

CAZON
Z 1
-2005
CO11

V.1

Government Publications

3 1761 11653304 3

REPORT OF THE Cornwall Inquiry

PHASE 1
FACTS & FINDINGS

VOLUME 1

VOLUME 2

VOLUME 3

VOLUME 4

The Honourable G. Normand Glaude
Commissioner

Ontario

December 14, 2009

The Honourable Chris Bentley
Attorney General of Ontario
Ministry of the Attorney General
720 Bay Street, 11th Floor
Toronto, ON
M5G 2K1

Dear Mr. Attorney,

Re: Report of the Cornwall Public Inquiry

I am pleased to deliver to you my report in four volumes, in both English and French, as required under the terms of the Order-in-Council creating this Inquiry.

The first volume includes findings from my investigation into the institutional response of the justice system and other public institutions, in relation to allegations of historical abuse of young people in the Cornwall area. It also provides recommendations directed at improvements of response in similar circumstances. The second volume includes an account of Phase 2 activities and recommendations to support healing and reconciliation in the future. The third volume provides a summary of informal, non-evidentiary testimony. The fourth volume is an executive summary of volumes one and two of this Report.

It has been an honour to serve as Commissioner.

Yours truly,

A handwritten signature in dark ink, appearing to read "G. Normand Glaude".

The Honourable G. Normand Glaude
Commissioner

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023 with funding from University of Toronto

University of Toronto

REPORT OF THE Cornwall Inquiry

PHASE 1
FACTS & FINDINGS

VOLUME 1

VOLUME 2

VOLUME 3

VOLUME 4

The Honourable G. Normand Glaude
Commissioner

Ontario

Published by Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General

© Queen's Printer for Ontario 2009

Cover and Interior Design: Tania Craan Design
Book Layout: Lakeside Group Inc.
Printed in Canada: Webcom Inc.

ISBN 978-1-4435-0000-5 (Print) (set)

ISBN 978-1-4435-0001-2 (Print) (v.1)

Library and Archives Canada Cataloguing in Publication

Cornwall Public Inquiry (Ont.)
Report of the Cornwall Inquiry.

4 v.

Issued also in French under title: Rapport de la Commission d'enquête sur Cornwall.

Complete contents: v. 1, phase 1. Facts & findings – v. 2, phase 2.

Services and programs for healing & reconciliation – v. 3, phase 2.

Voices from informal testimony – v. 4, phase 1 & 2. Executive summary.

Available also on CD-ROM and on the Internet.

ISBN 978-1-4435-0000-5 (set). – ISBN 978-1-4435-0001-2 (v. 1).

ISBN 978-1-4435-0003-6 (v. 2). – ISBN 978-1-4435-0005-0 (v. 3).

ISBN 978-1-4435-0007-4 (v. 4)

1. Child sexual abuse—Investigation—Ontario—Cornwall.
2. Sex crimes—Investigation—Ontario—Cornwall. 3. Criminal investigation—Ontario—Cornwall.
4. Governmental investigations—Ontario. 5. Cornwall Public Inquiry (Ont.).

HV8079.C46C66 2009

362.76'650971375

C2009-905602-X

A hardcopy of this publication can be ordered online at www.serviceontario.ca/publications

By phone through the Service Ontario Contact Centre
Monday to Friday, 8:30 AM to 5:00 PM
416 326-5300
416 325-3408 (TTY)
1 800 668-9938 toll-free across Canada
1 800 268-7095 TTY toll-free across Ontario

This Report is also available at www.cornwallinquiry.ca

Disponible en français

Preserving our environment

Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General chose Legacy Lightweight Opaque 20% post-consumer recycled paper for the pages of this book printed by Webcom Inc.

Mixed Sources

Product group from well-managed forests, controlled sources and recycled wood or fiber
www.fsc.org Cert no. SW-COC-002358
© 1996 Forest Stewardship Council

Table of Contents

Acknowledgments	xli
1 Introduction	1
Background to the Cornwall Public Inquiry	1
The Community of Cornwall	4
The Mandate	6
Preliminary Considerations of Phase 1 of the Inquiry	7
Organization of this Report	8
2 Expert Evidence on Child Abuse	15
Experts From Different Disciplines Testify at the Phase 1 Hearings	15
Types and Prevalence of Child Sexual Abuse	19
Important Facts About Child Sexual Abuse	21
The Impact of Child Sexual Abuse	22
Difficulties of Disclosure Encountered by Child Victims of Sexual Abuse	27
The Duty to Report Child Abuse	28
False Denials by Perpetrators Versus False Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Children	31
Growing Awareness of Child Sexual Abuse	32
Approach of the Courts to Child Sexual Abuse Cases	41
Bill C-2: Attention to Historical Cases of Child Sexual Abuse	47
Impediments to the Successful Prosecution of Child Abuse Cases	50
Particular Difficulties in Historical Sexual Abuse Cases	53
3 The Impact of Child Abuse	57

4 Media Coverage of Allegations of Historical Abuse of Young Persons in the Cornwall Area, 1986–2004	73
Expert Witness on Media Analysis Testifies at Hearings	73
Purpose and Scope of the Media Study for the Cornwall Inquiry	74
Methodology	75
Document Sample	75
Variables Examined in the Media Study	76
Media Landscape	78
Geographic Origins of Media Coverage	80
Peak Years of Media Coverage	80
Media Genres	81
Media Sources	85
First Fact Cited in Print Media and Tone of Media	88
Media Framing	89
Conclusions	95
5 Institutional Response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services	99
Introduction	99
Probation Services	99
Duties of Probation Officers	102
Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office Receives a Serious Complaint Regarding Probation Officer Nelson Barque	103
Complaint to the Cornwall Probation Office About Nelson Barque	104
Peter Sirrs Conducts a Preliminary Investigation	105
A Lock on Nelson Barque's Office Door and Pornographic Material in His Office	109
Nelson Barque Resigns From the Cornwall Probation Office	113
The McMaster Report: Inspection and Investigation Branch Decides No Further Action Is Necessary After Barque Resignation	116
Failure to Assess Whether Other Probationers Were Subjected to Inappropriate Acts by the Cornwall Probation Officer	119
Nelson Barque's Application to Work With Children After His Resignation From Probation: Peter Sirrs Is Contacted for a Reference	124
Nelson Barque's Employment at and Resignation From Équipe Psycho-sociale	129

Carole Cardinal's Contact With Nelson Barque on the Child Abuse Prevention Council	131
Probation Staff Aware of Nelson Barque's Interaction With Children at Subsequent Places of Employment	132
Tension Between the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office and His Staff	133
Relationship Between Area Manager Emile Robert and the Cornwall Probation Staff: Double Standards and Preferential Treatment of Ken Seguin	137
Relationship Between Ken Seguin and His Clients	139
Gerald Renshaw Moves in With His Former Probation Officer	145
Area Manager and Regional Manager Informed of the Renshaw-Seguin Living Arrangement	145
Reaction of Probation Staff to the Renshaw-Seguin Living Arrangement	152
Allegations by Gerald Renshaw of Sexual Abuse by Ken Seguin	153
The Varley Incident	157
One Week Passes Before Ken Seguin Discusses Varley Incident With the Cornwall Area Manager	157
Emile Robert's Contact With the OPP	161
Regional Manager Learns of Varley Incident Eight Months Later	163
No Investigation Recommended	167
Varley Incident Not Reflected in Performance Appraisals of Ken Seguin and Emile Robert	170
Deborah Newman Sends a Mediator to the Cornwall Probation Office, Emile Robert Is Subsequently Transferred to Ottawa	172
The Establishment of the Independent Investigations Unit in 1992	176
Regional Manager Receives a Call From David Silmsers: Allegations of Sexual Abuse by a Former Probation Officer at the Cornwall Office	180
Bill Roy Contacts the IIU, the Deputy Minister's Office, and the Police	181
December 17, 1993	183
Decision Silmsers Must Lodge His Complaint in Writing: Failure of the IIU to Investigate the Complaint	184
Failure to Examine Ministry Files From the Cornwall Probation Office: Another Lost Opportunity	188

Cornwall Probation Officers Express Concerns to Ken Seguin About Socializing With Probationers 193

Concerns About Ken Seguin's Behaviour Persist: Probation Officers Ron Gendron and Jos van Diepen Follow Seguin to Cornwall Square Mall 195

Ken Seguin's Suicide 196

Changes in Ken Seguin's Behaviour 196

Ken Seguin's Death 198

Ron Leroux Finds Ken Seguin's Body 199

Cornwall Probation Staff Learn of Seguin's Death 201

Nelson Barque Charged With Gross Indecency and Indecent Assault of Probationer Albert Roy 204

Nelson Barque Supervised by Cornwall Office During His Probation 207

Allegations of Sexual Improprieties on Project Truth Website 211

Mr. van Diepen Raises Concerns About the Website to Area Manager Claude Legault 212

Richard Nadeau Contacts Mr. van Diepen 214

Deborah Newman Initiates an Administrative Review at the Ministry of Correctional Services, Paul Downing Is Appointed 215

Contact With Law Enforcement Agencies: OPP and the Crown 218

Paul Downing Examines the Allegations on the Project Truth Website 219

Further Communication Between Deborah Newman and Paul Downing: The Need for a More Formal Investigation 220

Paul Downing Prepares Summary Review, Decision Made to Proceed With Stage One Investigation Only 221

Transfer of Mr. van Diepen From Cornwall Probation Office to Integrated Justice 227

Paul Downing Submits His Report to Deborah Newman and Gary Commeford 227

New Disclosures of Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Probation Officer Ken Seguin 230

Paul Downing Instructed to Close the File: No Historical Review of Former Probation Clients and No Disciplinary Measures Taken Against Ministry Employees 231

Increasing Number of Sexual Abuse Disclosures Confront the Cornwall Probation Office 236

Relocation of Cornwall Probation Office 242

Hiring Procedures for Probation Officers and the New Probation and Parole Service Model 242

No Historical Review of Files Undertaken in Cornwall Probation Office to Identify Other Victims of Sexual Abuse 243

Recommendations 246

6 Institutional Response of the Cornwall Community Police Service 251

Introduction 251

Allegations of Sexual Assault Made by Probationers of Nelson Barque 259

The Earl Landry Jr. Investigation 266

Chief Claude Shaver Pays a Visit to Earl Landry Sr.'s Home 267

Earl Landry Sr. Contacts the Investigating Officer in His Son's Case: The CPS Investigation Ends 268

CAS Contacts the CPS in 1993: Another Disclosure by a Child of Sexual Molestation by Earl Landry Jr. 271

More Disclosures in 1996 272

Sergeant Brian Snyder Assumes Responsibility for Landry Jr. Investigation 273

Earl Landry Jr. Breaches His Conditions of Release and Is Arrested by Sergeant Snyder 276

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie Identifies Several Problems in the Landry Jr. Investigation 276

Staff Sergeant Snyder Has Contact With C-52 Prior to Testifying at the Inquiry 279

Did the Former Police Chief Obstruct the CPS in Its Investigation of His Son Earl Landry Jr.? 280

Another Conflict of Interest? 283

The Investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc 284

Constable Brian Payment Assigned the Leblanc Investigation 284

Interview at the Burgess Home 286

Charges Laid Against Jean Luc Leblanc 288

The Marcel Lalonde Investigation 293

Constable Kevin Malloy Contacts the Crown 296

The Lalonde File Is Placed in Abeyance 297

CPS Learns of Allegations of Historical Sexual Abuse of David Silmsen by His Teacher, Marcel Lalonde 300

Further Allegations of Abuse Made by Victims of Marcel Lalonde 302

Sergeant Brian Snyder's Involvement in the Lalonde File 304

Marcel Lalonde Is Arrested 306

Adjournment of the Lalonde Trial 307

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie Meets With Cornwall Police Chief and the OPP: Ottawa Police Contacted	310
Staff Sergeant Derochie's Orders to Constable Perry Dunlop in January 2000	312
C-8 Discloses Before Lalonde Trial That Abuse on School Trip Never Happened	314
The Conviction of Marcel Lalonde	315
The Jeannette Antoine Investigation	316
The 1989 Complaint and the Involvement of CPS	317
The CAS Executive Director Meets With CPS and the Crown	317
Constable Kevin Malloy Assigned the Antoine Investigation	318
Four-Month Delay in the Antoine Case	321
Crown Correspondence	324
No Further Activity on the Antoine File	325
Suzanne Lapointe, Antoine's Sister, Discloses to Constable Malloy Abuse When She Was a Ward of the CAS	326
Constable Heidi Sebalj's Contact With Jeannette Antoine	327
Antoine Allegations in the Media: Deputy Chief Asks Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie to Review Investigation	328
The Involvement of Constable White in the Antoine Case	329
No Criminal Charges Laid	333
Systemic Problems, Poor Case Management, Delays, Inadequate Record Keeping, and Poor Supervision	334
Allegations by David Silmsers of Sexual Abuse by a Priest and Probation Officer	338
David Silmsers Contacts the Cornwall Police	338
Silmsers File Reassigned to Constable Heidi Sebalj	343
David Silmsers Requests a Male Officer	345
David Silmsers Contacts the Cornwall Police Chief, Repeats Request for a Male Officer	346
Call From Father Charles MacDonald's Lawyer	350
Contact Between David Silmsers, Constable Sebalj, and Father MacDonald's Lawyer: Proposal of a Civil Settlement by the Diocese	351
Father MacDonald's Lawyer Indicates His Client Is Prepared to Take a Lie Detector Test	353
Other Victims of Father MacDonald, CPS Decides Not to Pursue the Investigation of Ken Seguin	354
Constable Sebalj Receives a Call From Father MacDonald's Lawyer: Client Prefers to Be Escorted Rather Than Handcuffed When Arrested	357

Constable Sebalj's Supervisors Unaware No Work Done on the Silmsers File	357
David Silmsers Enters a Civil Settlement With Father MacDonald and the Church	358
CPS Investigation of Father MacDonald Ends: Sergeant Claude Lortie Expresses Dissatisfaction at September 1993, Morning Management Meeting	361
CPS Officers Learn of Perry Dunlop's Involvement in the Silmsers File	363
Chief Claude Shaver Meets With Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald	366
Cornwall Police Chief Learns That Perry Dunlop Gave David Silmsers's Statement to the CAS	367
Chief Shaver and Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet Meet With the Papal Nuncio and the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall	373
The Derochie Investigation	377
Helen Dunlop Arrives at Chief Shaver's Home, Registers Complaint About the Treatment of Her Husband by the CPS	380
Constable Dunlop Is Not "Counselled" for His Transgression	382
Ken Seguin Found Dead	385
Conclusions of Staff Sergeant Derochie on His Review of the CPS Investigation of the Silmsers Complaint	387
Ottawa Police Service Asked to Investigate Allegations of Cover-up by the Cornwall Police Service in the Silmsers Matter	390
No Investigative Activity for Over One Month, Lack of Documentation and Inadequate Reporting Process	391
Constable Sebalj Remains Responsible for Silmsers Investigation Despite Her Inexperience and the Complainant's Request for a Male Officer	392
Failure to Recognize Urgency of Investigation	394
Failure to Meet With a Potential Witness	394
Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald's Conflict of Interest	395
Leak of Victim's Statement to the Public	396
"Inept and Ineffective" Investigation of the Cornwall Police Service	397
No Cover-Up and Recommendations That an Outside Police Agency Conduct a Thorough Investigation of the Silmsers Complaint	401
News Releases by Cornwall Police Services Board Regarding Skinner Report: Transparency?	402
January 11, 1994 Press Release: Courville Undertakes That Board Will Be Forthcoming With Ottawa Police Review of Silmsers Investigation	402
February 2, 1994, Press Release and News Conference	404
Problems With Morale at the CPS: Internal Dissension	407

The Cornwall Police Services Board	415
The Mandate of the Board	415
Adequacy of Staffing at the CPS	417
Failure to Prioritize the Investigation of Sexual Assaults	418
Lack of Protocols on Sexual Assault	420
Lack of Training in the Investigation of Sexual Assault	421
Tension Among Board Members	424
Tensions Between Chief Shaver and the Cornwall Police Services Board	426
Lack of Policies on Conflicts of Interest	428
The Investigations of Richard Hickerson and James Lewis	432
Investigation of Allegations by Marc Latour of Sexual Abuse by His Elementary School Teacher	440
Allegations Against Father Charles MacDonald by Albert Lalonde	447
Perry Dunlop	454
Career History up to 1993	455
Discipline and Evaluation History up to 1993	456
Relevant Aspects of Perry Dunlop's Personal Connections	457
Constable Dunlop Becomes Aware of the Silmsen Complaint	458
Discipline Related to Disclosure to CAS	460
1996 Independent Investigations While on Leave	463
Perry Dunlop Returns to Work at the CPS	466
Perry Dunlop Leaves the CPS	468
After Perry Dunlop's Departure	469
Perry Dunlop as Part of Institutional Response	470
Recommendations	472

7 Institutional Response of the Ontario Provincial Police 479

Introduction	479
History of the OPP	480
Major Case Management Procedures	485
Training and the OPP	486
The OPP in Eastern Ontario	488
Schedule 1: Ontario Provincial Police Organizational Charts	491
Ken Seguin's Involvement in the Varley Investigation	497
The Commencement of the Investigation	497
The Officers Take a Statement From Ken Seguin	498

Decision to Wait Before Notifying Probation Office	498
Police Communication With Government Agencies	500
Videotapes Found in Ron Leroux's House by the OPP	501
C-8 Makes a Complaint Against Ron Leroux to the OPP	501
The OPP Learn That Ron Leroux Had Two More Firearms Registered	502
The OPP Execute a Search Warrant at Ron Leroux's Residence	502
Return to Justice Form Does Not Identify Seized Materials	504
Review of the Videotapes	504
Ron Leroux Signs the Quit Claim	505
Destruction of the Videotapes	506
Poor Record Keeping Fuels Rumours	507
Investigation of Ken Seguin's Sudden Death	508
Discovery of Ken Seguin's Body	508
The OPP Are Notified and Attend the Scene	509
Seguin Family Members Attend the Scene	509
Early Determination That Death Was Self-Inflicted	510
Detective Constable Randy Millar Takes Statement From Ron Leroux	510
Detective Constable Randy Millar's Knowledge of Allegations Against Ken Seguin	511
Detective Constable Randy Millar's Contact With Constable Perry Dunlop	511
Detective Constable Randy Millar Attends Cornwall Police Service	512
Offence of Extortion Considered	513
Officers Meet With Seguin Family	513
The End of the Investigation	514
Investigation of David Silmsen for Extortion	515
Meeting Between Superintendent Carson Fougère and the Seguin Family	515
Assignment of Detective Inspector Fred Hamelink and the Investigating Officers	516
Coordination With Detective Inspector Tim Smith's Investigations	517
Investigative Steps of Extortion Investigation	519
Interactions With Seguin Family During the Investigation	524
No Charges Laid in Extortion Investigation	526
Insufficient Coordination and Information Sharing Among Investigators	526

Commencement of Detective Inspector Tim Smith's 1994 Investigations 528

Communication Between Acting Chief Carl Johnston and Deputy Commissioner Ronald Piers 528

Police Press Releases 529

Assignment of Detective Inspector Tim Smith 529

Assignment of Detective Constable Michael Fagan 531

Comments on the Mandate of the Investigations 532

Re-Investigation of Father Charles MacDonald 532

Timing and Strategy of the Investigation 533

Limited Contact With CPS and CAS 534

Interview of David Silmser 535

Witness Statements Taken 539

Interview of Father Charles MacDonald 541

Preparation of Crown Brief 544

Detective Inspector Tim Smith's Views on Reasonable and Probable Grounds 545

David Silmser As a Complainant 547

Problems With the Investigation 548

Obstruction and Conspiracy Investigations 549

Meeting With CPS Chief Claude Shaver 549

Admission by Father Charles Macdonald to Bishop Eugène LaRocque 550

Source of Settlement Funds 551

Quality of the CPS Investigation 552

No Interviews With Other CPS Officers 552

No Interview of Constable Perry Dunlop 553

Investigation of the Crown's Involvement 554

Investigation Into the Diocese 555

Statements From Other Lawyers 559

Conclusion of Investigations 560

Flaws in the Conspiracy Investigation 561

Flaws in the Obstruction Investigation 562

Final Comments on the 1994 Investigations 563

Investigation of Milton MacDonald 564

Background 564

The MacDonald Family Learns of the Allegations 564

Detective Constable Randy Millar Meets With C-91's Father 565

Detective Constable Randy Millar Reports Allegation to Superintendent Carson Fougère	566
OPP Interaction With the Children's Aid Society (CAS) During the Investigation	567
Arrest and Prosecution	568
1994 Investigation of Nelson Barque	568
Complaint Made by Albert Roy	568
Information Sharing Between Constable Heidi Sebalj and Detective Constable William Zebruck	569
Interviews of Robert Sheets and C-90	569
Multiple Interviews of Albert Roy	570
Incident in the Car Between Detective Constable William Zebruck and Albert and Vicky Roy	571
Interviews of Probation Staff	572
Deficiencies in the Investigation	573
1995 Investigation of Father Charles MacDonald	573
Albert Lalonde	574
John MacDonald's Complaint Referred to the OPP	575
Father Kevin Maloney Complains of Harassment by David Silmser and John MacDonald	576
Contact Between Alleged Victims of Father Charles MacDonald	576
Complaint on Hold Until After Constable Perry Dunlop's Hearing	577
Submission of the Crown Brief	578
Robert Pelletier Recommends Charges Be Laid	579
Father Charles MacDonald Arrested	579
C-8's Allegations Against Father Charles MacDonald	580
C-8 Provides Statements to Constable Perry Dunlop and Others	580
C-8 Provides Statements to the OPP	581
Detective Constable Don Genier Sends Videotape to Detective Constable Michael Fagan	581
Father Charles MacDonald's Preliminary Inquiry	581
Investigation and Prosecution of Marcel Lalonde	583
CPS Refers C-68's Complaint to the OPP	583
Investigation of C-68's Complaint and Arrest of Marcel Lalonde	584
Detective Constable Don Genier Discovers Other Alleged Victims of Marcel Lalonde	584
OPP Refers Further Marcel Lalonde Complaints to CPS	585

OPP Involvement in CPS Arrest of Marcel Lalonde and Search of His Residence	586
The Decision Not to Include the Marcel Lalonde Case in Project Truth	586
OPP and CPS Charges Against Marcel Lalonde Are Combined	587
Coordination of Disclosure	587
Disclosure Issues Arising During the Preliminary Inquiry	588
Disclosure Issues Around the First Trial Date	589
Crown Claudette Wilhelm's Request for Assistance From the OPP	591
Marcel Lalonde's Conviction	592
Events Leading up to Project Truth	592
Constable Perry Dunlop's Lawsuit and Private Investigation	592
Involvement of Chief Julian Fantino	594
Ron Leroux's Complaint to the OPP in Orillia	596
Assignment of Detective Sergeant Pat Hall to the Death Threat Investigation	598
Project Truth: Initial Meetings Between OPP and Crowns	599
Constable Perry Dunlop Delivers Government Brief to Ministries	601
Only Solicitor General's Materials Passed on to the OPP	602
Indications to OPP That Constable Dunlop Delivered Additional Materials	602
Constable Dunlop Is Told OPP Will Investigate All Allegations	603
Initial Plan and Initial Coordination Meetings for Project Truth	604
Recent Major Investigations Into Child Sexual Abuse in Eastern Ontario	604
The Operational Plan for Project Truth	605
Selection of Officers	607
Mandate	610
Interactions With Other Institutions	610
Getting the Investigation Started	613
Initial Media Announcements of Project Truth	615
Press Release	615
Press Conference	616
Overview of Project Truth Investigations	617
The Duration of Project Truth	617
Number of Victims and Suspects Identified	618
Suspects Not Investigated	618
Suspects Investigated but Not Charged	619
Charges Laid and Outcome of Prosecutions	619

Daily Workings of Project Truth	620
Roles of the Officers	620
Availability of the Officers	621
Problems With Staffing	621
Case Management	624
Office Space	625
Materials From Previous Investigations	625
Investigative Methods	626
Cooperation From the Diocese	628
Cooperation With the Cornwall Probation Office	629
Interactions With Complainants	630
Project Truth's Mandate	631
Understanding of the Mandate by the OPP Outside Protect Truth	632
Understanding of Mandate by the Cornwall Police Service	633
Mandate Decisions	633
Victims' Perspectives on Impact of Mandate Decisions	642
Implications of an Ill-Defined Mandate	642
Interactions Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop	643
Initial Meeting Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop	644
August 7, 1997 Meeting Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop	646
Detective Sergeant Pat Hall Obtains Additional Names From Constable Perry Dunlop	648
Constable Perry Dunlop Won't Give Detective Sergeant Pat Hall Notes Upon Advice From His Lawyer	648
Constable Dunlop Discloses Yellow Binder and Additional Materials	650
C-18 Tells OPP That He Wasn't Abused	651
Constable Perry Dunlop Fires Lawyer Charles Bourgeois	652
Constable Perry Dunlop's Contact With Project Truth Victims	653
July 23, 1998, Meeting Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop	653
Delivery of the Government Brief to Project Truth	654
OPP Request for an Investigation of Constable Perry Dunlop	657
Constable Perry Dunlop Refuses to Sign Memo on Disclosure	657
Constable Perry Dunlop's Call to Claude Marleau	658
Contact With Victims in 1999	660
Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie Becomes the CPS Liaison Officer	660
Issues Arising in the Marcel Lalonde Trial	660

CPS Issues Comprehensive Order to Constable Perry Dunlop	662
Disclosure of Contact With C-2	663
Preparation of the Will-State and Incremental Disclosure	664
Ottawa Police Service Investigation of Constable Perry Dunlop	664
Constable Perry Dunlop Leaves Cornwall	665
C-8 Recants Just Prior to Marcel Lalonde Trial	665
Charges Against Father Charles MacDonald Withdrawn	666
Perry Dunlop's Testimony in Father Charles MacDonald 11(b) Motion	668
Further Request for an Investigation of Perry Dunlop for Perjury or Obstruction of Justice	668
Lack of Timely Disclosure	670
Project Truth Investigation of Father Charles MacDonald	671
Assignment of Detective Constable Joe Dupuis to Father Charles MacDonald Investigation	671
New Alleged Victims Come Forward to OPP	673
Father Charles MacDonald Arrested and Second Set of Charges Laid	676
Hallway Discussion Between Michael Neville and Robert Pelletier	676
Father Charles MacDonald's "Apology" Letters	677
Preliminary Inquiry	678
Change in Crown Attorney	678
C-2's Allegations	678
Dunlop Boxes	679
Application to Stay Father Charles MacDonald Proceedings	680
Investigation of Death Threats	681
Initial Investigative Action	681
Investigation After the Initiation of Project Truth	683
David Silmser's Death Threat Complaint	683
Interview of Ron Leroux	684
Interviews With Suspects	684
Submission of Crown Brief and Discussions With Helen Dunlop	685
Follow-Up With the Complainants	686
Comments on Delay in the Investigation	686
Investigations of Complaints of Claude Marleau and C-96	687
Claude Marleau Contacts OPP	687
Initial Interviews of Claude Marleau and C-96	687
Identification of Father René Dubé	690
Identification of Father Hollis Lapierre	691

Preparation of Crown Briefs and Crown Opinion	692
Follow-Up on the Consent Issue	692
Delay in Laying Charges Against Alleged Perpetrators	693
Simultaneous Arrests of Alleged Perpetrators	694
Claude Marleau's Contacts With Constable Perry Dunlop	695
The Links Among Alleged Abusers of Claude Marleau	696
Communication Between the OPP and Quebec Authorities	696
Claude Marleau's Perception of Treatment by the OPP	696
Outcome of the Prosecutions	696
Investigation of Richard Hickerson	697
Complaints Against Richard Hickerson	697
Caution and Release of Richard Hickerson	698
Richard Hickerson Death Investigation	699
Problems With Investigation and Delay of Arrest	699
Project Truth Investigation of Nelson Barque	699
Complaints Against Nelson Barque	700
Caution and Release of Nelson Barque	700
Concerns About Delay	701
Investigation of Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere	701
Investigation and Prosecution of Jacques Leduc	702
First Complaint to Ontario Provincial Police	702
Investigation of C-16's Complaint	703
Investigation of Allegations by C-17 and C-23	703
Constable Perry Dunlop's Conversation With C-16's Mother	704
Jacques Leduc's Contact With Victims	706
C-17 Receives a Death Threat	706
Investigation of C-22's Allegations	706
OPP Meets With Children's Aid Society About Leduc Victims	708
Arrest of Jacques Leduc	709
First Trial of Jacques Leduc and Stay of Proceedings	710
Police and Crowns Meet After Meeting With Defence Counsel	713
Appeal of Stay of Proceedings	728
Jacques Leduc's Wife Contacts C-22	728
Disclosure Motion in Second Trial of Jacques Leduc	729
Perry Dunlop Served With Production Order	729
Investigations Relating to the Cornwall Classical College	731
C-102's Allegations	732

C-103's Allegations	732
Richard Nadeau's Allegations	732
Allegations Against Father Jean Primeau	732
Allegations About a "Pedophile Ring" at Classical College	733
Linkages Between Project Truth Investigation and Classical College	734
Evaluation of Investigation of Classical College	734
Investigation of Malcolm MacDonald for Sexual Abuse	736
Allegations of Abuse by Malcolm MacDonald	737
Interviews With Malcolm MacDonald	738
Crown Opinion	739
Arrest and Release of Malcolm MacDonald	739
Death of Malcolm MacDonald	739
C-8's Allegations Against Ron Leroux and Jacques Martell	740
Statements to the OPP on January 23, 1997	740
Statements Contained in the Fantino Brief and in Other Disclosure Provided by Constable Perry Dunlop	741
C-8 Is Interviewed About His Allegations Against Ron Leroux	741
Ron Leroux Not Aware of Investigation	742
Crown Brief Submitted for Recommendation	743
Investigation of Jacques Martell	743
C-8's View of the Investigation	744
Investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc	744
Failure of OPP to Respond to Complaint in Fall 1998	744
Project Truth Becomes Aware of Allegations Against Jean Luc Leblanc	746
Surveillance of Jean Luc Leblanc	747
Decision to Delay Arrest	748
Arrest of Jean Luc Leblanc	748
Contact With the Children's Aid Society	749
Further Investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc	750
Further Charges Laid	751
Sentencing of Jean Luc Leblanc	752
The Police Services Board Complaint	752
Investigation of Bernard Sauvé	754
Investigations of Complaints of Ron Leroux and C-15	756
Statements by Ron Leroux	756
Abuse at St. Columban's Boys' School	757
Abuse at Cameron's Point	757

Abuse at Malcolm MacDonald's Cottage	758
Abuse at the St. Andrew's Parish House	759
Credibility of Ron Leroux	759
Allegations by C-15	759
Submission of the Crown Briefs	760
Investigation of Brian Dufour	761
Investigation of Keith Jodoin	763
Investigation of Father Romeo Major	764
Project Truth Receives Complaint Against Father Major	764
C-69 Alleges Abuse by Father Romeo Major	764
C-69 Not Medically Fit to Proceed	766
Prosecution and Withdrawal of Charges	766
David Petepiece's Complaint	767
Investigation of John Christopher Wilson	770
External Pressures: The Media, Websites, and Garry Guzzo	772
Media at the Outset of Project Truth—Framing the Issues	772
Media and the July 1998 Arrests	775
The Dunlops, the Media, and Project Truth	776
Garry Guzzo's Involvement	777
Reports on CBC Radio	782
Shift in the Public's Perception of Project Truth	783
Richard Nadeau and the Project Truth Websites	784
Bill 103: Proposal for a Public Inquiry	786
Garry Guzzo's Statements in the Legislature	789
Public Pressure to Wrap Up the Investigation	790
Announcement of End of Project Truth	791
Need for a Coordinated Media Strategy	792
Conspiracy Investigation	793
Mandate of the Conspiracy Investigation	794
The Need for a Broader Mandate	796
Decision to Delay the Investigation	798
The Set-Up of the Conspiracy Investigation	801
Investigation of the "Clan of Pedophiles" Allegation	801
Investigation of the Silmsen Settlement	805
Destruction of Videotapes Found in Ron Leroux's Home	814
Submission of the Crown Brief	815
Awaiting an Opinion on the Brief	818
The Winding Down of Project Truth	820

Follow-Up With the Crown	821
Crown Opinion and Press Release	821
Investigation of Linkages Among Alleged Perpetrators	823
Defining a “Ring”	823
Allegations of Joint Abuse	825
Allegations of Passing of Victims and Overt or Implicit Knowledge	826
Allegations of Passive Awareness of Abuse	826
The Problems With the OPP’s Investigation	827
Using Information About Linkages	829
Conclusion	830
Recommendations	836

8 Institutional Response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall 843

Introduction	843
The Organizational Structure of the Roman Catholic Church	843
Authority Within the Catholic Church	845
Orders of Deacons, Priests, and Bishops	845
Organizational Structure of Dioceses in Ontario	846
Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall	846
Expert Evidence on Canon Law and Sexual Abuse by Clergy	849
Background of Experts	849
Frequency of Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Clergy	852
The Catholic Church’s Historical Response to Sexual Abuse by Clergy	853
Response of the Catholic Church to Clergy Sexual Abuse Today	857
Adequacy of Canon Law to Deal With Sexual Abuse by Clergy	868
The Effect of Secrecy in the Catholic Church on Dealing With Clergy Sexual Abuse	871
Impact of Clericalism on Dealing With Clergy Sexual Abuse	873
Screening and Training of Candidates for the Priesthood	873
Duty to Report	876
Treatment of Abusive Priests	879
Return to Ministry for Abusive Priests	880
Policies and Procedures on Allegations of Sexual Abuse Against Members of the Clergy	881
Principles and Procedures for Clergy in Difficulty, 1987	882
Proposed Procedure to Be Applied in Cases of Child Sexual Abuse by a Cleric, 1988	883

Criteria for Accepting Ordained Priests to the Diocese, 1989	885
Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminaries, and Pastoral Assistants, 1992	886
Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians, and Pastoral Assistants, 1995	887
Protocol for Priests Who Are the Subject Matter of Criminal Proceedings or Civil Litigations, 1996	888
Policy and Procedures for Screening Church Personnel, 2000–2002	890
Creation of the Ad Hoc Committee on Safeguarding Against Abuse, 2002	891
Diocesan Guidelines on Managing Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees, and Volunteers, 2003	893
Screening Policy for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, 2004	896
Diocesan Guidelines on Managing Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees, and Volunteers, 2005	896
Orientations Issued by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops With Respect to Sexual Abuse of Minors, 2007	898
Conclusion	899
Father Gilles Deslauriers	899
Parishioners Raise Questionable Behaviour of Father Deslauriers With the Bishop, Claude Thibault Meets With Bishop LaRocque	901
Claude Thibault's Failed Attempt to Disclose Abuse to Bishop	905
Brisson Family Discloses Abuse of Benoit Brisson to Priests in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall	906
Lise Brisson Contacts Father Claude Thibault	908
Bishop LaRocque Learns There Are More Victims: Father Deslauriers Instructed to Leave Diocese	911
Knowledge or Suspicions of Clergy Regarding Father Deslauriers' Inappropriate Behaviour	913
Father Deslauriers Celebrates Mass in Hull	914
Father Ménard Sends a Report on the Deslauriers Matter to the Bishop	916
The Establishment of the Ad Hoc Committee	918
The Brisson Family Contacts the Media	922
Cornwall Police Interview Bishop LaRocque, Father Thibault, and Other Members of the Clergy	922
Incardination Into Another Diocese	925
Father Deslauriers Is Criminally Charged	927
The Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall Offers to Pay the Costs of Therapy for Victims of Father Deslauriers	929

Father Deslauriers Moves to a Different Diocese	929
Conclusion	931
Father Carl Stone	932
History of Sexual Relations With Boys and Young Men	932
Father Stone Returns to Cornwall in 1981	937
Bishop Receives Complaints About Father Stone: Priest Instructed to Leave the Diocese	943
Father Charles MacDonald	948
David Silmser Contacts the Church: Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Father Charles MacDonald	949
Church Officials in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall Meet With David Silmser, February 9, 1993	955
Pressure on the Bishop to Settle With David Silmser: A Difficult August Meeting With Bishop LaRocque	958
Advice for Bishop LaRocque at the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops	960
A Second Meeting With the Bishop: Agreement to Settle Civilly With David Silmser	960
Preparation of the Release Signed by David Silmser	963
Did Malcolm MacDonald, Jacques Leduc, or Sean Adams Contact Duncan MacDonald at the Time of the Settlement With David Silmer?	964
Sean Adams' Involvement in the Silmser Matter, Settlement Documents Are Signed	966
Instructions to Bursar of Diocese to Issue a Cheque in the Amount of $27,000	971
Cornwall Police Meet With Bishop LaRocque	973
The Children's Aid Society Arranges to Meet the Bishop	974
The Diocese Issues a Press Release	977
Assessment and Treatment for Father MacDonald at the Southdown Facility	983
Father Charles MacDonald Not Asked to Resign From Ministry Until 1998	986
Conclusion	988
Father Romeo Major	989
Criminal Charges Withdrawn Against Father Major Due to Illness of Complainant, Bishop Returns Priest to Ministerial Duties	991
Father Paul Lapierre, Father René Dubé, and Father Don Scott	993
Allegations Against Father Lapierre and Father Dubé	993
Father Don Scott	1001
Bishop Durocher Learns of Criminal Charges	1002

Father Ken Martin 1004

Response of the Diocese 1007

Father Hollis Lapierre 1009

Father Lucien Lussier 1012

Problems With the Priest Persist 1015

Father Lussier Returns to the Diocese 1018

Father Lussier's File Not Read by Bishops 1019

Father François Lefebvre 1020

Recommendations 1023

9 Institutional Response of the Children's Aid Society 1031

History and Mandate of Children's Aid Societies 1031

Organization of Children's Aid Societies 1034

The Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry 1034

Funding of Children's Aid Societies 1036

The Relationship Between Children's Aid Societies and the Ministry of Community and Social Services 1036

The Relationship Between Children's Aid Societies and the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies 1039

The Development of Protocols and the Relationships Between the Children's Aid Society of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry and Other Agencies and Organizations 1040

The Development of Protocols With Other Agencies 1040

Policies on Making Claims for Compensation 1041

Intake and Investigation Procedures for Protection Services 1041

Screening and Supervision of Employees 1043

Training of CAS of SD&G Employees 1045

Procedures When Complaints Are Made About the CAS 1045

Record Keeping and Access to Records 1046

Foster Homes 1048

Recruitment of Foster Parents 1048

Screening of Foster Homes 1049

Training and Support for Foster Parents 1052

Working Relationship Between Children's Aid Societies and Foster Homes 1055

Supervision of Foster Homes 1056

Rights and Responsibilities of Children in Care 1059

Discipline of Children in Care	1060
Use of Restraint in a Group or Foster Home	1061
Group Homes	1062
Duty to Report	1063
Child Welfare Act, 1965	1063
Child Welfare Act, 1978	1064
Ministry Training Materials, 1979	1065
Ministry Standards and Guidelines on Child Abuse, 1981	1066
Child and Family Services Act, 1984	1067
Ministry Revised Standards, 1992	1069
Child and Family Services Amendment Act, 1999	1070
Child Abuse Register	1074
Reporting to the Child Abuse Register	1076
Review of the Child Abuse Register	1077
Utilization of the Child Abuse Register	1078
Is the CAR Still a Useful Tool?	1078
The Dawson Review and Report	1079
The Case of Ron Locey: A Failure in Child Protection	1080
The Dawson Review Is Undertaken	1081
The Dawson Report Findings and Recommendations	1082
The Cieslewicz Foster Home	1085
Allegations of Sexual Abuse Against Hans Cieslewicz	1086
C-77's Allegations	1086
C-78's Allegations; Ms Cieslewicz and the Children Leave the Home	1087
Complaint About the Care of C-78	1088
C-79's Allegations	1089
C-76 Comes Forward With Allegations	1090
The CAS Report to the Child Welfare Branch and Meeting With the Crown Attorney	1090
The Cieslewicz Home Is Closed	1093
Roberta Archambault and the Lapensee Group Home	1095
Roberta Archambault in the Hubert Foster Home	1095
Interaction With the CAS While in the Hubert Foster Home	1096
Disclosure of Abuse to a CAS Worker	1098
Removal of Ms Archambault From the Hubert Foster Home	1099
Roberta Archambault Is Placed in the Lapensee Group Home	1100
Disclosure of Physical Abuse at the Huberts	1100

Sexual Abuse by Brian Lapensee	1101
CAS Investigation Into Allegations Against Brian Lapensee, November–December 1982	1102
Tom O'Brien Reports to the Ministry and Meets With the Crown	1105
Home Not Closed, Charges Not Laid	1106
Brian Lapensee Returns to the Lapensee Home	1106
Roberta Archambault Spends Christmas With the Lapenses	1107
The Easter Weekend Incident and Roberta Archambault's Second Suicide Attempt	1108
The Lapenses Resign and the Group Home Is Closed	1111
Staff of the Lapensee Group Home	1112
Roberta Archambault Is Placed in the deRonde Home	1113
Roberta Archambault Attempts to Access Her CAS File	1114
Jeannette Antoine	1115
The Reynen Foster Home	1115
Interaction With the CAS While in the Reynen Home	1116
Ms Antoine Alleges Abuse at the Looyen and Heemskerk Homes	1118
Jeannette Antoine Leaves the Reynen Home	1120
Jeannette Antoine's Experience in CAS Group Homes	1121
A Difficult Childhood	1121
The Second Street Group Home	1122
Bryan Keough's Knowledge of and Participation in Discipline in the Second Street Group Home	1123
CAS Officials Aware of Problems at Second Street Group Home in Early 1976	1125
Residents Run Away From the Second Street Home: Complaints by Children of Sexual Conduct and Excessive Physical Punishment	1127
Five Children Run Away From the Second Street Home	1130
Ian MacLean Is Unsuccessful at Introducing Position Changes at the Group Home	1132
Jeannette Antoine Discloses to the CAS Abuse When She Was a Ward of the Agency	1135
Bryan Keough's Application to Adopt a Child	1139
Richard Abell Succeeds Tom O'Brien As Executive Director of the Children's Aid Society	1141
Jeannette Antoine Requests Disclosure of Her File and Renews Allegations of Abuse	1141
Geraldine Fitzpatrick and Constable Sebalj Interview Jeannette Antoine: An Unauthorized CAS Investigation	1144

Antoine Allegations Against CAS Publicized in the Media	1146
Response to Reported Allegations at the Second Street Group Home	1148
Earl Landry Jr.	1149
Earl Landry Jr. Is Named As an Alleged Perpetrator	1149
CAS Receives a Letter From Dr. Park Containing Clear Allegations Against Earl Landry Jr.	1149
The CAS Does Not Investigate; Earl Landry Jr. Not a “Caregiver”	1150
No Reference to Earl Landry Jr. in CAS Case Notes	1151
The Campbell Case	1151
An Unfortunate Failure to Investigate	1152
1993: Earl Landry Jr. Becomes a Foster Parent	1153
Follow-up Regarding the Report by Dr. Nadler	1154
Joint Investigation With CPS Does Not Proceed	1154
Mr. Landry Jr.’s Employer Is Not Contacted	1155
Continued Attempts to Identify the Name of the Alleged Abuser	1155
Another Allegation Is Made Against Earl Landry Jr. in 1995	1156
C-54 Discloses Abuse by Earl Landry Jr.	1157
Poor Cross-Referencing and Record Keeping Create Unacceptable Risk	1157
Project Blue	1158
The CAS Meets With the Chief of Police	1162
The CAS Meets With Bishop LaRocque	1164
The Initiation of Project Blue: October 14, 1993	1167
CAS Receives a Call From Jacques Leduc	1169
The CAS Meets With the Cornwall Police Service	1170
The CAS Meets With David Silmser	1171
Interviews of Altar Servers	1174
Contact With Helen and Perry Dunlop	1174
Failed Attempt to Interview Father MacDonald	1175
David Silmser’s Allegations of Abuse Are Broadcast on Television: Distrust of Institutions Deepens	1176
“Verification” of Abuse by Father MacDonald	1178
Another Alleged Victim of Father MacDonald: John MacDonald	1181
Ottawa Police Service Investigates	1181
Reflections on Project Blue	1182
Relationship Between CAS and Project Truth Investigators	1183

C-14 1184

The Barber Foster Home	1185
The Hubert Foster Home	1189
Bryan Keough Conducts an Investigation	1191
Transfer From the Hubert Foster Home to the Lapensee Group Home	1193
The MacIntosh Foster Home	1193
Alleged Sexual Abuse by Frank Rolland	1194
Counselling	1195
Termination of C-14's Wardship	1196
C-14 Discloses Sexual Abuse Allegations to Bryan Keough	1196
C-14 Attempts to Get Information About His File From the CAS	1197
C-14 Discloses Abuse to the OPP; No Charges Are Laid	1198
The CAS Terminates C-17's File	1198
C-14 Attempts to Obtain His CAS File	1198
C-14 Discloses Abuse to Project Truth	1199
Conclusion	1200

Catherine Sutherland 1200

Catherine Sutherland Alleges the CAS Failed to Protect Her From Her Mother's Abuse	1201
Allegations of Sexual Abuse at Foster Home	1202
Catherine Sutherland Attempts to Obtain Her CAS File	1203
Conclusions About File Access	1213
Involvement With Police Forces	1214

Allegations Against Jean Luc Leblanc 1215

The Children's Aid Society Is Notified of Allegations, 1986	1216
The First CAS Interview of Scott Burgess	1217
The Burgess Home Visit	1218
CAS Fails to Interview Any Other Burgess Children	1218
Further Interviews	1219
Ongoing CAS Involvement With the Burgess and Tyo Families Related to Allegations Against Mr. Leblanc	1219
Bill McKinnon	1220
The CAS Gets Information About "Jean Luc" From a School Principal	1221
The CAS Gets More Information About Mr. Leblanc	1223
A Report to CAS That C-81 Was Living in a Tent in Mr. Leblanc's Backyard	1224
Report to CAS That Mr. Leblanc Was Seen With Young Boys	1226

CAS–OPP Project Truth Contact Regarding Jean Luc Leblanc	1227
Cross-Referencing of Files and Information	1227

Conclusion	1228
------------	------

Recommendations	1234
-----------------	------

10 Institutional Response of School Boards 1239

Upper Canada District School Board	1239
------------------------------------	------

Introduction	1239
---------------------	------

Robert Sabourin	1247
------------------------	------

Father Gilles Deslauriers	1255
----------------------------------	------

Nelson Barque	1258
----------------------	------

Jean Luc Leblanc	1259
-------------------------	------

Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario	1264
---	------

Introduction	1264
---------------------	------

Marcel Lalonde	1269
-----------------------	------

Gilf Greggain	1273
----------------------	------

Lucien Labelle	1275
-----------------------	------

Recommendations	1277
-----------------	------

11 Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General 1281

Introduction	1281
--------------	------

Responsibilities of the Criminal Law Division and the Role of the Crown	1281
--	------

Child Abuse Coordination, Victim Services, and Child-Friendly Courts Provided by the Ministry of the Attorney General	1283
--	------

The Basic Course of Prosecution of an Offence—Who Does What and When	1284
---	------

Criminal Code Provisions Concerning Sexual Abuse Have Changed Over Time	1285
--	------

Policies to Guide Crown Counsel Have Increased Over Time	1288
---	------

Policies and Protocols Related to Relationships Between the Crown and Other Institutions	1288
---	------

Policies and Protocols Related to Prosecutions of Child and Sexual Abuse Cases	1291
---	------

Victim-Related Policies	1295
--------------------------------	------

Nelson Barque Not Charged in 1982	1296
-----------------------------------	------

Don Johnson Receives Investigative Brief From Ministry of Correctional Services About Nelson Barque	1296
--	------

Don Johnson Provides Opinion: Insufficient Evidence to Lay Charge	1298
R. v. Father Gilles Deslauriers	1300
Assignment of a Crown Attorney to the Prosecution	1301
Public Interest in the Prosecution	1301
Preliminary Inquiry and Discussion Between Jacques Leduc and a Victim	1301
Pre-Trial Conference	1303
Father Gilles Deslauriers Pleads Guilty and Receives a Suspended Sentence	1303
Unsuccessful Request for Crown Appeal	1304
No Evidence on the Distinction Between Cases	1305
R. v. Jean Luc Leblanc, 1986	1306
Crown Opinion From Don Johnson Regarding Allegations	1306
Release Conditions of Jean Luc Leblanc	1306
Disclosure Request and Plea Negotiations	1307
Sentence	1307
Crown Contact With Complainants	1308
A Missed Opportunity	1308
Crown Opinions Provided to the Children's Aid Society Before 1991	1309
Cieslewicz Foster Home	1309
Lapensee Group Home	1310
Second Street Group Home	1311
Tom O'Brien Advises Don Johnson He Went Back to Police	1312
Constable Kevin Malloy Advises Tom O'Brien Insufficient Evidence; Crown Agrees	1313
Don Johnson Sends Letter to Regional Director of Crown Attorneys	1313
Norman Douglas Requests Police Keep Investigating	1314
Police Waiting for Response From Crown	1315
Crown Opinion Provided in 1994 Second Street Group Home Investigation	1315
Constable Shawn White Provides Brief to the Crown	1316
Meeting of Police and Crowns on October 19, 1994	1317
Peter Griffiths' Opinion Letter: No Charges	1318
Should the CAS Have Been Notified?	1320
Murray MacDonald's Advice During Investigation of David Silmser's Complaint	1321
Investigative Advice to Constable Heidi Sebalj	1321

Should the Children's Aid Society Have Been Notified of David Silmser's Statement?	1325
Murray MacDonald Learns David Silmser Is Negotiating With the Church	1326
Murray MacDonald's Discussions With Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc	1327
Constable Heidi Sebalj Locates Additional Victims	1329
Murray MacDonald Discusses the Settlement With CPS	1330
Correspondence Between Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet and Murray MacDonald in September 1993	1332
Information Murray MacDonald Did Not Have	1334
No Outside Crown Is Consulted	1336
Murray MacDonald Meets With Constable Perry Dunlop	1338
Murray MacDonald Meets With Chief Claude Shaver and Sergeant Claude Lortie	1338
Murray MacDonald Learns of the Illegal Clause in the Settlement	1339
Interview by Ottawa Police Service in January 1994	1339
1994 Investigations by the Ontario Provincial Police	1340
Extortion Investigation	1341
Investigations of Father Charles MacDonald, Conspiracy, and Obstruction of Justice	1344
Peter Griffiths' Opinion Letter on the Father Charles MacDonald Re-Investigation	1345
Peter Griffiths' Opinion Letter on the Conspiracy Investigation	1347
Clarifying the Roles of the Police and the Crown	1347
R. v. Malcolm MacDonald: Attempt to Obstruct Justice	1348
Peter Griffiths Receives Brief on Attempt to Obstruct Justice Investigation	1348
Peter Griffiths Obtains a Second Opinion	1349
No Written Opinion Provided	1350
Brockville Office Assigned	1350
Role of Jacques Leduc and Sean Adams	1351
Pre-Trial, Guilty Plea, and Sentencing	1352
Appropriateness of Sentence and Public Opinion	1352
John MacDonald Expresses Concerns to MPP John Cleary About Sentence	1353
R. v. Nelson Barque and Subsequent Complaint	1354
Don Johnson Is Defence Counsel	1354
Constable Heidi Sebalj Provides "Report" to Murray MacDonald: C-44 Ready to Proceed Against Nelson Barque	1355

Murray MacDonald Forwards Material to Peter Griffiths for Opinion	1356
Peter Griffiths Provides Opinion: No Charges	1356
R. v. Father Charles MacDonald: Charges Laid and Preliminary Inquiry	1359
Second Brief Prepared and Robert Pelletier Assigned to Prosecute	1359
Robert Pelletier Meets With Investigating Officers	1361
Robert Pelletier Has Discussions With Counsel for Father Charles MacDonald	1361
Robert Pelletier Reviews the Briefs	1363
Robert Pelletier Provides an Opinion	1364
Robert Pelletier's Relationship With David Silmser	1365
Judicial Pre-Trial	1370
Preliminary Inquiry and C-8's Complaint	1370
Robert Pelletier's Memo to Peter Griffiths of April 2, 1997	1373
The Initiation of Project Truth and Assignment of Crowns	1376
Meeting of April 24, 1997	1376
Should There Have Been a Dedicated Crown?	1377
Murray MacDonald's Office Handles Disclosure Prior to Crowns' Being Assigned to Prosecutions	1379
Assignments of Project Truth Prosecutions	1379
Resources Available to Crowns in Project Truth Prosecutions	1380
Prosecutions Related to Allegations Reported by Claude Marleau	1381
Crown Briefs Provided to Crown for Opinion on Charges	1381
Assignment of Crowns to the Prosecutions of Claude Marleau's Allegations	1382
Interactions and Relationship Between the Crowns and Claude Marleau	1383
Relationships Between Crowns and Police and Between Crowns	1384
Crown Preparation and Views on Expert Testimony	1384
Disclosure Requests by Defence	1385
Preliminary Inquiries	1386
Media Coverage	1387
Trials	1388
Connections Between Claude Marleau's Alleged Abusers	1391
Appeal Process and Appeal Considerations in Some Prosecutions	1392
Related Quebec Criminal Proceedings of R. v. Father Paul Lapierre	1392
Claude Marleau's Views of the Justice System	1394

R. v. Harvey Joseph Latour	1394
Investigation and Crown Opinion on Charges Regarding Allegations of C-96	1394
Involvement of Murray MacDonald in Disclosure	1395
Preliminary Inquiry	1396
Difficulties Prosecuting Historical Abuse Cases	1397
R. v. Marcel Lalonde	1397
Cornwall Police Service Investigation	1397
Crown Don Johnson Provides an Opinion	1397
David Silmsen's Allegations of Abuse by Marcel Lalonde and Subsequent Investigation	1398
Assignment of the Prosecution	1399
Constable Perry Dunlop's Involvement in the Prosecution	1399
R. v. Lalonde Trial	1401
R. v. Father Charles MacDonald: New Charges Laid and Trial	1401
Preliminary Inquiry Completed and Father Charles MacDonald Committed to Trial	1401
New Charges Laid—Robert Pelletier Reviews New Crown Brief	1401
Communication With David Silmsen's Lawyer	1402
Delays in Scheduling Judicial Pre-Trial	1403
January 1999 Adjournment: No Waiver of Section 11(b) Rights	1403
Preliminary Inquiry on Second Set of Charges—March 1999	1405
Robert Pelletier in a Conflict	1405
File Transferred to Shelley Hallett	1405
Robert Pelletier and Shelley Hallett Prepare for Pre-Trial	1406
Judicial Pre-Trial—September 7, 1999	1407
Joinder of Charges	1407
Pre-Trial Conference—October 22, 1999	1409
Order of Production to Constable Perry Dunlop on January 10, 2000	1409
C-2's Allegations	1409
Adjournment of Trial	1411
Shelley Hallett Reports to James Stewart	1413
Constable Perry Dunlop's Boxes Delivered to Project Truth Office	1413
Review of Constable Perry Dunlop's Boxes: Shelley Hallett's Concerns About Privacy and Privilege	1414
Pre-Trial Conference—August 23, 2000	1416
Preliminary Inquiry on C-2 Allegations; New Indictment on October 18, 2000	1417

Leduc Decision: Shelley Hallett Removed From Project Truth Cases	1418
James Stewart's Efforts to Find a New Crown	1419
Lorne McConnery Assigned to Father MacDonald Prosecution	1421
Lorne McConnery Cognizant of Delay Concerns	1422
Defence Requests Adjournment on April 25, 2001	1422
Disclosure of Constable Perry Dunlop's Boxes	1423
Lorne McConnery Begins Taking Notes	1426
Lorne McConnery Learns About the Difficult Relationship Between Shelley Hallett and Detective Inspector Pat Hall	1426
Transfer of File From Shelley Hallett to Lorne McConnery	1427
The Crown Prepares for Trial	1431
Judge Reassignment Before Trial and Adjournment of Trial	1432
Lorne McConnery Provides Further Disclosure to Defence	1435
Lorne McConnery Withdraws Charges Related to C-8 and C-2	1436
Defence Brings an Application for a Stay Under Section 11(b) of the Charter	1437
Stay Application Hearing	1438
Justice Chilcott Grants the Stay	1440
Managing Delay Due to Joinder of Charges	1441
R. v. Jacques Leduc: First Trial	1442
Crown Discusses Criminal Charges With OPP	1442
Case Assigned to Shelley Hallett	1442
Amendments to Charges	1443
Shelley Hallett Receives Letter From Gerry Langlois	1443
C-22 Provides a Statement	1443
Delay in Transcribing C-22's Interview	1445
Information Sworn on C-22's Allegations	1446
Defence Counsel Advised of New Charges	1446
Defence Raises Disclosure Issues	1446
Defence Seeks an Adjournment: Shelley Hallett May Be Subpoenaed to Testify	1449
Shelley Hallett's Memo to James Ramsay About Her Co-Counsel	1450
Preliminary Inquiry	1450
Pre-Trial Conference	1450
Trial Begins in R. v. Leduc	1450
C-16's Mother Testifies About Contacts With Constable Perry Dunlop	1451

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Brings References in Perry Dunlop's Will-State of Contacts With C-16's Mother to Court	1451
"This Is All News to Me" Comment by Shelley Hallett	1452
Detective Inspector Pat Hall Reminds Shelley Hallett She Was Provided With the Dunlop Material in March or April 2000	1453
Detective Constable Steve Seguin Delivers to Shelley Hallett a Copy of Her July 4, 2000, Letter to Detective Constable Joe Dupuis	1453
Defence Makes Several Disclosure Requests	1454
Defence Brings Application for a Stay of Proceedings	1456
Richard Nadeau Testifies on Stay Application and Urges Justice Colin McKinnon to Step Down	1457
OPP Officers to Be Called As Defence Witnesses Meet With Defence Counsel	1458
Detective Constable Joe Dupuis Borrows Shelley Hallett's Copy of the July 4, 2000, Letter	1459
Shelley Hallett and Christine Tier Have Dinner With James Stewart	1459
Detective Inspector Pat Hall Continues His Testimony and Is Cross-Examined	1460
Discussion With Officers After Court on February 22	1464
Final Submissions on Stay Application	1464
Shelley Hallett's Comments to Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Joe Dupuis About Detective Inspector Pat Hall on February 26	1465
Telephone Call Between James Stewart and Detective Inspector Pat Hall	1466
Decision of Justice James Chadwick	1466
Case Referred to Appeal Review Panel	1466
Shelley Hallett Makes Comments in Media	1467
E-Mail From Detective Inspector Pat Hall to James Stewart	1468
James Stewart Drafts a Response but Never Sends It to Detective Inspector Pat Hall	1468
Murray Segal Forwards E-Mail to York Regional Police, Which Begins an Investigation	1470
Shelley Hallett Prepares a Number of Summary Documents Responding to Concerns Raised During the Investigation	1471
Interviews by York Regional Police	1473
Shelley Hallett Writes to Detective Sergeant Denise LaBarge	1473
York Regional Police Investigation Concluded	1474
Murray Segal Denies Shelley Hallett's Request for a Copy of Police Investigation	1474
Garry Guzzo Requests Information From Shelley Hallett	1475

Justice James Chadwick's Decision Overturned by Court of Appeal; Leave to Appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada Denied	1476
R. v. Jacques Leduc Retrial	1477
Lidia Narozniak Assigned New Jacques Leduc Trial	1477
Adjournment Hearing	1478
Transfer of File to Lidia Narozniak and Her Review of the Material	1479
Disclosure Motion—Perry Dunlop Called As a Witness for the Crown	1481
Section 11(b) Application for a Stay of Proceedings	1484
Stay Granted by Justice Terrence Plantana	1486
Courts' Review of Perry Dunlop's Involvement With the Complainants	1487
R. v. Keith Jodoin	1488
R. v. Brian Dufour	1489
Shelley Hallett Receives Crown Brief; Case Considered a Priority	1489
Shelley Hallett's Opinion on Charges and Request for Follow-up	1489
Shelley Hallett and Detective Inspector Pat Hall Disagree on Conditions of Arrest	1490
Brian Dufour Deceased	1490
Timely Review	1491
R. v. Jean Primeau	1491
R. v. Malcolm MacDonald: Sexual Abuse	1491
Opinion and Recommendations for Arrest Provided by Shelley Hallett	1492
Follow-Up Investigation Requested and Further Disclosure of Crown Briefs	1493
Pre-Trial	1493
Death of Malcolm MacDonald and Withdrawal of Charges	1493
R. v. Bernard Sauvé	1493
Prosecution Assigned to Brockville Office	1494
Preliminary Inquiry Held and Accused Committed to Stand Trial	1494
Complainants Do Not Want to Proceed	1494
Charges Withdrawn by the Crown	1495
No Charges Laid Against John Christopher Wilson	1496
Crown Opinion	1496
R. v. Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere	1497
Crown Opinion on Charges Against Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere	1497
Alain Godin Assigned to the Prosecution	1498
Stay of Proceedings	1499
Clergy and Conspiracy Briefs	1500

Shelley Hallett Assigned Additional Project Truth Briefs	1500
Shelley Hallett Receives Crown Briefs on Clergy Investigations	1500
Delay in Reviewing Briefs and Providing Opinions	1501
Detective Inspector Pat Hall Inquires About Status of Briefs	1502
Shelley Hallett Receives Crown Brief on Conspiracy Investigation	1502
Shelley Hallett Tells Detective Inspector Pat Hall Legal Opinions Will Be Done in October	1503
Detective Inspector Pat Hall Under Pressure to End Project Truth	1503
Detective Inspector Pat Hall Expresses His Concerns to James Stewart	1503
Detective Superintendent Chris Lewis Speaks to Murray Segal About Delay	1504
Shelley Hallett Doesn't Ask for Help	1506
James Stewart Meets With Detective Inspector Pat Hall About Briefs	1506
Detective Superintendent Jim Miller E-Mails Murray Segal	1508
Lorne McConnery Assigned to Review Outstanding Briefs	1508
Transfer of Briefs to Lorne McConnery	1508
Murray Segal Meets With Lorne McConnery and James Stewart: Briefs to Be Done in Thirty Days	1509
Lorne McConnery Begins Review of Briefs	1510
View on Constable Perry Dunlop's Role	1511
Lorne McConnery Meets With Murray Segal	1511
Lorne McConnery Meets With Detective Inspector Pat Hall	1512
Lorne McConnery Writes Follow-Up Letter to Detective Inspector Hall	1513
Review of Clergy Briefs	1514
Review of Conspiracy Brief	1514
Lorne McConnery Writes Opinion in August 2001	1517
OPP Issues Press Release: No Evidence of a Pedophile Ring	1517
R. v. Jean Luc Leblanc, 2001	1517
Jean Luc Leblanc Pleads Guilty and Is Declared a Long-Term Offender	1518
External Pressures on Project Truth Prosecutions: Garry Guzzo	1519
Garry Guzzo Expresses Concern About the Dunlop Binders	1519
Detective Inspector Pat Hall Advises Robert Pelletier That Project Truth Had Obtained the Government Brief	1520
Garry Guzzo Raises Concerns About the Materials Delivered by Constable Perry Dunlop	1520
Murray Segal Speaks With Garry Guzzo About His Concerns	1521

Murray Segal Briefs the Deputy Attorney General	1522
Garry Guzzo Expresses Concerns About Murray Segal in a Letter to Ron McLaughlin	1523
Internal Investigation by the Ministry of the Attorney General	1524
Detective Inspector Pat Hall Requests That the Ministry of the Attorney General Investigate the Missing Binders	1525
Effect of the Loss of the Dunlop Binders	1526
External Pressures: Information Published on Local Websites	1527
James Bateman's Website: www.projecttruth.com	1527
Richard Nadeau's Website: www.projecttruth2.com	1528
Ministry Response to www.projecttruth2.com	1528
Richard Nadeau Cited in Contempt for Violation of a Publication Ban	1529
Resurrection of the projecttruth.com Website	1531
Impact of the Website	1532
R. v. Robert Sabourin	1533
André Lavoie's Allegations Against Robert Sabourin	1533
Alain Seguin's Allegations Against Robert Sabourin	1533
The Crown Attorney's Office's Relationship With Victims	1534
R. v. Earl Landry Jr.	1535
R. v. Gilf Greggain	1537
No Charges Laid Regarding Albert Lalonde's Allegations	1539
Albert Lalonde Allegations to Lorne McConnery	1539
Investigation of the Allegations	1539
Crown Review of the Allegations	1540
The Provision of Services to Victims	1542
The Victim/Witness Assistance Program in Ontario	1542
VWAP Special Prosecutions	1544
Project Truth Not Designated a Special Prosecution	1545
Shelley Hallett's Experience With VWAP	1546
Establishment of a Project Truth VWAP	1546
VWAP Services in Specific Project Truth Cases	1547
Link Between The Men's Project and Victim Witness Assistance Program	1550
Improvements for VWAP Delivery of Services	1551
Conclusion	1552
Recommendations	1557

12 The Process of Phase 1 of the Cornwall Public Inquiry	1563
The Purpose of a Public Inquiry	1564
A Public Inquiry Is Not a Civil or Criminal Trial	1565
The Decision to Establish the Cornwall Public Inquiry	1567
Principles Governing the Inquiry	1570
The Mandate	1570
The Mandate in General Terms: Two Phases	1570
Challenges With the Language of the Mandate	1571
Getting Started: Setting up the Inquiry	1580
Location for Evidentiary Hearings and Office Space	1580
Hiring Members of the Inquiry Team	1580
Standing and Funding	1586
Standing	1586
Funding	1588
Rules of Practice and Procedure	1591
The Process of Arriving at the Rules	1591
Challenge to Rule 31	1592
Preparing for the Evidentiary Hearings	1593
Investigation	1593
Disclosure and Management of Documents	1593
Determining the Stages of the Inquiry	1598
Identifying and Preparing Witnesses	1601
Summonses and Search Warrants	1608
Notices of Alleged Misconduct	1613
Hearing Room and Facilities	1614
Records of the Proceedings	1615
Conduct of the Hearings	1616
Commissioner's Statements	1616
Opening and Closing Statements	1616
Hearings Schedule	1617
Evidence and Examinations	1618
Phase 1 Research	1627
Costs	1627
Report	1629
Wrapping Up	1630
Recommendations	1631
Appendices	1632

Acknowledgments

As I look over the work accomplished by this Commission, I cannot but be impressed and humbled by the many individuals who dedicated their time, energy, and expertise to the completion of this important mandate.

Beginning with the Judiciary, I am indebted to the advice and encouragement that Associate Chief Justice Dennis O'Connor and former Chief Justice Sidney Linden provided over the course of the Inquiry.

Each and every person who worked with me contributed greatly in their own way, and more importantly, did so as part of a solid team effort that made this sometimes arduous task manageable.

Let me begin with Commission counsel. The extensive public interest work and administrative law experience of lead Commission counsel, Peter Engelmann, together with the solid criminal law experience of Pierre Dumais, permitted Commission counsel to conduct a full and fair investigation and presentation of the evidence to the Commission. Mr. Engelmann and Mr. Dumais were assisted throughout the Inquiry by a team of young, and not so young, lawyers, whose enthusiasm for this work proved contagious. They included, at different times, Simon Ruel, Christine Morris, Raija Pulkkinen, Maya Hamou, Janie Larocque, Mary Simms, Ian Stauffer, Suzanne Sinnamon, Deirdre Harrington, Karen Jones, and Kelly Doctor.

During the course of the Inquiry, we were presented with mountains of documents spanning some forty years and received testimony amounting to hundreds of volumes. All of this testimony had to be summarized and analyzed. This work was directed by Senior Legal Analyst Ronda Bessner, who came to the Inquiry with vast experience and knowledge, having performed pivotal roles in the work of many previous inquiries. Ms. Bessner assisted me in the preparation of the Phase 1 Report. Ms Bessner's experience and wise counsel proved invaluable to me over the course of the Inquiry. She was assisted throughout the Inquiry by Junior Analysts Deirdre Harrington, Emma Holland, Heather Cross, Rebecca Cutler, and Maryth Yachnin, all of whom have bright futures ahead of them.

Upon my appointment as Commissioner, the first matter at hand was to begin setting up the administrative side of the Commission. I am very indebted to Monique Seguin who, notwithstanding having worked with me in the North East Region for five years, “volunteered” to take a few months away from home and family to get the Inquiry up and running. Those “few months” turned into almost two years of service to the Commission. As Chief Administrative Officer, Ms Seguin worked tirelessly, and, after conferring with Mr. David Henderson, the guru of CAOs for different public inquiries, got the Commission equipped and functioning. Ms Seguin also implemented a mentoring program, permitting the more junior staff to rise to their full potential.

Upon her departure in March of 2007, Lise Kosloski and Anna DeVuono took on Ms Seguin’s responsibilities. Ms Kosloski had been with the Commission since the early days as Executive Assistant/Coordinator of Finance & Administration. Ms DeVuono accepted on very short notice and in difficult times to relocate to Cornwall from Sault Ste. Marie, where she had been serving as the Trial Co-ordinator, Ontario Court of Justice. Ms Kosloski took on the position of Manager Finance and Administration and Ms DeVuono assumed the position of Manager Finance and Operations. The transition was seamless. Together, Ms Kosloski and Ms DeVuono continued to steer the day-to-day functioning of the Commission with enthusiasm and integrity and showed great leadership throughout. Their administrative staff of Joan Bell, Edith Genois, and Lori Loseth worked tirelessly and efficiently under often seemingly impossible deadlines.

With all commissions of inquiry, a competent and effective investigative team is required to complete the background work and to seek out and prepare witnesses to give evidence. John Spice, RCMP Assistant Commissioner, Ethics and Integrity Advisor (retired), and Jack Briscoe, Staff Sergeant (retired), also of the RCMP, provided the leadership to the investigative team. Both were invaluable in providing wise advice on the preparation of often very fragile witnesses, and insight on the workings of police forces. At various times during the Inquiry, their team consisted of, Sergeant Phil Crouch, Superintendent Alex Geddes (retired), and Sergeant Luc Vidal (retired), all of the RCMP.

The work of researchers is often overlooked in the scheme of a public inquiry. Sherri McArthur headed up the Document Management Research team. Ms McArthur saw to the proper electronic disclosure of material to the parties on an ongoing basis, prepared paper copies for the hearings room, and provided timely research briefs for the legal team. Assisting Ms McArthur were Lori Beaudette and Janet George, who, it seemed, with the time they devoted to this project were becoming permanent fixtures in the office.

I thought it important to have the transcripts of the evidence heard at the hearings posted to our website on a daily basis. The court reporting team from International Court Reporting, consisting of Barry Prouse, Sean Prouse, Marc Demers, Mathieu Philippe, Aline Prouse, and Dale Waterman, provided reliable, accurate, and timely copies of transcripts throughout the hearings.

Simultaneous interpretation was expertly provided by Raymond Saint Laurent, Corinne Ardon, Albert Beaudry, and Louise Mercier.

Inside the hearings room, Avolution, under the able direction of Guy Bennett and his assistants James Rail and Will Rose, provided the audiovisual support. John Doyle and the support team from INSINC provided the live streaming services to allow the hearings to be carried to the website, and therefore, to the public. Our webmaster, Djordje Sredojevic, with the assistance of Ljiljana Vuletic, both from Autcon, saw to our “Web needs” and kept the public’s access to the hearings open at all times.

Once in the hearings room, my task was made that much more manageable with the assistance of competent and professional Registrars Louise Mongeon, Julie Gauthier, and Brigitte Beaulne. Aside from dealing with thousands of exhibits, the Registrars saw to the presentation of exhibits on the public screens while the examinations were taking place.

Joan Weinman ably addressed the Commission’s media relations and other communication needs throughout the Inquiry.

The editors, Camilla Blakeley, Stephanie Fysh, Sarah Wight, and Barbara Tessman, who worked under difficult deadlines, must be acknowledged. Their tireless efforts greatly facilitated the finalization of this report.

As well, I wish to recognize Peggy and Ken Parker, Lorraine and Ron Eamon, and Paul Scott, who attended the hearings from the beginning to end. In those few moments when my spirit was waning, I drew courage in seeing these citizens of Cornwall present, along with other private citizens, listening and interested in the workings of the Commission.

Finally, let me speak to the families and friends of all of us, who, in working on this Commission, spent so long away from our loved ones completing this public service. To all of you, I cannot begin to thank you on behalf of the people of Cornwall, the citizens of this great province, and myself for tolerating our long absences away from our homes, our children, and spouses, the missed family gatherings, sport or school activities, curtailed holidays, and the stresses we invariably brought home, all of which you understood.

While some may say those demands come with the territory, I cannot but admire the manner in which all involved in this collaborative effort worked together and endured to help me complete this mandate.

Simply put, “Je grandis a vous connaître.”

Introduction

Background to the Cornwall Public Inquiry

In early 1994, the media began reporting on allegations of historical sexual abuse made by former altar boy David Silmsen against Father Charles MacDonald, a priest in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. A short time earlier, probation officer Ken Seguin had taken his life before allegations of historical abuse against him were investigated by the police. Mr. Seguin was a friend of Father Charles MacDonald and another alleged abuser of Mr. Silmsen. Mr. Silmsen had reported allegations of abuse against these two men to the Cornwall Police Service (CPS)¹ in December 1992. The media coverage outlined a confidential financial settlement between David Silmsen, the Diocese, and Father MacDonald that resulted in Mr. Silmsen withdrawing his criminal complaint against the priest. This sparked rumours within the community and allegations of a cover-up by local institutions such as the CPS and the Diocese.

In January 1994, the Ottawa Police Service briefly examined the investigation the CPS had conducted of Father Charles MacDonald. It recommended that a thorough reinvestigation of the case be done by another police force.

Beginning in February 1994, the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) investigated the allegations made by David Silmsen but laid no charges. In early 1995, as a result of the OPP investigation of the settlement, Malcolm MacDonald was charged with attempt to obstruct justice. Mr. MacDonald was the lawyer who had represented Father MacDonald on the settlement. Nobody else involved with the settlement was charged. When Malcolm MacDonald pleaded guilty to the charge, he was granted an absolute discharge. Following this, more alleged victims of Father MacDonald came forward, and in 1996 he was charged in relation to allegations of historical sexual abuse.

1. On October 27, 2000, the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) became the Cornwall Community Police Service (CCPS). Accordingly, in this Report I have referred to the organization as the CPS with respect to matters pre-dating October 27, 2000, and as the CCPS with respect to matters after this date.

Perry Dunlop, a Constable with the CPS, began conducting an off-duty investigation into allegations of sexual abuse in June 1996, in part to support a multi-million dollar lawsuit against the CPS and others. Almost three years earlier, in the fall of 1993, Constable Dunlop had provided a copy of David Silmser's allegations against his former priest, Father MacDonald, as well as allegations against his former probation officer, Ken Seguin, to the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS) after he found out that the CPS had terminated its investigation of David Silmser's complaint.

In 1994, Constable Dunlop was charged under the Police Services Act for, among other things, providing Mr. Silmser's statement to the CAS. The charges against Constable Dunlop were later stayed, but his relationship with the CPS was forever changed. From 1994 onward, Constable Dunlop's difficulties with the CPS and his contacts with a number of alleged victims were widely reported in the media and well known in the community.

Constable Dunlop continued his private investigation of sexual abuse against young people. In December 1996, his lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, delivered some of the investigative work they had done to Chief Julian Fantino of the London Police Service. Chief Fantino turned these documents over to the OPP in February 1997. The Fantino Brief contained a number of individual complaints about sexual abuse as well as a claim that there was an organized group of powerful people within the community who were perpetrating and covering up allegations of abuse. These individuals were teachers, probation officers, police officers, a Crown attorney, priests, and other Church officials.

In the spring of 1997, the OPP began its "Project Truth" investigation. Its purpose was to examine the contents of the Fantino Brief and investigate the allegations of child sexual abuse and related criminal activity contained therein. At least sixty-nine alleged victims came forward, and fifteen men were eventually charged. Issues soon arose regarding the Project Truth investigation and the prosecutions. Only one person arrested as a result of Project Truth was convicted and a handful were found not guilty. Many cases did not proceed to a full trial on the merits for a variety of reasons: some elderly suspects had died or were too sick to proceed; in some cases the charges were withdrawn; and in others the trials were stayed for either delay or non-disclosure of evidence. Criticism was levelled at the OPP investigation by MPP Garry Guzzo, Constable Dunlop and his wife, and others. There continued to be widespread media interest.

Throughout the 1990s, allegations began to surface about cover-ups by the CPS or by the Diocese of other complaints of sexual abuse. In one of these cases, the alleged perpetrator was the son of a former CPS police chief. In another, the victim made it publicly known that the Diocese had transferred the priest who had abused him to another parish rather than properly dealing with the complaint. In yet another case, the alleged victim complained that neither the CPS nor the CAS had investigated her allegations of abuse against a former CAS worker and group home staff.

These cases, along with the number of alleged victims uncovered by Project Truth, suggested that there was a serious problem of sexual abuse in the community, and more particularly, a problem with the way that public institutions handled, investigated, and prosecuted complaints of abuse. Stories began to circulate attributing these problems to a massive criminal conspiracy.

In 2000, Mr. Guzzo called for a public inquiry to look into the circumstances surrounding allegations of abuse of young people in Cornwall and, in particular, the response of the police and other institutions to it. Segments of the community of Cornwall joined in, and thousands of citizens from the Cornwall area petitioned the government to inquire into the issues. It was the work of a coalition of individuals and groups that resulted in the Order-in-Council dated April 14, 2005, which established this Inquiry.

The preamble to the Order-in-Council sets out the general context for the Cornwall Public Inquiry:²

Whereas allegations of abuse of young people have surrounded the City of Cornwall and its citizens for many years. The police investigations and criminal prosecutions relating to these allegations have concluded. Community members have indicated that a public inquiry will encourage individual and community healing ...

As the hearings began, I heard submissions that the events alleged to have occurred in Cornwall had given rise to a great deal of rumour and innuendo and that it was difficult for the community to distinguish fact from fiction. Complicating this was that some of those said to have been involved with the alleged abuse worked within important public institutions such as the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, boards of education, and the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services.³

2. Appendix A1, Order-in-Council 558/2005, April 14, 2005.

3. During most of the period under review at the Inquiry, the Ministry was known as the Ministry of Correctional Services. It is now the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services (MCSCS). In this Report, I refer to the institution by its name during the period under discussion.

As a result, some members of the community had lost confidence in their public institutions. They were concerned about the existence of a conspiracy and attempts by powerful people in these public institutions to cover up allegations of abuse.

Public inquiries are often convened in the wake of public disillusionment in order to uncover the truth. This Inquiry is no different. The events under investigation involved elements of public controversy and an apparent loss of confidence in public institutions.

The community of Cornwall needed to clear the air with facts. It needed to know how the allegations of abuse had been handled by public institutions. It needed to heal and move forward. This volume and the others that constitute the totality of this Report are written in an effort to address these concerns. The goal here, as in other inquiries, was to find out what happened and what went wrong, and to look at what can be done to avoid similar occurrences in the future.

The Community of Cornwall

When I refer to the community of Cornwall, I am referring to all residents of the city and surrounding areas. Many families have been touched by the events and issues examined here. The community includes victims and alleged victims and their families; perpetrators and alleged perpetrators and their families; leaders, officials, and/or employees of the public institutions whose institutional responses the Inquiry examined; concerned citizens of Cornwall who have called for or otherwise been involved in the Inquiry process either as individuals or in a group capacity; and the media, both formal and informal, which have been reporting on these events for many years.

Early on in the Phase 1 hearings, I heard some evidence on demographic aspects of the City of Cornwall and surrounding area. This evidence was presented during a legal argument on whether or not the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall was a public institution and also in the contextual expert evidence given by Robert Fulton.

The focus of the demographic evidence on the “public institution” argument was restricted to the role of the Diocese in the lives of Cornwall area citizens, both historically and today. The citizens of the City of Cornwall and surrounding area are overwhelmingly of the Catholic faith. Approximately two-thirds of the residents identify themselves as Catholics, and the Cornwall area, in particular the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, has one of the highest proportions of people identifying themselves as religious within its population in the province of Ontario.

The demographic evidence provided by Mr. Fulton was relevant to the community needs assessment that he completed for the CAS in 2003. Its purpose was to provide the CAS with data on the social, demographic, and economic forces that affect children and families in the area and to assess the prevalence of child abuse. Given the specific purpose for which this demographic evidence was prepared, its scope is far from comprehensive. It nonetheless provides some background on the community, albeit limited.

Mr. Fulton's study was a compilation of statistics from Statistics Canada, most from 1991 to 2001. From the data, he identified key indicators related to the need for child protection services. Among them were:

1. The population of the City of Cornwall and the counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry declined from 1986 to 2001.
2. The Cornwall area has a relatively low socio-economic status.⁴
3. Data on three out of four of the most critical adverse outcomes correlated with child abuse—higher rates of accidental death among children, youth suicide, and crime rates—are all significantly higher in Stormont than elsewhere in Ontario.

Mr. Fulton's evidence suggests that statistics like these and others set out in his report indicate that children and youth in the Cornwall area are in greater need of protection than those in most other communities. Statistics and conclusions like these may be difficult to accept, but it must be borne in mind that along with others used by Mr. Fulton in his report to the CAS, they tell only a part of the story of the City of Cornwall. They were used to provide the CAS with a community needs assessment and thereby to assist the agency in estimating the likelihood of harm such as physical or sexual abuse occurring in a community and in determining staffing and programming needs.

Issues related to child sexual abuse are more complex than numbers on a page. The context-setting expert testimony on child sexual abuse that was presented at the Inquiry by Dr. David Wolfe and Dr. Peter Jaffe, among others, and which is discussed in Chapter 2 of this volume, made this abundantly clear. In the time that I spent in Cornwall conducting this Inquiry, I came to know a community that is resilient and striving to promote change. At the end of the day, this is one of its most important features.

4. In 2001, 36.2 percent of Cornwall citizens over twenty did not graduate from high school and only 56.4 percent of youth aged fifteen to twenty-four were still in school.

The Mandate

The Cornwall Public Inquiry was established by the government of Ontario on April 14, 2005, under the Public Inquiries Act.⁵ I was appointed Commissioner of this Inquiry by Ontario Attorney General Michael Bryant.

An inquiry's mandate is what shapes its work. The Order-in-Council⁶ establishing this Commission set out the following mandate:

2. The Commission shall inquire into and report on the institutional response of the justice system and other public institutions, including the interaction of that response with other public and community sectors, in relation to:
 - (a) allegations of historical abuse of young people in the Cornwall area, including the policies and practices then in place to respond to such allegations, and
 - (b) the creation and development of policies and practices that were designed to improve the response to allegations of abuse in order to make recommendations directed to the further improvement of the response in similar circumstances.
3. The Commission shall inquire into and report on processes, services or programs that would encourage community healing and reconciliation in Cornwall.
4. The Commission may provide community meetings or other opportunities apart from formal evidentiary hearings for individuals affected by the allegations of historical abuse of young people in the Cornwall area to express their experiences of events and the impact on their lives.

The mandate was divided into two separate parts, Phase 1 and Phase 2. Phase 1 was the fact-finding phase. In general terms, this portion of the mandate required me to inquire into and report on the events surrounding allegations of abuse of young people in Cornwall by examining the response of the justice system and other public institutions to the allegations. I was also required to make recommendations to improve the response in similar circumstances. The work of this Phase of the Inquiry would be conducted by way of evidentiary hearings.

Phase 2 was directed toward the goal of community healing and reconciliation. In Phase 2 we used a variety of additional resources to collect information on key issues that were identified in the hearings and by the community. Among other things, we commissioned research papers, held community meetings and educational workshops, established witness and counselling support programs, and provided the opportunity for individuals to give informal testimony as part of the process of healing.

5. R.S.O. 1990, c. P.41.

6. Appendix A1.

While Phase 1 and Phase 2 were carried out somewhat simultaneously, the counselling program portion of Phase 2 will continue to operate until January 15, 2010, at which point its continuity will depend on whether or not my recommendations are acted upon.

Preliminary Considerations of Phase 1 of the Inquiry

The Inquiry office space and hearings room were located in the community of Cornwall in a designated historic building, referred to as the “Weave Shed.” I believed it was important that the Inquiry be held in Cornwall so that those most affected by its subject matter would have easy access to our offices and the hearings room.

While not as formal as a court procedure, a public inquiry nonetheless requires its own rules to ensure that it runs smoothly and is thorough, efficient, and fair. In drafting our Rules of Practice and Procedure, I had the benefit of reviewing the rules of other inquiries, and I adapted them to suit our particular circumstances.

Another matter that had to be addressed prior to the start of the Inquiry hearings was that of standing and funding. The Rules of Practice and Procedure set out the criteria for both standing and funding for Phases 1 and 2.⁷ By the end of the Inquiry, I had granted fourteen parties full standing, limited to their interests.⁸ One party had special standing, and four witnesses were granted limited party standing with respect to discrete areas. Participating as parties in the Inquiry were public institutions, community groups, and people who had been investigated and charged with respect to child sexual abuse. Those with limited standing were employees of public institutions and a lawyer who provided independent legal advice to an alleged victim of child sexual abuse. While at times it seemed as though the Inquiry proceedings were slowed by the number of parties, I believe that in the end the participation of and input from each were very helpful to me.

I was empowered by the Rules of Practice and Procedure to make recommendations to the Attorney General regarding funding,⁹ and I assessed applications for funding as they were presented to me. Several parties convinced me to recommend that they receive funding from the Attorney General, and in all of these cases the Attorney General did in fact approve funding. There were many other issues the Inquiry had to deal with on day-to-day basis. Some of them included disclosure and production matters, issues surrounding confidentiality, a number of motions requiring decisions, and in several instances judicial review applications to the Superior Courts. The process followed during the course of the Inquiry is more fully discussed in Chapter 12 of this volume.

7. Appendix B, Rules of Practice and Procedure (amended September 29, 2006), Rules 8 and 58.

8. Appendix D, List of Parties With Standing.

9. Appendix B; also see Appendix A1, s. 10.

Organization of this Report

Many inquiries are called to examine the circumstances surrounding a single event or incident. The Ipperwash Inquiry, for example, examined the events surrounding the death of Dudley George in Ipperwash Provincial Park in 1995.¹⁰ The Walkerton Inquiry examined the circumstances surrounding the contamination of Walkerton's drinking water system in 2000, which led to seven deaths and to many people becoming ill.¹¹

In contrast, this Inquiry was called to examine a broader subject: the institutional response of the justice system and other public institutions in relation to allegations of historical abuse of young people in the Cornwall area. The time frame this Inquiry examined spanned decades. Many institutions in the Cornwall area were involved in the response to these allegations. The Ministry of Correctional Services, the Cornwall Police Service (CPS), the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, the Children's Aid Society (CAS) of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, a number of school boards, and the Ministry of the Attorney General all played some role in the matters at hand. In some cases, institutions responded jointly or concurrently to allegations. For example, alleged abuse against a young person may trigger a joint investigation by the CAS and a police service, and the Crown may be involved to provide advice on the charge and to conduct the prosecution if charges are laid. In addition, some institutions were involved as both "responding" institutions and as employers of alleged abusers.

Unlike an inquiry that examines one incident, in which the story can often be told in a chronological fashion, the subject matter and timeframe of this Inquiry required a different approach. Chapters were prepared for each involved institution.

10. The Honourable Sidney B. Linden, Commissioner, Report of the Ipperwash Inquiry (Toronto: Ministry of the Attorney General, 2007).

11. The Honourable Dennis R. O'Connor, Report of the Walkerton Inquiry: The Events of May 2000 and Related Issues (Toronto: Ministry of the Attorney General, 2002).

In several instances, the response to a particular complaint is reviewed in more than one chapter. Thus, while each chapter can be read in isolation, to fully understand the response of all of the institutions involved, it is often necessary to review additional chapters.

The Inquiry began with testimony on child sexual abuse from experts in different disciplines. The purpose of starting with contextual experts was to better educate everyone involved in the Inquiry: members of the public, parties, Commission and party counsel, and me.

The experts included psychologists, social workers, police officers, law professors, and Crown prosecutors. These individuals have spent many years in their respective fields assessing victims of child sexual abuse, investigating and prosecuting child abuse cases, and training child protection workers, police, and other professionals involved in the area of child sexual abuse. They have conducted research on different aspects of child sexual abuse and have numerous publications in journals, books, and manuals. Several have also testified as expert witnesses in civil and criminal proceedings, at coroners' inquests, and before parliamentary committees.

The topics covered at the hearings by the contextual experts included child sexual abuse and the impact of child sexual abuse on victims; the evolution of legislation, law, and legal processes involving children and, in particular, child sexual abuse; the reporting of abuse against children; the child welfare response to allegations of child sexual abuse; child sexual abuse and the institutional and community response to it; social work, with a particular emphasis on community needs assessments; the investigation of sexual offences and historical sexual offences and the training of police officers in this area; the training given at the Ontario Police College; the prosecution of child sexual abuse; canon law; the Church's response to clergy sexual abuse; and the historical background of clergy sexual abuse.

Chapter 2 of this Report begins with an overview of some of the context-setting evidence that was provided by the experts during the Phase 1 hearings. Many of the topics just listed are reviewed in this chapter. The chapter also discusses the lack of awareness, until the 1980s, by the public and by many professionals of the extent of child sexual abuse. The legal rules that perpetuated the erroneous view that child victims are unreliable witnesses—that they have poor memories, lie, and fantasize—are reviewed as well. Also discussed is the lack of accommodation of victims of sexual abuse in the court system, which has had the effect of re-victimizing survivors of abuse who testify in civil and criminal proceedings.

In Chapter 3, I describe the impact of child sexual abuse in the Cornwall area as recounted by a number of victims and alleged victims and their parents, spouses, and siblings. Over thirty victims and alleged victims testified at the Cornwall Public Inquiry. They testified that when they were children and/or youth in Cornwall they were sexually abused by teachers, foster parents, Catholic priests, probation officers, shop owners, and other members of the community. Some of the victims and alleged victims testified that the abuse began when they were very young children. Others indicated that it began during their adolescence and continued until they were older.

These witnesses painfully discussed the effects of their abuse, which included a continuing lack of trust in authority, failure in school, inability to have intimate relationships, inability to parent their children appropriately, attempts at suicide, addiction to drugs and alcohol, and the fragmentation of their families. The effects have been and continue to be psychological, social, and financial. The impact of this historical child abuse on Cornwall area individuals mirrors much of what was described in the expert testimony by psychologists, social workers, police officers, and legal experts.

As described in Chapter 12, a motion was brought to exclude victims and alleged victims from testifying. I dismissed this motion and the Divisional Court upheld the decision, agreeing that the evidence of victims and alleged victims was important for the Commission to fully investigate the institutional response of the justice system and other public institutions in relation to allegations of historical abuse of young people. Having heard this evidence, I found it was necessary not only in order to fully and properly assess the institutional response of the public institutions but also to fully understand the impact of the abuse and alleged abuse on individuals and their families. Chapter 3 summarizes some of the personal impact, whereas Chapters 5 to 11, on the response of public institutions, describe some of this evidence in an institutional context.

In Chapter 4, I summarize the report and testimony of Dr. Mary Lynn Young. Dr. Young was qualified at the Inquiry as an expert in media analysis. She conducted a study of the print and broadcast media coverage of allegations of historical abuse of young people in the Cornwall area from 1986 until the end of 2004. In her report, Dr. Young concentrated on two main issues: (1) what media content or information may have influenced the institutions in their responses; and (2) how media coverage affected the understanding of the community regarding the social problem identified in Cornwall. Dr. Young examined the trends and changes in the media coverage, focusing on both the nature and the amount of information made available through print and broadcast. Three key frames in the media coverage emerged: police ineffectiveness; the depiction of Perry Dunlop as a “folk hero”; and the presentation of the issues as discrete news events, rather than as a larger, systemic problem. Dr. Young noted, “[T]he citizens of Cornwall could have been better served” had the media quality been better.

Chapters 5 through 11 are dedicated to my examination of the response of a number of public institutions to allegations of historical child sexual abuse. Some of these public institutions, and in particular the Ministry of Correctional Services, the Diocese, and the school boards, employed perpetrators and alleged perpetrators of historical abuse against young people. These chapters examine how the institution as an employer responded to individual cases as well as how it responded systemically through the development and evolution of policies to deal with this issue. The evidence I considered was given by a number of current and former employees and officials of each institution. In addition, I considered the evidence I heard from victims and alleged victims and community context witnesses in my examination of each institution's response. The oral evidence of these witnesses was supplemented by an extensive documentary record.

In Chapter 5, I discuss the response of the Ministry of Correctional Services. This chapter begins with a discussion of problems confronting the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office. Widespread allegations were made by probationers of sexual abuse by two Cornwall probation officers. Allegations against one of these officers came to the attention of the Area Manager in the early 1980s. Staff in the Cornwall office noticed inappropriate conduct by these employees in that office over time.

The response of the Ministry and its employees to allegations of abuse by probationers and former probationers, and to admissions by probation officers of sexual improprieties or other inappropriate conduct, is discussed in detail in this chapter. In recognition of the likelihood that a large number of probationers had been abused, the Ministry, and in particular the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office, developed a protocol in the late 1990s in order to find further victims of this abuse and to support them with counselling and other support services. Issues such as training on male sexual victimization, conflict of interest principles, information sharing, institutional memory, critical incident information management, and audits and reviews of files of probation officers and other Ministry staff are also discussed.

Chapter 6 addresses the response of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) to allegations of historical sexual abuse of children and young people in the Cornwall area. Investigations of complaints by individuals who alleged that probation officers, members of the clergy, teachers, a federal government employee, childcare workers, and staff under the supervision of the Children's Aid Society abused them in their youth is described and analyzed.

The investigation arising from the complaint of David Silmser is examined in detail. Also examined are the complaints of Jeannette Antoine and others regarding alleged abuse by CAS staff. The fragmented investigations of Earl Landry Jr., the son of a former police chief who was investigated over many years, is also addressed in this chapter.

Other issues discussed in this chapter include the training of officers for sexual abuse investigations, and in particular historical child sexual abuse cases; victim support and accommodation; note taking; interviewing; the supervision of officers conducting these investigations; and the importance of sharing information on such cases among CPS officers and with other institutions such as the OPP and the CAS. The issue of notifying employers of alleged perpetrators working for public institutions is also covered in this chapter.

The institutional response of the OPP is addressed in Chapter 7. This chapter examines the investigations conducted by the OPP in 1994 at the request of the CPS. It also examines the Project Truth investigations, a special project launched by the OPP in 1997 in response to allegations of historical sexual abuse made in Cornwall and surrounding areas. Constable Perry Dunlop's interactions with the Project Truth complainants and investigators are explored in some detail. In addition, the chapter begins with a discussion of investigations in the early 1990s that were related to allegations investigated during Project Truth.

Some of the particular investigations discussed in the chapter are the investigation into allegations against Father Charles MacDonald, Jacques Leduc, Jean Luc Leblanc, and allegations of conspiracy. The relationship between the OPP and other institutions such as the Ministry of the Attorney General, the CPS, and the CAS during the course of these investigations is also examined.

Chapter 8 details the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. This chapter begins with an overview of the organizational structure of the Roman Catholic Church and the Diocese within that structure. There is then a review of the expert evidence provided at the Inquiry by Fathers Thomas Doyle and Frank Morrissey. They discussed issues such as the Catholic Church's historical response to sexual abuse by clergy, the 1983 Code of Canon Law, the 1992 From Pain to Hope report prepared by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, and the 2001 and 2002 norms. Topics such as the screening and training of members of the clergy on how to address sexual abuse were also canvassed. This evidence was provided for context and background.

A discussion of the policies and protocols developed in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall to address clergy sexual abuse and the evolution of those policies are also included. The balance of the chapter focuses on the institutional response of the Diocese to allegations of sexual misconduct by Fathers Gilles Deslauriers, Carl Stone, Charles MacDonald, Paul Lapierre, Romeo Major, Ken Martin, and other priests.

The institutional response of the CAS is addressed in Chapter 9. This chapter addresses the history and mandate of Children's Aid Societies and in particular, that of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. The development and evolution of a number of policies and protocols are set out. Some of them are interagency protocols entered into with other public institutions, while others are internal to the CAS. Policies governing foster homes and amendments to them are examined. Also examined are the duty to report under the Child and Family Services Act, the historical and current use of the Ontario Child Abuse Register, and the Dawson Review, a systematic review of the CAS of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry that took place in the late 1980s and resulted in large-scale changes to policies and protocols.

The CAS Project Blue investigation, which looked at whether or not children were currently at risk as a result of Father Charles MacDonald's active ministry in the St. Andrew's Parish, is discussed in this chapter. This investigation commenced after Constable Dunlop provided a copy of Mr. Silmsen's statement alleging historical sexual abuse by Father MacDonald.

The chapter also examines the individual allegations of former CAS wards Jeannette Antoine, Cathy Sutherland, Roberta Archambault, and C-14. In addition, it addresses allegations of abuse that arose in regard to the Second Street group home, the Lapensee group home, and the Cieslewicz foster home. The CAS interactions with police agencies in their investigations of Earl Landry Jr. and Jean Luc Leblanc are also addressed. The difficulty for former CAS wards to get access to their own files, the notification of employers of alleged perpetrators, and the reporting or non-reporting of sexual abuse allegations to the police are all covered in this chapter.

Chapter 10 sets out the institutional response of the Upper Canada District School Board and the Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario and their predecessor boards with respect to allegations of sexual abuse of children and young people. It also covers the development and evolution of policies and protocols pertaining to how reports of child sexual abuse were handled by these boards and their predecessors.

Father Gilles Deslauriers, Robert Sabourin, and Nelson Barque were employed by school boards that were predecessors to the current Upper Canada District School Board. The circumstances surrounding the employment of these men and allegations reported against them are discussed. The chapter also examines the circumstances surrounding the hiring of Jean Luc Leblanc, an individual convicted of sexual offences against children, as a school bus driver for the Upper Canada District School Board and the actions taken by employees of that board in response to his arrest on additional sexual offences in 1998.

The section on the Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario deals with allegations of sexual abuse that were made against teachers Marcel Lalonde and Giff Greggain and principal Lucien Labelle.

The institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General is addressed in Chapter 11. This chapter begins with an overview of the responsibilities and roles of Crown attorneys, and specifically the role of Crowns during investigations; a discussion of policies regarding the prosecution of sexual offences; and the evolution of Criminal Code provisions relating to the sexual abuse of children and youth.

This chapter also addresses prosecutions, legal opinions, and related work with respect to a number of historical child sexual abuse cases from the early 1980s onward. These include prosecutions, legal opinions and investigative advice from 1993 to 1996 and during the course of the Project Truth. Some of the prosecutions examined in detail are those involving Father Charles MacDonald and other Catholic priests, Jacques Leduc, and Jean Luc Leblanc.

Other prosecutions, opinions, and investigative advice are also addressed, as is the issue of services to assist victims and witnesses. The allocation of resources for special projects and other cases, and the interaction between Crown counsel and police are covered as well.

It is my hope that the facts and findings, together with my recommendations, as described in this Report, will serve to assist the community of Cornwall with its healing and reconciliation. I hope that it will also allow the public institutions examined to effect further positive change and to ensure that they have the trust and confidence of the citizens of Ontario.

Expert Evidence on Child Abuse

Experts From Different Disciplines Testify at the Phase 1 Hearings

The Phase 1 evidentiary hearings at the Cornwall Public Inquiry began with testimony on child sexual abuse from experts in different disciplines. The experts included psychologists, social workers, police officers, law professors, and Crown prosecutors. These individuals have spent many years in their respective fields assessing victims of child sexual abuse, investigating and prosecuting child abuse cases, and training child protection workers, members of the police force, and other professionals involved in the area of child sexual abuse. They have conducted research on different aspects of child sexual abuse and have numerous publications in journals, books, and manuals. Several have also testified as expert witnesses in civil and criminal proceedings, at coroners' inquests, and before parliamentary committees.

The purpose of this chapter is to describe the valuable research and evidence of the experts who testified at the Phase 1 hearings. Some of the topics covered are the incidence of child sexual abuse, the impact of child sexual abuse, the reporting of sexual abuse, and impediments to disclosure by victims of child sexual abuse. Another subject is the lack of awareness by the public and by many professionals, until the 1980s, of the extent of child sexual abuse. The legal rules that perpetuated the erroneous view that child victims are unreliable witnesses—that they have poor memories, lie, and fantasize—are also discussed. The chapter describes as well the lack of accommodation of victims of sexual abuse in the court system, which has had the effect of re-victimizing survivors of abuse who testify in civil and criminal proceedings.

Before discussing the research, assessments, and experience of these different experts, I would like to describe their backgrounds briefly.

Dr. David Wolfe has been a Professor of Psychology and Psychiatry in Canada for over twenty-five years. He is currently a professor at the University of Toronto and prior to that was at the University of Western Ontario, where he taught graduate and undergraduate courses in child sexual abuse, family violence, developmental psychopathology, and professional ethics. Dr. Wolfe was a founding member and Academic Director of the Centre for Research on Violence against Women and Children at the University of Western Ontario.

Dr. Wolfe has worked in private practice as a psychologist. He has also been extensively involved in research on child sexual abuse and has authored or co-authored many books and articles on subjects such as child abuse in community institutions, and the impact of sexual abuse on later development in childhood, adolescence, and adulthood. Dr. Wolfe was Chief Psychologist for the London Children's Aid Society from 1981 to 1995, where he conducted assessments of children.

Dr. Wolfe has testified as an expert in civil and criminal trials on child abuse. Many of these trials involved adults who had been sexually abused during childhood. Also, Dr. Wolfe was appointed by the Ontario Superior Court in 1999 as the consultant to the liquidator for the Christian Brothers of Ireland in Canada in the evaluation of claimants of Mount Cashel who were abused as children in this Newfoundland orphanage. Dr. Wolfe was the 2005 recipient of the Donald O. Hebb Award for distinguished contributions to psychology from the Canadian Psychological Association. He has also received the Outstanding Career Award from the American Professional Society on the Abuse of Children.

Dr. Nicolas Trocmé is a Professor of Social Work at McGill University and is Director of the McGill Centre for Research on Children and Families. He is also Senior Advisor for Research Integration at the Batshaw Youth and Family Centre in Montreal. Prior to that, he was a professor at the University of Toronto in the Faculty of Social Work. Dr. Trocmé was also the founding Director of the Centre for Excellence for Child Welfare at the University of Toronto. He conducted his postdoctoral work at McMaster University at the Child Psychiatry Unit and the Centre for Studies of Children at Risk.

Dr. Trocmé is the recipient of numerous research grants and research contracts. In 1993, he was the principal investigator of the Ontario Incidence Study, which examined rates of reporting of child abuse and neglect. At that time, there was inadequate data on reports of children who had been abused. In 2003, Dr. Trocmé was the principal investigator of a national study on the incidence of reported child abuse and neglect and was involved in follow-up analysis in 2005–2006. His findings were shared with agencies and child protection workers throughout Canada.

Dr. Trocmé has authored or co-authored over sixty peer-reviewed publications, including journal articles and book chapters on different topics related to child abuse. He has also testified as an expert at coroners' inquests in Ontario.

Detective Wendy Leaver joined the Toronto Police Force in 1975. She worked in the Youth Bureau and subsequently in the Pornography Unit. Detective Leaver was seconded to the federal government from 1981 to 1985 to work with Dr. Robin Badgley, who was responsible for a renowned national study on sexual offences committed on children in Canada. This study is discussed in further detail in this chapter.

Detective Leaver became a sexual assault investigator and later coordinator of the Sex Crimes Unit of the Toronto Police Force. In her fifteen years with the Unit, Detective Leaver has been involved in approximately thirty historical sexual assault investigations, the majority of which have involved institutions such as schools and churches. These cases have predominantly involved male complainants.

Detective Leaver taught a course to first-year medical students at the University of Toronto on profiling pedophiles, and she helped develop a sexual assault and child abuse training course for police officers. She was also involved in the development of a course for the Canadian Forces and the RCMP. She has lectured at the Ontario Police College, the Canadian Police College, and the Law Society of Upper Canada. Detective Leaver's courses on interviewing victims of abuse, victim management, and video-conferencing for vulnerable witnesses have been presented internationally in countries such as Australia, Italy, England, and the Netherlands.

Wendy Harvey has been a Crown prosecutor in British Columbia for over twenty-five years. She specializes in sex crimes and crimes against children. Ms Harvey has made numerous presentations and has given training sessions on sexual abuse to members of the judiciary, prosecutors, police officers, psychologists, medical doctors, and defence lawyers. Ms Harvey was involved in the Jericho Project in British Columbia, in which there were allegations of sexual crimes committed by staff on students at Jericho Hill School for the Blind and the Deaf. She developed an administrative system for criminal cases to ensure that prosecutors have advance notice of trials so that they have time to meet with vulnerable witnesses, such as child victims of abuse, prior to legal proceedings.

Wendy Harvey testified as an expert before a parliamentary committee on the 1988 reforms to the Criminal Code and Canada Evidence Act: children's evidence and protections to child victims of abuse in criminal proceedings. She has worked with the Policy Centre for Victim Issues on the United Nations Resolution on Guidelines on Treatment of Children, Witnesses, and Victims.

Ms Harvey has written books and many papers on child abuse. Her first book, So You Have to Go to Court, was published in 1986 and was geared to child witnesses. Her second book, Sexual Offences Against Children in the Criminal Process, was released in 1993. She also authored a publication entitled “Child Witness Preparation.” Her most recent book, Trauma, Trials and Transformation, which she co-authored with psychologists, was published in 2006. It discusses the impact of sex crimes and provides information on the civil and criminal justice system to victims of sexual abuse.

Professor Nicholas Bala, another expert who testified at the Phase 1 hearings, has been a professor in the Faculty of Law at Queen’s University for over twenty-five years. His areas of speciality include children’s law and family law with a focus on child abuse, child witnesses, child welfare law, and children who commit crimes. Professor Bala has published extensively; he has authored or co-authored twelve books and more than a hundred articles and book chapters. His work has been cited by the Supreme Court of Canada and appellate courts in several provinces.

Professor Bala was the lead researcher in a report on the Ontario Child Abuse Register and was a consultant to the Special Advisor on Child Sexual Abuse to the Minister of Health and Welfare Canada, Rix Rogers, in 1989–1990. He also was involved in the Robins Report in 2000, on child sexual abuse in schools. In 2004, Professor Bala was a member of a research team that reviewed the Ontario Office of Child and Family Service Advocacy. He has appeared several times as a witness before parliamentary committees related to issues of child abuse and child witnesses and has made several presentations in continuing education programs for judges, lawyers, doctors, police officers, and psychologists, as well as at law reform and academic conferences. Professor Bala is the principal investigator of an interdisciplinary project on child witnesses funded by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada. Other members on the team include psychology professors and a victim/witness worker.

John Liston, who has a Master of Social Work degree as well as a Master of Business Administration, has been involved with the child welfare system since the late 1960s. He was the Executive Director of the Children’s Aid Society of London & Middlesex for twenty years, where he was responsible for a staff of 400 and an operating budget of $50 million. Prior to that, he was Assistant Executive Director of the Children’s Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto and Executive Director of the Big Brothers of Metropolitan Toronto. Mr. Liston has served in a variety of positions at Children’s Aid, including supervisor and front-line worker.

Mr. Liston has been involved in research endeavours of provincial and national significance. He oversaw the project “Protecting Children Is Everyone’s Business.” This research, conducted by a team at the University of Western Ontario, analyzed the reasons for the growing number of children in care and the increase in services in the late 1990s and early 2000s. Mr. Liston also oversaw the operation of the first agency-based provincial training centre for the London Children's Aid Society, which is also used by other Children's Aid Societies in southwestern Ontario. Furthermore, he has participated on several provincial task forces on Children's Aid Societies. Mr. Liston is an expert in the response of child welfare to allegations of child sexual abuse.

Dr. Peter Jaffe, a psychologist since 1974, is a professor in the Faculty of Education and the Departments of Psychology and Psychiatry at the University of Western Ontario.¹ He has been teaching for over thirty years. Dr. Jaffe is also the Academic Director of the Centre for Research in Violence against Women and Children, which addresses sexual as well as physical abuse.

Dr. Jaffe is also Director Emeritus at the Centre for Children and Families in the Justice System (formerly known as the London Family Court Clinic). He was the Executive Director of the Centre for twenty-six years. The Centre receives over 200 referrals each year of child victims or witnesses, who may ultimately testify in court proceedings. The Centre has also had referrals of adult survivors of historical abuse. Dr. Jaffe has conducted many assessments of child and adult victims of abuse, as well as of pedophiles and other individuals who have sexually abused children. The Centre works collaboratively with Children's Aid, the police, and the Crown Attorney's Office.

Dr. Jaffe has been involved in both quantitative and qualitative research on child abuse. He has a plethora of publications and has co-authored books, chapters, and articles on child abuse and family violence. He has also worked on the development of child witness protocols that focus on making courts more child friendly, to avoid the re-traumatization of children. Dr. Jaffe has appeared as an expert in court proceedings on the impact of sexual abuse on adult survivors, abuse in community institutions, the effects of trauma on memory, as well as on delayed disclosure of sexual abuse.²

Types and Prevalence of Child Sexual Abuse

At the Phase 1 hearings, Dr. David Wolfe gave an overview of the different types of child sexual abuse and described the prevalence of child sexual abuse in Canada. The following World Health Organization definition, in his view, comprehensively captures the nature of child sexual abuse:

1. Dr. Jaffe was also a member of the Phase 2 Advisory Panel.

2. The evidence of Father Francis Morrissey and Father Thomas Doyle will be discussed in Chapter 8, "Institutional Response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall."

Child sexual abuse is the involvement of a child in sexual activity that he or she does not fully comprehend, is unable to give informed consent to, or for which the child is not developmentally prepared and cannot give consent, or that violates the laws or social taboos of society. Child sexual abuse is evidenced by this activity between a child and an adult or another child who by age or development is in a relationship of responsibility, trust or power, the activity being intended to gratify or satisfy the needs of the other person.

As Dr. Wolfe explained, children cannot give informed consent to sexual activity, behaviour they do not fully understand. Moreover, the relationship context is critical to understanding the nature of abuse. The abuser may be a family member, caregiver, teacher, or stranger. The World Health Organization definition describes the emotional bond the child may have with the adult perpetrator of the abuse.

A distinction is made by professionals between “intra-familial” and “extra-familial” sexual abuse. As the name suggests, intra-familial abuse is perpetrated by a person who has a family relationship with the child, and includes people who live with the child as well as members of the child’s extended family. Extra-familial abuse refers to situations in which the sexual exploiter is not related to the child; it is important, however, to note that the child victim typically knows the person committing the sexual abuse. Girls are more likely to experience intra-familial child sexual abuse within their home, whereas boys are more likely to become victims of extra-familial sexual abuse.

There are different types of child sexual abuse. Physical sexual abuse includes (1) touching or fondling of the sexual parts of the child’s body, or touching by the child of sexual parts of the older person’s body; (2) sexual kissing; (3) penetration—penile, digital, and with objects—of the vagina, anus, or mouth; and (4) masturbation of the child or the child masturbating the perpetrator. Verbal sexual abuse involves the use of inappropriate sexual language with the child and includes making lewd comments about the child’s body or making obscene phone calls. Exhibitionism and voyeurism is a type of sexual abuse in which the child poses, undresses, or performs in a sexual fashion; it includes exposure of the child to sexual activity and pornographic movies or photographs.

The concept of “grooming” of children by abusers was discussed in the expert testimony. Over time, child victims are gradually introduced by the perpetrator to sexual activities. The grooming process is designed to make the child believe that the sexual activities are “normal” and acceptable.

Pedophilia is sexual orientation toward children. It is designated as a mental disorder in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) of the American Psychiatric Association.³ “Exclusive pedophiles” are people who are sexually aroused only to children, while “non-exclusive pedophiles” can be sexually aroused to both children and adults. Pedophiles have no common background but are from different socio-economic classes and ethnic groups. Pedophiles can be married, single, and have children. They can have a heterosexual, homosexual, or bisexual orientation. There is one clear risk factor—being male. As Dr. Wolfe explained, almost all pedophiles are male. However, it is important to understand that homosexuality is distinct from pedophilia. Homosexuality is simply “sexual orientation towards the same sex” and does not mean that a male person is sexually aroused to children.

The DSM limits the definition of pedophilia to prepubescent children; that is, children thirteen years old or younger. In Dr. Wolfe’s view, the definition of pedophilia should be extended to children under the age of sixteen.

Important Facts About Child Sexual Abuse

Over 90 percent of child sexual abuse is committed by men. Of the 10 percent of cases in which women commit acts of child sexual abuse, half of these situations also involve a male partner.

The most vulnerable ages for child sexual abuse are between seven and thirteen years old.

There have been two major prevalence studies of child sexual abuse in Canada: the Badgley Survey in 1983, and the Ontario Health Supplement Survey in 1990. The Badgley study found that 17.6 percent of women and 8.2 percent of men reported that they had been victims of child sexual abuse before the age of seventeen. The Ontario Health Supplement Survey, conducted seven years later, concluded that the incidence rate for severe child sexual abuse was 11.1 percent for females and 3.9 percent for males. As Dr. Trocmé said in his evidence, these two major studies confirmed that child sexual abuse is much more widespread than previously believed. Most child sexual abuse—70 to 90 percent—is committed by acquaintances or family members. Child sexual abuse usually occurs within ongoing relationships based on the appearance of protection, nurturing, and trust. Children often do not realize they are victims and repeatedly and voluntarily return to the abuser. They may be offered gifts, alcohol, or money. If an important or prominent member of the community such as a school principal, priest, or teacher instructs them to engage in particular sexual conduct, children may believe that this is acceptable behaviour. In fact, victims of child sexual abuse may not know until many years later that they have been abused. Dr. Wolfe explained at the hearings:

3. American Psychiatric Association, Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, 4th ed. (Washington, DC: American Psychiatric Association, 1994).

With children, they don't really understand what is happening to them in many cases and it's important to keep in mind that because of the nature of the abuse, they're not frightened by it in many cases. It may actually be pleasurable. They may get to do adult things that their friends can't do like drink. So they go back for the attention, for the special relationship, sometimes for the money that they're given, the gifts and the fact that sometimes there's special esteem given if you're the friend of this teacher, if you're the friend of that coach.

Although sexual abuse is prevalent in all socio-economic classes, some children may be particularly at risk. According to experts, offenders prey on vulnerable children. Such situations include a single mother who seeks a positive male role model for her son such as a Big Brother, Boy Scout leader, or priest. Another example is a child who is developmentally delayed. Dr. Jaffe stated that children in trouble with the law, some of whom may have been in custody or in detention facilities, are also at risk of sexual abuse; they are considered "bad kids," and if they disclose the abuse they have little credibility. Perpetrators seek to exert various controls over children—for example, financial and emotional—in order to disempower and intimidate these young people.

There is a high recidivism rate among pedophiles. This means that there is a tendency for these offenders to repeat these sexual acts. According to social science research, pedophiles who are sexually attracted to boys have the highest recidivism rate. The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders of the American Psychiatric Association states that the recidivism rate for pedophiles who prefer sexual encounters with boys is twice that of those who have a sexual preference for girls. According to the expert testimony, organizations with the greatest amount of access to children, such as schools and sports organizations, have the greatest risk of attracting pedophiles.

The Impact of Child Sexual Abuse

It was evident from the testimony of the experts and the research studies they presented that child sexual abuse has devastating effects not only during childhood but also long term, throughout adulthood. The impacts are psychological, physical, and financial. As will be discussed in this and the following chapters of the Report, the consequences of child sexual abuse may also be intergenerational.

Physical impacts of child sexual abuse include appetite problems, headaches, vomiting, and sleep problems. Children may also exhibit regressive behaviour such as bedwetting, thumb-sucking, excessive crying, and tantrums. Other effects include self-destructive conduct such as self-inflicting injuries and engaging in risk-taking behaviour.⁴ Children who have been sexually abused may be predisposed to panic attacks and depression and may have difficulty focusing and sustaining their attention. They may exhibit a withdrawal from participation in activities, a decline in school performance, and a lack of interest in socializing with peers. Studies confirm that sexual abuse is connected to “poorer cognitive performance.”⁵

The impact of child sexual abuse depends not only on the severity and chronic nature of the abuse but also on the child’s family and situational characteristics. Dr. Wolfe testified that “the best circumstance for a child ... would be one in which he or she tells what happens, the adults believe them,” an investigation is conducted, and there is support for the child “along the way.” In fact, one of the most significant factors in mitigating the negative effects of child sexual abuse is support from and protective actions by the child’s parents. The response from institutions and from officials in the institutions, such as childcare workers and police officers, is also important in terms of minimizing the adverse impact of the abuse. Dr. Wolfe explained:

So if they are, so to speak, shut down by that system, someone says, “No, this couldn’t have happened or you’re making it up,” or in any way attributes it to the child, then they either will quit saying anything about it or may have even a lot more adjustment problems ...

Children who are believed and supported have the best chance of growing up healthy. The impact of child sexual abuse is generally more serious if the molester is in a position of trust and authority.

Dr. David Wolfe, from the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health at the University of Toronto, along with colleagues from the Department of Psychology at the University of Western Ontario, recently completed a study entitled “Child Abuse in Religiously-Affiliated Institutions: Long-Term Impact on Men’s Mental Health,” published in the journal Child Abuse and Neglect.⁶ It describes the effects of physical and sexual abuse on male children committed by adults in positions of authority and trust in an institution. The acts of abuse took place between the early 1960s and the late 1980s but were not investigated until the 1990s.

4. See, for example, C. Wekerle and D. Wolfe, “Child Maltreatment,” in Child Psychopathology, ed. E.J. Mash and R.A. Barkley (New York: The Guilford Press, 2003), pp. 632–684.

5. Ibid., p. 643.

6. David A. Wolfe, Karen J. Francis, and Anna-Lee Straatman, “Child Abuse in Religiously-Affiliated Institutions: Long-Term Impact on Men’s Mental Health,” Child Abuse and Neglect: The International Journal, vol. 30, no. 2 (2006): pp. 205–212.

In this study, 63 percent of the men who had been victims of child sexual abuse at this institution reported that they suffered post-traumatic stress disorder, including flashbacks, nightmares, and anxiety attacks. Sixty-five percent of the men had substance abuse problems related to alcohol, and one-third suffered from severe mood disorders such as depression and suicide ideation. These victims of historical abuse have high rates of criminal behaviour: 50 percent have committed property offences, 49 percent substance-related crimes, and 40 percent have a history of violence. According to this study, victims have difficulty maintaining employment, developing intimate relationships, regulating their anger, and trusting others. Moreover, they have “higher lifetime rates of anxiety, alcohol abuse/dependence and anti-social behaviour than non-abused men.”⁷

Dr. Wolfe and his co-researchers state that the long-term effects of child abuse in non-familial settings are connected to the nature of the relationship of the victim with the abuser, the significance of the setting, and the nature and severity of the abuse. The importance of the institution, the role of the perpetrator(s) in the institution or organization, and the community’s response to the allegations of abuse all have an impact on the long-term effects of the abuse on the victim.

Dr. Wolfe and Dr. Jaffe conducted a study entitled “The Impact of Child Abuse in Community Institutions and Organizations: Advancing Professional and Scientific Understanding,” published in the 2003 American Psychological Association journal Clinical Psychology: Science and Practice.⁸ The authors identify important factors that contribute to the long-term impact of child sexual abuse committed in community institutions and organizations. The first is the significance and role of the community institution or organization within society.⁹ When an institution is highly valued, as, for example, a religious or educational institution, children may be particularly vulnerable to abuse by individuals associated with that institution. As the authors state, “When a child is abused, efforts at disclosure may be thwarted by the strong community support for the institution, as well as the resources and power of the institution itself.”¹⁰

7. Ibid.

8. David A. Wolfe, Peter G. Jaffe, Jennifer L. Jetté, and Samantha E. Poisson, “The Impact of Child Abuse in Community Institutions and Organizations: Advancing Professional and Scientific Understanding,” Clinical Psychology: Science and Practice, vol. 10, no. 2 (2003): 179–191.

9. Ibid., p. 182.

10. Ibid., pp. 182–183.

Another important factor is the role of the perpetrator within the institution or organization. Adults and children tend to trust individuals such as teachers, ministers, and Boy Scout leaders because of their expertise and their position within the institution. Parents are “less likely to scrutinize the activities” of these individuals, and “children are more likely to do as they’re told” and not question these authority figures.¹¹ This occurs with religious leaders, often considered representatives of God. Also in sports organizations, as, for example, hockey, a child may “fear that disclosure will jeopardize their aspirations or interfere with their ... opportunities” and may “accommodate themselves to the circumstances.”¹²

An additional factor is the degree and nature of the child’s involvement with the institution. Is the child required to participate in the institution, for example, and how often is he or she involved with the organization?

Moreover, the circumstances surrounding the abusive acts and the post-abuse events have a profound impact on the well-being of the abuse victim. That is, the nature of the sexual acts, whether violence was involved, and the response of the institution to disclosure by the child victim are important. For instance, if a religious or educational institution simply transfers a priest, teacher, or other perpetrator and does not conduct an investigation, the child victim may experience further feelings of self-blame and more serious, long-lasting consequences. Also, the failure of the justice system to respond appropriately when allegations are raised can have a devastating impact on victims of child sexual abuse.

Expert witnesses at the Phase 1 hearings summarized five typical core outcomes for adult victims of child sexual abuse:

1. Difficulty trusting people in different relationships. Victims of abuse may move from one partner to another and may be unable to maintain steady employment.
2. Difficulty controlling their behaviour. They may commit criminal acts or engage in violent behaviour.
3. Poor coping skills, which may lead to alcohol or drug abuse.
4. Anxiety or mood disorders such as depression or suicide ideation.
5. Confusion about their sexual identity or orientation. This is particularly the case for men who have had sexual relations with a male during their childhood and who, consequently, may be uncertain whether they are gay.

11. Ibid., p. 183.

12. Ibid.

Another important long-term impact is that abused victims may themselves become perpetrators of child sexual abuse. A further consequence is that when these individuals have children, they often experience serious fears and high anxiety when their sons or daughters attend school, church, or other institutions at which they themselves were abused. There is a great mistrust of these authority figures. As Dr. Jaffe said, such abuse changes many individuals' "whole life trajectory." He referred to current research that indicates that the relationship between child sexual abuse and later mental health problems "is as high as the correlation between smoking and lung cancer."

In Dr. Jaffe's view, the potential impact of abuse is not adequately understood. Dr. Jaffe has interacted with hundreds of survivors of abuse in his career. Common responses by both members of the public and some professionals to adults who disclose child sexual abuse are that their stories are not credible or that the impact is not serious and they should "get on with their life" and put the child abuse behind them:

When they come forward, the first thing they're told, "It didn't happen" or "It couldn't have happened." Once there's a finding that, in fact, it did happen, the next thing people say, "Well, maybe it happened, but it wasn't that bad."

As will be discussed later in this Report and in my recommendations, treatment and counselling services must be readily available and accessible for survivors of historical child abuse. As both the experts and victims and alleged victims of abuse repeatedly said at the Inquiry, treatment and counselling services, particularly for male victims of sexual abuse, are lacking. Moreover, entire families are affected by the abuse, not solely the victim. As Dr. Jaffe stressed, it is important for treatment services to be available for parents as well as non-abused siblings. The London psychologist illustrated the importance of such counselling by referring to interactions he had had with a father whose son had been abused by a religious member in the community:

The reality is you have to see a whole family system, that people are affected, adults.

I talked to a father whose son was abused in their faith community and the impact on him in a profound way, his faith, feeling guilty about all the time he thought his son was having a good time with sort of a fatherly and other male mentor in the community; now realizing that his son was being violated. So there's guilt. There's impact on sibling relationships.

As Dr. Jaffe said, “So when you think about a survivor you have to think about the ripples throughout.”

It is important to note that treatment for victims of sexual abuse is often postponed for fear that discussing the abuse with a counsellor or other professional may taint the victim’s testimony and ultimately negatively affect his or her credibility as a witness. But as Dr. Wolfe said, delaying treatment until the resolution of the criminal process can have serious consequences for victims of abuse such as drug overdoses, suicide, and other self-destructive behaviour.

Difficulties of Disclosure Encountered by Child Victims of Sexual Abuse

The difficulties of disclosure encountered by child victims of sexual abuse are complex. As social scientists explain, disclosure is very difficult for such victims because of their vulnerability and the power imbalance between them and the perpetrators of the abuse.

There are many reasons why child victims of abuse fail to disclose. First, as mentioned, a young child may not in fact know that the sexual behaviour of an authority figure such as a teacher, priest, or foster parent is inappropriate. As Crown Prosecutor Wendy Harvey commented at the hearings, “[E]ventually by the time they do find out that it’s wrong, they are already entrenched in their relationship” with the perpetrator. Second, the child may be threatened by the abuser if he or she discloses the sexual acts to a person in the institution, to a parent, or to another caregiver. “You won’t have a place to live,” “You’ll have to leave your school,” or “I’m going to kill ... your dog” are examples of such threats. Moreover, the child victim may believe that she or he did something wrong. The relationship between the child, the abuser, and the institutional context also affects the victim’s ability to disclose abuse. For example, a child raised in a community in which a religious institution is highly valued is less likely to report that he has been abused by a priest, minister, or other religious figure in that institution. Furthermore, the child victim may believe that disclosure will disrupt or destroy his or her family or community. To complicate the situation, the child may care about his or her abuser. As Wendy Harvey said:

... [T]hey love them and, in fact, it’s like there’s a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde scenario where you’ve got this loving relationship, whether it be the priest or the teacher or the father or the doctor, whoever it is, who provides so much to that child and actually in many ways helps them with their development in a really positive way, but then there’s this. There’s the fact that the sexual abuse is going on and if only they could have that relationship without this, and they find that the only way that this can be stopped is by telling someone about it or reporting.

Children may not disclose because they feel embarrassed or guilty, or think they will not be believed. They also may not feel safe disclosing the sexual abuse. As Dr. Wolfe stressed, there is “the shroud of silence” that “occurs in childhood around sexuality.” Children may feel guilty or ashamed because they found the sexual acts pleasurable. It is particularly difficult for boys to disclose sexual abuse. As Dr. Jaffe explained, boys are socialized not to speak about their vulnerability: “[B]oys are raised to be strong and silent, to keep feelings to themselves, to be tough guys, to maintain a tough guise.” Another impediment to disclosure by males is that it may raise questions about their sexual orientation; the social stigma of being labelled as gay is clearly a barrier to disclosure.

Wendy Harvey discussed some of the reasons people decide to disclose the abusive acts perpetrated on them. The disclosure may occur one year, several years, or even decades after the sexual abuse:

... [A]n interesting thing [that] happens in the lives of many is that they pass by kind of this invisible threshold where one day, all of a sudden, it seems the right thing to do, to tell. And sometimes this is a year later; sometimes it's 50 years later; and sometimes the person they tell is a therapist and sometimes it's a police officer, a friend or whatever. Depending on who they tell, it may or may not find its way into a police file and there's all kinds of issues around that too.

Survivors may feel that the abuse is something they need to resolve in their lives, or they may be very concerned that their siblings, children, or grandchildren are at risk of being abused by the same perpetrator. The victims may also be in a different setting and consequently feel that their surroundings are such that it is safe to disclose the sexual abuse. They may also want to provide an explanation for their behaviour to their spouses, friends, family members, or the people with whom they work. Victims of abuse may also decide to seek therapy and compensation for the abuse. In some jurisdictions, it is necessary to make a police complaint in order to qualify for Criminal Injuries Compensation. Survivors of abuse may seek acknowledgment of the abuse as well as an apology from the perpetrator.

The Duty to Report Child Abuse

Although a legal duty to report child abuse has existed in Ontario since 1965,¹³ it was rarely reported until the 1980s. The *Child Welfare Act*¹⁴ imposed a legal duty on professionals to report child abuse to child welfare authorities. Members of the public also had an obligation under the legislation to report child abuse, although unlike professionals, no fine or other penalty could be imposed on them for failure to report. This statutory duty continued under the Ontario *Child and Family Services Act*¹⁵ and, as will be discussed in this Report, the reporting obligations of professionals have been expanded. But despite this legal duty, sexual abuse cases involving children are often not reported. Even in cases in which professionals have failed to report, legal action has generally not been initiated against them for violating their statutory duty.

13. Child Welfare Act, S.O. 1965, c. 14.

14. S.O. 1978, c. 85.

Dr. Trocmé explained that prior to the 1980s, child sexual abuse was poorly understood by professionals. When child victims disclosed, professionals either did not believe them or did not know how to respond appropriately. According to Dr. Trocmé, there were problems with identification, detection, and reporting of child sexual abuse.

What were the common responses of institutions and community organizations when children disclosed abuse? The first response to disclosure of abuse was generally disbelief, and the next was to “get rid of the problem.” The term used in some of the literature is “passing the trash.” Throughout Canada and the United States, a common response when a teacher had abused a student was to send the teacher to another school or school district. The abusive acts were not reported and the offender had access to other children. This pattern was common not only in schools but also in churches, recreational clubs, and hockey organizations. Dr. Wolfe gave the example of Mount Cashel, in which Christian Brothers in Newfoundland were moved to other schools, where they continued to abuse children.

In many historical sexual abuse cases, adults saw “bits and pieces about what’s happening” but “didn’t want to believe it.” The initial reaction was “loyalty to your own.” These individuals immediately think about “the consequences to that adult rather than the first response is always the safety and security of children.” Institutions had a culture of turning a “blind eye” to the abuse. And as Dr. Jaffe has observed in his thirty years as a psychologist in the fields of child abuse and domestic violence, “[W]e still have a number of people who operate through denial.” There are professionals in the community, neighbours, and friends, he testified, who believe child abuse is predominantly a societal problem of the past. The responses of such individuals are, “We have help lines. We have shelters. We have Children’s Aid. It’s not really happening any more.” Dr. Jaffe commented:

I used the analogy of 30 kilometres down a 100 kilometre road. I think people are much more aware but ... I think there is still some resistance.

15. S.O. 1984, c. 55.

I think there's a—if you look at any group of professionals, take 100 people at random, you still have some percentage that are in denial. It can't happen any more.

In an institutional setting, it is most difficult to deal with child sexual abuse when it is committed by people with high status in the organization: “[T]he more power that person has, the more influence they have in institutions that are supposed to investigate, the greater the danger there will be a longer denial or potential cover-up around the problem.” “[C]hild abuse is about power,” stressed Dr. Jaffe:

It's about adults' position of power violating children and ultimate power corrupts and if people feel they can get away with it and there's no consequence, then there is a real danger. Some of the communities, if you have multiple perpetrators and they have significant influence, it makes it harder to uncover these cases.

Dr. Jaffe also discussed the reporting of child sexual abuse in religious institutions, places that have historically had a “profound influence” in society. These institutions often lack clear infrastructure to report sexual abuse:

It's often confusing from the outside about responsibilities and authority and when you're trying to talk about abuse within a church, you're talking about disclosing something that happened in your whole community. When someone belongs to a church, it's not just belonging to an institution. It's your very sense of being in the community, your faith. It's that more difficult to disclose it, more difficult to disclose it and be believed. So it's the ultimate institution.

And, he added, “[W]hen you have institutions where the church and the schools are combined ... it's extremely powerful.”

The importance of reporting child sexual abuse was stressed by Dr. Jaffe; “silence” is tantamount to “condoning” the abuse. People may either “watch it happen and don't say anything” or they may be “actively part of a cover-up”:

... [B]ystanders play different roles, active and passive. At the end of the day, the bystanders, whether they're active or passive, have ultimately condoned the behaviour; that it wasn't worth stopping, it wasn't worth reporting, it wasn't worth taking action on.

Condoning such behaviour has very serious consequences: it re-victimizes the child and also “puts future victims in danger of the same perpetrator.” As Dr. Jaffe warned, “Silence is the enemy of child sexual abuse.”

Prosecutor Wendy Harvey testified that only 7 to 10 percent of sex crimes are reported.

False Denials by Perpetrators Versus False Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Children

Although attention is often focused on false allegations of sexual abuse by children, empirical studies have established that the number of children who fabricate sexual abuse is statistically very small. Social scientists have repeatedly stated that false denials by perpetrators are much more common than false allegations by victims of abuse.

Dr. David Finkelhor, an expert on child sexual abuse in the United States, was one of the first social scientists in North America to research and publish studies on child sexual abuse, beginning in the 1970s. In a 1994 article entitled “Current Information on the Scope and Nature of Child Sexual Abuse,”¹⁶ Dr. Finkelhor states that only between 4 and 8 percent of reports of abuse are fabricated, exaggerated, or misinterpreted.¹⁷ This study did not address historical allegations of child sexual abuse by adults.

The conclusion that false reports of child sexual abuse are statistically few was confirmed by Ontario child abuse expert Dr. Nicolas Trocmé. In the Ontario Incidence Study of Reported Child Abuse and Neglect,¹⁸ Dr. Trocmé found that very few reports of child abuse are deliberately or maliciously false. According to the results of his research, only 1 percent of reports of child sexual abuse are intentionally false. Although the number of false allegations made by adults in historical abuse cases is unknown, it is also believed to be low.

As both Dr. Trocmé and Professor Bala explained at the hearings, it is important to distinguish between false and unsubstantiated allegations of abuse. An unsubstantiated or unproven allegation means that there is insufficient evidence to establish that the child sexual abuse occurred. As Professor Bala said, it is essential to understand that a criminal acquittal or unsuccessful civil lawsuit “does not mean they were not genuine victims; [i]t simply means there was not enough evidence to establish” the criminal conviction or civil liability. The Queen’s University law professor explained that proving sexual abuse in court proceedings, whether criminal or civil, is very difficult in both current and historical cases of child sexual abuse. As will be discussed, such cases generally lack physical evidence. Sexual abuse of children only infrequently involves penetration and moreover, there is often significant delay in disclosure, with the result that any available physical evidence is not preserved. To compound the problem, there are rarely any witnesses to the abuse. Child sexual abuse and sexual crimes in general are typically committed in private—solely the child victim and the perpetrator are present.

16. David Finkelhor, “Current Information on the Scope and Nature of Child Sexual Abuse,” The Future of Children, vol. 4, no. 2 (1994): 31–53; David Wolfe, testimony, February 13, 2006, transcript pp. 121–128, February 14, 2006, pp. 49–52.

17. Ibid.

18. Nico [Nicolas] Trocmé, Debra McPhee, Kwok Kwan Tam, and Tom Hay, Ontario Incidence Study of Reported Child Abuse and Neglect (Toronto: Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse, 1994).

Growing Awareness of Child Sexual Abuse

Until the 1980s, there was very little knowledge in Canada or the United States of the prevalence or impact of child sexual abuse. As Professor Bala wrote in “Child Sexual Abuse Prosecutions in Canada: A Measure of Progress,” “Until the early 1980’s, child sexual abuse was a virtually ignored social phenomenon in Canada.”¹⁹ In the 1950s and 1960s, it was believed that child sexual abuse was rare and in the few number of cases in which it was committed, strangers were the perpetrators. There were few scientifically rigorous studies on child abuse prior to the 1980s.

The women’s movement in the 1970s publicly voiced issues of domestic violence and sexual exploitation. During that decade and into the 1980s, it continued to be believed that sexual abuse was committed primarily either by strangers or by members of the nuclear family (where it was generally considered to be an incestuous problem between fathers and their daughters).

In 1983, Bill C-127 was proclaimed. Prior to that time, laws on sexual abuse focused on penetration. In order to secure a rape conviction, it was necessary to establish that penetration had occurred. Also, until 1983, it was legal for a man to rape his wife. Moreover, there were no offences in the Criminal Code for fondling, invitation to sexual touching, or for sexual exploitation of children by individuals in positions of trust. In addition, the language of many of the criminal offences described men as the offenders and women as victims, although boys are often victims of sex crimes and women are sometimes the offenders.

19. Nicholas Bala, “Child Sexual Abuse Prosecutions in Canada: A Measure of Progress,” Annals of Health Law, vol. 1 (Chicago: Loyola University Chicago School of Law, 1992), p. 177.

The 1983 reforms repealed the crime of rape and replaced it with sexual assault. Three tiers of sexual assault were introduced in the Criminal Code: sexual assault, sexual assault causing bodily harm, and aggravated sexual assault.²⁰ Also the rules relating to the law of recent complaint were abrogated.²¹

But it wasn't until the Badgley Report in 1984 that government officials, Crown prosecutors, police officers, mental health professionals, and the public began to understand the scope of the problem of child sexual abuse in Canada. The Badgley Report, described as "a seminal piece of work," was the "first comprehensive effort in Canada to gain a national" understanding "of the problem of sexual abuse."²² This national empirical study revealed that the incidence of child sexual abuse was much higher than previously understood. It was also one of the first major studies to document the extent to which boys are sexually exploited. Entitled Sexual Offences Against Children in Canada, the Badgley Report states:²³

Child sexual abuse is a largely hidden yet pervasive tragedy that has damaged the lives of tens of thousands of Canadian children and youths. For most of them, their needs remain unexpressed and unmet. These silent victims—and there are substantial numbers of them—are often those in greatest need of care and help. Only a few young victims of sexual offences seek assistance from the helping services and there are sharp disparities in the types and adequacy of the services provided for them in different parts of the country.

It found that "about one in two females and one in three males have been victims of one or more unwanted sexual acts."²⁴ These acts included being touched on a 20. Bill C-127, An Act to Amend the Criminal Code, 1st Sess., 32nd Parl., 1980–81–82, s. 246.

21. The "recent complaint" rule, developed at common law, permitted counsel in a criminal prosecution to elicit from the complainant or other person a complaint of a sexual assault made at the first reasonable opportunity. The complaint was admitted, not for its truth, but to show consistency and rebut the adverse inference, which the trier of fact would otherwise be invited to draw, that the victim's allegation was untrue. In other words, the law of recent complaint permitted the trier of fact to draw a negative inference against the credibility of the complainant who had not made a complaint immediately after the alleged crime had occurred.

22. Rix Rogers, Reaching for Solutions: The Summary Report of the Special Advisor to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on Child Sexual Abuse in Canada (Rogers Report) (Ottawa, ON: National Clearinghouse on Family Violence, Health and Welfare Canada, 1990), p. 10.

23. Robin F. Badgley, Summary of the Report of the Committee on Sexual Offences Against Children and Youths, appointed by The Minister of Justice & Attorney General of Canada, The Minister of National Health and Welfare Government of Canada (Badgley Report) (Ottawa: Supply and Services Canada, 1984), p. 1.

24. Ibid.

sexual part of the body, being sexually threatened, and being sexually assaulted. About four out of five of these unwanted sexual acts were first committed against these people when they were children or youths. The Report concluded that abuse by strangers was a relatively small problem and that most sexual abuse was committed on children by family members, friends, and acquaintances such as teachers and coaches. As the Badgley Report stated, “[A]bout one in four of the sexual offences against young persons was committed by persons either prominent in the child’s life or by persons to whom the child was particularly vulnerable.”²⁵ It found:²⁶

- the opportunities for sexually abusing the children were greater than ordinary;
- the young victims were particularly vulnerable; and
- these offenders breached the vital position of trust reposed in them due to their special relationship to these young victims.

Not only did the Badgley Report document the extent of child abuse in Canada but it also created awareness of the inadequacies of legislation, policies, and protocols in our country.

The Badgley Report concluded that the sexual assault laws in Canada did not adequately deal with grooming by pedophiles, sexual exploitation that did not involve penetration, or exploitation by people in positions of trust. The Report proposed amendments to the Criminal Code to address a broader range of sexual acts. As discussed below, some of the recommendations in the Badgley Report were introduced in the Criminal Code and Canada Evidence Act in 1988. It recommended that it constitute a criminal offence for an individual to touch any part of a child’s body for a sexual purpose and, similarly, to have a child touch a person for a sexual purpose. It also proposed that the one-year limitation period for the prosecution of certain offences be removed from the Criminal Code.

The Badgley Report made significant recommendations about both evidence and procedural law with the objective of removing obstacles to the reception of children’s testimony and accommodating child witnesses testifying in legal proceedings. These included the abolition of the corroboration requirement for the evidence of children and the availability of screens and closed-circuit television for children testifying in court.

In 1988, Bill C-15 became law. These amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Criminal Code, which implemented some of the recommendations in the Badgley Report, represented “major reform” of the federal laws governing the sexual abuse of children.²⁷ Substantial barriers to the reception of children’s evidence were removed. Prior to the 1990s, there had been few successful prosecutions of child sexual assault, in large part because of the obstacles to the reception of children’s evidence, the lack of preparation of sexual assault victims for the court process, and the lack of accommodation of young witnesses by the judicial system.

25. Ibid., p. 21.

26. Ibid., pp. 21–22.

As a result of Bill C-15, the rule requiring corroboration for children under the age of fourteen was abolished. Children were also given the opportunity in 1988 to affirm in place of swearing on the Bible, an option previously available only to adult witnesses. New provisions were added to the Criminal Code to enable child sexual abuse victims under particular circumstances to testify behind a screen or by closed-circuit television. Moreover, a videotape of a child complainant can now be introduced in court for certain criminal sexual offences if particular conditions are satisfied. These reforms, designed to facilitate the testimony of child victims of abuse, were not available to adults who testified in criminal trials about sexual acts committed on them when they were children. A further reform, introduced in 1993, allows a support person in court for a child complainant who testifies in a sexual abuse case.

Bill C-15 also introduced new sexual offences into the Criminal Code such as (1) touching for sexual purpose, directly or indirectly, with a part of the body or with an object, any part of the body of a child under fourteen years old; and (2) inviting a child under fourteen to touch for a sexual purpose with an object or part of his/her body, directly or indirectly, the body of an adult. In addition, a sexual exploitation offence was introduced for people in a position of trust or authority with regard to children under the age the eighteen. It also applied to a person with whom a child was in a relationship of dependency.

As Prosecutor Wendy Harvey commented, an understanding was also beginning to emerge at this time that preparation of a child witness for court is very important. She explained:

... [T]he whole point of preparing a child for court is that it is an adult forum you are bringing the child into. You want to prepare them emotionally for something that they’re not used to. Even adults have difficulty testifying in a criminal court and particular difficulty with a very, very unusual experience of being cross-examined and actually having to sit in the same seat and endure it.

27. Nicholas Bala, “Bill C-15: New Protections for Children—New Challenges for Professionals,” C-15 Forums Keynote Address Series no. 1, October (Toronto: Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse, 1988), p. 2.

Victim/witness programs began in the 1980s to provide child witnesses in sexual abuse cases with information about the court process, to provide support persons, and to explain that prosecutors could ask the presiding judge to allow the child to testify behind a screen or by closed-circuit television.

In 1990, the Rogers Report, Reaching for Solutions, was released. Rix Rogers, Special Advisor to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, had been asked to conduct a study on the long-range direction of federal initiatives on child sexual abuse. His study involved consultations throughout Canada in urban areas, small communities, and the North,²⁸ in which he met with governmental and non-governmental officials, community-based groups, and front-line service providers. Rix Rogers also met with victims of child sexual abuse and perpetrators.

The Rogers Report confirmed the findings of the Badgley Report regarding the prevalence of child sexual abuse in Canada. The 1990 Report stated that child sexual abuse “affects children in all regions, races, religions and socio-economic classes of our society.”²⁹ It found that about 95 percent of child sexual abusers are male and that although the majority of victims are girls, “many victims are boys.”³⁰ It stated that “incidents involving multiple victims and multiple offenders are becoming more common.”³¹ According to the Rogers Report, “The sexual abuse of children is symptomatic of deeply rooted societal values which tolerate and thereby permit the misuse of power and authority against vulnerable populations, including children.”³²

The Rogers Report proposed several recommendations, which focused on:

- ways to expedite child sexual abuse cases in the court system;
- improved co-ordination of systems and professionals working with child sexual abuse cases;
- improved linkage between the justice, correctional, probation and parole systems;
- use of leverage in the justice system to mandate treatment opportunities;
- full utilization of the provisions of Bill C-15;
- improved consistency in sentencing;
- requirements for education and training of all professionals in the legal system, including judges;
- specialization in the field of investigation and prosecutions;

28. Rogers Report, p. 7.

29. Ibid., p. 13.

30. Ibid.

31. Ibid.

32. Ibid., p. 15.

- improved use of experts in the court process;
- increased provision of victim witness support services;
- changes to the Criminal Code and provincial legislation to improve victim protection;
- changes in the Criminal Code to improve supervision and treatment of offenders;
- establishment of screening mechanisms to ensure that those with a history of abuse are not placed in positions of responsibility for children; and
- further research into the characteristics and incidence of false allegations.

Some of the recommendations in the Rogers Report were:³³

That protocols be developed in each local community and rural region to facilitate inter-disciplinary and interjurisdictional co-operation among service providers and various systems in combating child abuse.

That provincial ministries of education, culture and recreation, and social services should continue to fund and plan strategies that will encourage an enhanced liaison between school personnel and community leaders, supported by developmentally appropriate preventive education programs, targeting pre-school through elementary to secondary levels of education. As well, teacher training must regularly deal with child sexual abuse.

That all relevant professional associations be encouraged to develop policy with respect to child abuse and the role their professionals should play in the detection, treatment and prevention of abuse.

That child and youth serving organizations in Canada continue and further develop their efforts to combat child abuse in Canada, including the addition of an official policy to prevent child abuse within their organization. Official policies should set out guidelines related to the selection, training and screening of leaders.

That churches develop policies and procedures for responding appropriately to the problem of child sexual abuse. This includes the articulation of guidelines for church leaders to follow in the event of disclosures, training for appropriate pastoral counselling, procedures to follow in the event that church personnel are accused of sexual abuse, and comprehensive screening procedures for clergy and other personnel who work with children and youth.

33. Ibid., pp. 21–22.

That all police officers and supervisory personnel receive training in issues related to child sexual abuse and domestic violence; and

That all police forces have officers who specialize in the handling of child sexual abuse cases and who have had specialized multi-disciplinary training in programs of at least one week's duration.

The Report stated that “[t]he criminal justice system across Canada is having great difficulty in coping with the increased number of child sexual abuse cases and at the same time minimizing the trauma which the system has on children.”³⁴ There is a need, concluded the Report, for more programs, resources, training, and protocols to facilitate coordination between different organizations such as the police and child protection services.

In the late 1980s and early 1990s, child sexual abuse in an institutional context started to appear on the radar screens of professionals and members of the public. The 1989 Hughes Inquiry into abuse at Mount Cashel Orphanage in Newfoundland heightened awareness about issues of sexual abuse of boys in institutions. This was followed by the St. George's Cathedral case in Kingston, in which there were allegations of both current and historical abuse by a choir-master, a respected member of the community. Reports started to appear in the media and professional literature about victims of child sexual abuse in residential schools as well as Ontario training schools such as Grandview, St. Joseph's Training School, and St. John's Training School.

The Hughes Inquiry into institutional abuse resulted in greater awareness in the legal community that adult victims of child sexual abuse often have criminal records, substance abuse problems, and high unemployment rates, and that these factors should not automatically undermine their credibility.

Mount Cashel was “shocking” in that clergy, individuals in positions of trust and authority, had abused children, the abuse was “wide-scale,” and the consequences to the victims were very serious. There was recognition in the late 1980s of the need to develop protocols to address child abuse in institutions serving youth such as schools, religious institutions, and volunteer organizations.

Another case that raised public and professional awareness in Ontario was Project Guardian. In 1993, pornographic videos were discovered in a garbage bag near a river in London, Ontario. It soon became evident to the London Police Department that this was a multi-victim, multi-offender case. The London Children's Aid Society worked jointly with the police in the investigation.

34. Ibid.

Not one of the victims, most of whom were disadvantaged and marginalized youth, came forward on their own to disclose the sexual abuse. Sixty percent of these children had had previous contact with the Children's Aid Society or were in foster care. Recruitment of the child victims involved psychological and financial manipulation such as gifts of sports jerseys and running shoes as well as meals at restaurants. As stated in the 1997 report Project "Guardian": The Sexual Exploitation of Male Youths in London,³⁵ "There was a highly successful system of peer recruitment, as well as adult-offered enticements, both of which fostered compliance, secrecy and escalation of involvement in young males lured into homosexual sex trade." Some of the adult perpetrators were "well respected professionals" in the London community.

John Liston, Executive Director of the Children's Aid Society (CAS) of London & Middlesex, stated that his staff was not prepared for a multi-offender, multi-victim investigation. The CAS protocols did not address this type of investigation. Another lesson learned from Project Guardian was the importance of a constructive and positive relationship between the CAS and the police. The importance of information sharing between agencies also became very evident. But as John Liston said, and as will be discussed in this Report, impediments remain with regard to the sharing of information. Mr. Liston argues that various statutory and regulatory provisions need to come into effect (such as Part VIII of the Child and Family Services Act) to facilitate information sharing between agencies such as the police, CAS, school boards, health units, and other agencies.

It was learned through Project Guardian that "[t]he dynamics underlying the sexual exploitation of children," particularly male youth, were "not well understood" by professionals. The 1997 report stressed:³⁶

... Specialized education must be offered to professionals who work with youth, so that they are able to identify potential victims, offer assistance to high risk youth, and intervene therapeutically and appropriately to protect victims. Additional training must be offered to police officers and child protection workers who routinely investigate cases of child sexual abuse ...

35. Louise Sas and Pamela Hurley, Project "Guardian": The Sexual Exploitation of Male Youths in London (London, ON: London Family Court Clinic, 1997), p. 2.

36. Ibid., p. 181.

The need for public education was also emphasized:³⁷

There is an acute need to provide the public with concrete accurate knowledge regarding the sexual exploitation of children. Concrete examples of high risk victim behaviour, recruitment strategies by offenders, and the negative impact on victims should be offered as part of public presentations so that parents and others are sensitized to the pattern of engagement.

The report stressed that there was the “need for a national strategy to combat child sexual abuse.”³⁸

The Robins Report, entitled Protecting Our Students, was released in 2000 and also raised awareness in Ontario about institutional sexual abuse of students in the school system. Sydney Robins, a former judge of the Ontario Court of Appeal, was appointed to conduct a review of incidents involving a teacher in Sault Ste. Marie at the Roman Catholic Separate School Board. All of the victims were females who ranged in age from ten to eighteen years old.³⁹ The conduct of Mr. DeLuca, the teacher, “severely damaged his victims’ physical and emotional well-being and, in some cases, has had a devastating impact on their lives.”⁴⁰

The Robins Report stressed that Mr. DeLuca’s situation “is not unique”:⁴¹

... There are abusive teachers who, like DeLuca, are “opportunistic” sexual predators motivated by power, control and sexual gratification. Some are pedophiles who prefer to have sex with children and have chosen to work in schools so they can better access their targets. Others have “romantic/bad judgment” relationships with students, believing that their conduct is either harmless or is acceptable because the students are said to be doing what they want to do. Still others engage in sexual harassment or insensitive and inappropriate, though not necessarily criminal, conduct. The unhappy reality is that cases of sexual misconduct are more prevalent than the public and the teaching profession may believe.

37. Ibid.

38. Ibid., p. 186.

39. Sydney L. Robins, Protecting Our Students: A Review to Identify and Prevent Sexual Misconduct in Ontario Schools (Toronto: Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General, 2000).

40. Sydney L. Robins, Protecting Our Students: Executive Summary and Recommendations (2000).

41. Ibid.

The Robins Report stated that many instances of sexual misconduct against students are concealed and are not reported. The reported cases of sexual misconduct “represent only the tip of the iceberg.”⁴² Justice Robins explains:⁴³

... Reluctance on the part of teachers to report suspected sexual misconduct by a colleague, intimidation of victims and their parents to prevent or discourage disclosure, failure to act upon disclosures of misconduct, the inadequacy of records documenting complaints made, the transfer of a suspected perpetrator from school to school, the absence of screening procedures on the hiring of new teachers have all been seen, to varying degrees, in both the DeLuca case and in numerous other cases and in the literature documenting sexual misconduct in schools.

Dr. Peter Jaffe was involved in the Robins review and interviewed some of the survivors who were sexually abused by the teacher. He said that although colleagues saw “signs, symptoms, warning signs,” “a conspiracy of silence” existed “throughout the system.” Mr. DeLuca was transferred from school to school and continued to sexually abuse students. When some of the children disclosed the abuse, they were not believed. As Dr. Jaffe testified, this case is a “reminder” of how “one perpetrator can do incredible damage to multiple victims.”

Approach of the Courts to Child Sexual Abuse Cases

After Bill C-15 was proclaimed in 1988, the constitutionality of several of the provisions in the new legislation was challenged. Decisions from the Supreme Court of Canada and appellate courts upheld the constitutionality of the new provisions, stressed the importance of accommodating child witnesses in court, and sought to more broadly admit the evidence of children in legal proceedings.

For example, the Supreme Court in *R. v. L.(D.O.)*⁴⁴ upheld the section introduced into the *Criminal Code*⁴⁵ that permitted a videotaped statement of a child in a sexual assault case to be admitted in criminal proceedings. Moreover, the 1990 Supreme Court of Canada landmark decision of *R. v. Khan*⁴⁶ expanded the

42. Ibid.

43. Ibid.

44. [1993] 4 S.C.R. 419.

45. Criminal Code, s. 715.1.

46. [1990] 2 S.C.R. 531.

circumstances in which the hearsay statements of a child could be admitted in court. In R. v. B.(G.),⁴⁷ Justice Wilson discussed how the judiciary should take a “common sense approach” to the testimony of children. Contradictions in a child’s evidence should not always be given the same effect as similar flaws in the testimony of an adult. The Supreme Court stated:⁴⁸

... While children may not be able to recount precise details and communicate the when and where of an event with exactitude, this does not mean that they have misconceived what happened to them and who did it. In recent years we have adopted a much more benign attitude to children’s evidence, lessening the strict standards of oath taking and corroboration, and I believe that this is a desirable development. The credibility of every witness who testifies before the courts must, of course, be carefully assessed but the standard of the “reasonable adult” is not necessarily appropriate in assessing the credibility of young children.

In another Supreme Court of Canada decision a few years later, Justice McLachlin affirmed this approach to the evidence of children. Adult tests for credibility should not be applied to the evidence of children. As the Court stated, “Since children may experience the world differently from adults, it is hardly surprising that details important to adults, like time and place, may be missing from their recollection.”⁴⁹ Justice McLachlin also discussed in R. v. W.(R.) the abolition of the legal requirement that children’s evidence be corroborated and the previous assumption that children’s testimony is always less reliable than the evidence of adults. She warned that “if a court proceeds to discount a child’s evidence automatically, without regard to the circumstances of the particular case, it will have fallen into error.”⁵⁰

Courts also became more receptive to the admissibility of expert evidence in child sexual abuse cases. For example, the Ontario Court of Appeal held in 1989 that a properly qualified expert could give opinion evidence about the behavioural and psychological characteristics of child victims of sexual abuse. Justice Galligan, speaking for the Ontario Court of Appeal, said:⁵¹

47. [1990] 2 S.C.R. 30.

48. Ibid., at 55.

49. R. v. W.(R.), [1992] 2 S.C.R. 122 at 133.

50. Ibid.

51. R. v. F.E.J. (1990), 53 C.C.C. (3d) 64 (Ont. C.A.) at 72.

I would think that it is probably not generally known that children who have been sexually abused, and have reported it, commonly recant their allegations. Thus, in order for the trial judge in this case to decide whether this child's testimony should have been disbelieved because of the letter, he was entitled to know that recantations are common.

Another landmark case was the Supreme Court of Canada decision R. v. Levogiannis,⁵² which upheld the constitutionality of the provision introduced in Bill C-15 that allows child sexual assault victims to testify behind a screen. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé said: "[T]he evidence of all those involved in judicial proceedings must be given in a way that is most favourable to eliciting the truth."⁵³ The court also discussed the re-victimization of child victims in legal proceedings and the low conviction rates in child sexual assault cases. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé wrote:⁵⁴

... [O]ne cannot ignore the fact that, in many instances, the court process is failing children, especially those who have been victims of abuse, who are then subjected to further trauma as participants in the judicial process ... [D]espite the increase in child sexual assault complaints since the early 1980s, the ratio of charge to conviction remains unchanged.

As the Supreme Court stressed, "The plight of children who testify and the role courts must play in ascertaining the truth must not be overlooked ... [C]hildren may require different treatment than adults in the courtroom setting."⁵⁵

In 1993, the Criminal Code was amended to prevent accused persons in sexual assault cases from personally cross-examining a child under the age of eighteen.

Gradually, measures were introduced into the judicial system to minimize the trauma to child witnesses in sexual assault cases, with the objective of eliciting the truth. Courtrooms such as the "J" Court in Toronto and the Zebra Centre in Edmonton were constructed to accommodate these child witnesses. Such courtrooms have protective devices such as screens and closed-circuit television to ensure that the child need not see the alleged perpetrator while giving evidence. Children are provided with support persons and counsellors from victim assistance

52. [1993] 4 S.C.R. 475.

53. Ibid., at 483.

54. Ibid.

55. Ibid., at 484.

programs. They enter these courtrooms from a special entrance and have designated waiting rooms with snacks, crafts, and other distractions for these young witnesses. As Wendy Harvey explained in her evidence, the name of the Zebra Centre is a metaphor: as adult zebras encircle younger zebras, the stripes confuse predators who seek to attack the younger animals. The Zebra name, she said, is consistent with the theme of adults playing an important role in the protection of children.

But despite the amendments to the Criminal Code that provide for protective devices for children, many courtrooms in Canada do not have screens, closed-circuit television, or technology for videotaped testimony. Nor do they have special courtrooms similar to the “J” Court or the court at the Zebra Centre. As Ms Harvey said, a child may be in a courtroom only six or seven feet away from the accused and his supporters. She further noted:

... [T]here are still courthouses and courtrooms in Canada where there is virtually no provision of the videotaping or screens or anything of that nature and, in fact, little room for even support persons to sit.

So those are the challenges. Those are the challenges for the victim. Those are the challenges for this country.

...

Canada is not doing okay because there are many, many areas in Canada and role settings in others where these courthouses are still allowing both the accused and the victim the significant discomfort and distress of not having the physical plant in place ...

New sentencing provisions introduced by Parliament also made it clear that legislators were turning their attention to the seriousness of sexual offences perpetrated on children. A section of the *Criminal Code*⁵⁶ permits the sentencing judge, for prescribed sexual offences on children under fourteen years old, to prohibit the offender (1) from attending a public park or swimming area, daycare centre, school ground, or community centre; (2) from seeking, continuing, or obtaining employment or becoming a volunteer in a position of trust or authority toward persons under fourteen years; or (3) from using a computer system for the purpose of communicating with a child under the age of fourteen years.⁵⁷

56. S. 161.

57. See s. 161(1).

The prohibition may be for life or “for any shorter duration that the court considers desirable.”⁵⁸

In 1996, Bill C-41 came into effect, which codified principles of sentencing. Some of the provisions were geared to sexual assault victims, including children. Section 718.2 of the Criminal Code provides a list of aggravating principles that includes:

1. evidence that the offender, in committing the offence, abused a position of trust or authority in relation to the victim; and⁵⁹
2. evidence that the offender, in committing the offence, abused the offender’s spouse or common-law partner or child.⁶⁰

There was also acknowledgment that in order to protect victims and potential victims, some perpetrators need to be under supervision for long periods. In 1997, amendments were added to the *Criminal Code*⁶¹ on dangerous and long-term offenders.

A dangerous offender hearing takes place after the conviction of an accused for sexual assault and other specified offences. For sexual assault offences, there must be a finding by the judge that:⁶²

1. the offender’s conduct in any sexual matter shows a failure to control his or her sexual impulses; and
2. there is a likelihood of his or her causing injury, pain, or other evil to other persons through failure to control his or her sexual impulses.

The mandatory result of a dangerous offender finding is an indeterminate sentence.⁶³

Long-term offender status was introduced as a “middle ground” between an indeterminate sentence and an ordinary fixed-term sentence.⁶⁴ Individuals found to be long-term offenders can be sentenced to a term of imprisonment for a minimum of two years⁶⁵ followed by supervision on conditions for up to ten years.

58. S. 161(2).

59. S. 718.2(iii).

60. S. 718.2(ii).

61. S. 752.

62. Criminal Code, s. 753.

63. Ibid.

64. Allan Manson, The Law of Sentencing (Toronto: Irwin Publishing, 2001), p. 336.

65. Criminal Code, s. 753.1(1), (2), (3).

There are three conditions to a long-term offender designation. The court may find a person to be a long-term offender when:⁶⁶

1. it would be appropriate to impose a sentence of imprisonment of two years or more for the offence for which the offender has been convicted;
2. there is a substantial risk that the offender will reoffend; and
3. there is a reasonable possibility of eventual control of the risk in the community.⁶⁷

Another change in sentencing in recent years has involved the role of the victim. The Criminal Code defines a victim as “a person to whom harm was done or who suffered physical or emotional loss as a result of the commission of the offence.”⁶⁸ A victim impact statement that describes the harm and loss to the victim as a result of the offence can be presented to the court for consideration by judges in their determination of the sentence for the accused.⁶⁹ The victim impact statement must be in writing and in a prescribed form.⁷⁰

Further Criminal Code amendments introduced in 1999⁷¹ expanded the role of victims in the sentencing process. In the past, it was the Crown Attorney who essentially decided if a victim impact statement would be presented to the sentencing judge. Now the judge is required to permit the victim to read the impact statement in court “or to present the statement in any other manner that the court considers appropriate.”⁷²

66. Criminal Code, s. 753.1.

67. According to the Criminal Code, the court shall be satisfied there is a substantial risk that the offender will re-offend if:

- (a) the offender has been convicted of an offence under section 151 (sexual interference), 152 (invitation to sexual touching), 153 (sexual exploitation), subsection 173(2) (exposure) or section 271 (sexual assault), 272 (sexual assault with a weapon), or 273 (aggravated sexual assault), or has engaged in serious conduct of a sexual nature in the commission of another offence of which the offender has been convicted and
- (b) the offender
 - (i) has shown a pattern of repetitive behaviour, or which the offence for which he or she has been convicted forms a part, that shows a likelihood of offender’s causing death or injury to other persons or inflicting severe psychological damage on other persons, or
 - (ii) by conduct in any sexual matter including that involved in the commission of the offence for which the offender has been convicted, has shown a likelihood of causing injury, pain or other evil to other persons in the future through similar offences.

68. S. 722(4)(a).

69. Criminal Code, s. 722(1).

70. Criminal Code, s. 722(2)(a).

71. S.C. 1999, c. 25, s. 17(1).

72. Criminal Code, s. 722(2.1).

Another aggravating factor in sentencing an accused was added to the Criminal Code.⁷³ It stipulates that evidence that the offender in committing the offence abused a person under eighteen years old shall be deemed to be an aggravating circumstance. This provision was introduced in Bill C-2. A discussion of this important legislation follows.

Bill C-2: Attention to Historical Cases of Child Sexual Abuse

In 2006, Parliament and society as a whole began to realize that adult victims of child sexual abuse also needed protection in order to successfully prosecute perpetrators of these offences. Bill C-2 introduced significant amendments to the Criminal Code, designed to protect both children and vulnerable adults from sexual abuse and exploitation.⁷⁴ It changed some of the provisions on sentencing for child sexual abuse offences, including a minimum mandatory sentence for specific sexual crimes. It also strengthened child pornography offences and created new crimes such as the sexual exploitation of adolescents and voyeurism. In addition, the legislation offered important protections to adult witnesses of sexual abuse, designed to facilitate the giving of testimony in these cases. The competency rules for children in the Canada Evidence Act were also amended.

Before I highlight some of these significant amendments, the preamble of Bill C-2 is reproduced as it identifies the objectives of Parliament in enacting these statutory provisions:

WHEREAS the Parliament of Canada has grave concerns regarding the vulnerability of children to all forms of exploitation, including child pornography, sexual exploitation, abuse and neglect;

WHEREAS Canada, by ratifying the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, has undertaken to protect children from all forms of sexual exploitation and sexual abuse, and has obligations to sign as a signatory to the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography;

WHEREAS the Parliament of Canada wishes to encourage the participation of witnesses in the criminal justice system through the use of protective measures that seek to facilitate the participation of children and other vulnerable witnesses while ensuring that the rights of accused persons are respected;

73. S. 718.2(a)(ii.1).

74. Nicholas Bala, Katherine Duvall-Antonacopoulos, R.C.L Lindsay, Kang Lee, and Victoria Talwar, "Bill C-2: A New Law for Canada's Child Witnesses" (2005), 32 C.R. (6th) 48.

AND WHEREAS the continuing advancements in the development of new technologies, while having social and economic benefits, facilitate sexual exploitation and breaches of privacy ...

A significant provision introduced to the *Criminal Code*⁷⁵ in 2006 permits an application to be made to the court to allow adult witnesses to testify behind a screen or outside the courtroom by closed-circuit television. There is recognition that adults, particularly in sexual offence cases, may be intimidated by the accused and consequently may have difficulty giving evidence in court. If the judge is of the opinion that this is “necessary to obtain a full and candid account from the witness of the acts complained of,”⁷⁶ he or she will allow the adult to testify behind a screen or by closed-circuit television. It is noteworthy that there were constitutional challenges to this provision, section 486.2 of the Criminal Code, within months of its amendment. To date, this provision has been upheld by the courts.

Section 486.2 of the Criminal Code was also amended to give children and adults with mental or physical disabilities easier access to closed-circuit television, screens, and support persons while they testify at criminal trials.

Another very important legislative change is that children under the age of fourteen need no longer satisfy the rigid competency rules that previously existed in order to give evidence in court. Pursuant to Bill C-2, there is now a presumption in the Canada Evidence Act that children under the age of fourteen have the capacity to testify. Victims and other witnesses under fourteen years old need no longer explain in court abstract concepts such as the oath or the difference between a lie or the truth before they are permitted by a judge to testify. Many of the competency hurdles that prevented children from testifying have now been removed as a result of Bill C-2.

Another significant provision is the new section 153 Criminal Code on sexual exploitation. As Wendy Harvey explained in her expert testimony, Bill C-2 expands the criminal offence “so that it goes beyond [a] relationship of dependency ... [I]t opens the door a little bit to embrace other relationships beside the trust/dependency/authority one that the courts have been tackling with over the years.” Section 153(1.2) Criminal Code states:

75. S. 486.2(2).

76. Ibid.

- (1.2) A judge may infer that a person is in a relationship with a young person that is exploitative of the young person from the nature and circumstances of the relationship, including
- (a) the age of the young person;
 - (b) the age difference between the person and the young person;
 - (c) the evolution of the relationship; and
 - (d) the degree of control or influence by the person over the young person.

Bill C-2 introduced minimum penalties for the offence of child sexual exploitation as well as other crimes committed on young people. This prevents the availability of a conditional sentence⁷⁷ for offenders who commit these sexual crimes on children. As mentioned above, Bill C-2 stipulates⁷⁸ that it is an aggravating factor for purposes of sentencing if evidence exists that the offender abused a person under the age of eighteen. Moreover, the following Criminal Code section⁷⁹ was added:

When a court imposes a sentence for an offence that involved the abuse of a person under the age of eighteen years, it shall give primary consideration to the objectives of denunciation and deterrence of such conduct.

As an expert at the Phase 1 hearings said, it is hoped and expected that “[t]he changes in Bill C-2 should both enhance the truth-seeking function of the criminal justice system and reduce the stress on children and other vulnerable witnesses from their involvement in the legal process.”⁸⁰

77. Conditional sentences were introduced by Parliament in 1996. A judge may order that a term of imprisonment of less than two years be served in the community on conditions. Section 742.1 Criminal Code states:

742.1. If a person is convicted of an offence, other than a serious personal injury offence as defined in section 752, a terrorism offence or a criminal organization offence prosecuted by way of indictment for which the maximum term of imprisonment is ten years or more or an offence punishable by a minimum term of imprisonment, and the court imposes a sentence of imprisonment of less than two years and is satisfied that the service of the sentence in the community would not endanger the safety of the community and would be consistent with the fundamental purpose and principles of sentencing set out in sections 718 to 718.2, the court may, for the purpose of supervising the offender’s behaviour in the community, order that the offender serve the sentence in the community, subject to the offender’s compliance with the conditions imposed under section 742.3.

78. See Criminal Code, s. 718.2(a)(ii.1).

79. S. 718.01.

80. Bala et al., “Bill C-2: A New Law for Canada’s Child Witnesses,” supra n. 74.

Impediments to the Successful Prosecution of Child Abuse Cases

Until the 1980s, few criminal cases of child sexual abuse were successfully prosecuted in Ontario and Canada as a whole. Children's evidence was considered unreliable, there was a limited range of sexual offences in the Criminal Code under which offenders could be prosecuted, and children had to overcome significant legal hurdles in order to give evidence in a criminal trial. These are a few of the reasons why child sexual abuse cases either did not proceed or did not result in convictions of accused persons.

A further reason, as discussed, was that the legal system did not accommodate children. Young witnesses who had been abused were required to wait outside courtrooms in close proximity to the offender, as there were no special facilities for children. Also, when children testified, they were compelled to have face-to-face confrontation with the accused, and did not have the protection of a screen or closed-circuit television. Nor were support persons permitted to stay close to children at the witness stand while they testified. Moreover, victim/witness programs to prepare the child for court proceedings did not exist. And it was not until the 1990s that accused persons were prohibited from personally cross-examining a child sexual abuse victim, which had a significant adverse impact on the child's evidence. Cases collapsed due to the inability of the child to complete his or her testimony.

Children were traditionally considered to be unreliable witnesses. As mentioned, it was believed that young people had a tendency to lie and fantasize and that their memories were poor. This was reflected in the psychological literature, in statutes, and in court decisions until the 1980s. There was also little understanding of human memory. Defence lawyers would successfully challenge the credibility of children who were repeatedly abused over a number of years, on grounds that they could not describe in detail each separate incident of sexual abuse. Wendy Harvey discussed in her testimony the concept of script memory:

... [I]f I ask you to describe to me ... how many times have you ever driven to work? So if you drive to work like 200 times a year or so, and I insisted that you've got a pencil and paper in front of you and "I want you to write down every time that you went to work." So you've been going to work for 10 years. That's 2,000 times or so. So why isn't there 2,000 episodes of driving to work on that piece of paper? It's because the memory puts it into a script. And so what you're going to hear and what, chances are, people will write is, "Well, I pick up my briefcase and I would leave the door and I would go to my car and open the garage door and drive my car out."

...

So the same principles apply. Of course they apply when we're talking about a victim of a sex crime. Many of these victims—and it's the very nature of some sex offenders, that these are repeated, ongoing abuses and the result is that a victim will describe that as a script.

...

Now, when this gets into a court of law ... the cross-examination will be of a nature of, well, "Witness, I've done the arithmetic here and you said that this has happened for 10 years and so many times a week, and so my arithmetic tells me that this probably happened about 2,000 times. Is that correct?" "Well, I haven't really done the math." "Two thousand times, that is my arithmetic, and yet, witness, I have counted how many times that you were actually able to describe something that transpired and there's five. There's five times, witness. How could this possibly be that you have been sexually assaulted 2,000 times by this man and you can only tell us five times?" ...

And the trier of fact, the jury, is sitting there and they're going, "Yeah, witness" because they're not thinking about the times of driving to work or the fact that they can't recall the brushing of their teeth or what they had for breakfast, because when we're in a court of law, sometimes it takes on an artificiality, as if the human brain is to operate differently from how it does day to day, and it is convincing at times.

Another impediment, previously discussed, was that before children under fourteen years old were permitted to testify, they were required to pass a competency test. Children needed to demonstrate to the judge that they understood the nature of an oath that involved abstract questioning. It was very difficult for five-, eight-, or even thirteen-year-old witnesses to describe the concept of swearing an oath to a Supreme Being.⁸¹ Also children, unlike adults, were not allowed to solemnly affirm. And significantly, until the 1980s, legal rules necessitated that a child's evidence be corroborated by independent evidence before an accused could be convicted of a crime. This was virtually impossible as child sexual abuse generally occurs in private without other witnesses; only the child and the accused are present. As Detective Wendy Leaver from the Toronto Police Force said, these legal rules created significant obstacles to the successful prosecution of the sexual offenders. The police "knew that the child couldn't make it through the court system" because of the evidentiary requirements.

81. See R. v. Bannerman (1966), 48 C.R. 110 (Man. C.A.), aff'd Supreme Court of Canada, [1966] S.C.J. no. 74.

The perception that children were inherently unreliable had ramifications throughout the social and legal systems. When children came forward and reported abusive acts, the response was that they were lying. When Detective Leaver began to investigate sexual offences in the late 1970s and early 1980s, very little was known about child sexual abuse. There was a tendency not to believe children's accounts of sexual abuse. This was reinforced with the emergence of the theory of false memory syndrome, which asserted that children "remembered" or "recalled" acts of sexual abuse that had not actually occurred.

Nor did police officers have training in sexual assault cases. As Detective Leaver said, there was "no specialized training, no skill training in any areas of interviewing, victim management, how to investigate sexual assaults." Investigators often considered sexual crimes against children to be "family matters." Wendy Harvey stated:

... [Y]ou had to convince police that this is a police matter and, in fact—and I expect, with the greatest respect to the police, that there are still remnants of that today where, you know, "Give me something real to investigate. Give me a homicide or give me a robbery," because they still would see that this is not a police matter.

When police interviews were conducted, interviews were not audio or video recorded. Instead, police notebooks were used and the language of the child victim was paraphrased. Moreover, because of their lack of training, police officers often asked suggestive questions, which had an adverse impact on the weight attached to the child's evidence in legal proceedings.

Children were often punished for making allegations against their perpetrators, some of whom were respected community figures such as priests. Young victims of sexual abuse were returned to the institutions at which they had been abused, such as schools, churches, and foster homes. The message to these children and other potential child victims was that sexual abuse should not be disclosed.

Detective Leaver also discussed the limited sexual offences that existed in the Criminal Code. For example, vaginal penetration, as mentioned, constituted a criminal act, but not invitations to sexual touching or masturbation. Also, most of the offences were applicable to female but not to male victims, with the result that many young boys "weren't protected by the law." Moreover, there were strict time limitations for the prosecution of some criminal offences; cases needed to be reported and prosecuted within one year. As Detective Leaver commented, research studies have confirmed that "it takes a lot longer than a year for victims to come forward." "Everybody," the police detective said, "was frustrated with the inability to carry these cases forward.” This assessment was confirmed by Crown Prosecutor Wendy Harvey, who said: “[T]here was clearly a time in Canada history where it was virtually impossible to prove a crime of sexual assault or of a sexual nature against a child.”

There are also particular challenges with multi-victim, multi-offender cases. These cases are complex, burden local resources, and place great strain on the community as a whole. Project Guardian in London and Project Jericho in Prescott are examples of such cases in Ontario. Collaboration between different institutions such as the police, the Children’s Aid Society, and the Crown Attorney’s Office is critical to the successful prosecution of multi-victim, multi-offender sexual abuse cases. This is discussed in detail in the Report.

Particular Difficulties in Historical Sexual Abuse Cases

There are several reasons why historical sexual abuse cases have not been successfully prosecuted. First, the offender can be criminally charged only under provisions in the Criminal Code that existed at the time of the sexual abuse. Therefore, if the offence was committed before either the 1983 or the 1988 amendments to the Criminal Code, provisions such as fondling or invitations to sexual touching do not apply, and consequently the offender cannot be criminally charged with these offences.

Another obstacle is that adults who were sexually assaulted when they were children may have problems such as alcohol addiction and drug dependencies. They may also have criminal records. Another outcome of childhood abuse is that they may not be capable of maintaining steady employment. These difficulties result in credibility issues at trial. Both Dr. Jaffe and Dr. Wolfe stressed that people involved with the judicial system—police officers, judges, and lawyers—need to more fully understand the impacts of historical sexual abuse; victims may distrust authority and may not be amicable or courteous. Dr. Jaffe said:

I think it’s important that judges and lawyers and police officers have some awareness about the aftermath of abuse, how to understand the circumstances. The example that I see over and over again is in the court system everyone likes polite witnesses: friendly, cooperative. Survivors are not polite, friendly, cooperative sometimes. They are angry, they are distrustful. They come to court. They make it very difficult. They distrust everybody and one has to accept and acknowledge that and not expect them to be the same. Again, I don’t want to stereotype all survivors, but it’s a reality.

As I discuss in this Report, it is important that trained and specialized persons interview survivors of child sexual abuse. Detective Leaver stressed at the hearings that police need more training and more resources for historical sexual abuse cases. Moreover, counselling services to help these individuals deal with some of these complex problems have not been available in the past, particularly for male victims.

Another problem, which will be discussed in greater detail, was the lack of a reliable system to document reports of abuse to the Ontario Children's Aid Societies. The Ontario Child Abuse Register was established in 1979, but concerns existed as to its accuracy and comprehensiveness. Child protection workers relied on the Ontario Child Abuse Register to determine if there were reports that a particular individual had abused a child in the past. The report needed to be "substantiated" for it to be in the Register. As will be described, an improved system is now in place known as the Fast Track System. For about the past nine years, Children's Aid Societies in Ontario have been connected by a computer system and can, with ease, acquire information on whether other Children's Aid Societies in the province have had contact with alleged perpetrators.

Another problem has been a lack of understanding of how memory functions, particularly in cases of historical sexual abuse. Many people, including police officers and jurors, believe that witnesses who are confident, non-evasive, and non-hesitant in recounting an event in the past provide more accurate and reliable testimony. But what they fail to understand is that memory comes in fragments and that hesitation may indicate that a victim is working to reconstruct his or her memories.

Connolly and Read, professors in law and psychology at Simon Fraser University, wrote in an article entitled "Remembering Historical Child Sexual Abuse":⁸²

... [M]any scholars have found that the single best predictor of belief of a witnesses' [sic] account is the confidence with which the account is expressed: the higher the confidence the more likely the witness is believed. However, in general, the level of confidence a person displays about memory reports of a variety of types of information, from eye-witness identification to general knowledge, is not highly related to report accuracy.

These authors state that compared to memory for neutral (non-traumatic) events, memory for central details of traumatic events such as childhood sexual abuse is superior but memory for peripheral details is poorer.⁸³ Moreover, they confirm that repeated abuse often results in an inability to describe the particular details of each sexually abusive act or the specific number of times the victim was abused. This should not, they stress, be used to successfully challenge the credibility of the witness:⁸⁴

82. Deborah A. Connolly and J. Don Read, "Remembering Historical Child Sexual Abuse" (2003), 47 C.L.Q. 438 at 446.

... [R]epeated abuse has several predictable effects on memory. These include an inability to recall particular instances or details of the abuse and an inability to estimate accurately the frequency with which the abuse events occurred. Further these detrimental influences of repeated events appear to increase proportionally with increases in their actual frequencies. As a result, when abuse has occurred on many occasions, it is to be anticipated that only a very small proportion will be recallable as independent and unique events. These kinds of predictable memory errors should not be used to discredit the witness. (Emphasis added)

In their expert testimony, Dr. Jaffe and Ms Harvey said it is essential that people involved in the legal system, such as police officers, Crown attorneys, and judicial decision makers such as judges and jurors, acquire knowledge about memory. In historical sexual abuse cases, they could be assisted in their deliberations by hearing expert evidence on memory to properly assess the credibility of victims of childhood sexual abuse.

Another obstacle in historical sexual assault cases is getting other victims to come forward and become involved in the criminal process. Another reason for the unsuccessful prosecution of such cases is that the offender may have moved out of the jurisdiction. As Detective Leaver said, the unwillingness of victims to come forward, the death or relocation of witnesses or the perpetrator, and the fact that the site of the sexual assault may no longer exist are some of the complicating factors that impede the successful prosecution of historical sexual abuse cases.

A further obstacle to the successful prosecution of historical sexual abuse cases is that records in institutions may have disappeared. Also, in the past, there was inadequate collaboration and sharing of information between professionals in institutions such as the Children's Aid Societies and police forces. These issues will be discussed in detail in this Report.

The expert evidence given at the beginning of the Inquiry by experts in diverse disciplines on issues such as the prevalence and impact of child sexual abuse and impediments to disclosure by victims of abuse was extremely beneficial. These experts also discussed the failure to report child abuse, the lack of accommodation of victims of historical child sexual abuse in the court system, and the obstacles to the successful prosecution of cases of historical sexual abuse of young persons. The information conveyed by these expert witnesses, before evidence was heard on the responses of the institutions to allegations of abuse of young persons, was undoubtedly very valuable to me, to the parties, and to members of the public.

83. Ibid., at p. 449.

84. Ibid., at p. 479.

The chapter that follows describes the impact of historical sexual abuse on the victims and alleged victims in Cornwall who testified at the Inquiry.

The Impact of Child Abuse

Over thirty victims and alleged victims testified at the Cornwall Public Inquiry. Some, such as Jamie Marsolais, Cindy Burgess-Lebrun, and Jason Tyo, were in their mid-thirties when they gave their evidence; others were in their forties and fifties, such as Benoit Brisson, Albert Roy, Roberta Archambault, and Kevin Upper; and some, such as Fernand Vivarais, were sixty years old. The victims and alleged victims included a priest (Father Claude Thibault), a film producer and director (André Lavoie), and a lawyer (Claude Marleau). Many of the other victims and alleged victims were in low-paying jobs such as construction and in factories, several had difficulty maintaining steady employment, and a significant number were unemployed. These victims and alleged victims of child sexual abuse described how they suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder, have severe depression, and have panic attacks, problems that for many have impeded them from either seeking or holding down a job.

The purpose of this chapter is to describe the impact of child sexual abuse as recounted by the victims, alleged victims, and their parents, spouses, and siblings. These witnesses painfully discussed the effects of their abuse, which included lack of trust in authority, failure in school, inability to have intimate relationships, inability to parent their children appropriately, attempts at suicide, addiction to drugs and alcohol, and the fragmentation of their families. The effects have been and continue to be psychological, social, and financial. The impact of this historical child abuse mirrors much of what was described in the expert testimony¹ by psychologists, social workers, police officers, and legal experts in child sexual abuse.

Witnesses testified that when they were children in Cornwall they were sexually abused by teachers in elementary and high school, by foster parents while they were in the care of the Children's Aid Society (CAS), and by priests in the Catholic Church. Others stated that they were sexually violated by probation officers, shop owners, and other members of the Cornwall community. The acts of sexual abuse, according to these witnesses, took place on Church property and at youth retreats with the Catholic Church, in foster homes, in schools, and at the workplace of probation officers. Others said they were sexually abused as children in swimming pools and change rooms, in cars, in trailer parks, in motels, in store basements, as well as in the homes of the perpetrators.

1. See Chapter 2.

For some of the victims and alleged victims, the abuse began when they were very young children. Marc Latour testified that in grade 3, at the age of eight, he was repeatedly sexually violated by his teacher. Roberta Archambault, another witness, described the sexual abuse by her foster father that began when she was a seven- or eight-year-old girl. In summer, the abuse allegedly occurred on fishing excursions, and in the colder months in the garage of the foster home. She testified that the abuse continued until she left the foster home at fifteen years old. Jeannette Antoine was placed in the care of CAS at the age of sixteen months. She remained under the care of the CAS until she was seventeen. She testified that she was sexually abused by her foster father when she was five or six years old, as was her sister. Abuse continued, she claimed, when she was placed in another foster home. Jeannette Antoine was seven or eight years old at that time.

Several other victims and alleged victims discussed the sexual abuse committed by clergy in the Roman Catholic Church during their adolescence. Some of these children were altar boys at churches in Cornwall, others were students in Catholic schools, and some were asked by members of the clergy to do work or chores for them. Others were invited to special events by priests.

Other victims and alleged victims claimed they were abused in their pubescent and post-pubescent years by government employees, some of whom had professional responsibilities for these youths. Witnesses testified that probation officers fondled and performed sexual acts on them. Others asserted that a federal employee at Canada Manpower sexually abused them from as young as nine years old. Some witnesses claimed that a member of the legal profession in the Cornwall community committed sexually abusive acts on them during their childhood.

Other Cornwall residents testified that they were abused in the 1980s by an employee of Transport Canada in a variety of locations, including the offender's home, a cottage, and in public facilities. Some of these children, who included siblings and schoolmates, stated that at times, they were abused together with a brother, sister, or classmate.

Other witnesses testified that they sustained years of abuse in their adolescence in foster homes in Cornwall when they were placed in the care of the CAS. The abusers and alleged abusers included foster parents, foster siblings, and childcare workers.

As previously discussed in Chapter 2, on expert evidence at the Inquiry, child victims are often groomed by perpetrators of sexual abuse. Several of the victims and alleged victims described the grooming process and the gifts, alcohol, and money they received from these sexual predators.

Alain Seguin described how a photography teacher at high school, Robert Sabourin, befriended him and his family. The teacher often invited Alain, who was thirteen or fourteen years old at that time, to lunch. He then offered to teach the young boy photography. He lent Alain his camera, and he invited the grade 7 student on photography excursions. He also gave the boy keys to his office at the school. This teacher visited Alain Seguin's home and also offered photography services to Alain's parents for their family reunions. Alain's parents gave the high school teacher permission to take their son on a trip to Ottawa for the inauguration of Bishop Adolphe Proulx as Archbishop. The high school teacher told Mr. and Mrs. Seguin that he was a photographer for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall and a personal friend of the Bishop. As Alain Seguin testified, the teacher "made himself seem very revered."

This high school teacher introduced Alain to alcohol and continued to take him to restaurants for meals. Alain Seguin said that the grooming process took place for about six weeks before he was sexually molested. And when the sexual abuse began, Alain did not understand what was happening. He stated at the hearings:

Things of a sexual nature were very, very new to me and I didn't understand. All I knew was this man was an adult. He was respected. I had been taught that adults knew what is right and wrong.

Mr. Sabourin was ultimately charged, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced in 1999.²

André Lavoie was sexually abused by the same high school teacher, Robert Sabourin. Mr. Sabourin pleaded guilty and was also sentenced in 1999. Beginning in grade 9, André was taught French and then filmmaking by this man. In fact, he taught André Lavoie in all of his five years of high school. As Mr. Lavoie testified at the hearings, this teacher quickly identified his interest in literature, music, and film. Mr. Sabourin invited André to his basement apartment. The abuse took place in the closet at school and in his apartment. This teacher gave André driving lessons, and the young boy had access to his teacher's car. He also took his student on trips. André Lavoie testified that the teacher:

... very rapidly identified my interest in literature, music and film. It was perfect. So I was a perfect victim for him because he was sort of a role model. He took an interest in me. You know, say, “You’re interested in music? Well I’ve got music at home that I can show you, a nice stereo system, all kinds of records and stuff” and he would play me all on those things. So he immediately satisfied whatever cravings a kid might have.

2. This will be discussed in fuller detail in this Report.

...

... [A]s soon as he took an interest in me, I felt great. I mean, “Gee, here is somebody who can line me up and make sure that I do my very best academically and artistically.” That was my first reaction. “Well, this is wonderful.” But that soon turned sour.

...

... [H]e had these saxophone type records. And in films, we had these [sic] nice Nikon camera with interchangeable lenses that was an absolute joy to behold. And I had access to all that stuff.

...

... [H]e would encourage my studying habits. He would show me ways to make notes out of books so that I could remember parts of them better. A real lesson in how to study and how to memorize information so that you could do better at your exams. That’s the way it started.

And then following—a few weeks later he would say, “Well, now you need to know how to relax. You have worked pretty hard, so why don’t you lie down on the bed here and I will turn down the lights and things and I will see you in a few minutes.” And it progressed to where he would come over and give me massages.

Mr. Lavoie stated that he was abused by this teacher throughout his five years of high school.

Children in the Burgess family and their school friend Jason Tyo also described how they were groomed by a man who sexually assaulted them in different locations, sometimes in each other’s presence. They identified the perpetrator as Jean Luc Leblanc.

Jody Burgess testified that at the age of twelve or thirteen, he was approached at a Cornwall gas station by a man on a motorcycle. The man, Jean Luc Leblanc, asked if Jody was interested in doing odd jobs and offered to pay the boy $20.00 to cut his grass. This was a substantial amount of money for Jody. Mr. Leblanc introduced himself to Jody’s parents, who were aware their son was spending time with this man. He took Jody and his brother, Scott, for rides on his motor-cycle, clearly a “thrill” for the young boys. Jody Burgess said that in the four-year period in which he was abused, the perpetrator continued to give him money, took him to restaurants, and bought him a scarf, hat, and other gifts. He also took Jody on trips on a train and on a plane, first experiences for the young boy. His friend Jason Tyo also described the money, meals at restaurants, and gifts such as a bicycle and a videogame that were given to him by Mr. Leblanc.

It was the testimony of the Burgess children that after the perpetrator sexually assaulted Jody Burgess, brother Scott and sister Cindy soon also became victims. Cindy Burgess-Lebrun echoed the evidence of many victims of historical child sexual abuse that as a young girl, she did not appreciate that she was being sexually abused. She was unaware of the impropriety and illegality of these acts. Mr. Leblanc pleaded guilty to sexual acts perpetrated on Cindy Burgess, Jody Burgess, and Jason Tyo.³

Robert Renshaw and his siblings were raised by their father until his death in 1981. Robert Renshaw testified that when he was fifteen, his older brother’s probation officer, Ken Seguin, asked him if he would cut his grass and work on his flower beds. This probation officer was a frequent visitor at the Renshaw home, beginning in approximately 1976 or 1977. Robert Renshaw stated that he was sexually abused by Mr. Seguin. A few years later, both Robert and his younger brother Gerry got into trouble with the law and were supervised by this same probation officer. They testified that they were invited to Mr. Seguin’s home and offered alcohol and the use of his car. This probation officer, testified Robert and Gerry Renshaw, repeatedly sexually abused them while they were under his supervision.

Claude Marleau testified that he was about eleven or twelve years old when he was asked if he would like to do chores in a store—sorting bottles, cleaning floors, and distributing flyers—for a man who became his perpetrator of child sexual abuse. This store owner offered young Claude rum and Coke, and he was groomed by this man and his acquaintances, who included members of the clergy.

Claude Marleau, who was from a lower-middle-class family, received money for these chores and the opportunity to drive a car when he was clearly too young to have a driver’s licence. The abusers offered him emotional support and became like an alternative family. The store owner introduced Claude Marleau to a priest, Father Paul Lapierre, who became a parental figure. Mr. Marleau said that this priest became the most important figure in his adolescence. The priest showed young Claude the affection he was missing at home and became Claude's mentor. Claude Marleau had a lot of respect for him. As Mr. Marleau said, this priest:

3. This will be discussed in fuller detail in this Report.

... est devenu la figure la plus importante de mon adolescence ...

...

Donc, c'est comme lui qui a été—qui a remplacé l'affection que j'avais—que je croyais avoir perdue chez nous et c'était devenu mon mentor. C'était devenu mon mentor.

Et j'avais un très grand respect pour ce qu'il représentait dans ma tête d'adolescent.

Soon a line was crossed, which Claude Marleau was not even aware of at the time.

This priest introduced young Claude to other members of the clergy who, Mr. Marleau said, also sexually abused him. He testified that each new perpetrator he was subjected to knew about the prior abuse. Claude Marleau felt like a toy or present that was passed around. The priest gave him money, bought him his first ski boots, and took him to restaurants. Mr. Marleau said that the men who abused him were the only stability he had during his adolescence. The abuse occurred repeatedly for a number of years until he was sixteen or seventeen.

Father Lapierre was ultimately charged in Ontario and in Quebec. He was found guilty in the Quebec case in 2004, but not guilty in the Ontario prosecution in 2001.

Fernand Vivarais recounted a similar experience. He testified that from the age of eleven or twelve, he was groomed by a priest at a church to which his family belonged. His parents were religious. The priest played ball with young Fernand and invited him to the Ice Capades in Montreal. Fernand Vivarais had never been to the Ice Capades—it was very exciting. His parents willingly allowed their son to go on the trip to Montreal with this respected religious figure in their community. Fernand Vivarais thought of him as “a God or something.” Mr. Vivarais said that it was on this trip that he was sexually abused, repeatedly, by this priest: “[H]e got me in a bear hug and he actually held me like a dog ... over and over again.”

As will be discussed in the following chapters, some of the perpetrators were criminally charged, and a few were convicted of these acts of child sexual abuse. But some of these alleged offenders died or committed suicide before their criminal trial or before they were even charged. In some circumstances, proceedings were stayed by the court⁴ because of the long lapse of time in the prosecutions. Criminal trials of some of these alleged offenders did not proceed for a variety of reasons, which will be discussed in detail in this Report. There was also testimony that convicted offenders continued to sexually abuse children in the Cornwall community after they were sentenced or while on probation.

The effects of the child sexual abuse on these victims and alleged victims were both immediate and long term. There were serious repercussions throughout their childhood, and the abuse continued to deeply affect them psychologically, academically, economically, and socially. It affected their ability to trust, to sleep, to love, to parent, and to economically sustain themselves and their families. The desire to live was greatly diminished and sometimes non-existent. The spouse of one of the witnesses described the child sexual abuse sustained by her husband as “a life long sentence.”

Juliette Seguin, a single mother who raised her son, Larry, testified that his behaviour regressed immediately after the six year old was abducted and sexually abused. Upon his return home, he began to speak in “baby talk.” Larry explained that after the abuse, he “felt different than other kids.” He began to socialize with older children. By ten years old, Larry Seguin was using drugs. As he explained at the hearings, he started “using drugs basically to erase—to get rid of the pain I was feeling emotionally, which kind of led me into the wrong path of life.” As a result of his drug addiction, he shoplifted and committed other property crimes. As his mother, Juliette Seguin, lamented, her young son’s “innocence” was taken from him as a result of the abuse. This was reiterated by many witnesses, including C-11, who testified that he was sexually abused when he was twelve or thirteen by a man who worked at Canada Manpower, who tutored him in violin. C-11, now in his fifties, agreed that nothing “brings back” the innocence. The OPP took a statement from the alleged perpetrator, who admitted he had engaged in sexual activity with this boy. A few days later, this man, Richard Hickerson, committed suicide.

Jamie Marsolais was also raised by his mother in a single parent family. He testified that his abuser was the same man who worked at Canada Manpower. Jamie Marsolais, nine years old at the time, did not have a male influence in his life. He did not understand that the abusive acts were inappropriate. As Mr. Marsolais said in his evidence, “I didn’t realize at that time it was wrong what was happening” and “I didn’t think that someone would harm me, especially someone that supposedly cares about you.”

At the age of fourteen, Jamie Marsolais started to drink, and by sixteen he was consuming large quantities of alcohol. As he said at the hearings, “I began to drink very heavily,” and this continued for many years. It is only in the past few years that he has been able to get his drinking “under control.”

4. This means that the proceedings did not continue.

Jamie Marsolais’ academic performance suffered as well. When he began to comprehend the impropriety of the sexual acts that had been committed on him, Jamie’s behaviour and school marks took a downhill turn. His academic average, which had been in the nineties, dropped to the sixties in grade 7. As his anger set in, Jamie began to act out and for the first time saw “the inside of the principal’s office.” In the words of Mr. Marsolais, “I never kind of came back from that.” By grade 10, he had dropped out of school. At the age of sixteen, he left home and had a child not long after. As Mr. Marsolais reflected, “I was still a child myself at sixteen.”

C-14, who testified that he was abused multiple times in foster homes, also suffered academically. He had performed very well in school prior to the sexual abuse. But it was not long after he was sexually violated that C-14 “stopped studying,” “gave up on school,” and completely “abandon[ed]” any “educational pursuits.”

As I discuss in this section, the abuse suffered during their childhood years had a significant impact on the economic circumstances of these individuals.

Claude Marleau was inquisitive, had a lot of energy, and his grades in primary school were well above average. As mentioned, Mr. Marleau testified that beginning at age eleven, he was abused for a number of years by a group of men who knew each other, including members of the clergy. One of these men was Father Lapierre. Claude Marleau’s grades plummeted. The abuse resulted in a tumultuous adolescence, and he dropped out of high school in 1970. His behaviour and poor academic performance caused problems and strain within his family. He was perceived as lazy, and people thought he would not go anywhere in life. As Mr. Marleau said at the hearings, “Tu as toujours le sentiment d’être en fuite part rapport à ça,” which means that you always feel as if you are running away. Claude Marleau carried tremendous guilt for many years as he was convinced that he had voluntarily participated in these abusive acts. Despite these and many other obstacles encountered as a result of the abuse, Claude Marleau ultimately went to law school and was admitted to the Quebec Bar in 1983.

Alienation from parents and the fragmentation of families were other serious impacts of the sexual abuse sustained by child victims. Marc Latour testified that a grade 3 teacher at a Catholic school sexually abused him when he was eight years old. Mr. Latour, in his late forties at the time he gave his evidence, said that the most significant impact of the abuse was the loss of his relationship with his mother. The adult who sexually abused him convinced him that his “mother gave him permission to do those things.” In emotional testimony, Marc Latour said:

... [T]he effects were enormous all through my life. The biggest thing is, he took my mom away ... I always believed to be true that she gave him the permission and I hated her, all my life. I even hated her when she died ... He took away my dream, my future.

I've been through things I never would have been through if it wasn't for him. And, the only reason I'm here is in memory of my mom.

The abusive acts had serious consequences on Marc Latour's behaviour. From the age of eleven until eighteen, he was in trouble with the law and was sent to a reform school in Alfred as well as a correctional facility. He drank excessive amounts of alcohol, was convicted of impaired driving, and served time in a correctional institution when he was sixteen or seventeen. As Mr. Latour explained, "I started drinking just to help me get through what happened to me. I kind of used drinking as a medicine ... I abused alcohol just to forget."

Victims and alleged victims of child sexual abuse described their mistrust of authority in their evidence at the Inquiry. Kevin Upper testified that he was sexually abused by a priest in his church when he was an altar boy, as well as by his grade 8 teacher, who was a deacon at the same church. He became deeply "confused" about "authority" and about "what's right and wrong," and he did not know "who to go to when something [was] wrong." Kevin Upper had recurring nightmares and "did a lot of drinking and drugs ... to help cope."

Lack of trust in authority and failure in school were also experienced by Fernand Vivarais. Mr. Vivarais said he completely lost interest in school after he was abused at eleven or twelve years old by a priest at a church that his family regularly attended. He said at the hearings, "You become a loner ... [Y]ou don't trust anybody." He began to drink alcohol, and he became contentious and belligerent.

C-10 similarly described his problems with authority, his anger and resulting difficulties in school, and his addiction to drugs as a consequence of sexual abuse by a priest and other individuals in the Cornwall community. As C-10 said, "[O]nce I was abused, I just went downhill ... I had no focus ... I was angry ... too angry to do anything sometimes."

Albert Roy, who testified that he was sexually abused by two Cornwall probation officers when he was a teenager, said: "I tried to stay drunk as much as I could ... [t]o try and stop thinking about it ... I wouldn't allow myself in a room alone with a man, like anybody in authority." He identified these two probation officers as Nelson Barque and Ken Seguin. Mr. Barque pleaded guilty to indecent assault on Albert Roy in 1995. He was sentenced to four months custody and eighteen months probation in 1995.

Abandonment of religion was another impact of children sexually assaulted by clergy. Benoit Brisson, like many children in Cornwall, was raised by parents who were devout Roman Catholics and very involved in the Church. His father led the church choir at Christ-Roi Parish. The member of the clergy who abused him, Father Gilles Deslauriers, was the chaplain at a Roman Catholic high school. Benoit placed his trust in this priest. Benoit's mistrust of authority, particularly of persons affiliated with the Church, caused him to completely abandon his religion. Father Deslauriers pleaded guilty in 1986. Similarly Claude Marleau, who testified that he was repeatedly abused by clergy in the Catholic Church, is no longer a practising Catholic, refuses to be labelled a Catholic, and is angry at his parents for baptizing him. Fernand Vivarais also said in his evidence, "I don't believe in God, I don't believe in the Church, I don't believe in priests." When his nephew died recently, Mr. Vivarais could not bring himself to attend church for the funeral of his brother's child.

Kevin Upper similarly testified that he "eliminated the church out of [his] life" as a result of the abuse he sustained in grade 8 by a teacher and a priest. He became introverted and confused, no longer trusted people in authority, and did not know to whom he could turn "when something [was] wrong."

Confusion about their sexuality and the inability to be intimate were other serious impacts repeatedly described by victims and alleged victims at the Inquiry. A witness who was sexually abused between the ages of eleven and seventeen by male adults described his confusion about his sexual identity:

D'abord on se lance dans une quête effrénée de vouloir se convaincre qu'on est hétérosexuel parce que, vous savez, avant de réaliser que homosexualité et pédophilie sont deux choses très différentes, ça prend du temps. Donc tu vis avec cette peur-là jusque dans la jeune trentaine ...

Claude Marleau states in this passage that he essentially went on a mission to convince himself that he was heterosexual, that it took a long time to realize that homosexuality and pedophilia are two very different things, and that he lived with this fear until his early thirties.

A forty-year-old female witness explained that she does "not like to be touched." A male witness described his "contempt" for his "own body." Other witnesses, such as C-14, "look for reasons to avoid [their] bedroom" and suffer from serious insomnia. Fernand Vivarais also discussed his years of sleep deprivation and resort to alcohol as a result of the abuse he suffered as a child: "[Y]ou can't sleep because he's behind you every time you wake up at night. It's not him, it's your wife, but you think it's him."

Mr. Vivarais regularly arrived at home intoxicated, hoping that the excessive amounts of alcohol he consumed would help him "get sleep." "It has been rough on the wife and kids,” he said at the hearings. He also described a constant source of anxiety; for the past forty years he has washed and scrubbed but cannot get the sensation of semen off him:

I still go through that. Back then I used to wash and scrub, wash and scrub, I couldn't get it off. To this day, I still haven't got it off ... It's even—now I'll jump in the shower periodically and you know, you don't think about it. And you try and scrub it off and you can't [get] it off.

Witnesses attributed the child sexual abuse they suffered as the major cause of the disintegration and breakdown of their marriages. Benoit Brisson, for example, discussed how the sexual abuse committed on him as a child by a member of the clergy was the catalyst for his separation from his wife. The same priest who sexually abused him in his teens had blessed his engagement, married him, and baptized his oldest child. Two years after he was married, Benoit Brisson announced to his wife, Denyse Deslauriers, that he wanted to separate. After much urging by his wife, who was “shocked” by Benoit's announcement, he disclosed for the first time that the priest who had officiated at their wedding and child's baptism had sexually assaulted Benoit in his youth. As mentioned, this priest, Father Gilles Deslauriers, was later criminally charged and ultimately pleaded guilty.

Jamie Marsolais similarly described how the “abuse has taken its toll on two long term relationships” and that he has a problem with intimacy. He has had multiple sexual partners and has participated in unsafe sex. Mr. Marsolais said the child sexual abuse that he sustained:

... caused me to make quite a few unhealthy choices in life and dangerous ones. I have slept with exotic dancers and escorts in the past because of this, because there was no attachment and it was kind of a quick fix for that addiction. It's not something I'm proud of and it's not anything I've shared with anybody until recently, but I think it's something important to say here in a forum like this so that people can understand ... So it's something else that I've had to cope with and deal with.

...

But there's a problem with intimacy as well ... I mean, you're taught at a young age that intimacy is something that's selfish and for one's pleasure. So that was—that took a toll on my first marriage.

As far as my second relationship, I mean, I had learned that it was something greedy and for the taking instead of something to share with someone, and that all compounded into our family life.

André Bissonnette also said that as a result of the abuse he endured in a foster home as a child, he “could never be intimate with anyone.” Similarly, Cindy Burgess-Lebrun stated that the abuse she sustained is constantly in her mind and had a serious impact on her relationship with her spouse. As she said at the hearings, “All these years, I cried when my husband made love to me because [the abuser] invaded my thoughts ... even at these precious times.” C-14 testified, “[M]y inability to form long-term trust relationships has prevented me from ever marrying ... My dreams of normalcy, owning a home, and raising a family, have all vanished.” Another witness, C-11, said, “[N]othing brings back the loss of innocence. Once that’s taken away from you, the chance of coming into healthy human sexual experience is corrupted; your world is skewed.”

Not only did the sexual abuse have an impact on relationships with spouses and partners, but it also affected the ability of victims to parent. Cindy Burgess-Lebrun, abused in the 1980s with her siblings when she was about twelve years old, discussed the impact this has had on her parenting. She is not able to allow her adolescent child to develop the skills necessary to become an independent person, as Cindy Burgess-Lebrun has deep-seated fears that her child will be harmed or abused. She is “a very over-protective parent”: “I have a fifteen year old who cannot go three blocks from my home ... and I wish I could let him be a little more free.” Her brother Scott Burgess has difficulties relating to his children. As he said in his testimony, “My son, he tries to get close, but I push him away.”

Jamie Marsolais also described how the sexual abuse he sustained as a child had adverse repercussions on his relationship with his son from his first marriage:

I wanted to toughen him up a bit ... I didn’t want him to be weak like I was or I perceived myself as being. I’ve made a lot of mistakes parenting ... It’s never too late to start over, but I can’t give them back those years either. So everything trickles down.

Mr. Marsolais discussed how the abuse has an impact on subsequent generations.

Kevin Upper also described the effects on his children and grandchild of the abuse he allegedly sustained. Mr. Upper overdisciplined his sons, was impatient, and was always “yelling at them for almost anything.” He was also overprotective. Mr. Upper insisted on accompanying his children to camp and was their coach. “I had to get involved in everything my kids did,” he said at the hearings.

Kevin Upper lamented the toll the abuse has taken on his family—his children and grandson. Jeannette Antoine also “watched” her “daughter like a hawk so nobody would touch her.”

Marc Latour and André Bissonnette similarly described their poor parenting skills, which they attributed to the sexual abuse they were subjected to as children. Mr. Bissonnette simply “could not be a good father” to his children, and Mr. Latour discussed how his own behaviour adversely affected his son’s educational prospects. Another alleged victim of abuse described his difficulty having physical contact with his baby. “Changing my own child’s diapers kind of felt awkward because of what had happened to me,” he said in his evidence. Alain Seguin described his distance from his children: “[A]s a father, you know, there were some protection aspects of me that was missing towards my children ... because things happened to my children too and I didn’t react properly.” Mr. Seguin said that he could not react when his children were in danger. Vicki Roy, another witness, described how her husband Albert was “afraid to hug his own sons” as a result of his childhood abuse.

Job instability and the resultant negative financial repercussions was a further impact of abuse described by witnesses at the Inquiry. André Bissonnette has moved from one job to another. Inability to deal with authority and difficulties with alcoholism have been impediments to employment stability. Similarly, Scott Burgess has not been able to stay at one job for a long period. He testified that as a result of being sexually abused by a male perpetrator, he has difficulty interacting with men, including fellow employees at work. Albert Roy also said that he has had difficulty “hold[ing] down jobs” and “being alone with a male” as a consequence of the sexual abuse he sustained as a child. “It was always all in the back of my mind” that males may be molesters, he told the Inquiry. He is particularly afraid of males in positions of authority. Benoit Brisson described his constant relocations, frequent job changes, and instability. He has moved about twenty times since 1994, from Cornwall to Kingston, Toronto, and Ottawa:

J’ai déménagé peut-être une vingtaine de fois depuis 1994. Je suis allé de Cornwall à Kingston, à Toronto, à Kingston, là je suis à Ottawa. Même chose avec mes jobs.

Donc, il n’y a rien de stable.

The serious psychological effects of childhood sexual abuse throughout their adult years were described by these witnesses. Some victims and alleged victims testified that the abuse they sustained as children has impeded their ability to work. Several have been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder. Roberta Archambault described not only her inability to work but also the difficulties she encounters in performing mundane tasks such as grocery shopping and going to the bank:

I can't go into the bank and then do groceries because I have panic attacks so bad that I can't do both on the same day. It takes me a day to recover from just going into a bank. It takes me a day to recover from doing groceries. From the anxiety attacks, I can't take the bus. I can't be around crowds of people.

Similarly, C-14, who suffers from depression, insomnia, anxiety attacks, and migraines, has “trouble finding the energy to perform even the most menial of tasks.” He and other witnesses discussed their suicide attempts. André Lavoie described how he has “faced the muzzle of a twelve-gauge shotgun.” He said:

... [F]rom the age of 14 when the abuse started until this very day, I don't think there is one day that goes by—there might [be] one or two—without myself truly, deeply thinking how to end the pain, and the only solution that I can find is suicide. So I have been living with death my whole life because every time that he abused me, I would die basically, because I just couldn't take it. So I would split my body from my spirit. “Take the body, take whatever you want. Have fun. When you're done, I'll try and recombine the two,” which is not easy to do because you're dragging around a piece of dirt and then you live with that for the rest of your life. And the pain starts.

So you know, I have faced the muzzle of a 12 gauge shotgun and looked at it and just pondered, this could end right now. The only thing that stopped me is the one question, what if. What if something happens that changes my future in a dramatic way in the next second, but I just pulled the trigger, right. Also, I don't like a mess.

So the final solution that I have come up with, which is really, truly elegant is an excellent bottle of scotch and a blend of carbon monoxide, and that is so satisfying knowing that solution is there for me and I can take it anytime.

Several of the victims and alleged victims continue to take medication such as antidepressants to help them cope with the effects of their child sexual abuse.

As Jamie Marsolais said, “[J]ust because the scars aren’t evident, it doesn’t mean the scars aren’t there. There’s still impacts.” Mr. Marsolais has been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder and depression and has been hospitalized for panic attacks.

Guilt and a sense of responsibility for the sexual acts perpetrated on them as children continue to haunt many of the victims, such as Claude Marleau. As another witness explained:

... [A]s a victim, you always feel that somehow it was your fault ...
[I]t was like there was something about me that made these men
[the perpetrators] react this way ... [I]t’s something I still deal kind of with ... [A]s an adult, you think why didn’t I do something? Why didn’t I stop it?

André Lavoie expressed similar anxieties:

... [O]ne December evening, he demands, “Do you want me to put your penis in my mouth?” And he repeats, “Do you want me to put your penis in my mouth?” Until I finally replied “Yes.” I thought it was all a mistake, that it would end right there. My approval that first time still echoes in my mind, but I hear myself screaming with rage to this day. I can still picture my body on that small bed, naked and confused. At the age of 15, I lost my innocence. I lost any right to a normal life, lost the privilege of defining my own persona. I became an accomplice to a deranged individual. Until recently, I felt like a whore who had compromised his ambitions to satisfy the hunger of a vulture ...

That one word [yes] set off a chain of events that would forever change my life or damage my life. On that snowy December evening, I lost my youth, my right to explore my own sexual life, gave up any chance to a normal future.

Mr. Lavoie was sexually abused by his teacher repeatedly throughout high school. As mentioned, the perpetrator, Robert Sabourin, pleaded guilty in the criminal prosecution.

Jamie Marsolais testified that his sexual abuse began in a Cornwall theatre when he was a young boy. As the perpetrator sexually fondled him, he asked Jamie if it felt good. Jamie responded, “I don’t know.” For the next two decades, Mr. Marsolais punished himself for uttering these words:

So the reason why I'm sharing this story is because those three words I had to beat myself up over for over 20 years because that's where it had started and I thought I had let it happen. Had I handled it differently, you know, things could have changed ... [T]hat was something that haunted me that certain episode and that I saw at night while I slept and so on for so many years.

I just thought it was important to share that and how some incidents really scar people and that, you know, I had to accept that, you know. It didn't matter what I said at that time and I was only nine years old.

One of his alleged perpetrators, Richard Hickerson, committed suicide before Mr. Marsolais reported that he had been sexually abused. The other sexual offender, James Lewis, pleaded guilty.

Clearly, the impact of sexual abuse on these child victims has been serious. The repercussions have been both immediate and long term.⁵ The scars from the abuse are psychological, social, academic, and financial. Suicide attempts, drug and alcohol addictions, depression, insomnia, recurring nightmares, mistrust of authority, and failure in school are some of the impacts of the abuse described by witnesses and their families at the Inquiry. Victims, their siblings, parents, and spouses also painfully described the inability to parent, the inability to maintain steady employment, the loss of faith in God and abandonment of religion, the confusion about sexuality, and the inability to have intimate relationships.

The following chapters describe the interactions of the Cornwall victims and alleged victims of child sexual abuse with institutions such as the police, school, Children's Aid Societies, the Church, and government ministries such as the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services and the Ministry of the Attorney General. The response of the institutions to the allegations of child abuse in Cornwall, a central mandate of this Inquiry, is discussed in detail in the following chapters of this Report.

5. Note that although some of the victims and alleged victims are not specifically named in this chapter, including John Macdonald, David Silmser, Cathy Sutherland, and C-8, the following chapters of the Report describe their allegations and some of the effects of the historical sexual abuse they allegedly suffered when they were young people.

Media Coverage of Allegations of Historical Abuse of Young Persons in the Cornwall Area, 1986–2004

Expert Witness on Media Analysis Testifies at Hearings

Dr. Mary Lynn Young, Acting Director of the Graduate School of Journalism at the University of British Columbia, was qualified as an expert in media analysis at the Inquiry. The main focus of Dr. Young's academic teaching is best practices news writing. She trains journalists to write, research, and report in different media such as print, broadcast, and the Internet. Prior to joining the University of British Columbia, Dr. Young taught journalistic best practices at the Ryerson University in Toronto.

Dr. Young was a crime reporter for a number of daily newspapers in Canada and the United States, including The Hamilton Spectator, The Vancouver Sun, and The Houston Post. She also worked as a national business columnist for The Globe and Mail.

Dr. Young's primary concentration is media content analysis. She has experience in both quantitative and qualitative analysis. Dr. Young is also the author of journal articles. These articles include an analysis of major crime stories in the United States, the impact of lack of media competition on the content of reports, and an analysis of media coverage of the Pickton case in Vancouver, British Columbia, in which sixty-five women went missing in a thirty-year period. For her doctoral dissertation, Dr. Young examined sixteen years of media content to determine whether newspapers increased their coverage of sensational crime when the environment became more competitive. The research methods employed and analysis conducted for her published articles and her doctoral dissertation are similar to the work Dr. Young was commissioned to do for the Inquiry.

Dr. Young has made presentations on the media in Canada, the United States, and Asia. Some of the titles of these presentations are "Media Credibility in Canada," "Gendered Practices and Media Panics: Masculinity, Newspaper Wars and Crime Content in Canada,” and “Sensationalism and Resources: U.S./Canada Differences in Attitudes Towards Media Credibility.”

Purpose and Scope of the Media Study for the Cornwall Inquiry

Dr. Young was asked to conduct a study of media coverage of allegations of historical abuse of young persons in the Cornwall area from 1986 until the end of 2004 (at which time the media focus shifted to the establishment of the Public Inquiry). Her study of this period involved print, radio, and television broadcast news reports from a media database that had been compiled by the Cornwall Public Inquiry. Dr. Young concentrated on two main issues:

1. what media content or information may have influenced the institutions in their responses; and
2. how media coverage affected the understanding of the community regarding the social problem identified in Cornwall.

The trends and changes in media coverage during this nineteen-year period were examined with a focus on both the nature and the amount of information made available through print and broadcast.

The specific research questions addressed by Dr. Young were:

1. What information about the allegations of historical abuse of young persons in Cornwall was communicated to the public, and did it change over time? In other words, what facts or frames were selected by journalists, and did the reporting change in the 1986–2004 period?
2. What key themes emerged and, in turn, were disseminated to the public?
3. Who were the key voices and agenda setters represented in the media coverage, and how were they framed over time?
4. What media genres were used to cover the allegations of abuse as they unfolded? Were they short news stories or longer-form investigative journalism?
5. What was the geographic diffusion pattern of the media coverage? Was the coverage predominantly in local media in Cornwall such as the Standard-Freeholder or the Seaway News? To what extent was there regional media coverage of the issue such as in the Ottawa Citizen, Ottawa Sun, or affiliates of the larger broadcast outlets in Ottawa, or national coverage such as in The Globe and Mail or National Post?
6. What were the peak coverage times from 1986 to 2004?

As explained by Dr. Young, the issue of whether media coverage can alter the institutional response is complex. Clearly, she said, media coverage can have an impact. She gave the example of the campaign of Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD). This movement, which was covered extensively in the media, changed social policy and cultural norms surrounding drinking and driving. Dr. Young said that although “it would be inaccurate and simplistic to locate the genesis of that shift in the media coverage of MADD,” it “obviously played a part.”

Methodology

The study by Dr. Young for the Inquiry, as mentioned, involved an examination of both print and broadcast media. The content was predominantly mainstream media information from established local, regional, and national print and broadcast outlets. Both qualitative and quantitative content analysis was conducted. The quantitative analysis examines who said what to whom, and with what purpose; it seeks to identify general trends in the media content over time.¹ The qualitative analysis, subjective in nature by contrast, focuses on how issues surrounding allegations of historical abuse were represented by the media. It examines the narrative, or framing, trends.

Citizen journalism—that is, citizen-created information and news reported on websites during the 1986–2004 period—is not included in Dr. Young’s report. Nonetheless, it was not surprising to Dr. Young, given that Cornwall is a small community with a limited number of media outlets, that citizens decided to write about these issues on the Web. The specific focus of her report was mainstream media outlets.

Document Sample

The document sample was created from the Cornwall Inquiry database of print documents and broadcast files. The database contained 1,329 unduplicated print media articles in the 1986–2004 period. Of these, 1,105 were news reports and 224 were letters to the editor.

According to statistical principles, it is not necessary to examine the entire database in order to address the research questions described. As explained by Dr. Young, the standard way of establishing a workable sample is to use a

1. SPSS (the Statistical Package for the Social Sciences), an established academic software package, was used for the data analysis. It is essentially a high-level Excel program commonly used in the social sciences.

“constructed week” in the media; this means randomly sampling a week of newspaper articles. Sampling articles over two separate weeks in a year is considered sufficient to create a representative sample from which to draw conclusions for the purpose of media analysis.

Rather than sampling two weeks out of a fifty-two week period, Dr. Young decided to conduct more rigorous sampling. She sampled every second article; that is, 50 percent of the media database. The sample was 555 print articles (one-half of the 1,105 unduplicated print articles from the database). Although this was probably “over-sampling,” Dr. Young considered it “better to have more information than you require than less.”

To ensure the accuracy of the media articles in the Inquiry database, Factiva, one of the most comprehensive databases of Canadian print and broadcast news content, was examined for the period January 1, 1986, to December 31, 2004. The key words “Cornwall,” “abuse,” and “Ontario” were used in the search of the database. It became apparent that the Factiva sample contained no media coverage of the issue from 1986 to 1993.

The first mention of historical sexual abuse in Cornwall in the Inquiry sample was in 1986. The local newspaper, the Standard-Freeholder, described criminal proceedings against a Catholic priest in the Cornwall area, Father Gilles Deslauriers, who pleaded guilty to four counts of gross indecency involving historical abuse of boys.² As will be discussed later in this chapter, it was not until 1993, seven years later, that media accounts of allegations of historical child sexual abuse by priests in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall were again covered.

As far as the broadcast sample of radio and television news clips from the Inquiry media database was concerned, the amount of coverage was significantly smaller than in the print media database. There were only twenty-one broadcast clips, which included a number of television newscasts from a CTV affiliate in Ottawa, CBC Television, and a Fifth Estate television documentary. It also included a CBC Radio series that won a national investigative journalism award for its coverage of the allegations of historical abuse in the Cornwall area.

Variables Examined in the Media Study

In her determination of which variables to use for this study, Dr. Young examined the research questions as well as the literature on media coverage of crime and social problems of this nature. A coding sheet with variables was developed, which is reproduced here.

2. “Priest Pleads Guilty to Gross Indecency; Put on Probation,” cited in Dr. Mary Lynn Young, Report on the Media Coverage of Allegations of Historical Abuse of Young Persons in the Cornwall Area, 1986–2004 (Young Report), Prepared for the Cornwall Public Inquiry, October 22, 2007, p. 6.

Coding Sheet

Cornwall Public Inquiry

Year	Genre	Origin
	1. News story	1. Local
	2. Brief	2. Regional
	3. Feature	3. National
	4. Editorial	4. Specialized
	5. Column

Number of sources – 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5

Source	Facts cited
1. Cornwall Police	1. Pedophile ring exists
2. OPP (Project Truth)	2. Suicide—victim
3. Alleged victim/family	3. Suicide—perpetrator
4. Government official	4. Conspiracy against victims
5. Social agency occurred	5. Historical child sex abuse—uncertain/never
6. Expert	6. Cornwall Police—thorough investigation
7. Catholic Church	7. Cornwall Police—NOT a thorough investigation
8. Other media	8. OPP/Project Truth—thorough investigation
9. Citizens group investigation	9. OPP/Project Truth—NOT a thorough investigation
10. Perry Dunlop	10. Judicial system—thorough job
11. Other source	11. Judicial system—NOT a competent job
12. Alleged perpetrator

Tone

1. Positive	2. Negative	3. Neutral
-------------	-------------	------------

Genre This variable essentially asks, “How was the story presented?” Was it a discrete news event, reflecting a certain time and place? Or did it contain more in-depth information such as an investigative news feature or longer-form journalism?

Origin This variable examines the location of a news outlet. Cornwall’s two newspapers, the Standard-Freeholder and the Seaway News, constituted the local coverage; Ottawa’s two daily newspapers, the Ottawa Citizen and the Ottawa Sun, constituted the regional coverage; and The Globe and Mail and the National Post constituted the national media coverage. Specialized media such as magazines and smaller publications were separately identified and included Maclean's, Canadian Lawyer, The Orator, and The Wanderer.

Number of sources This variable refers to the number of people cited in the story, and examines whether those individuals were directly quoted or whether their words were paraphrased. It assesses which voices were consistently cited in the 1986–2004 time frame. Dr. Young explained that the complexity and quality of a story can be measured by the number of people cited, how much analysis was provided, and the diversity of opinion presented. This variable helps evaluate the amount of research conducted by the journalist for the story.

Kinds of sources Reporters are required to identify the people quoted in a story according to their relevance and association with a particular issue. This variable examines the institutional affiliation or subjective position of the source.

Facts cited A number of key facts in the media coverage were identified as relevant to the allegations. They include whether the media reported the existence of historical abuse of young persons or questioned whether the abuse in fact occurred, whether it reported the existence of a pedophile ring, and whether it discussed if the local and provincial police conducted comprehensive investigations.

Tone “Neutral” refers to news content that did not contain critical commentary; “positive” refers to news content that was laudatory in its comments or in information about the official response; and “negative” refers to criticism in the story regarding various official agencies involved in the allegations, such as criminal justice or other government ministries.

Media Landscape

When examining media content, it is important to study the media landscape for the particular time frame. Factors such as ownership and resources, for example, may have an impact on media coverage. News stories generally begin in the local media and, if considered significant, are covered by regional news media, which in this case were located in Ottawa, and national media such as The Globe and Mail, the National Post, The Canadian Press, the three national television networks—CTV, Canwest Global, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC)—and CBC Radio.

Media economics teaches that a relationship exists between quality and the amount a media outlet invests in news gathering and editorials. Greater media competition and greater financial investment in content result in higher quality news.³ Local community newspapers vary in their level of investment in news stories as well as in revenue models, from small dailies with weekly paid circulation to local weekly advertisers that supply free distribution with revenues solely from advertisements.

3. Dr. Young cites Stephen Lacy and Todd F. Simon, The Economics and Regulation of United States Newspapers (Norwood, NJ: Ablex Publishing, 1993), in Young Report, p. 10. This relationship between news quality, competition, and investment is known as financial commitment theory.

Cornwall's two local newspapers in the 1986–2004 period were the Standard-Freeholder and the Seaway News. In this nineteen-year period, ownership of the Standard-Freeholder changed a number of times. Launched as an independent weekly in the mid-1880s, the Standard-Freeholder became a daily newspaper in the late 1940s. It was owned by Thomson Newspapers Inc., proprietor of The Globe and Mail, at approximately the time when a Catholic priest in Cornwall, Father Gilles Deslauriers, pleaded guilty in 1986 to four counts of gross indecency involving youth.⁴ In 1996, the Standard-Freeholder was bought by Southam-Hollinger, the largest newspaper chain in Canada at the time, and in 2001 it was sold to Osprey Media.⁵ In 2007, the Standard-Freeholder was purchased by Quebecor Media Inc., which owns the Sun chain of newspapers.⁶ The average daily circulation of the Standard-Freeholder is 14,280.⁷ Because the Standard-Freeholder changed ownership a number of times in the 1986–2004 period, Dr. Young did not discern a particular ideology associated with this newspaper in this time frame.

The other newspaper in Cornwall, the Seaway News, was founded in 1985 by two individuals, Mr. Dick Aubry and Mr. Rick Shaver. In 2007, it was purchased by Transcontinental Inc. The Seaway News has a controlled (free) circulation of 34,900.⁸ As an independently controlled weekly, the Seaway News has limited reach outside the Cornwall area. By contrast, news content of interest in the Standard-Freeholder newspaper was distributed by the Canadian Press wire service in the 1986–2004 period.⁹

Small daily and community newspapers that are part of larger media groups are generally valued for their revenue-generating potential and as training grounds for young journalists, offering lower paid, entry-level jobs that tend to be transient in nature. These smaller newspapers “tend to be seen more as financial assets than news agenda setters, a role left to larger regional dailies.”¹⁰

Regional media included the Ottawa Citizen and the Ottawa Sun. According to Dr. Young, these media “represent a variety of ideological as well as journalistic traditions.”¹¹ The Globe and Mail and Ottawa Citizen are considered “newspapers of record”¹² for their respective markets, while papers such as

4. Young Report, pp. 10–11.

5. Ibid., p. 11.

6. Ibid.

7. Ibid.

8. Ibid.

9. Ibid.

10. Ibid.

11. Ibid., p. 9.

12. Ibid.

the Ottawa Sun are tabloids that tend to focus on “a more sensational array of media content.”¹³

Geographic Origins of Media Coverage

The study of media coverage from 1986 to 2004 revealed that the vast proportion of print content—72.1 percent—was local. Most of the stories from the print media originated in the Standard-Freeholder and the Seaway News. The study found that 23.1 percent of the coverage of the allegations of historical child abuse in Cornwall was from regional sources, the Ottawa Citizen and Ottawa Sun, and national media accounted for only 1.6 percent. Specialized media—articles in such publications as The Orator and Canadian Lawyer—constituted 3.2 percent of the coverage.¹⁴

The limited amount of national coverage was a surprise to Dr. Young. She contrasted the Cornwall story to coverage of the Mount Cashel allegations of child sexual abuse in Newfoundland, for example, which received significantly more national media attention.

Peak Years of Media Coverage

The peak year for coverage of the allegations of historical child sexual abuse in Cornwall was 2001, which accounted for 20.9 percent of stories. The other three peak periods were 2000 (18.7% of the coverage), followed by 2002 (11.4%), and 1994 (also 11.4%).¹⁵

These four peak periods corresponded with the following events, discussed in greater detail in this Report:

- 1994 Media access to a victim’s (David Silmsen’s) statement to the police and financial settlement, as well as issues surrounding Perry Dunlop.
- 2000 Perry Dunlop’s resignation from the Cornwall Police Service and initial calls for a public inquiry.
- 2001 Jacques Leduc’s trial¹⁶ and stay of proceedings, as well as issues surrounding Dick Nadeau’s website.
- 2002 The end of Project Truth and its charges against fifteen people on 115 counts of sexual abuse.

13. Ibid.

14. Ibid.

15. Ibid., p. 11.

16. Jacques Leduc was a lawyer who represented the Diocese. In 1998, he was charged with six counts of sex-related offences. In 1999, there were additional charges. In 2001, there was a stay of proceedings on all charges.

Media Genres

News stories have gradually become longer and more complex over the past century. In an article discussed by Dr. Young, social scientists Barnhurst and Mutz¹⁷ state that news coverage now includes more analysis and places more emphasis on time frames other than the present. Studies indicate that there has been a “shift from descriptive to analytic journalism, from event-centred to interpretative reporting, or from episodic to thematic coverage.”¹⁸ In other words, there has been a movement toward news analysis that examines how and why something may have happened, rather than simply event coverage that reports only that something occurred. According to the Barnhurst and Mutz 1997 study, 40 to 45 percent of stories cover the “how” and “why.”¹⁹

In the media coverage of the Cornwall issue, 67.2 percent of the news content consisted simply of news stories that reported that an event had happened; it did not provide analysis of how or why the historical child sexual abuse occurred in the Cornwall area (Table 4.1).²⁰ Examples of news stories in the 1986–2004 period included the announcement of criminal charges against particular individuals, interviews with politicians about the allegations and the police investigations, and accounts of criminal trials of some of the alleged perpetrators.

Table 4.1
Print News Content by Genre, 1986–2004

	Frequency	Valid percent
News	373	67.2
Brief	39	7.0
Feature/In-depth	29	5.2
Editorial	36	6.5
Column	78	14.1
Total	555	100.0

Only 5.2 percent of the coverage constituted feature/in-depth articles. Dr. Young expected more analysis of the issues, which occurred over a lengthy period:

17. Kevin G. Barnhurst and Diana Mutz, “American Journalism and the Decline in Event-Centred Reporting,” Journal of Communication, vol. 47, no. 4 (1997): pp. 27–52.

18. Ibid., pp. 27–28.

19. Ibid., pp. 32–33.

20. Young Report, pp. 11–12.

... [W]hat I find surprising is that the percentage of in-depth analytical pieces are lower than I would think on an issue of this complexity, over this length of time.

... [I]t's not just the allegations of historical child abuse, it's actually the criminal justice response to those kinds of allegations ... [I]t is complex on a number of levels.

Over 20 percent of the information from 1986 to 2004 was opinion content; this included columns and newspaper editorials. Dr. Young considered 20 percent, or one in five articles, a “significant amount of opinion comment.” The columns, for the most part, originated from the two Cornwall newspapers and their two main columnists, who, Dr. Young said, “addressed the problem and allegations from opposing perspectives—often trading barbs with each other in print.”²¹ A few columns also appeared in regional and national media, including two in the Ottawa Sun in 1999 that discussed details about the allegations of abuse not addressed in other media.²² There were editorials in the local newspapers and regional daily newspapers such as the Ottawa Citizen.²³

The remaining news content (7%) consisted of briefs or short news stories of fewer than three paragraphs.

Columns and editorials are generally used as vehicles to inject in-depth analysis and opinion into the news agenda. Best practices focus on evidence-based reporting methods and argumentation as a means of analyzing and describing events and issues in the public realm.²⁴ This entails confirmation of the accuracy of the information, transparency as to whether the information is speculation or based on evidence, and identification of the source of the evidence.

Kovach and Rosenstiel, well-known and respected media commentators on best practices journalism, state that the discipline of “verification” is what separates journalism from “entertainment, propaganda, fiction or art.”²⁵ It is argued that

21. Ibid., p. 12.

22. Ibid.

23. Ibid.

24. Philip Meyer, Precision Journalism: A Reporter's Introduction to Social Science Methods, 4th ed. (Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2002), cited in Young Report, p. 12. Dr. Young lists a number of sources for information about best practices journalism: Canadian Association of Journalists, Statement of Principles; Bill Kovach and Tom Rosenstiel, The Elements of Journalism: What News People Should Know and the Public Should Expect (New York: Crown Publishers, 2001); the Poynter Institute; and ethics textbooks.

25. Young Report, p. 13; Kovach and Rosenstiel, The Elements of Journalism, p. 71, supra n. 25.

“only through best practices and ‘precision’ journalism can media fulfill their role in facilitating democracy and the public good.”²⁶

It was Dr. Young’s opinion that “journalistic best practices were not followed in a number of instances” in the sample of Cornwall newspaper columns. As she wrote in her report:²⁷

... [E]xamples from the database indicate that opinion content included speculation, rumour and hyperbole without systematic and evidence-based argumentation in attempts to make sense of the allegations of historical abuse of young persons in the Cornwall area.

Dr. Young provided a number of examples of columns in the Cornwall local media that failed to conform to journalistic best practices. Two such columns were “Not Wearing Any Blinders,” published in the Standard-Freeholder on July 25, 1998, and a Seaway News column entitled “Champions of Complacency: Claude McIntosh and The Freeholder,” published on August 9, 1998. Most of the information on the allegations of child sexual abuse in Cornwall originated from two columnists from the two local newspapers. These columnists, Dr. Young commented, basically trade barbs with each other.²⁸ An excerpt from a July 1998 issue of the Standard-Freeholder is reproduced:

Gotta admit, it was uncomfortable squeezing a size seven ball cap over a size 12 head after reading Bob Roth’s glowing description of this scribbler in last week’s edition of the Seaway News.

You know, the one under the headline “Freeholder takes pathetic stand on child abuse issue.”

In that column, Roth raved about this scribbler being his “favorite journalist.”

“Articulate scribe,” Roth said, “doing first-class work.”

This article is essentially a critique of another columnist. It is common in a small town such as Cornwall for journalists and others in the local media to know each other. Local media, Dr. Young explained, sometimes tend to deal with personalities

26. Young Report, p. 13; Kovach and Rosensteel, The Elements of Journalism, supra n. 25; Meyers, Precision Journalism, supra n. 25.

27. Young Report, p. 13.

28. Ibid., p. 12.

rather than issues related to events based on research and verification. It is important to note that the Statement of Principles of the Canadian Association of Journalists outlines standards that journalists should adhere to; they include accuracy, fairness, balance, and defending the public interest, rather than taking “pot shots” at other journalists. In Dr. Young’s opinion, this column does not conform with best practices journalism.

Similarly, the following excerpt from the column in the Seaway News responds to the Standard-Freeholder column cited above:

I guess we’re back at it.

I tried to stay away from the “dirty little secret” last week (and did), but I really must respond this week to The Standard-Freeholder’s personal attack on me, the Dunlops and anyone else who doesn’t greet child sexual abuse and institutional break down with a gigantic yawn.

I refer, of course, to the editorial page piece by Associate Editor Claude McIntosh in the July 25 edition of the Freeholder.

It wasn’t an overt attack. Frontal assault is not the Freeholder’s style. So instead of targeting my arguments, Claude chose to fire pot shots at me from the bushes of irrelevance and innuendo.

Claude, as you know, is one of my favorite journalists, but he has become somewhat agitated because I have challenged his foggy thinking on the child abuse issue. In my view, he and his newspaper have taken a timid approach to the appalling failure of Cornwall’s key institutions (e.g. police and church) to tell the truth and protect our children.

...

Instead, the Freeholder’s associate editor makes sneering comments about those who want something done.

This is “unsubstantiated character discussion as opposed to well-sourced comment or analysis,” testified Dr. Young. She described these columns as simply entertainment, providing little information to members of the public to help them understand these important issues of child sexual abuse. Fairness, balance, and analysis, said Dr. Young, constitute best practices journalism.

Dr. Young contrasted these columns with a two-part series in April 1999 by a journalist from the Ottawa bureau of the Toronto Sun. In “Coverup or Witchhunt?” and “OPP Defend Pedophile Inquiry: Project Truth Cops Deny Coverup Allegations,” journalist Michael Harris interviewed a number of people, including MPP Gary Guzzo, officers from the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), and an individual from the Ministry of the Attorney General. Dr. Young stated that the journalist conducted research, tried to substantiate his opinions, and provided a “higher level” of analysis than the columns in the two local Cornwall newspapers.

Dr. Young provided another example from July 1998 in the Standard-Freeholder that, in her view, does not adhere to journalistic best practices. Entitled “Rumor Mill Is Working in Overdrive,” the column discusses an “anonymous” letter, quotes an “old friend,” does not identify sources, and makes problematic claims. The Canadian Association of Journalists Ethics Guidelines explicitly state: “We will identify sources of information, except when there is a clear and pressing reason to protect anonymity.”

The remaining news content included briefs (7%), which are shorter than three paragraphs, and features or long-form/in-depth journalism (5.2%).²⁹ Some of the longer-form journalism appeared in The Globe and Mail and the Ottawa Citizen. Chatelaine completed a lengthy feature on Perry and Helen Dunlop, the Ottawa Sun published a special report on abuse in the Catholic Church, and The Orator published three long features on allegations of historical child sexual abuse in the Cornwall area. These longer-form articles provided some context, “largely absent from the basic news stories.”³⁰

Media Sources

The quantity of sources cited in the print media and the quality of the sources were examined by Dr. Young in this study.

With respect to the number of sources cited in an article, the Statement of Principles and Ethics Guidelines from the Canadian Association of Journalists state that the more sources and the more diversity of sources, the better the quality of news and information content. On a complex subject such as historical allegations of child sexual abuse, it is expected that a variety of sources will be cited such as officials, experts including psychologists and psychiatrists, and complainants or victims of abuse. The general rule in “hard” news reporting, according to Dr. Young, is three or more sources.

According to the results of the study, approximately half of the print news content in the 1986–2004 period referred either to only one source or to no source at all. In other words, in 50.9 percent of the news articles, a very small number of sources were relied upon to report on the complex allegations of historical sexual abuse of individuals in the Cornwall community (Table 4.2).

29. Ibid., p. 13.

30. Ibid.

Table 4.2
Number of Sources in Print News Content, 1986–2004

	Frequency	Valid percent
0	63	11.4
1	219	39.5
2	169	30.5
3	93	16.8
4	11	2.0
Total	555	100.0

Almost one-third (30.5%) of print stories quoted two sources, while only 18.8 percent of stories cited three or four sources.³¹ “The result,” said Dr. Young, “is a body of information that relies on a narrow, limited range of research and knowledge for its content; ... news content with few identified sources” is “constraining and has a negative impact on the community, as well as citizens’ ability to make sense of complex issues or events.”³² To compound the situation, even when newspaper articles quoted two or three sources, they were often from the same sphere of influence; for example, a police officer is cited, then a representative of a different police force, and then a person from the Police Services Board. As Dr. Young explained, “[A] focus on one type of source can result in news content that is ideologically or institutionally biased.”³³

The sources in the first few paragraphs of a news story have the most impact and set the tone for the balance of the article, according to studies of media content.³⁴ Journalists typically place first the people they consider “the most important agenda-setter.” This is because about half the readers are generally lost after the third paragraph of an article.

In the sample of print articles on the historical allegations of sexual abuse in Cornwall, the most common first news source (29.7%) in the 1986–2004 period was a government official (e.g., politician, Crown prosecutor, judge).³⁵ As Table 4.3 indicates, the second most cited source was alleged victims (13.4%), followed by representatives of Project Truth (12.4%).

31. Ibid., p. 14.
32. Ibid.
33. Ibid., p. 15.
34. Ibid., p. 14.
35. Ibid.

Table 4.3

First Source in Print Media Coverage, 1986–2004

	Frequency	Valid percent
Gov't official	146	29.7
Alleged victim	66	13.4
Project Truth	61	12.4
Other source	43	8.7
Catholic Church	39	7.9
Perry Dunlop	32	6.5
Cornwall Police	32	6.5
Alleged perpetrator	22	4.5
Citizens group	19	3.9
Social agency	15	3.0
Other media	15	3.0
Expert	2	0.4
Total	492	100.0

Note: The total is 492 because 63 articles had no sources.

Other sources included representatives of the Catholic Church (7.9%) and Perry Dunlop (6.5%).³⁶ Interestingly, Perry Dunlop was cited as a first source almost as often as a Catholic Church representative, which Dr. Young said, suggests:³⁷ (1) “an inability or disinterest by media to access information from the Catholic Church and/or hold it and its representatives accountable”; and also that (2) “Dunlop was able to establish himself as a main agenda-setter.”

When Project Truth and the Cornwall Police Service are combined, the result is that the first source in almost one in five articles is the police (18.9%). Other first-cited sources were alleged perpetrators (4.5%), citizens groups (3.9%), which became more active toward the end of the time period, and social agencies (3.0%). Only 0.4% of first-cited sources in the print articles were experts in abuse, clearly a “dearth of experts,” in Dr. Young’s opinion:³⁸

... [T]he extremely small percentage of the news agenda devoted to experts, defined as academics, psychologists and other specialists in

36. Ibid., p. 15.

37. Ibid.

38. Ibid., pp. 15–16.

historical abuse claims, indicates a lack of depth and expertise about the psychological, social, cultural and institutional costs of this kind of social problem to a community.

First Fact Cited in Print Media and Tone of Media

Dr. Young examined the first or key fact reported in media coverage of the allegations of historical sexual abuse in Cornwall (Table 4.4). The most referenced first fact in the print media was the existence of a pedophile ring (27.3%). This conformed with journalistic norms of media coverage of sexual abuse in other communities. This was followed by criticism of the Cornwall Police Service, that its investigations were not thorough (20.8%), and that a conspiracy against victims existed in the Cornwall community (15.9%).

Table 4.4
First Fact Cited in Print Media, 1986–2004

	Frequency	Valid percent
Abuse ring	79	27.3
Cornwall Police—not thorough	60	20.8
Conspiracy vs victims	46	15.9
Judicial system—not thorough	29	10.0
Project Truth—not thorough	26	9.0
Abuse claims unsure	24	8.3
Suicide—perpetrator	7	2.4
Suicide—victim	6	2.1
Project Truth—thorough	5	1.7
Judicial system—thorough	4	1.4
Cornwall police—thorough	3	1.0
Total	289	100.0

Note: The total is 289 because some articles referred to none of the facts.

Of note were the “inattention” or “silences” regarding relevant facts, such as the suicide of perpetrators, mentioned as a first fact in only 2.4 percent of the print stories. Journalists often tend not to cover acts of suicide.³⁹ When the suicides of individuals were mentioned, there was inconsistency as to the number of suicides that occurred.

39. Ibid., p. 17.

The tone of most of the news content—65 percent—was negative. Officials and organizations such as the Cornwall Police Service and Project Truth, responsible for investigating the allegations of historical sexual abuse, were criticized. The fact that about two-thirds of the sample had a negative tone was not a surprise to the media expert. As Dr. Young said, “[N]ews tends to reflect negative changes in the status quo.”

Media Framing

Journalism scholars argue that journalists consciously select certain aspects of a social problem or event and define the social problem or event in a particular way. The manner in which the social problem is constructed or “framed” has an effect on judgments made, as well as on the remedies that are identified. An example of this is Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD). The issue was framed in terms of mothers losing their children, which inspired a policy shift or response, rather than in terms of youth in a certain demographic or cultural group engaging in irresponsible behaviour. Another example is the Pickton serial murders in British Columbia. The media frames involved missing women identified as Aboriginal sex trade workers and those who had drug addictions; they were depicted as “not worthy victims” and somewhat “culpable in their own death.” In other words, journalists consciously set up a framework within which to think about a particular issue or event.

The qualitative framing analysis conducted by Dr. Young involved the full sample of news articles on this Cornwall issue. A qualitative “framing” analysis was completed on the entire database of 1,329 print media articles, which included the 244 letters to the editor as well as the 21 broadcast clips. This involved an examination of media content orientations: how particular events or issues were represented or “framed,” and how connections between these events and their possible interpretations or solutions were promoted. As Dr. Young explained, “frames” provide the conceptual structure or framework necessary for the communication of news and information. As one author describes this process, “Frames are principles of selection, emphasis, and presentation composed of little tacit theories about what exists, what happens and what matters.”⁴⁰

Dr. Young found three key frames in the media coverage of allegations of historical abuse of young persons in Cornwall in the 1986–2004 period. The most prominent and consistent frame was that the Cornwall Police Service and other levels of the criminal justice system were either responsible for the social problem of historical child sexual abuse or, if not responsible, were culpable for their incompetence and ineffectiveness. Secondly, the construction of the issue was determined by “key sources,” the most dominant of which was Perry Dunlop, depicted as a “folk hero” in the media. Thirdly, the content was framed as discrete news events as opposed to a larger, systemic problem. A lack of in-depth investigative journalism was evident in the 1986–2004 period.

40. Dr. Young cites Todd Gitlin, The Whole World Is Watching: Mass Media in the Making and Unmaking of the New Left (Berkeley, CA: Open University Press, 1980), p. 6, in Young Report, p. 6.

The most prominent media frame, as mentioned, was police ineffectiveness. It began in 1993 with the Cornwall Police Service. In 1994, the media reported that the Ottawa Police Service had completed an investigation of the handling by the Cornwall Police of a complaint of abuse in 1992 by alleged victim David Silmser.⁴¹ The Ottawa Police concluded, according to media reports, that there was a “noticeable lack of senior management direction and support through the investigation.” In 1995, the media also reported that an audit by the Solicitor General had described the Cornwall Police in 1993 as “rife with conflict.”

In addition to the criticisms of the Cornwall Police Service, the media reported extensively on Perry Dunlop’s charges under the Police Services Act and the subsequent “clearing” of these charges. The 1995 obstruction of justice charges against lawyer Malcolm MacDonald, who represented Father Charles MacDonald,⁴² were also depicted as an example of police ineffectiveness.⁴³ In a 2000 broadcast media news story, police were described as either “incompetent” or “most botched up” in two investigations of allegations of historical abuse.

Concerns about police ineffectiveness shifted from the Cornwall Police Service to the OPP investigation, Project Truth. An article in the Standard-Freeholder, “Do We Still Need Project Truth?”⁴⁴ discusses the length and cost of the police investigation:

Project Truth, the Ontario Provincial Police investigation into claims of massive sexual abuse in Cornwall and area, plods along.

It has been plodding along for almost 15 months, making it one of the longest criminal investigations carried out in this neck of the woods ...

...

The cost has been enormous.

41. This investigation is discussed in fuller detail in Chapter 6 of the Report.

42. This is discussed in further detail in Chapter 11 of the Report.

43. Young Report, p. 18.

44. December 18, 1999.

As evidence of OPP ineffectiveness, the media reported that there was only one guilty plea in 2002 out of 115 counts of sexual abuse in which fifteen men were criminally charged. Very few of the articles referred to the second conviction that emerged from Project Truth⁴⁵—Father Paul Lapierre was found guilty in Montreal⁴⁶ and was sentenced to one year in custody and three years probation.

Other institutions, such as the Ministry of Correctional Services, did not have the same media “spotlight” on them. As Dr. Young observed, “[J]ournalistic investigation of issues at the probation office, guidelines about allegations of abuse from Corrections were not followed up.” Given that there were incidents and allegations of abuse involving probation officers, “it would be best practices for journalists to actually look at policies, examine Probation and Corrections, do more investigation and interviewing with respect to that institution” and not focus solely on the police. As Dr. Young said, the “spotlight gets focused on one area,” which “has an impact on how people understand what’s happening in the public realm.”

The second key theme focused on Constable Perry Dunlop, a Cornwall police officer. He was depicted as a “folk hero” who “blew the whistle on the local police and the inadequate investigation of allegations of historical abuse.” It was at this time that the “frame of police and Catholic Church cover-up received more fuel.”⁴⁷ Perry Dunlop became the centre of sustained local media attention and was the catalyst for national coverage such as large news features by The Globe and Mail and Chatelaine,⁴⁸ as well as an appearance in a documentary by The Fifth Estate in 1995.⁴⁹ There was a shift in the nature of media coverage from a discussion of a few disparate and unlinked cases of allegations of historical sexual abuse to the existence of a “pedophile clan” or “pedophile ring.” This continued until Constable Dunlop resigned from the Cornwall Police Service in 2000. The following excerpt from an article in the Ottawa Sun is an example of reports that depict both Perry Dunlop and his wife, Helen, as heroes:

Courageous

Perry Dunlop was driven by principle, nothing more, nothing less.

For seven years, the Cornwall police officer aimed a light into the darkest corners of a community’s secrets, exposing what he called a ring of pedophiles that had operated in the city virtually untouched for decades.

45. Young Report, p. 18.

46. In 2004, in Montreal. He was found not guilty at his trial in Ontario. This is discussed in fuller detail in the Report.

47. Young Report, p. 19.

48. Ibid.

49. Ibid.

For that he was once suspended and on numerous times threatened with worse.

He was often ignored or shunned, even by friends and colleagues, for exposing the dirty little secrets of people who had earned the public's trust and respect as pillars of the community.

Despite a wall of public indifference and outright denial, Perry Dunlop wouldn't stop asking the uncomfortable questions, just as he wouldn't stop answering the door when victim after victim after victim showed up to tell his story to just about the only person in town they thought they could trust.

This week Perry and his equally courageous wife, Helen, announced that after seven long years fighting for the truth on behalf of victims, they were packing up and heading west for a new life.

They're all but broke, having mortgaged the home to the hilt battling one legal action after another. They have no jobs awaiting them.

Not that we worry for them. The courage and perseverance that saw them through these past seven years equip them well for the challenges ahead.

We worry more for the community they leave behind—a community not yet cleansed of the stain of allegations involving abuse laid against numerous individuals.

It took years, but Dunlop's allegations finally prompted a full OPP probe that, to date, has led to more than 100 charges against 14 individuals.

Helen Dunlop says it's only the tip of the iceberg and expresses hope that somebody will pick up where they must leave off.

Hopefully, that will be the case, particularly as MPP Garry Guzzo voices demands for a provincial inquiry into the entire affair.

In the meantime, Cornwall, indeed all Canadians, owe a debt of gratitude to the Dunlops.

It's always easier to join the rest of the crowd in turning away from the scene of a crime, lest we become involved.

The Dunlops refused to turn away.

They became involved, even at enormous personal risk and sacrifice.

Heroes.

The media content of the allegations of historical sexual abuse in Cornwall was generally presented as discrete news events. There was little journalistic investigation or in-depth analysis. As Dr. Young stressed, more analytical and contextual information about the police and the investigations, including the legal issues involved in investigating historical allegations of abuse, would have enabled members of the public to better understand and assess the social problem. Moreover, there were few attempts to link the issues in Cornwall with multi-victim abuse cases in other regions such as Project Guardian in London, Ontario; Project Jericho in Prescott, Ontario; or Mount Cashel in Newfoundland. In Dr. Young's view, there should have been more journalistic research of Perry Dunlop's assertion to the OPP that a "pedophile ring" was operating in the Cornwall area. This claim was not verified by other sources or police agencies at the time. Perry Dunlop had become a "whistleblower"; he was "starting to set the news agenda" and "had become a part of the story." "[C]orroboration," she stressed, is required in a "best practices and objective journalism research model."⁵⁰ As Dr. Young commented, Mr. Dunlop was "potentially not independent."

Dr. Young observed "a number of problematic silences" in the media stories. The fact that a Cornwall area priest, Father Gilles Deslauriers, was convicted of historical sexual abuse in 1986 is mentioned in only a limited number of media accounts in 1993, 1994, and 1995. Also, in Dr. Young's opinion, research into the clergy and Roman Catholic Church "lacks sufficient media attention and rigour" in the print coverage.⁵¹ Few print articles examine the alleged perpetrators in the Church or the Church bureaucracy, leaving this area "uncharacteristically silent."⁵² Accountability questions could have been asked. These silences resulted in a further lack of information to the public.

Dr. Young provided a number of examples of news stories that lack research, analysis, and context. An article published in the Standard-Freeholder in March 1999, "MPP Wants Inquiry into Project Truth," contains only one source, Garry Guzzo, and it fails to provide a tie-in to the broader context of this Cornwall social issue. Little information is imparted to members of the public to help them understand the serious allegations of child abuse in their community. Similarly, in "Dunlop Quits City Police," also published in the Standard-Freeholder, only one source is quoted and it is not an individual but rather a police statement. Again, little information is conveyed to members of the public to help them comprehend the context of the allegations of sexual abuse by clergy in the Catholic Church and by others in positions of trust in the City of Cornwall.

50. Ibid., p. 20.

51. Ibid., p. 21.

52. Ibid.

The media expert contrasted such news stories with a CBC Radio series covering the allegations of sexual abuse in Cornwall entitled Breach of Trust, for which the CBC won a national investigative journalism award in 1999. In accordance with best practices, the journalist interviewed several individuals, including victims, the police, and a person who taught Ethics and the Law at a law school in Toronto. The CBC also obtained information on Church documents, court records, Law Society documents, photos, and other relevant written material. Below is an excerpt from the radio story:

... [A]n investigation by CBC Radio News reveals there are photos, old court records, church records and other documents. Yet Project Truth has never asked for any search warrants to obtain them. In some cases interviews with those involved produced new leads that were never followed up. And as each new person comes forward with a story of abuse it opens up a new door.

The radio story discusses the “pedophile ring” in Cornwall:

... how a group of powerful people sexually preyed on generations of young boys in Cornwall, Ontario. Our investigation has found at least 50 people who say they were sexually abused by at least 20 men. The list includes men from the city’s religious, professional and business establishments ... It has taken four separate police investigations to try to uncover activities that were swept under the rug by people in authority in the community.

It describes the alleged perpetrators as including priests and probation officers who were co-workers. It reports that the “Roman Catholic Church struck a deal with a young man who claimed he was abused by a parish priest,” in which $32,000 was paid to the man in exchange for not pursuing criminal charges. Malcolm MacDonald—the lawyer who represented Father Charles MacDonald, the priest accused of sexual assault—and his conviction for obstruction of justice are discussed. The broadcast also describes the establishment of Project Truth. The OPP was interviewed. The radio transcript states: “[P]olice admit many of the accused know each other and travelled in the same circles.” It also states that three of the suspects had committed suicide. The head of the OPP Criminal Investigation Branch discussed some of the difficulties encountered in investigating historical sexual abuse cases: “Memories fade, people are difficult to locate, documentation is non-existent. There’s also reluctance of victims to disclose that they’ve been sexually abused.”

This series also describes the history of the City of Cornwall, the population, and the socio-economic level of the majority of residents. It conveys the fact that the community is predominantly Catholic; “three out of four people here call themselves Catholic,” stated the radio broadcast.

In her examination of broadcast media framing, Dr. Young examined twenty-one video and audio clips. Although the broadcast coverage framed the allegations in similar ways to the print media, the broadcast media seemed to play more of an agenda-setting role than the print media. An Ottawa television station raised the issue of the 1992 complaint by victim David Silmsen and his financial settlement with the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. The CTV news affiliate in Ottawa broadcast information about this victim’s statement to the police, which was picked up by other media such as the Ottawa Citizen.

The broadcast media were the only media to refer to the religious context in Cornwall—that most of the residents are Catholic and attend church regularly. The Fifth Estate also provided community context about the impact of the investigation of Father Charles MacDonald and his subsequent removal from the parish. It was reported that “[h]is parishioners were told nothing. He was removed from the parish house quickly, sort of a middle of the night thing.”

Also, as mentioned, the CBC Radio investigative series Breach of Trust, prepared by four senior journalists, discussed the existence of a pedophile ring—that about fifty victims claimed they had been sexually abused by twenty men, that three suspects had committed suicide—and it referred to documentary and photographic evidence.⁵³

Dr. Young also examined about 200 letters to the editor. These letters, predominantly in Cornwall-area newspapers, provided both insight and competing information on issues surrounding the allegations of historical sexual abuse. The letters, Dr. Young said, “tell a completely different story about what’s happening to the community”: religious affiliation, internal conflicts, concern about rumours, residents trying to make sense of the allegations. The letters are very emotive and demonstrate how difficult this issue is for this community. Some of the letters complain about the quality of media coverage, the level of hyperbole. As a letter published in the Seaway News says, “[W]e are too long on feelings and too short on facts.” It is apparent from the letters to the editor that people are struggling to understand the problem in their community.

Conclusions

A study of print and broadcast media on the historical allegations of sexual abuse of young persons in Cornwall in the 1986–2004 period was conducted for the Inquiry. Media expert Dr. Mary Lynn Young concluded that the majority of news and information content originated from local media, which used few sources and which failed to provide “the necessary context and in-depth investigation that would reflect a best practices journalism model.”⁵⁴ As Dr. Young stated, “[T]here was too little fact and too much conjecture.”⁵⁵ When relevant facts were reported, “they were not presented in a coherent narrative—in one place,” to help the public understand the complex institutional and individual issues.⁵⁶

53. Ibid., p. 22.

Therefore, the main findings were that there was too much speculation and insufficient facts in the print media, lack of in-depth investigation and analysis, and limited verification of evidence. Dr. Young stated that the local media may not have adequate journalistic training in the coverage of historical sexual abuse claims, it may lack resources, and media accountability mechanisms may be limited in small communities.⁵⁷ Dr. Young stated that there were exceptions to her main findings, “but they were unfortunately few and far between.”⁵⁸

Other important findings from the media study were as follows:⁵⁹

1. The main information communicated to the public on the allegations of historical abuse of young people in Cornwall was framed within a legal context of ineffective policing.
2. The Cornwall Police Service and not other institutions—such as Ministry of Correctional Services or the Catholic Church—became the main media target for public complaint and critique over the period. Other institutions and organizations, said Dr. Young, “should very well have been asked a few more questions.”
3. The key voices and agenda setters in the media were government officials (including MPP Garry Guzzo), the police (including Perry Dunlop), victims, and citizens groups.
4. Issues were presented largely as event-centred news and there was a lack of in-depth analysis, which limited the amount of meaningful information available to the public. There was inadequate journalistic rigour respecting government institutions and their roles regarding the allegations of historical sexual abuse of young people in Cornwall.

54. Ibid., p. 24.

55. Ibid.

56. Ibid.

57. Ibid.

58. Ibid.

59. Ibid., pp. 24–25.

5. The geographic diffusion pattern shows that coverage of the allegations originated largely in the local media, with sporadic coverage by regional and national media. Regional media became interested in the Cornwall issue in 1994. The national media became more interested in the Cornwall issue in 1995, as a result of charges against Perry Dunlop under the Police Services Act.
6. Peak coverage in the 1986–2004 period occurred in four years, which corresponded with particular events:
 - a. media coverage in 1994 of the statement to police by complainant David Silmser and the financial settlement;
 - b. initial calls for a public inquiry and Constable Perry Dunlop's resignation in 2000;
 - c. the Leduc trial and stay of proceedings in 2001; and
 - d. the end of Project Truth and charges against fifteen people on 115 counts of sexual abuse in 2002.
7. Media periodization of the incidence of historical abuse in the Cornwall area was largely incorrect. Media coverage, for the most part, constructed events around the allegations of David Silmser's complaint and subsequent financial settlement. This focus neglected the fact that a priest in the Cornwall area, Father Gilles Deslauriers, had been convicted in 1986 of historical sexual abuse involving incidents that occurred in the 1970s. This is referred to in only a limited number of media accounts and was not extensively followed up.

Dr. Young concluded her report with the following statement:⁶⁰

In Cornwall, journalists barely scratched the surface and let one of the largest stories in the community remain clouded in rumours and allegations for more than two decades. It shows that best practices journalism matters for accountability and the ability of citizens to make sense of important issues in their community.

Media coverage of the Cornwall issue on the whole “lacked in-depth analysis” and “verification and systematic sourcing.” In Dr. Young's opinion, “[T]he citizens of Cornwall could have been better served” had the media quality been better.

60. Ibid., p. 26.

In my view, Dr. Mary Lynn Young provided valuable expert evidence on media coverage from 1986 to 2004 of allegations of historical abuse of young persons in the Cornwall area. Her analysis of print and broadcast reports provided insight to the parties at the Inquiry and to members of the public on the quality and quantity of information conveyed about allegations of historical sexual abuse in this part of eastern Ontario.

Institutional Response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services

Introduction

The Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services (MCSCS) is responsible for establishing, maintaining, operating, and monitoring correctional institutions and probation and parole offices in Ontario.¹ The Ministry currently has jurisdiction over offenders eighteen years and older who are on probation or are under conditional sentence orders requiring community supervision. It is also responsible for offenders under parole supervision. The Ministry operates over thirty correctional facilities: jails and detention centres. There are approximately 120 probation and parole offices in Ontario.

Over the years, Correctional Services has expanded its programs and services. The Ministry provides custodial facilities, parole and probation offices, and community supervision; it offers community programs for offenders; it prepares reports for the courts to assist in sentencing convicted offenders; and it implements programs on prevention of crime.

Correctional Services is currently part of the MCSCS. In the past, it has existed as a separate ministry, the Ministry of Correctional Services, and has also been combined with other ministries such as the Ministry of the Solicitor General and the Ministry of Public Safety and Security.

Probation Services

Probation services have undergone many changes in previous decades. A number of different ministries and organizations have been involved in providing probation services for children, youth, and adults. Moreover, there have been different philosophies regarding appropriate interventions for children, youth, and adults.

1. MCSCS corporate presentation. M. Hughes, J. Bunton, and G. Semple provided an overview of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services.

In the early part of the last century, Children's Aid Society workers and "other persons" were appointed as probation officers under the Juvenile Courts Act. Later, probation officers were appointed by Order-in-Council under the Ontario Probation Act. They were responsible to local courts. In 1952, a provincial probation service was established, at which time probation officers reported to a Director of Probation Services, who in turn reported to the Attorney General.

Until 1971, the Ministry of the Attorney General provided all probation services, including those for youth under the age of sixteen. In 1972, the Ministry of Correctional Services assumed responsibility for probation services from the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Prior to 1977, correctional services for juveniles under the age of sixteen were administered by the Juvenile Division of the Ministry of Correctional Services. Many of these programs were delivered through residential training schools. In 1977, juvenile corrections programs became the responsibility of the Children's Services Division of the Ministry of Community and Social Services (MCSS). Sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds continued to be the responsibility of the Ministry of Correctional Services.

In 1985, after the implementation of the Young Offenders Act, the Ministry of Correctional Services provided supervision of and programming to sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds² as youths, rather than as part of the adult system. Although Correctional Services under the MCSCS has now been transformed into an exclusively adult-focused provincial corrections system, in the past it delivered services to youth.

Legislative changes played a large part in the type of services provided to children and youth, through the enactment of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, the Young Offenders Act, and the Youth Criminal Justice Act.

There have been three significant changes in federal legislative approaches that have had an impact on the delivery of the youth justice service in the past hundred years. The first shift occurred at the beginning of the last century with a paternalistic approach to children and youths who committed crimes. The second, which followed in the 1980s, was a legalistic approach to youth in trouble with the law. The latest shift has been to a holistic approach to youth, in response to statistics that indicate that young people in Canada have been incarcerated at higher rates than in other Western countries.

2. Phase 2 youth are sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds. Phase 1 youth are twelve- to fifteen-year-olds.

The federal government enacted the Juvenile Delinquents Act in 1908. The Act created a juvenile justice and corrections system with a social welfare—oriented philosophy. Under the statute, children could be subjected to delinquency proceedings for violating any federal, provincial, or municipal law, or for an offence of “sexual immorality or any similar form of vice.”³ The Juvenile Delinquents Act required judges to treat a delinquent not as a criminal but as a “misdirected and misguided child.”⁴ Under the Act, due process rights were minimized in the interests of an informal process and the promotion of the welfare of children.

The Young Offenders Act, enacted in 1984, replaced the Juvenile Delinquents Act. It was, in part, a response to the 1982 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms,⁵ which guarantees legal rights such as the right to life, liberty, and security of the person. There was a concern that the provisions in the Juvenile Delinquents Act did not protect legal rights guaranteed in the Charter. The Young Offenders Act moved away from the child welfare approach of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. Although the Young Offenders Act continued to make a distinction between youth and adult crime, it attempted to make young people more accountable for their actions. By virtue of the Act, Phase 2 youth—sixteen- to seventeen-year-old young offenders—were placed under the jurisdiction of Correctional Services.

The *Youth Criminal Justice Act*⁶ came into force in 2003, replacing the Young Offenders Act. One of its main objectives is to ensure that the formal justice system is used more selectively by reducing excessive reliance on incarceration and increasing the reintegration of young people into the community following custody.

In 2004, the Ministry of Children and Youth Services was created. All services for young offenders under the age of eighteen have become the responsibility of the Ministry of Children and Youth Services. Phase 1 and Phase 2 offenders were moved from their previous ministries to this new, specialized ministry. Previously, Phase 1 youth, aged twelve to fifteen, had been the responsibility of the Ministry of Community and Social Services, while Phase 2 youth, aged sixteen and seventeen, were under the Ministry of Correctional Services.

3. Juvenile Delinquents Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. J-3, under definition of “juvenile delinquent” in s. 2(1).

4. S. 38.

5. Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, enacted as Part 1 of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act (1982) (U.K.), 1982, c. 11.

6. Youth Criminal Justice Act, S.C. 2002, c. 1.

Duties of Probation Officers

The *Ministry of Correctional Services Act*⁷ specifies the duties for probation and parole officers. The responsibilities of an adult probation officer include preparation of court-ordered reports such as pre-sentence reports, reports for conditional sentences,⁸ post-sentence reports, and pre-parole reports for the Ontario Parole and Earned Release Board. Section 44(1) of the Ministry of Correctional Services Act delineates the duties of a probation officer with regard to reporting information to the court relevant to a disposition. Probation officers also make recommendations regarding community programs and supervision. Section 44(3) of the Act states that probation officers must perform other duties as assigned by the Minister, such as liaison with community agencies, community correctional stakeholders, the public, and victims. Probation officers have operational duties. They are expected to develop supervision plans, monitor and enforce probation conditions, conduct facility and community home interviews, implement offender rehabilitation plans, and liaise with Crown attorneys, the courts, and other community agencies.

There are two levels of probation officers. PO-1s are entry-level probation officers, and PO-2s are fully trained and have been probation officers for at least two years.

When the Ministry of Correctional Services had responsibility for cases involving children and youth, the duties of probation officers were similar to those described above. Probation officers prepared supervision plans for young offenders based on need and risk. They were also responsible for supervision as well as enforcement of court-ordered community-based sentences.

This chapter, on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, as it is now known, begins with a discussion of problems confronting the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office. Allegations by probationers of sexual abuse by Cornwall probation officers came to the attention of the Area Manager in the early 1980s. Staff in the Cornwall office noticed inappropriate conduct by employees in that office. The response of the Ministry and its employees to allegations of abuse by probationers and former probationers, and to admissions by probation officers of sexual improprieties or other

7. Ministry of Correctional Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. M.22.

8. With the implementation of Bill C-41 in 1996, conditional sentences became a sentencing option.

The Criminal Code permits an offender to be released on a conditional sentence when the offence is not punishable by a minimum term of imprisonment, the court imposes a sentence of imprisonment of less than two years, and the court is satisfied that serving the sentence in the community would not endanger the community and it would be consistent with the fundamental purpose and principles of sentencing.

inappropriate conduct, are discussed in detail in this chapter. Woven through the sections are recommendations that address such issues as training on male sexual victimization, conflict of interest principles, information sharing, institutional memory, critical incident information management, and audits and reviews of files of probation officers and other Ministry staff.

Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office Receives a Serious Complaint Regarding Probation Officer Nelson Barque

When Peter Sirrs arrived in Cornwall to assume the position of Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office in September 1981, the office was located at 340 Pitt Street.⁹ The police were located on the main floor, the courts on the second and third floors, and the probation office on the fourth floor.

Nelson Barque had been a probation officer for about seven years when Mr. Sirrs became the on-site Area Manager in Cornwall. Other probation officers in Cornwall at that time were Ken Seguin, Jos van Diepen, and Stewart Rousseau. The support staff were Marcelle Léger and Louise Quinn. Prior to Mr. Sirrs' arrival as Area Manager, the Cornwall Probation Office had been supervised remotely; there had been no on-site managers.

Mr. Sirrs had been in the Canadian Air Force for ten years before his career at the Ministry of Correctional Services as a probation officer and then as Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office. Two of his staff, Mr. Barque and Mr. Seguin, had studied theology in preparation for careers in the priesthood. Mr. Seguin had studied at Saint Paul University in 1968, as did Mr. Barque in the early 1970s. Both these men decided not to pursue careers as priests, but instead became probation officers at the Cornwall Probation Office.

The probation office moved to 502 Pitt Street in October 1981, one month after Peter Sirrs became the Area Manager. Unlike in the previous location, at the new premises each probation officer had a private office. At 502 Pitt Street, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) were on the first floor of the building, and Malcolm MacDonald had his law office in the basement. The probation office shared the second floor with the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

Both Ken Seguin and Jos van Diepen had also applied for the position of Area Manager at the time when Peter Sirrs was the successful candidate. Mr. van Diepen listed Malcolm MacDonald as a reference on his curriculum vitae at that time. He testified that Mr. MacDonald had the title of Q.C. (Queen's Counsel) and that the lawyer was also a Grand Knight of the Knights of Columbus. It was Mr. van Diepen's objective to provide references from people who knew him and had a position of responsibility and credibility in the community. Mr. van Diepen considered that he knew Mr. MacDonald fairly well. Mr. Seguin and Mr. MacDonald also knew each other and were, in fact, friends. Prior to September 1981, both Mr. van Diepen and Mr. Seguin were told that they had not been selected for the position of Area Manager at the Cornwall Probation Office.

9. This was the Court Building. The Cornwall Probation and Parole Office will also be referred to in this Report as the Cornwall Probation Office.

The hours of the Cornwall Probation Office at the new premises remained 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 or 5:00 p.m. One evening each month, generally the last Thursday of the month, probation officers would meet with clients. The evening hours were approximately 6:30 or 7:00 p.m. until 8:00 or 9:00 p.m. Probation officers were required to record all contacts with their clients, including telephone communication. Mr. Sirrs testified that although it was the "preferred practice" for support staff to be present when a probation officer met with a client at the office at night, this did not occur "in every case." Nor was the presence of a second probation officer required when clients had appointments at the Pitt Street office in the evening.

As explained by Mr. Sirrs, one of his major responsibilities as Area Manager was to conduct case audits as well as performance appraisals. His role was to examine the files of the probation officers to assess the frequency and time of their meetings with probationers, whether they were making proper notations, and whether the supervision of probationers was in compliance with the particular probation orders. Case audits of PO-1s were conducted every six months and all their case files were reviewed. The PO-2s were subjected to an annual audit in which about 10 percent of their files were examined. Mr. Sirrs was responsible for ensuring that Ministry guidelines, policies, and procedures were followed by the probation officers in the Cornwall office.

Mr. Sirrs was Nelson Barque's supervisor from September 1, 1981, when he became Area Manager of the Cornwall office, until May 1982, when Mr. Barque tendered his resignation. Until a complaint concerning Mr. Barque was made to the Cornwall Probation Office in April 1982, Mr. Sirrs considered Nelson Barque's performance satisfactory. He found Mr. Barque to be cooperative, punctual, and receptive to suggestions. But Mr. Sirrs' perceptions of Mr. Barque changed on April 8, 1982, when a telephone call was received at the Cornwall office.

Complaint to the Cornwall Probation Office About Nelson Barque

In the first week of April 1982, Marcelle Léger, administrative assistant to Mr. Sirrs, received a telephone call from Ronald St. Louis. He began to complain to Ms Léger about probation officer Nelson Barque. Ms Léger explained that the Area Manager was not in the Cornwall office at the time but that she would give Mr. St. Louis' telephone number to Mr. Sirrs upon his return.

Mr. Sirrs received a call from Mr. St. Louis on April 8, 1982. Mr. St. Louis reported that a probationer, Robert Sheets, was engaged in a "flagrant use of alcohol and drugs" in contravention of his probation order.¹⁰ His complaint was directed against probation officer Nelson Barque for his inadequate supervision of Mr. Sheets. Robert Sheets was a boarder at the residence of Mr. St. Louis.

Mr. St. Louis reported an incident to Mr. Sirrs in which Robert Sheets had become violent while under the influence of alcohol and initiated a fight with two people. There was considerable damage to Mr. St. Louis' home and Mr. Sheets had threatened him with personal injury. Mr. St. Louis said he had reported this incident to the Cornwall police, who had referred him to Nelson Barque.

In this call, Mr. St. Louis expressed serious concern to Mr. Sirrs about Mr. Barque's supervision of probationer Robert Sheets. Mr. St. Louis claimed that not only was Mr. Barque aware of Mr. Sheets' use of drugs and alcohol but that the probation officer had in fact provided these substances to Mr. Sheets, in violation of the probation order. Mr. St. Louis also alleged that Mr. Barque was sexually involved with probationer Robert Sheets.

On the same day that Mr. Sirrs received this complaint,¹¹ he contacted Mr. E.B. Toffelmire, Regional Administrator (Eastern Region) of Probation and Parole Services of the Ministry of Correctional Services.¹² Mr. Toffelmire suggested that Peter Sirrs discuss the complaint with Mr. S. Teggart, Director of the Inspection and Investigation Branch, who in turn recommended that Mr. Sirrs conduct a preliminary investigation. It was suggested that Mr. Sirrs speak with the persons involved in the incident, including the victim and the police. The preliminary investigation was considered to be urgent.

Peter Sirrs Conducts a Preliminary Investigation

Mr. Sirrs contacted the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and met with Sergeants Masson and Laroche on April 9, 1982. These officers discussed incident reports in their possession that pertained to Mr. Barque. They informed Mr. Sirrs that they had received complaints about Mr. Barque from maintenance staff at 340 Pitt Street through the building supervisor, Mr. Gerald Levert. Mr. Levert had told the police that some of his staff had observed unusual activity involving Nelson Barque and young males in the evening, in and around the probation office. Both Sergeant Masson and Sergeant Laroche were also aware of rumours concerning the relationship between Mr. Barque and Mr. Sheets.

10. Robert Sheets at nineteen years old was convicted of assaulting a peace officer in 1982 and was sentenced to three months imprisonment followed by two years probation. Some of the conditions of his probation were to report to his probation officer, to refrain from the consumption of alcoholic beverages and the use of non-medicinal drugs, not to enter licensed premises with the exception of a restaurant, and not to purchase alcoholic beverages.

11. April 8, 1982.

12. The position of Regional Administrator is also known as Regional Manager.

Mr. Sirrs also learned that the police had referred Mr. St. Louis to Mr. Barque, Robert Sheets' probation officer. Mr. Barque had met with Staff Sergeant Maurice Allaire of the CPS and Mr. Keith Jodoin, Justice of the Peace and Administrator of the Provincial Court. Mr. Barque had discouraged the police from pursuing the matter further. He had indicated that he would take action with respect to Mr. Sheets' inappropriate behaviour and report back to Staff Sergeant Allaire. But Mr. Barque did not execute these undertakings, according to the information obtained by Mr. Sirrs.¹³

Sergeant Masson told Peter Sirrs that he had informally counselled Mr. Barque regarding these rumours and his relationship with probationers, particularly Robert Sheets. The Cornwall police officer reported that Mr. Barque had acknowledged that he needed to do something about this.

Sergeant Masson also told Mr. Sirrs that on several occasions, Mr. Barque had attempted to persuade the CPS not to proceed with actions against particular probationers. In one circumstance, when Sergeant Masson was laying a charge against Robert Sheets, Mr. Barque was cautioned that he would be charged with obstruction if he continued to interfere with the police. Mr. Sirrs learned that incidents of a similar nature had occurred with other police officers. It was Sergeant Masson's view that Mr. Barque was too frequently in the company of Robert Sheets.

Mr. Sirrs also contacted the RCMP, whose offices were in the same building as the probation office, at 502 Pitt Street. He met with Sergeant Wayne Isbester, Detachment Commander of the RCMP, who confirmed that he too had heard rumours about Mr. Barque's relationship with Robert Sheets and Mr. Barque's disregard of his client's use of alcohol and drugs.

When Mr. Sirrs met with the RCMP and the CPS, he asked whether he should be concerned about other employees in the Cornwall Probation Office. Mr. Sirrs was told that no concerns existed with respect to other employees in the office.

Mr. Sirrs also interviewed several janitorial staff who worked at 340 Pitt Street, the former premises of the Cornwall Probation Office: John Viau, Lionel 13. Peter Sirrs learned this from the police.

Benoit, Gerald Desnoyers, and another member of the janitorial staff who wished to remain unnamed. Mr. Viau reported that when he was working one evening on the fourth floor of the building, which was where the probation office was located, he saw a young male with a small black moustache. The young man said that Nelson Barque had given him access to this area.

Another member of the janitorial staff, Gerald Desnoyers, stated that at about 11:45 p.m., he went to the fourth floor to look for one of the other janitors. As he walked out of the elevator, he saw Mr. Barque, shirtless and barefoot and carrying two jugs of water. Upon seeing Mr. Desnoyers, Mr. Barque quickly walked into the probation office.

Mr. Benoit reported to Mr. Sirrs that on Mr. Barque's request, he stayed away from the area of the probation office. Nelson Barque told the cleaner that he did not want to be disturbed.

On April 14, 1982, Mr. Sirrs met with Mr. St. Louis, C-44, and C-44's father. Mr. Barque's probationer, C-44, had been living at Mr. St. Louis' house as a boarder. Mr. Sirrs learned that Mr. Barque made telephone calls to the St. Louis residence, often late at night, and sometimes visited the house.

C-44 told Mr. Sirrs that Mr. Barque knew that Robert Sheets and C-44 used drugs and alcohol. In fact, he said that both he and Robert Sheets had reported to the Cornwall Probation Office under the influence of these substances. C-44 also relayed that Mr. Barque brought homemade wine to him and Robert Sheets at the St. Louis home. In addition, C-44 reported that Mr. Barque had offered him wine at the Cornwall Probation Office and treated him to an alcoholic beverage at a restaurant in the Cornwall Square mall. C-44's father also told Mr. Sirrs that Mr. Barque had come to his home and given money to C-44 to purchase beer.¹⁴ As Mr. Sirrs wrote in his April 1982 report to Mr. Toffelmire, "[T]hese alleged incidents are in direct contravention of conditions on Probation Orders issued against both [C-44] and Sheets."¹⁵

C-44 disclosed to Mr. Sirrs that Mr. Barque had engaged in sexual acts with him at the Cornwall Probation Office and at the probation officer's home. As Mr. Sirrs wrote in his report, C-44:

14. In January 1980, when he was eighteen years old, C-44 began his probation for convictions on a number of criminal offences. His probation officer was Nelson Barque. He was convicted of break and enter in December 1980 and in December 1981 of theft. Nelson Barque was again designated in intake information as C-44's probation officer. The conditions of his probation included reporting to his probation officer and refraining from the use of alcohol and non-medicinal drugs.

15. The probation orders of both Robert Sheets, dated January 14, 1982, and C-44, dated December 23, 1981, state that these probationers must abstain from alcohol.

... was un-equivocal in his admission he had engaged in homosexual activity with Mr. Barque on several occasions at both Mr. Barque's home and at the Probation Office. On other occasions, Mr. Barque had made sexual advances to [C-44] verbally and physically which were rebuffed. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Sirrs considered these allegations of sexual involvement with clients to be “extremely serious.” Mr. Barque was in a “[p]osition of authority, position of trust ... It was clearly contrary to Ministry and government policy ... [I]t was just the most serious of the issues.”

The issue of whether the relationship was consensual was irrelevant for the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office. In Mr. Sirrs' words, “[I]t was just inappropriate to be so involved with clients.” In his report of April 20, 1982, he wrote: “When it involves clients, probationers or parolees, a distinction cannot be made between the personal and the professional.”

Mr. Sirrs was disturbed by these revelations. He was also “very disappointed” with the police for not discussing Mr. Barque's inappropriate behaviour with him. Mr. Barque was interfering with or obstructing the police in their dealings with probationers, and the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office expected to be given this information. Moreover, it concerned Mr. Sirrs that the police had not taken action with regard to the complaint of Mr. Levert and his janitorial staff. At least three police officers and Justice of the Peace Jodoin had information that Mr. Barque was sexually involved with or acting inappropriately with probationers, yet no action had been taken. In Mr. Sirrs' view, members of the criminal justice system had “overlooked” Mr. Barque's behaviour in efforts to protect him: “It was my sense that they regarded probation officers to some degree as colleagues, and in the same way that police have often overlooked behaviour on the part of their colleagues.”

In my view, it was important for the Cornwall Police Service to provide this information regarding Mr. Barque's inappropriate conduct with probationers to the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office and to other senior officials at the Ministry of Correctional Services, including the Regional Administrator. Mr. Barque was in a position of trust with regard to the probationers under his supervision. Mr. Barque was not only ignoring the probation conditions mandated by the courts but he was, in fact, facilitating the breach of his clients' probation. With this information, Ministry officials could have taken immediate steps to stop this highly inappropriate conduct of Mr. Barque with probation clients. Had the police provided this information to Ministry officials, other probationers supervised by Mr. Barque might not have been placed at risk.

Deputy Minister Deborah Newman recommended in her testimony that the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services develop a protocol with Justice partners, police, and the Crown to share information regarding allegations of sexual impropriety and other information. In my view, this is long overdue.

A Lock on Nelson Barque's Office Door and Pornographic Material in His Office

During the course of his investigation, Mr. Sirrs discovered that Mr. Barque had a lock on his door at the Cornwall office at 502 Pitt Street. The lock was not observable from the hallway. Mr. Sirrs made this discovery after he received the complaint from Mr. St. Louis in early April 1982. The lock was on the inside of Mr. Barque's office, which Mr. Sirrs described as a "standard bathroom door lock handle." He assumed that Mr. Barque had installed the lock. Mr. Sirrs had the lock removed after he made this discovery.

Marcelle Léger, an administrative assistant at the Cornwall Probation Office, was interviewed by the Ontario Provincial Police several years later, in 1995. Although Ms Léger claimed that she had no recollection of the interview, Detective Constable Zebruck's notes contain the following statement from Ms Léger: "Nelson had a lock put on his door. Installed soft lighting in his office claiming that it was more relaxing to interview clients at night." Ms Léger testified that she did not know when the lock was installed on Mr. Barque's door. Detective Constable Zebruck's notes also contain the following statement from this interview: "Liked to have younger clients. Wanted the ones charged with sexual offences."

When Ms Léger gave her evidence at the Inquiry, she claimed she had no recollection of Mr. Barque making any such requests to her. She also maintained that she had no memory of making these statements to Detective Constable Zebruck. I find it surprising that Ms Léger has no recollection of either the interview by Detective Constable Zebruck or of comments made to her by Mr. Barque such as his preference for younger clients and those charged with sexual offences.

Another statement from Marcelle Léger contained in the police notes says: "Some of his probationers would come more often than would be required." Ms Léger confirmed in her evidence that some of Mr. Barque's probationers "would just show up at the office without an appointment" and ask to see Mr. Barque. A further inscription in Detective Constable Zebruck's notes states: "Nelson would keep his clients in his office after hrs, tell staff to lock the door as they left; didn't want to be disturbed." Ms Léger stated that she would leave the office as soon as the last client had reported and lock the door of the probation office. It is evident that Ms Léger knew that the probationers would come to the probation office and visit Mr. Barque when they did not have scheduled appointments. She also knew that Mr. Barque had clients in his office after hours and that he instructed staff to lock the probation office door when they left the premises so that he would not be disturbed.

Louise Quinn was another administrative assistant in the Cornwall Probation Office. She was hired in 1974 as a secretary and remained in that position until 1995, at which time she became a probation officer. Ms Quinn testified she had no concerns that Mr. Barque was acting inappropriately with any of his clients. But clearly Ms Quinn noticed suspicious circumstances that, in hindsight, she agreed she should have perhaps discussed with the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office. One such situation was when Mr. Barque telephoned Ms Quinn from outside the office and asked her to retrieve a file from his desk drawer. When Ms Quinn “opened the drawer,” she saw “pornographic material, magazines with explicit young boys.” She thought it was “very strange that he had such material in the drawer.” When Mr. Barque returned to the office, Ms Quinn asked him why he had this material. Mr. Barque explained that he had confiscated the magazines from a client. But Ms Quinn wondered why the pornographic material had not been destroyed by the probation officer. “Thinking back ... maybe it was a sign, but I didn’t take it as a sign back then,” she said at the hearings. In retrospect, Ms Quinn agreed that perhaps she should have discussed her discovery with Mr. Sirrs: “[M]aybe I should have raised that issue with the manager, but I didn’t at that time ... [Mr. Barque] gave me an answer that I felt comfortable with at the time.”

When Detective Constable Zebruck interviewed Ms Quinn several years later, she reported the following: “Saw homosexual porn magazines in his desk. Also magazines of naked young boys, some performing sex acts ... Asked Nelson why ... clothes were in the desk and he told me that [name removed] changed clothes there occasionally.” She also told the police, “Nelson had mentioned that he had homosexual relationships in the past when he was younger.”

Ms Quinn thought Mr. Barque was perhaps too involved with his clients but rationalized that “it was a social worker side of him.” She testified that given current greater awareness of sexual issues, her views and reactions would probably be different now if she discovered pornographic magazines or such clothing in the probation office:

... I’m sure it’s something that would have to be reported to the area manager. We are much more aware of those things today than we were 20, even 10 years ago. We’re being trained now ... We have ... policies about sexual offenders.

We know much more—it’s much more in our faces now than it was in those days and certainly if I were to see any of those things happening today, such as the pornographic material, the clothing in the office, my view on that would be much more different now than it was looking back, you know, 20, 30 years ago. (Emphasis added)

Probation officer Jos van Diepen was another person in the Cornwall office who discovered pornographic material in Mr. Barque's office. Mr. van Diepen also had suspicions about Mr. Barque's relationship with probationers.

When Mr. van Diepen began his employment at the Cornwall Probation Office at 340 Pitt Street in 1976, there was not sufficient space for each probation officer to have a private office. As a result, Mr. van Diepen would use the offices of colleagues to interview clients. Mr. van Diepen was in Mr. Barque's office on one such occasion, in his first year as a probation officer. He opened Mr. Barque's desk drawer to search for a pen and discovered pornographic material, a paperback book with drawings of paired males in various sexual positions, and some Playboy magazines. He also found handcuffs in Mr. Barque's office.

Mr. van Diepen claimed he reported this discovery of "inappropriate" material to Ken Seguin, the senior probation officer in the Cornwall office, who assured him that he would deal with this issue. But Mr. van Diepen did not know whether there was follow-up with Mr. Barque regarding the pornographic magazines and drawings in his office. Nor did Mr. van Diepen take any measures to determine whether this had been pursued by officials at the Ministry.

When Mr. Paul Downing, Special Investigator for the Ministry, interviewed him in 2000, Mr. van Diepen claimed that after Mr. Barque had resigned from the Cornwall Probation Office in 1982, he had an "informal discussion" with Mr. Sirrs about the pornography found in Mr. Barque's desk drawer. In response to Mr. Downing's questioning as to whether he should have advised management of the pornography at the time it was discovered, Mr. van Diepen agreed that, in hindsight, he ought to have conveyed this information to a person in a management position at the Ministry.

Mr. van Diepen testified that this incident caused him to have "some doubts" about Mr. Barque's sexual orientation. Although Mr. Barque was married and had a child, as a result of this discovery, Mr. van Diepen questioned whether Mr. Barque was "exclusively heterosexual."

Another issue of concern regarding Mr. Barque also occurred in Mr. van Diepen's first year as a probation officer at the Cornwall office. In 1976, Mr. van Diepen had a seventeen-year-old client who had serious problems and was unable to live at home. Mr. Barque suggested that this probationer reside with Father Charles MacDonald, a parish priest in St. Raphael's, northeast of Cornwall in Glengarry County. The church needed a janitor/groundskeeper, and Mr. van Diepen considered this a good opportunity for his client to work and have a place to live, and that it would help ensure he did not get involved in further difficulties.

Within less than a week of his stay in St. Raphael's, the probationer returned to Cornwall and told Mr. van Diepen that he refused to remain at this parish because "Father Charles was a queer" who "liked little boys." The probationer told Mr. van Diepen that he had woken up to find Father Charles sitting on his bed. The seventeen-year-old did not provide further details.

Mr. van Diepen was "upset" and "angry" with Mr. Barque for suggesting this placement for his probationer and was concerned about the information that had been conveyed by the seventeen-year-old. Mr. Barque had placed a probation client "in a situation of risk" and "knew or ought to have known that that was not an appropriate placement." Mr. van Diepen considered it his role "to protect that individual." He decided to discuss this with Mr. Ken Seguin, the senior probation officer in the Cornwall office.¹⁶ As mentioned, there was no on-site manager at the Cornwall Probation Office until the early 1980s. Because of Mr. van Diepen's concern that Father MacDonald had sexual intentions regarding the probationer, he asked Mr. Seguin if the priest was gay. Mr. Seguin's response was that Father MacDonald was not gay but that Mr. van Diepen ought not to have placed the probationer with this priest. Mr. van Diepen was not aware at this time that Father Charles MacDonald and Mr. Seguin had a close friendship. In fact, Father MacDonald and Mr. Seguin had been in the seminary together.¹⁷

Jos van Diepen testified that in 1976 he was concerned about the vulnerability of children who had contact with Father MacDonald. Mr. van Diepen knew that Father MacDonald continued to be a parish priest for many years after 1976. He claimed that he expressed his concerns to Mr. Seguin, believing that was sufficient. Mr. van Diepen did not discuss the issue with management at the Ministry of Correctional Services, nor did he contact the Children's Aid Society. As he said in his evidence, "I felt that I did what was appropriate" and that it was not necessary to take any further actions.

Mr. van Diepen claimed that in 1976 he reported the pornographic material and handcuffs found in Mr. Barque's desk drawer to Mr. Seguin. He also claimed that in the same year, he told Mr. Seguin about Mr. Barque's inappropriate suggestion to send the probationer to live with Father MacDonald and to work at his parish. Yet Mr. van Diepen said he had "no knowledge of what happened" with regard to these issues. Mr. Barque continued in his position as a probation officer, and Father MacDonald remained a parish priest for many years.

16. Jos van Diepen testified that he was told by Ken Mitchell, the Area Manager at the time, that he was to report matters to Ken Seguin.

17. In 1968, Ken Seguin studied theology at Saint Paul Seminary at the University of Ottawa. Father Charles MacDonald studied there between 1963 and 1969. Nelson Barque studied theology at Saint Paul from 1970 to 1971.

Mr. van Diepen agreed that follow-up was important. He did not discuss these matters with the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office, nor with others in positions of management at the Ministry, prior to Nelson Barque's resignation. Mr. van Diepen ought to have conveyed his observations and knowledge of Mr. Barque's inappropriate conduct to management at the Ministry of Correctional Services. Had this been done in 1976, it is possible that measures would have been taken by Ministry officials to prevent Mr. Barque from further engaging in sexual and other inappropriate contact with young men, clients of the Ministry of Correctional Services.

Nelson Barque Resigns From the Cornwall Probation Office

After completing his investigation, Mr. Sirrs considered the allegations against probation officer Nelson Barque "without question" to be "extremely serious." In his confidential report to Mr. Toffelmire in April 1982, Mr. Sirrs wrote:

Clearly the credibility of Mr. Barque as a Probation Officer as well as that of the Probation and Parole Service in Cornwall is at question. If all or part of these allegations are founded, then Mr. Barque would be unable to continue to function in his capacity as a Probation and Parole Officer.

Mr. Sirrs recommended that the matter be referred to the Inspection and Investigation Branch of the Ministry of Correctional Services for a thorough investigation. He also suggested that the allegations and information gathered in the investigation be presented to Mr. Barque. Mr. Sirrs concluded his report with the following statement:

Should Mr. Barque acknowledge that the allegations are indeed founded, then I would further recommend that he be afforded an opportunity to resign and that should he resign, no further action be initiated by the Ministry. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Sirrs explained at the hearings why he thought the resignation of Mr. Barque was an appropriate response, and why he concluded that it was not necessary for the Ministry to take further action. The Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office argued that (1) termination or firing raises serious issues, both legal and under grievance with the employee association; (2) the process can be difficult and prolonged; (3) he believed that resignations had been the practice of the Ministry in similar situations; and (4) there was “concern for the prestige and the position of Probation in the community.” Mr. Sirrs thought that if the Barque matter became public it would tarnish the image of the Cornwall Probation Office. Mr. Sirrs testified:

I thought this was a very isolated incident and I didn't think that there was any underlying issues ... so that I felt this was a satisfactory way to deal with the matter. (Emphasis added)

Although Mr. Sirrs believed that a formal disciplinary process was more open and transparent, he took the position that resignation was “the most expeditious route to follow in everybody's interest.” His superiors at the Ministry agreed.

Upon receipt of Mr. Sirrs' report, Mr. Toffelmire wrote to Mr. Dickson Taylor, Director of Probation and Parole Services, to inform him of the completion of the preliminary investigation. Mr. Toffelmire stated that Mr. Sirrs had “reached a point beyond which he does not wish to continue the investigation,” and, “It has been most trying on him.” Mr. Toffelmire enclosed Mr. Sirrs' report, making it clear that he “concur[ed] entirely with his recommendations.” In other words, the Regional Administrator (Eastern Region) of Probation and Parole Services seemed to agree that the resignation of Mr. Barque was appropriate.

On May 3, 1982, the Director of Probation and Parole Services informed Mr. Barque by letter that he was suspended with pay from the employment of the Ministry of Correctional Services. Mr. Taylor explained that the suspension was pending the investigation into his “alleged unprofessional and improper supervision of clients.” Both Mr. Sirrs and Mr. Toffelmire were copied on this letter.

On May 5, 1982, Mr. Barque delivered his letter of resignation to Mr. Sirrs:

St-Andrews W., Ontario
May 5th, 1982

Mr. Peter Sirrs,
Ministry of Correctional Services,
502 Pitt Street,
Cornwall, Ontario

By this letter I would like to submit my resignation has [sic] an employee of the Ministry of Correctional Services. The resignation date would be as of May 4th, 1982.

Please forward all monetary dues to my account number 3277, Caisse Populaire de l'Est de Cornwall, and all other documents to Island Rd., St-Andrews, W., Ontario, K0C 2A0.

Thank you.

"Nelson Barque"

Copy: E. Tofflemire [sic]

Mr. Sirrs completed an employee separation and work performance record for Mr. Barque's employment at the Cornwall Probation Office for the period August 1974 to May 1982. The Area Manager rated Nelson Barque's attendance, punctuality, and working relationship with his co-workers and supervisors as "very good" and his quality of work as "good." Mr. Sirrs inscribed the word "resigned" as the reason for Mr. Barque's separation. He stated that he would not rehire this employee. In the space for citing specific reasons, Mr. Sirrs simply wrote, "Mr. Barque submitted his resignation as a consequence of enquiries into his professional conduct and over involvement with clients." No explanation or further details were provided.

When Mr. Sirrs completed this standard Ministry form on May 11, 1982, he was aware of Nelson Barque's sexual relationships with at least two probationers, he knew that Mr. Barque had provided and allowed probationers to use alcohol and/or drugs in breach of probation orders, and he was aware of Mr. Barque's interference with the police. But at the hearings, Mr. Sirrs could provide "no explanation" for the lack of these details on the Ministry form. The former Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office agreed that, in retrospect, someone reading this Ministry form would be unaware of the seriousness of the allegations against Mr. Barque.

It was extremely important for the Ministry records to contain the details under which Mr. Barque left his employment from the Cornwall Probation Office. The document completed by Mr. Sirrs clearly did not elaborate on the reasons for Mr. Barque's departure. Specifying sexual acts with probationers, the supply of illicit substances in breach of probation orders, and interference with police might have caused some Ministry officials to question whether the resignation of Mr. Barque was an appropriate response. The Ministry might have initiated contact with probationers who had been subjected to these inappropriate acts by Mr. Barque and offered these victims counselling and other services. And perhaps it would have prompted some Ministry officials to implement changes in the supervision of probation and parole officers in the Cornwall Probation Office after Mr. Barque's departure. This would have helped to ensure that more young men were not subjected to sexual and other inappropriate acts by their probation officers, who were in positions of trust and authority over these probationers.

The McMaster Report: Inspection and Investigation Branch Decides No Further Action Is Necessary After Barque Resignation

Mr. Teggart, Director of the Inspection and Investigation Branch of the Ministry of Correctional Services, asked Inspectors Clair McMaster and Robert Porter to investigate the alleged unprofessional conduct of Mr. Barque, probation and parole officer at the Cornwall Probation Office. The request for this investigation was initiated by Mr. Taylor, Director of Probation and Parole Services.

Inspectors McMaster and Porter were briefed in Cornwall by Mr. Sirrs on April 29, 1982. The two inspectors proceeded to the CPS and met with Staff Sergeant Allaire and Sergeants Laroche and Masson. The three police officers confirmed that they had heard rumours regarding Mr. Barque's relationship with probationers and, in particular, Robert Sheets. In addition, they discussed Mr. Barque's attempts to interfere with the police on behalf of Mr. Sheets. The Ministry inspectors also interviewed the janitorial staff from the former location of the probation office.

Inspectors McMaster and Porter returned to Cornwall on May 4, 1982, and interviewed C-44, C-44's father, and Robert Sheets. C-44's father stated that both he and his wife had been concerned for a long time about Mr. Barque's supervision of their son. C-44's father said that Mr. Barque had supplied his son with liquor and knew that his son often smoked "pot." Despite knowledge of this conduct, Mr. Barque did not breach C-44's probation. The Ministry inspectors also learned that C-44 had disclosed to his mother in approximately April 1982 that he was sexually involved with Mr. Barque.

On May 6, 1982, Inspector McMaster took a sworn statement from Mr. Barque in respect of the allegations of misconduct. Forty-two-year-old Nelson Barque admitted that he had engaged in sexual relations with two probationers for whom he was responsible: Robert Sheets and C-44. Mr. Barque acknowledged that he had instigated the sexual relationships with the two probationers, which had taken place over a one-year period. Mr. Barque also admitted that he gave C-44 and Robert Sheets alcohol in violation of their respective probation orders. When asked by Inspector McMaster why he had allowed them to consume liquor, Mr. Barque responded, "Because they asked me for it and I had to comply being involved with them in a homosexual relationship." As Inspector McMaster stated in his report, Mr. Barque was "intimating that it was a form of blackmail." Below is an excerpt of the interview with Inspector McMaster in which Mr. Barque admits he engaged in sexual relations and provided liquor to probationers under his supervision:

Q: You are aware that allegations have been made in that you have had homosexual relations with probationers, that you have provided them with alcoholic beverages and that at least on one occasion did interfere with police in an investigation. Do you wish to respond to these allegations?

A: Yes.

Q: Do you admit that you have had sexual relations with any person on probation on your case load?

A: Yes.

Q: Who?

A: [C-44] and Robert Sheets.

Q: How long has this been happening?

A: One year.

Q: Who instigated these relationships?

A: I did.

Q: Did you provide these probationers with alcoholic beverages?

A: Yes.

(Emphasis added)

Mr. Barque was also asked about his attempts to obstruct the police on behalf of his probationers. His response was that he “didn’t feel [he] was interfering” but rather “was trying to get the person—Robert Sheets—away from the situation before he got into trouble.”

Inspector McMaster interviewed C-44, who stated that Mr. Barque had been his probation officer since 1980. C-44 explained that Mr. Barque had supplied him with alcohol “quite often” and never took any steps to breach his probation because Mr. Barque was “afraid” of him. C-44 confirmed that he had been involved in a sexual relationship with Mr. Barque for about a year and that the last time they had been together was on March 31, 1982, at the probation office on 502 Pitt Street.

In his May 13, 1982, report to Mr. Teggart, Inspector McMaster concluded that Mr. Barque was “inappropriately involved with Robert Sheets and [C-44]” and that he had “effectively compromised his authority and position as a Probation Officer.” Despite these conclusions, Inspector McMaster recommended that no further action be taken by the Ministry of Correctional Services. The investigation report ends with the following statement: “Since Mr. Barque has submitted his resignation effective May 4th, 1982, no further action by this Ministry is deemed necessary.”

The same conclusion was reached by Mr. Teggart, Director of the Inspection and Investigation Branch. In his confidential report of May 31, 1982, to the Deputy Minister, Mr. A. Campbell, Mr. Teggart states that although the investigation established that Mr. Barque did “supply alcoholic beverages” and was “homosexually involved” with two probationers under his supervision, no further action was required because the probation officer had resigned:

Mr. Barque submitted his resignation prior to the conclusion of this investigation with an effective date of May 4th, 1982. This concludes our investigation and no further action is necessary by this branch.
(Emphasis added)

When Ministry Special Investigator Mr. Paul Downing conducted an internal review in 2000, he did not find evidence that a full and thorough investigation of Mr. Barque’s activities had been undertaken by the Ministry. In my view, the Ministry of Correctional Services should have conducted a comprehensive investigation to determine the full extent of Mr. Barque’s inappropriate behaviour and to identify other probationers, such as Albert Roy, who may also have been sexually abused by Mr. Barque.

As I discuss further in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General,” Inspector McMaster wrote a letter and spoke to Crown Attorney Don Johnson on June 14, 1982, concerning Nelson Barque. Inspector McMaster sent his report and asked the Crown attorney whether criminal charges would be laid against the Cornwall probation officer. In correspondence on June 22, 1982, Mr. Johnson replied that criminal charges were not warranted for the following reasons. First, he stated that Mr. Barque had resigned from the Ministry of Correctional Services when confronted with the allegations. Second, the Crown attorney noted that one of the “homosexual relationships” involved an individual who was twenty-one years old and that as a result, a criminal prosecution would not be successful. And third, although Mr. Barque had admitted to engaging with Mr. Sheets in a “homosexual relationship,” Mr. Sheets had denied it. It was Mr. Johnson’s view that criminal charges against Mr. Barque would not succeed in these circumstances.

Mr. Sirrs and the Ministry of Correctional Services did not adequately supervise probation officer Nelson Barque. Moreover, Mr. Sirrs and the Ministry failed to implement changes in the Cornwall office regarding the supervision of probation officers after Mr. Barque’s departure for sexual improprieties with Ministry clients under his supervision. It is my view that applying the standards of that time, the decision to allow Mr. Barque to tender his resignation and the failure to provide details on Ministry work performance and employee separation forms of Mr. Barque's inappropriate conduct with probationers demonstrated very poor judgment on the part of Ministry officials. Ms Newman stated that had she been confronted with the Barque situation, she would have terminated the probation officer's employment at the Ministry. As the Deputy Minister testified, "[I]n that particular situation ... if I was making the disciplinary decision, I would say I would terminate the individual." Mr. Sirrs confirmed at the hearings that no steps were taken to assist the victims of Mr. Barque after their probation officer resigned. The probationers were likely to have required and might have been receptive to counselling and other professional services as a result of Mr. Barque's sexual behaviour and other inappropriate conduct. Failure to pursue the more formal disciplinary process at the Ministry and to furnish details on Ministry forms of the reasons for Mr. Barque's departure clearly had the effect of suppressing information regarding Mr. Barque's egregious and inappropriate conduct.

It is my recommendation that the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services institute measures to ensure that detailed information on the reasons for an employee's departure from the Ministry, including details of inappropriate and sexual conduct, are provided on the employee separation and work performance records.

Failure to Assess Whether Other Probationers Were Subjected to Inappropriate Acts by the Cornwall Probation Officer

After Mr. Barque's resignation, no action was taken by the Ministry of Correctional Services to try to determine whether other probationers in Cornwall had been subjected to inappropriate conduct by their probation officers. Neither Mr. Sirrs, Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office, nor Inspectors McMaster and Porter or other Ministry officials took measures to ensure that this assessment was done.

After Mr. Barque resigned from the Cornwall office, Mr. Sirrs did not convene a meeting or discuss with his staff the reason for Mr. Barque's departure. Nor did he ask his staff whether they knew or had concerns about inappropriate behaviour by Mr. Barque with probationers.

Mr. Sirrs testified that he "didn't really tell" his staff "anything" about the reasons for Mr. Barque's departure from the probation office. At the hearings, he said: "I didn't feel that it was my position to lay out the circumstances of Mr. Barque's resignation ... I concluded they would probably find out through the grapevine."

Mr. van Diepen confirmed that no meeting was convened by Mr. Sirrs or other Ministry officials after Mr. Barque's resignation to inform probation officers and staff at the Cornwall Probation Office of the reason and circumstances surrounding his departure. Mr. van Diepen was not told that Mr. Barque had admitted to engaging in a sexual relationship with a probationer: “[T]he Ministry never told us what happened.”

Mr. Sirrs did not even discuss the reasons for Mr. Barque’s resignation with Carole Cardinal, the probation officer who assumed responsibility for Nelson Barque’s caseload. In early May 1982, after Mr. Barque had resigned, Ms Cardinal was offered a contract and then a permanent position at the Cornwall Probation Office. Mr. Sirrs simply advised Ms Cardinal to report to him anything out of the ordinary.

It was not until several months later that Ms Cardinal learned from her colleagues at the probation office the circumstances surrounding Nelson Barque’s resignation. Ms Cardinal found out that Mr. Barque had been asked to resign from the Cornwall Probation Office for having a sexual relationship with a client. This was approximately four or five months after she assumed responsibility for Mr. Barque’s probation cases.

Mr. van Diepen testified that neither he nor, to his knowledge, other staff at the Cornwall office were asked to examine Nelson Barque’s files after his resignation. In particular, neither Mr. van Diepen nor his colleagues were asked to conduct a review to determine whether other probationers had had a sexual relationship with Mr. Barque. Nor did Ministry officials such as the Regional Administrator visit the Cornwall office to conduct a case review of Mr. Barque’s or other probation files.

Carole Cardinal agreed that it would have been prudent to conduct an investigation of all Mr. Barque’s files to ensure that other probationers were not subject to inappropriate behaviour. As I discuss later in this chapter, beginning in the 1990s over thirty former Ministry clients made disclosures of sexual misconduct to the Cornwall Probation Office. Some of these allegations involved Nelson Barque, and a few of these disclosures were made to Ms Cardinal.

Mr. Sirrs was asked at the hearings to explain (1) his failure to advise his staff of circumstances surrounding Mr. Barque’s departure from the Cornwall Probation Office; and (2) his failure to seek additional information about Mr. Barque’s behaviour with his probationers. Mr. Sirrs replied that there was a Ministry policy that if staff “knew of something that was going on in the office that was inappropriate, they were required to advise their management, either directly to the manager or, if that wasn’t satisfactory, to a more senior manager.” Mr. Sirrs simply relied on this policy and did not take proactive measures to seek out this important information. This was in spite of the fact that the Area Manager thought that other staff in the Cornwall office might have knowledge of Mr. Barque’s inappropriate behaviour with his probationers.

Mr. Sirrs acknowledged that “in retrospect,” it “probably ... would have been a good idea” to issue a memo or meet with his staff to remind them that they should report concerns or inappropriate conduct to him. This might have revealed information of which he and other Ministry officials were not aware, namely that other probationers had been victims of sexual and other inappropriate acts. Moreover, discussing these issues and concerns with his staff could have served as a deterrent to other probation officers who were contemplating engaging in such behaviour with Ministry clients. It could also have halted the inappropriate conduct of staff in the Cornwall office. Mr. Sirrs failed to stress Ministry policies and the ethical conduct expected of probation officers and staff.

As I discuss in this chapter, some years later probationers disclosed that another probation officer in the Cornwall office, Ken Seguin, had engaged in sexual acts and other inappropriate conduct with them. And significantly, other probationers of Mr. Barque revealed that they, too, had participated in sexual acts with him and with Mr. Seguin.

Mr. Sirrs did not conduct a historical review of Mr. Barque’s files to determine whether probationers other than C-44 and Robert Sheets had been involved in sexual relations with him, had been supplied with alcohol and other illicit substances, or had been involved in other inappropriate behaviour with this probation officer. Nor did anyone from the Ministry, stated Mr. Sirrs, suggest to him that such follow-up be undertaken. Mr. Sirrs agreed that in hindsight, it “certainly wouldn’t have done any harm” to examine the files of Mr. Barque to assess whether other probationers in the past had been subjected to inappropriate conduct. If this had been done, perhaps names would have emerged such as Albert Roy, a probationer abused by Mr. Barque. Both former Deputy Minister Morris Zbar and Deputy Minister Newman agreed that examining the files was important. Mr. Roy Hawkins, the Regional Manager who replaced Mr. Toffelmire, also testified that it was “troubling” that Mr. Barque’s clients weren’t followed up by the Ministry. As I discuss later in this Report, Mr. Barque pleaded guilty to indecent assault of Albert Roy and was sentenced in 1995 to four months custody and eighteen months probation. And significantly, a few weeks after he was interviewed by the Ontario Provincial Police in June 1998 for the sexual assault of Robert Sheets and another probationer, C-45, Nelson Barque committed suicide.¹⁸

Mr. Sirrs was asked at the Inquiry why, in his preliminary investigation, he did not contact other probationers supervised by Mr. Barque. His response was that it did not occur to him at that time. And, he said, probationers tend to “generate unreliable information”:

18. Nelson Barque died on June 28, 1998.

... [G]enerally they can be less than factual about things, and so I would not have had a lot of regard for any complaint that they might have made, not having come forward themselves to initiate the complaint.

It is surprising and of serious concern to me that the Area Manager of a probation office decided not to contact possible victims of abuse by Mr. Barque because he believed probationers to be untrustworthy individuals. Mr. Hawkins, the Regional Manager, agreed that this was clearly not an appropriate management response.

It is my recommendation that the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services develop a protocol to ensure that file reviews are conducted in circumstances in which there are allegations of sexual improprieties by Ministry employees of clients under their supervision. The Area Manager should examine the case notes of other clients under the employee's supervision and conduct interviews with clients.

This was endorsed by Deputy Minister Newman when she gave her evidence at the Inquiry. Ms Newman testified that the protocol should also mandate an examination of case files when Ministry employees depart suddenly, or if there is a suspicious death. She also stated that a formal investigation should be conducted by the Ministry in circumstances in which suspicious patterns are discovered in the review of the case files. I agree.

Mr. Sirrs stated that after Mr. Barque resigned, he did not institute any changes in the office in terms of managerial oversight to eliminate the risk of something similar recurring. Mr. Sirrs considered whether perhaps other probation officers in the Cornwall office, such as Ken Seguin, could be involved in similar behaviour, but he dismissed this thought as without foundation.

Shortly after Mr. Sirrs completed his investigative report, there was a meeting of regional managers. Bill Groten from Kingston, Gerry Kiessling from Ottawa Centre, and Lorraine Braithwaite from Ottawa West were among those in attendance at the meeting. Mr. Toffelmire, Regional Administrator (Eastern Region), was also present. Mr. Sirrs stated that at the meeting he raised his concern about sexual contact between probation officers and probationers. But Mr. Sirrs had no recollection of either identifying probation officers about whom he was concerned or discussing preventive measures that could be implemented in the probation office to ensure that the behaviour engaged in by Mr. Barque with Ministry clients did not recur.

In my view, Area Manager Peter Sirrs and the Ministry of Correctional Services should have implemented changes in the supervision of probation and parole officers after Mr. Barque's departure from the Cornwall Probation Office for his inappropriate behaviour with probationers.

A short time later, in 1983, Mr. Roy Hawkins replaced Mr. Toffelmire as Regional Manager (Eastern Region). Mr. Hawkins met with Area Manager Peter Sirrs to obtain a briefing on the Cornwall Probation Office. But Mr. Sirrs did not convey any information to the new Regional Manager about the situation with Mr. Barque or his concern that other probation officers could be involved in similar inappropriate behaviour with Ministry clients. Mr. Sirrs testified that he could not recall whether he briefed Mr. Hawkins on this issue, but agreed that it was “probably” important to advise the new Regional Manager about these issues that had confronted the Cornwall Probation Office in the past year. Mr. Hawkins testified that even in 1993, when he left the Eastern Region for a position with the Ministry in London, Ontario, he was not aware of the Barque improprieties. Deputy Minister Newman agreed that this issue deserves serious attention by the Ministry:

[I] think you raise a very legitimate concern in relation to information management and so that is on my radar. That has come to my attention through looking at this and at the gaps that I think you've pointed out quite aptly, that we need to consider how better to capture institutional memory as people transition from positions and we have a long history that goes back a number of decades. I think that's very challenging.

We don't have a work environment where people spend their entire careers in a single position so we don't have that continuity. So I've certainly begun to think about how we can better ensure the transmission of information, and particularly at the area manager and regional manager level, who have direct responsibility for managing our operations; that they need some way of ensuring that that institutional memory of events is captured and that it can be easily retrieved and accessed. And I think that's very challenging but it's certainly something that I'm committed to undertaking to try to do better. (Emphasis added)

In my view, it is essential that such information be communicated to Ministry officials who are assuming new positions in the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services. It is my recommendation that the Ministry institute policies and procedures to ensure the transfer of such critical information to incoming area managers and to other officials assuming supervisory positions at the Ministry. A system should be implemented to ensure that information on incidents is collected systematically. This information should be easily retrievable by Ministry officials at all levels.

Nelson Barque's Application to Work With Children After His Resignation From Probation: Peter Sirrs Is Contacted for a Reference

Équipe Psycho-sociale is an organization in Cornwall that provides programs for children who live in the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. The team, composed of psychologists, social workers, and psychiatric consultants, offers specialized services for children from infancy to eighteen years old who have mental health issues. Some of the programs include day clinical services, intervention in school settings, and programs for abused children.

Pierre Landry, executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale in Cornwall, placed an advertisement in the local newspapers in 1982 to search for additional staff. In 1982, there was an expansion of services, and Mr. Landry required a social worker on his team at Équipe Psycho-sociale. Nelson Barque, who had left the Cornwall Probation Office a few months earlier, responded to the advertisement. The curriculum vitae sent by Mr. Barque to Mr. Landry in July 1982 stated that Mr. Barque had a Master of Social Work degree from Carleton University, that he was fluently bilingual in French and English, that he had worked as a social worker for the City of Cornwall, and that he was a substitute teacher at La Citadelle Secondary School. It also mentioned that Mr. Barque was involved in a number of community organizations and boards. The curriculum vitae stated that from August 1974 to May 4, 1982, he was employed by the Ministry of Correctional Services as a probation officer in Cornwall. Mr. Barque listed the reason for leaving this position as conflict with Ministry rules: “[J]’ai quitté dû à un conflit face aux règlements du Ministère.” Mr. Peter Sirrs, 502 Pitt Street, Cornwall, was listed as his reference.

Mr. Landry received ten to fifteen applications for the position. About three or four candidates were selected for interviews, one of whom was Mr. Barque. Because of his professional background, his experience, and his involvement in community activities, Mr. Barque was an attractive candidate. At that time, it was difficult to find individuals with professional backgrounds in the Cornwall area. Mr. Landry said:

... [C]hose certaine, c’est son expérience qu’il avait, ses qualifications, d’autre chose aussi, c’est y semblait être impliqué au niveau communautaire, y semblait connaître, définitivement, la communauté de Cornwall et les environs.

C’est peut-être, disons, ce qu’y a joué le plus dans la sélection de Monsieur Barque. Parce que, à ce moment-là, c’était très difficile aussi de trouver les gens de Cornwall avec un background professionnel. Les gens venaient de l'extérieur la plupart. Alors, si je regarde ses activités, il était très impliqué au niveau de la communauté de Cornwall.

Mr. Landry interviewed Mr. Barque. The executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale described the work expected and the functioning of the team, as well as salary and vacation. He also discussed a possible start date in the event that Mr. Barque was selected for the position.

At the interview, Mr. Landry asked Mr. Barque why he had left his employment at the Cornwall Probation Office. Mr. Barque responded that there was a political conflict, a new administration, a new direction with his supervisor. Mr. Landry did not ask Mr. Barque to elaborate on this conflict at the probation office or the reason for his departure. Rather, the executive director decided to contact Mr. Barque's references and to acquire more information about the reasons the probation officer had resigned from his position at the Ministry.

At the interview, Mr. Barque offered a second reference, Father Dubé, a priest at Christ-Roi Church. Mr. Barque was a member of the parish committee at this church. After the interview, Mr. Landry contacted Father Dubé, who highly recommended Mr. Barque for the position.

Mr. Landry also called the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office, Peter Sirrs. Mr. Landry explained that he was the executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale, which provided mental health services, and that Mr. Barque had submitted an application for the position of social worker. Mr. Landry could not recall whether he explicitly told Mr. Sirrs in the August 1982 call that the Psycho-sociale team worked with children or that Mr. Barque would be providing services directly to children. But Mr. Landry stressed in his evidence that the Psycho-sociale team was well known in Cornwall in 1982. The local newspapers as well as the Ottawa press reported on the work of this mental health agency. Government ministers had visited Cornwall in 1980 and 1982 in connection with the work and new premises of Équipe Psycho-sociale.

Mr. Sirrs testified that from this conversation with Mr. Landry, he was aware that Mr. Barque would be working with clients but construed this as "working directly with the school board." Mr. Sirrs claimed he could not recall whether Mr. Landry had explained that the advertisement was for a social worker position. Nor could Mr. Sirrs remember whether the executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale mentioned that the agency provided services to children with mental health issues.

In this telephone call with Mr. Sirrs, Mr. Landry asked the Area Manager of the probation office for a reference for Mr. Barque. Peter Sirrs responded by asking Mr. Landry to send him a letter specifically requesting a reference for his former employee. Mr. Landry testified that at no time during this telephone conversation did Mr. Sirrs offer any details about Mr. Barque. Nor did he suggest or caution Mr. Landry that he should not hire his former employee.

Mr. Sirrs did not ask Mr. Landry any questions in this telephone call about the work of the agency. But Mr. Sirrs claimed that he “advised” Pierre Landry that he “would not employ Mr. Barque.” Mr. Sirrs stated: “I will say one more thing with regard to the phone call. I told him very clearly at the end of our phone conversation, I said, ‘I would not hire Mr. Barque.’”

Not only was this disputed by Mr. Landry, but when Ministry Special Investigator Paul Downing conducted his investigation and spoke to Mr. Sirrs about the telephone call, Mr. Sirrs failed to inform him that he had cautioned the executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale not to hire Mr. Barque. When Mr. Downing interviewed Mr. Sirrs in 2000, Mr. Sirrs initially said he could not recall a telephone call with Pierre Landry regarding a job reference for Nelson Barque. Mr. Downing testified that it was only “later during the conversation” that Mr. Sirrs “acknowledged that there had been a telephone contact” but claimed “he had not released any information and had told Pierre that he needed the release form prior to providing any information regarding Nelson’s employment.”

It was evident to Mr. Downing that a difference of opinion existed between Mr. Landry and Mr. Sirrs regarding (1) the existence of the telephone call initially; and (2) the contents of the call. Paul Downing considered Mr. Landry’s version of events to be credible:

... [T]here appeared to be certainly a difference of opinion based on my conversation with Pierre [Landry] and Peter [Sirrs]. Pierre was very clear to me during my telephone conversation that he had in fact had some discussion with regards to the employment that Nelson [Barque] would become involved in and that that was the purpose of his telephone call, was to assure that Nelson would be appropriate for that nature of work. Obviously, from my discussion with Peter, he’s taking the position that that did not take place.

...

... I recall the conversations very clearly because it was ... for me as an investigator, it was a significant issue with a reference letter on file, the investigation report that caused Nelson to resign and the potential future employment that this former employee was to become involved in, I had no reason, based on my conversation with Pierre—it was quick, it was spontaneous ...

he seemed to be credible—the reluctance of Peter caused me concern.
(Emphasis added)

After carefully assessing the documents and testimony of the witnesses, I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Sirrs, Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office, did not advise Mr. Landry, executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale, that he should not hire Nelson Barque in the telephone call.

On August 12, 1982, Mr. Landry wrote the requested letter to Mr. Sirrs asking the Area Manager for a reference for Nelson Barque. The letter reads:

Dear Mr. Sirrs:

Following our telephone conversation of this date, I would appreciate receiving any recommendations that you can give me concerning Mr. Nelson A. Barque, who has applied for the position of Social Work with our organization.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank you for your cooperation in this matter.

Yours sincerely,

Pierre Landry
Executive Director

The letter specifically states that the position is for a social worker. Of significance is that it is clearly inscribed on the letterhead that the agency provides services to children and adolescents:

ÉQUIPE PSYCHO-SOCIALE POUR ENFANTS ET ADOLESCENTS
FRANCOPHONES DE STORMONT, DUNDAS & GLENGARRY

Mr. Sirrs took the position that he did not receive the August 12, 1982, letter from Mr. Landry. As he said at the hearings, “I am quite clear that I didn’t receive the letter.”

Despite Mr. Sirrs’ contention that he did not receive Mr. Landry’s letter of August 12, Mr. Sirrs wrote to the executive director on August 23, 1982, providing an “employment reference” for Nelson Barque. The Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office wrote:

Dear Mr. Landry:

Re: Employment Reference—Nelson A. Barque

Mr. Barque commenced his employment with the Ministry of Correctional Services in Cornwall as a Probation and Parole Officer I on August 19, 1974. He completed the probationary period satisfactorily and was confirmed to the classified staff (permanent) one year later.

On June 1, 1978 Mr. Barque was reclassified to Probation and Parole Officer II, following his successful completion of the in-service Professional Development Program, and remained with the Ministry in this capacity until his resignation effective May 4, 1982.

Yours truly,

Peter H. Sirrs,
Area Manager

Mr. Sirrs simply provided information about the dates of Mr. Barque's employment in Cornwall with the Ministry of Correctional Services, and his position as a probation and parole officer. Mr. Sirrs does not mention the reason for Mr. Barque's resignation nor suggest any inappropriate behaviour on the part of the probation officer. Peter Sirrs acknowledged that "it's just tombstone data." When Mr. Sirrs was asked by counsel whether he thought it was important to inform a prospective employer about the circumstances surrounding Mr. Barque's departure from the Cornwall Probation Office, his response was: "I'm bound by privacy regulations and I'm responsible not to release information without the individual's consent." But Mr. Sirrs did not ask Mr. Barque whether he could release this information. Mr. Sirrs maintained, "[T]hat wasn't my responsibility."

Mr. Downing decided to contact Pierre Landry in October 2000 in his investigation of Mr. Barque's departure from the Ministry in 1982 and his subsequent employment with Équipe Psycho-sociale. It was Mr. Downing's understanding that "Mr. Barque left the employment, resigned but there was cause to dismiss him." The Ministry Special Investigator was "curious as to the reference that had been provided to Pierre by Mr. Sirrs surrounding Nelson Barque's employment with the Ministry."

It is significant that when Mr. Downing contacted Peter Sirrs in 2000, Mr. Sirrs initially claimed that he did not provide an employment reference for Nelson

Barque. When Mr. Downing told Mr. Sirrs that he in fact had a reference letter in his possession, Mr. Sirrs' response was that someone "must have forged" his signature. Mr. Downing testified:

I then talked to him about a letter I had—a letter of reference, and he stated that he had not prepared any such letter of any nature and I said to him I had one in my hands and it appeared to be his signature. He initially responded that, "Then somebody must have forged it because I didn't do it."

Mr. Sirrs was "reluctant to talk" to Mr. Downing and "asked for reassurance that a lawyer would be provided and any expenses if he talked to me any further."

It is clear from the evidence that Peter Sirrs, Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office, provided a reference for Nelson Barque to Pierre Landry of Équipe Psycho-sociale. Mr. Sirrs knew that Mr. Barque had applied for the position of social worker and would be working with schools in the Cornwall area. Mr. Sirrs was also aware that Mr. Barque would be interacting with special needs children. This was confirmed in the August 12, 1982, letter from Mr. Landry, which I find Mr. Sirrs received. The letterhead explicitly states that the agency provides services to children and adolescents with mental health issues. But Mr. Sirrs did not, either in his telephone conversation or in his written correspondence with Mr. Landry, disclose that Mr. Barque had left the probation office because of allegations of sexual improprieties with probation clients under his care and supervision at the Ministry of Correctional Services. The executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale did not become aware of this information for four years, during which time Mr. Barque worked directly with children at this agency.

Mr. Sirrs should have told Mr. Landry that he had concerns regarding Mr. Barque for the position at Équipe Psycho-sociale. He should have conveyed to the executive director of the agency that Mr. Barque, while in a position of trust, had had sexual relationships with probationers under his charge. Moreover, the Ministry of Correctional Services should have had policies in place that would have precluded Area Manager Peter Sirrs from providing a reference of this kind for an employee such as Mr. Barque after his resignation from the Ministry for sexual improprieties with probationers under his supervision.

Nelson Barque's Employment at and Resignation From Équipe Psycho-sociale

Mr. Barque worked for Équipe Psycho-sociale as a social worker from 1982 to 1986. He interacted with children at two elementary schools in Cornwall: École

Nativité and École St. Francis de Sales. Mr. Barque met privately with children at these two schools. As explained by Mr. Landry, École Nativité was located in a disadvantaged area with an at-risk population and Mr. Barque met with boys and girls who had behavioural problems. He often met with these children alone.

In May–June 1986, Mr. Landry received two or three anonymous telephone calls asking him to seek information about the reason for Mr. Barque's resignation from the Cornwall Probation Office. In one of the contacts, the anonymous caller stated that Mr. Barque had ended his career as a probation officer because he had sexually abused clients. As the executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale said at the hearings:

... [J]'ai eu un autre appel me disant à ce moment-là que Nelson, la raison qu'y avait été parti de l'officier de probation, c'est que apparemment il y aurait eu des abus sexuels et que c'était très sérieux ... Sur des clients qu'il voyait comme officier de probation.

Mr. Landry was also told in these calls that Mr. Barque socialized with adolescents at Cornwall Square, a shopping mall on Water Street.

Mr. Landry decided to go to Cornwall Square one evening. On this visit, he saw Mr. Barque on two or three occasions socializing with boys who ranged in age from sixteen to eighteen. Mr. Landry and Mr. Barque saw each other but did not exchange words.

Within the next day or so, Mr. Landry confronted Mr. Barque. The executive director told the former probation officer that he had received anonymous calls in which serious allegations had been made against Mr. Barque, namely that he had made sexual advances or had engaged in inappropriate touching. Mr. Landry told Mr. Barque that he must leave his employment at the agency if this information was accurate. Later that day, Mr. Barque tendered his resignation. The July 11, 1986, letter states in part:

Cher monsieur Landry,

Par la présente, veuillez [sic] accepter ma demission comme travailleur social à l'Équipe Psycho-sociale pour enfants et adolescents franco-phone de S.D. & G.

Je quitterais mon poste, effectif le 18 août 1986. Je prendrais mes vacances pour l'année 1986 à partir du 21 juillet 1986 au 15 août 1986 inclusivement.

Mr. Barque asked Mr. Landry for time to inform his wife that he was no longer employed at Équipe Psycho-sociale.

In the four years in which Mr. Barque was employed at Équipe Psycho-sociale, 1982 to 1986, no information had been conveyed to Mr. Landry that Mr. Barque had engaged in sexual conduct with young people. It was only in 1986, when Mr. Landry received the anonymous calls, that the executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale learned about these allegations. As Mr. Landry said, it was a well-guarded secret:

... [C]hose certaine, c'est que de '82 à '86, j'ai jamais entendu parler de rien. Et croyez-moi j'étais impliqué moi aussi dans la communauté et jamais personne m'a parlé de rien. Alors, ça me semblait être un secret bien gardé. Je sais pas, mais chose certaine, personne m'a parlé de rien. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Landry subsequently met with his staff at Équipe Psycho-sociale to inform them that Mr. Barque had resigned. He told his team that there were allegations from anonymous sources regarding acts of misconduct committed by Mr. Barque while he was a probation officer. The executive director did not provide details.

Mr. Landry did not discuss this issue with school officials or family members at the two elementary schools at which Mr. Barque had interacted with young children as a social worker.

Some time later, Mr. Landry received a call from an individual who asked for an employment reference for Mr. Barque. Mr. Landry made it clear to that person that he would not re-hire Nelson Barque. He did not provide any further details.

Mr. Landry did not know that after he had resigned from Équipe Psycho-sociale, Mr. Barque taught as a supply teacher in a local high school. Nelson Barque again had contact with youths.

It was several years after Mr. Barque's resignation from Équipe Psycho-sociale that Pierre Landry learned through the media that Mr. Barque had been found guilty of sexual acts committed at the time he was a probation officer. As mentioned, Mr. Barque was sentenced in Cornwall on August 18, 1995, to four months incarceration and eighteen months probation for indecently assaulting Albert Roy, a former probationer, contrary to the Criminal Code. This is discussed in fuller detail in this chapter.

Carole Cardinal's Contact With Nelson Barque on the Child Abuse Prevention Council

Carole Cardinal was a member of the Child Abuse Prevention Council in Cornwall on behalf of the Probation Office. The Child Abuse Prevention Council was established in 1984–1985 to bring together agencies to develop a protocol on child abuse issues in the community. Ms Cardinal stated that the Child Abuse Prevention Council had a “high profile” in the local media.

Mr. Barque attended a meeting of the Child Abuse Prevention Council and identified himself as a representative of Équipe Psycho-sociale. Ms Cardinal testified that until that time, she had not been aware that Mr. Barque was employed at Équipe Psycho-sociale and was “surprised” the former probation officer attended the meeting. She was familiar with this agency and knew that Équipe Psycho-sociale provided services to francophone children with behavioural problems.

At the meeting, Mr. Barque volunteered to distribute pamphlets about child abuse to the public at shopping malls. Ms Cardinal took “quite an exception to that” and “really didn’t want him to be a representative of our council.” After the meeting, she decided to express her concerns to a member of the Child Abuse Prevention Council, Crown Attorney Don Johnson, who was also familiar with the circumstances under which Mr. Barque had resigned from the Cornwall Probation Office. Ms Cardinal told the Crown attorney that Mr. Barque should not participate at these meetings. She also raised her apprehensions with Bruce McPhee, a defence lawyer in the Alexandria area who was a school trustee at the time. According to Ms Cardinal, he agreed with her concern regarding Mr. Barque’s participation at the Child Abuse Prevention Council.

Mr. Barque did not appear at subsequent meetings of the Child Abuse Prevention Council. Ms Cardinal concluded that “somebody must have spoken to him and asked him not to return.”

After this encounter with Mr. Barque, and despite the knowledge she had acquired regarding his current employment, Ms Cardinal did not contact the executive director or other staff at Équipe Psycho-sociale. When asked by Commission Counsel whether other people contacted Équipe Psycho-sociale to discuss Mr. Barque, Ms Cardinal’s response was “not that I’m aware of.” As mentioned, Mr. Barque remained a social worker at Équipe Psycho-sociale until 1986, at which time the executive director received anonymous calls that suggested that Mr. Barque’s career at the probation office in Cornwall had ended because he had sexually abused clients.

Probation Staff Aware of Nelson Barque’s Interaction With Children at Subsequent Places of Employment

Jos van Diepen, a probation officer at the Cornwall office, knew that Nelson Barque had been hired at Équipe Psycho-sociale. He was also aware that Équipe Psycho-sociale was a francophone agency that provided services to children with behavioural and psychological problems.

Mr. van Diepen testified that other staff at the Cornwall Probation Office also knew that Mr. Barque was working at Équipe Psycho-sociale after his employment as a probation officer. In the words of Mr. van Diepen, “[W]e were rather shocked” and “thought it was inappropriate.” This was because Mr. Barque was in a position of trust with these children. Mr. van Diepen claimed that he spoke to Carole Cardinal, who undertook to speak to the Board of Équipe Psycho-sociale. Mr. van Diepen claims that he also spoke to Area Manager Peter Sirrs, about this issue.

Mr. van Diepen stated that he and others at the Cornwall Probation Office also had concerns when Mr. Barque worked as a supply teacher at the same French school board after he left his job at Équipe Psycho-sociale.

Nelson Barque secured a supply teaching contract with Conseil des Ecoles Séparées de Stormont, Dundas et Glengarry in 1992. He left one year later. From 1993 to 1994, he had part-time employment as an assistant administrator with L’Arche la Caravane, a residential facility for disabled adults. When Mr. van Diepen was asked at the hearings how he became aware of Mr. Barque’s different jobs, his response was, “It’s Cornwall. It’s a very small community.”

Mr. van Diepen told Mr. Downing in his interview on September 28, 2000, that after Mr. Barque’s resignation from the Ministry of Correctional Services, he heard that Nelson Barque was “involved in a ‘lovers triangle’ with one and possibly two clients.” Mr. van Diepen was also aware in the 1980s and 1990s that men were reputed to be engaging in sexual acts with young persons at the Cornwall Square mall. He also knew that “Nelson would hang out there” after his employment as a probation officer at the Ministry. Knowledge by staff of inappropriate conduct of probation officers at the Cornwall Probation Office is further discussed in the following sections of this chapter.

Tension Between the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office and His Staff

Emile Robert became the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office in 1985. His predecessors were Leo White, who was the Area Manager for a short period, and Peter Sirrs, who was in that position from 1981 to 1984. Mr. Robert became a probation officer at the Ministry of Correctional Services in 1978. He worked in Kapuskasing, in northern Ontario, and then L’Orignal.

There was a competition for the position of Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office in 1985, and Ken Seguin, Jos van Diepen, and Emile Robert were applicants. Mr. Seguin decided to withdraw his name from the competition. At the hearings, his colleagues were unable to give a definitive reason for Mr. Seguin’s decision not to pursue the Area Manager position.

Mr. van Diepen had previously submitted his name in a number of competitions for Area Manager in different locations in Ontario. This was Mr. van Diepen’s second application for the Cornwall position; in 1981, Peter Sirrs was the successful candidate, and in 1985, Emile Robert won the competition.

Mr. van Diepen was asked a number of questions in French at the interview. He did not have high proficiency in French. On March 14, 1985, Roy Hawkins, Regional Manager (Eastern Region), met with Mr. van Diepen to inform him that he was not the successful candidate. In a note to file, Mr. Hawkins wrote:

I advised him that he was not the successful candidate and that I was somewhat surprised at the lack of content in the responses to his questions. He indicated that he had an “off day” and was disappointed with his own performance.

Mr. van Diepen told Mr. Robert that, but for the fact that he was not bilingual, Mr. van Diepen would have been selected as Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office. He was clearly disappointed that he did not win the competition.

The relationship between Mr. van Diepen and the new Area Manager was tense from its inception. And in the approximately thirteen years in which Mr. Robert supervised Mr. van Diepen, their already tenuous relationship further deteriorated.

Other members of the Cornwall probation staff also had a poor relationship with Mr. Robert and considered his managerial style alienating, inconsistent, and adversarial. The friction existed with probation officers as well as administrative personnel.

Ron Gendron, another probation officer, considered Mr. Robert a poor manager. He contrasted Peter Sirrs to Emile Robert and described their management styles as “day and night.” In his view, Mr. Robert did not have the competence or requisite skills for the position. Mr. Robert, he said, tended to micro-manage the office, “he was very self-centred,” and “some of his decision-making was quite questionable.” Mr. Gendron thought that there must have been “a small talent pool for the position” of Cornwall Area Manager in the 1985 competition.

Mr. Robert had an unsettling welcome at the Cornwall Probation Office when he arrived in 1985. In the first week, when he was on a telephone call with his superior, Roy Hawkins, Jos van Diepen flung an elastic band at Mr. Robert’s forehead. Moreover, soon after his arrival in Cornwall, Mr. van Diepen asked Mr. Robert if he could borrow the VHS recorder from the office for the weekend for his personal use. Mr. Robert testified that despite his refusal, Mr. van Diepen removed the video recorder from the probation office and left a note with the inscription “taken by Jos van Diepen.” There were other arguments regarding office rental cars and expense accounts. Mr. Robert testified that Mr. van Diepen often called him names and swore at him. It was clear to Mr. Robert from his first few days at his new position that the probation staff did not respect him.

Mr. Robert believed that Mr. van Diepen’s behaviour had an impact on other employees such as Carole Cardinal, Ron Gendron, and Louise Quinn, who were all members of the same union. Mr. Robert thought that Mr. van Diepen's conduct was a significant cause of the tense work environment. The Area Manager denied that he treated employees inconsistently or that during audits he scrutinized Mr. van Diepen's files more harshly than those of other probation officers.

Ms Cardinal maintained that Mr. Robert's "management style was certainly not conducive to promote a healthy work environment." As she said at the hearings, the relationships between Mr. Robert and his staff "were not positive ... [T]here was a certain lack of respect with Mr. Robert." He was "difficult to communicate with" and he did not treat the probation staff in an equal manner. The Area Manager was arbitrary; this extended to, for example, scheduling vacations, conducting case audits, and signing time sheets at the office. Ms Cardinal testified that Mr. Robert showed a preference for certain probation officers and that he had a "closed eye to some events," particularly those involving Ken Seguin.

Probation staff described tension in the relationship between Mr. Robert and Mr. van Diepen. As Mr. Gendron said, "Mr. van Diepen would have had more conflict with Mr. Robert than anybody else." In Mr. Gendron's view, the only good working relationship in the office was between Mr. Robert and Ken Seguin.

Mr. van Diepen testified that he was ostracized and singled out: he was subject to discipline and criticism by Mr. Robert when others in the office who engaged in the same conduct were not:

... [T]he discipline dealt with a number of activities that officers did from time to time, and the result was that there was no action taken against them and yet there was disciplinary action taken against me ... or there would be some kind of a reaction to what I did where it didn't happen in other cases.

Mr. van Diepen stated in his evidence that he had initiated a number of grievances against Mr. Robert and that the outcome was an apology to him from the Area Manager.

Roy Hawkins was the Regional Manager of the Cornwall office when Mr. Robert became the Area Manager in 1985. He noticed the tension between Mr. Robert and probation officer Jos van Diepen. He attributed it to Mr. van Diepen's disappointment that he had not been selected as Area Manager of the probation office. This tension did not dissipate throughout Mr. Robert's tenure as Area Manager, testified Mr. Hawkins. The Regional Manager made the following observation about the relationship between staff and the Cornwall Area Manager:

When I moved to Eastern Ontario from Toronto, one of the things that I had observed was that there's quite a cultural difference between a large metropolitan city such as Toronto where there are literally hundreds of probation officers interacting with each other on an ongoing basis and an office like Cornwall where you might have eight or ten or twelve probation officers and in a sense it's a—it's a remote, removed location from—relative to a place like Toronto. The probation officers, in terms of their responsivity to supervision from an area manager and from contact from regional office was certainly much more distant, and I don't know if the word less trustful would be the correct word to use but—but they seemed to—seemed to operate much more autonomously than would have been my observation in other locations.

...

[I]t's an observation that I make but I think it's also a very limiting type of culture to develop. I think that most of us benefit from interaction with other professionals in the field and in other locations. To some extent geography limits what can happen in a place like Cornwall but by the same token when persons come in—whether it's from the regional office or from other locations, I think that there is an opportunity to benefit from whatever strengths or gifts they might have to enrich the experience of probation and parole officers here.

Mr. Robert's management style clearly had an impact on the morale of the office. And importantly, it had an effect on the willingness of probation staff to communicate with him and to discuss problems at the Cornwall office. Ms Cardinal limited "contact to only when necessary." Similarly, Mr. Gendron was reluctant to share any concerns he had with his Area Manager, Mr. Robert:

... [W]e all had trust issues with Mr. Robert, including me. I did not trust Mr. Robert on many levels.

He wasn't one to be trusted ... he would mismanage things.

...

... Mr. Robert ... he wasn't a competent manager. It's that simple. You didn't have faith in him. You didn't have confidence in him.

Mr. Gendron "tended to avoid Mr. Robert as much as possible." Mr. van Diepen also described the effect of low morale and poor communication between the Area Manager and the Cornwall staff. Mr. van Diepen's relationship with Mr. Robert progressively "deteriorated." As he said in his evidence, "I can certainly tell you that he affected the morale for me and I certainly did not like his management style.” Mr. van Diepen stated that it had an impact on the ability of probation staff to do their work and, at times, the office was dysfunctional. But a serious effect of this poor communication, Mr. van Diepen said, was that it inhibited probation staff from speaking freely to Mr. Robert about concerns that arose in the workplace. He described the work environment as “poisoned.”

As I discuss in this chapter, the serious problem that emanated from the poor communication was that probation staff did not discuss with Mr. Robert the questionable and inappropriate conduct that they observed between probation officer Ken Seguin and probationers. Staff at the Cornwall Probation Office were worried that if they disclosed some of their observations and concerns, the Area Manager could react negatively and impose adverse consequences on them.

Relationship Between Area Manager Emile Robert and the Cornwall Probation Staff: Double Standards and Preferential Treatment of Ken Seguin

As mentioned, probation officers in the Cornwall office testified that Emile Robert’s management style was responsible for a poisoned work environment and a dysfunctional office. Mr. Robert was described by his staff as arrogant, demeaning at times, lacking in social skills, and arbitrary. Mr. Robert, they said, did not treat the probation officers equally and, in particular, favoured Ken Seguin. Problems between Mr. Robert and his staff were evident in the early 1990s and the situation deteriorated. As will be discussed, a mediator was ultimately sent to the Cornwall Probation Office to try to defuse the tensions and improve the relationship between the Area Manager and his staff. In 1998, Mr. Robert was transferred from the Cornwall Probation Office by Ms Deborah Newman, the District Administrator at the Ministry of Correctional Services.¹⁹

Probation officers gave examples of the unequal treatment by Mr. Robert in such matters as vacation scheduling, case audits, sign-out sheets, and other office practices. Probation staff explained that the general procedure for case audits was for the Area Manager to select seven to ten cases to review. But as Ms Cardinal explained, some probation officers, such as Jos van Diepen, were subjected to a much more onerous process: many more of his files were scrutinized. As Ms Cardinal testified, Mr. Robert imposed different practices for different probation officers. Carole Cardinal gave another example of Mr. Robert's unreasonable behaviour; she entered the office one morning at 8:33 a.m. and saw him staring at his watch, visibly upset that she was three minutes late. Mr. Gendron confirmed that Mr. Robert micromanaged the office and that "some of his decision-making" was questionable.

19. In 1996, Ms Newman became District Administrator. In late 1998–99, she was seconded to the federal government to act as a director at Human Resource Development Canada. She was asked to return to the Ministry of Correctional Services by Morris Zbar to be Regional Director of the Eastern Region. In September 2000, she became Assistant Deputy Minister and in September 2005, Deputy Minister, her position at the time of her testimony at this Inquiry.

It was apparent to staff within a few years after Mr. Robert became the Area Manager of the Cornwall office that he gave preferential treatment to Ken Seguin. This favouritism, as mentioned, was exhibited in the scheduling of vacations, in failing to enforce office practices such as the sign-out sheets, and in having a "closed eye to some events" in which Mr. Seguin was involved. As Carole Cardinal said, Mr. Robert allowed Mr. Seguin "certain leverage that maybe others would not be granted." Mr. Robert's favouritism to Ken Seguin was also described by probation officers Ron Gendron and Jos van Diepen. The Area Manager's failure to discipline Mr. Seguin for improper behaviour with probationers, in particular his poor judgment in the Gerald Renshaw living arrangement as well as in the Varley incident, further consolidated their view that Mr. Robert gave special treatment to Mr. Seguin.

Mr. van Diepen, who had a very turbulent relationship with Mr. Robert, testified that problems in the office were exacerbated by the fact that Ken Seguin was the "office snitch." Mr. Seguin "tattled on his fellow employees" and in Mr. van Diepen's view, "compromised himself as a fellow staff employee and a colleague."

The favouritism displayed to Ken Seguin by Mr. Robert and the poor communication and conflict between Mr. Robert and the rest of the staff resulted in an unhealthy work environment. Ms Cardinal and other probation officers minimized their contact with the Area Manager as much as possible, and staff did not feel they could approach Mr. Robert with their concerns. As Ron Gendron said, "I did not trust Mr. Robert on many levels ... He wasn't one to be trusted," and "we all had trust issues with Mr. Robert." Mr. van Diepen also maintained that Mr. Robert's management style had an adverse impact on how he and other staff discussed problems and areas of concern in the workplace. As Mr. Gendron said:

With Mr. Robert ... he wasn't a competent manager. It's that simple.
You didn't have faith in him. You didn't have confidence in him ...
[Y]ou knew that he wasn't going to deal with this appropriately.

Staff at the Cornwall Probation Office were of the view that the Area Manager lacked judgment and social skills and acted arbitrarily. The lack of trust in the Area Manager, the preferential treatment by Mr. Robert of Mr. Seguin, and the conflict in the office between Mr. Robert and his staff created a situation in which probation officers were reluctant to discuss with the Area Manager concerns they had about Mr. Seguin's inappropriate behaviour with probationers and other young people. This was a significant problem.

Had Mr. Robert's managerial skills been better, had staff had a healthier and more trustful relationship with their Area Manager, and had Mr. Robert not given Mr. Seguin preferential treatment, it is possible that some of the inappropriate conduct between Mr. Seguin and probationers would have been disclosed and dealt with by Ministry officials at an earlier time. This may also have prevented other young men from being subjected to sexual and other inappropriate acts by Mr. Seguin.

Relationship Between Ken Seguin and His Clients

Probation officers and administrative staff at the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office thought Mr. Seguin had a particularly close relationship with probationers. They described his relationship with Ministry clients and former clients as "unusual," "very friendly," "too close," and crossing a boundary. Many of the Cornwall probation staff assumed or knew that this probation officer was gay but maintained that they either did not suspect or did not believe Mr. Seguin was engaging in sexual relationships with probationers or former probationers.

Mr. Seguin was the most senior probation officer at the Cornwall Office. He was known as "Mr. Probation." As his co-worker Sue Lariviere said, "I always saw him as going beyond the call of duty" and "he always looked to do whatever it was that they [probationers] needed in terms of getting a job or those kinds of things." She further commented:

... [H]is work was immaculate. There was nothing that you could say about his work. He did everything he could possibly do to help people and he—his case notes were perfect, his desk was perfect, he was perfect; he came in in a suit and tie every day.

It was just somebody that you admired and felt that he was very professional in what he did.

Ron Gendron, another probation officer in Cornwall, used similar language to describe Mr. Seguin:

Ken would really go beyond the call of duty with his clients ... Ken would just do things with his clients that no other probation officer really did. He was admired and respected for it because he went the extra mile for clients and other probation officers didn't.

...

Ken was very helpful. He was always trying to assist them with their life.

Mr. Gendron further described Mr. Seguin's relationship with Ministry clients. It was not unusual for Mr. Seguin to drive probationers to their place of employment. Moreover, if Ministry clients needed workboots for a job, Mr. Seguin would, without hesitation, access the probation office's special needs assistance fund to buy the boots or other supplies or equipment required by the probationers. Some of the Ministry clients had substance abuse problems and did not have transportation to treatment centres such as St. Raphael's, located about twenty miles outside the City of Cornwall. Mr. Seguin willingly drove probationers to the treatment centre. Mr. Seguin was very attentive to the needs of Ministry clients, said Mr. Gendron:

Other probation officers wouldn't do that. They just—they'd say, you know, "You're required to be there; be there. That's your problem getting there." And they were—they would have to find their own transportation there or—

Ken wouldn't take that approach. He'd make sure they'd get there because it's important to him ... [that] they get substance abuse treatment.

...

Ken was very friendly with clients.

Mr. Gendron testified that Mr. Seguin had a philosophical approach different from that of other probation officers in the Cornwall office; he subscribed to a "social work" rather than a "law enforcement" approach. Mr. Seguin was considered by his peers to be lenient in terms of enforcing probation orders such as community service, restitution, and reporting requirements. In Mr. Gendron's view, Mr. Seguin "had a wider definition of 'wilful failure' than most probation officers."

Jos van Diepen agreed. One of his clients complained to Mr. van Diepen for requiring him to complete his community service and argued that Mr. Seguin did not enforce the prescribed hours of community service. Mr. van Diepen testified that there was clearly a difference between him and Mr. Seguin in terms of enforcement of conditions of probation of Ministry clients:

... [W]hen we're getting to a situation where there is a wilfulness, a knowing wilfulness and a failure to comply, then we're talking about the potential for a breach. And in those situations, I would be forced to file a breach ...

But Mr. Seguin, on the other hand, this stuff would be swept under the rug.

Probationers would often request Mr. Seguin as their probation officer. This was confirmed not only by staff in the Cornwall office but also by the Area Manager, Emile Robert.

Ms Cardinal thought that Mr. Seguin went beyond the call of duty of a probation officer and that he was inclined to give the benefit of the doubt to Ministry clients. She also noticed that some probationers repeatedly asked to have Mr. Seguin as their probation officer. She heard him referred to as "Mr. Probation" and thought this was an apt description of him. Administrative assistant Marcelle Léger agreed that Mr. Seguin spent more time with and paid more attention to Ministry clients, on average, than other probation officers. Mr. Gendron also confirmed that many probationers requested Mr. Seguin as their probation officer rather than himself or Mr. van Diepen. He attributed this to the philosophical differences between the social work approach subscribed to by Mr. Seguin and the law enforcement approach adhered to by the other Cornwall probation officers; Mr. Seguin was clearly more lenient in terms of enforcing probation orders.

Probation staff provided other examples of Mr. Seguin's close relationship with probationers. Ms Cardinal testified that when she was at the Cornwall jail, corrections officers mentioned Mr. Seguin's frequent visits to the custodial facility, which they considered unusual. Moreover, Ms Cardinal and other probation staff watched Mr. Seguin smoke and chat regularly with Ministry clients outside the office. Jos van Diepen described Mr. Seguin's conduct with probationers as "cigarettes and fraternization, socializing ... chummy with clients rather than being professional." Mr. van Diepen stated that when he and Ken Seguin went to a local pub for a drink, Mr. Seguin socialized with Ministry clients. In Mr. van Diepen's opinion, Ken Seguin engaged with his clients "socially rather than professionally" and was "not performing the duties properly ... as a probation officer." He was too "close" to his clients. Ron Gendron also observed that "Ken had a lot of social interactions with clients." Mr. Seguin mentioned to Mr. Gendron that a Ministry client had dropped by his house and that they had had a few bottles of beer. Mr. Gendron considered this "unusual for a probation officer, but more typical for Ken." Mr. Gendron also noticed that probationers visited the probation office to see Mr. Seguin when they weren't required to be there.

Mr. Gendron was "worried that Ken was putting himself in a position of being vulnerable and compromising himself." He elaborated:

Ken would do these extraordinary things with his clients. You know, it's great to be ... Mr. Perfect Probation Officer, but at the same time, those things can really backfire on you, and I was worried that that could happen with Ken.

In Mr. Gendron's view, Area Manager Emile Robert was in a supervisory position and, consequently, had the authority to instruct Mr. Seguin not to have smoke breaks with Ministry clients or to take private rides with probationers. But Mr. Robert never appeared to take such action. Mr. Gendron described Mr. Robert's approach to Mr. Seguin in contrast to other probation officers at the Cornwall office:

Emile had double standards. He had one standard for one probation officer, another standard for another. He had different standards for me; he had different standards for van Diepen; he had different standards for Seguin.

Cornwall probation officers and staff, such as Marcelle Léger, assumed that Mr. Seguin was gay but claimed they did not know he was having sexual relations with probation clients. When Ms Cardinal began her employment at the Cornwall office in 1982, Mr. Seguin was about forty years old, was not married, and did not have children. In the following ten years in which she worked with him, Mr. Seguin did not seem to date any women and "he never asked" Ms Cardinal "once" to set him up with her single women friends:

I knew that he had never married, that he had no children. I don't recall him ever mentioning that he was dating anybody. I don't recall ever mentioning a girlfriend or any significant partner.

...

I assumed that he was homosexual.

...

... [B]y the time I commenced, he would have been almost 40 and I'm employed there for another 10 years and I've never seen him date any women. I'm also fortunate to have a number of attractive, single women friends and he never asked me once to set him up with any of my friends.

Mr. Gendron said a Ministry client entered his office one day and mentioned that another probationer was meeting with the “homosexual probation officer.” Mr. Gendron testified that although he and others may have thought that Mr. Seguin was gay, “that didn’t mean he was having sexual contact with clients.” Mr. Seguin “would come into the office and say he had a date on the weekend with some woman,” said Mr. Gendron, but:

... we never saw any woman ... I’d never known him to—to date women and that was over a 10-year period, and most of his friends were men and they weren’t married. They were single men.

So you just wondered if he was gay, and I did.

Mr. Gendron knew that Mr. Seguin engaged in improper social interactions with clients and that he might be gay, but maintained that he “did not know Ken was sexually involved with his clients.” Mr. Gendron added:

He was breaking the rules socially. He was breaking a conflict of interest rule that the manager knew about. He knew. Emile Robert knew that. He knew more than I did. He knew more than the probation officers did.

Mr. Robert knew that clients would often request Mr. Seguin as their probation officer. The Area Manager was also aware that Mr. Seguin smoked with Ministry clients outside the office. In his interview with Paul Downing, a special investigator at the Ministry, Mr. Robert mentioned that he saw “a number of rough looking youth in Seguin’s car” on Water Street in the early morning, which raised concerns for him as an employer. Mr. Robert discussed his observation with Mr. van Diepen, who told the Area Manager that Mr. Seguin had hired young people to rebuild his boathouse.

Bill Roy, who had succeeded Roy Hawkins as Regional Manager (Eastern Region), was also aware of Mr. Seguin’s sexual orientation. At a number of meetings, he noticed that Mr. van Diepen made negative comments about homosexual behaviour. In his interview with Mr. Roy in 2000, Paul Downing wrote:

Bill said he thought it was odd that Jos was a good friend of PPO Ken Seguin, however, he (Jos) was very negative about homosexual behaviour (Ken was homosexual). Bill said that he heard Jos express his feelings about homosexual conduct during a number of meetings at the Cornwall Probation & Parole Office.

Paul Downing thought Mr. Robert knew that Mr. Seguin was associating with Ministry clients outside the workplace. This behaviour clearly contravened Ministry policy. In his interview with the Area Manager in 2000, Mr. Downing concluded that Mr. Robert strongly suspected Mr. Seguin was violating Ministry rules with regard to associating with offenders under the supervision of the Ministry.

Mr. van Diepen made inconsistent statements in his evidence as to his knowledge of Mr. Seguin's sexual orientation. But it is clear that Mr. van Diepen, like other probation officers in the Cornwall office, thought Mr. Seguin was gay. Between comments made in the probation office, his observations of Mr. Seguin's relationship with probationers, and interviews with the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), it is evident that Mr. van Diepen believed Mr. Seguin was gay.

It is noteworthy that inscribed in a statement Mr. van Diepen made to the OPP in 1994 are the words "I know Ken's boyfriends." Mr. van Diepen claimed he did not make this statement to OPP Constables Genier and McDonnell. According to the OPP, Mr. van Diepen amended the statement four and a half years later to "I knew some of Ken's male friends." Mr. van Diepen claimed that any amendments he made to the 1994 police statement were done around the time the statement was made, not four and half years later. This is further discussed in Chapter 7, "Institutional Response of the Ontario Provincial Police."

Mr. van Diepen testified that after Mr. Nelson Barque had resigned from the Cornwall Probation Office for his inappropriate sexual contact with probationers, Area Manager Peter Sirrs made a comment to Mr. Seguin to the effect that if he wished to participate in similar behaviour, Ken Seguin should do it in Montreal. Mr. van Diepen told the OPP:

Nelson's career ended when one of Nelson's client's boyfriend [sic] complained to Peter Sirrs, supervisor, about Nelson being sexually involved with a probationer. Nelson handed in his resignation shortly after.

...

Peter Sirrs told Ken once around the time Nelson got the boot, to go to Montreal if he got those tendencies. Ken asked me afterwards what Peter meant by that. I told him if you're queer, don't do it here.

Mr. van Diepen stated that Mr. Seguin was upset by Mr. Sirrs' comments and discussed them with him after Nelson Barque's resignation. Mr. Sirrs testified that he did make this comment, but it was to Mr. Barque at the time of his resignation. The former Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office agreed this was “probably an inappropriate comment to make.” Mr. Sirrs had no recollection of making such a statement to Mr. Seguin.

Mr. van Diepen was also aware in the late 1980s that Gerald Renshaw, a former probation client, was living with Ken Seguin at his home in Summerstown. He believed that Mr. Renshaw and Mr. Seguin were in a sexual relationship. Mr. van Diepen told the OPP in 1994 that “Ken and Gerry were lovers.” He also said: “I think Emile Robert knew that Ken was a homosexual. Ron Gendron & I tried to talk to Ken about his clients living there and that but Ken would always tell us to get out of his office.”

As I discuss further in the following sections, despite the fact that the Cornwall Area Manager and some of the probation staff knew Mr. Seguin was socializing with clients, contrary to Ministry policy, they failed to report this behaviour to their superiors.

Gerald Renshaw Moves in With His Former Probation Officer

Area Manager and Regional Manager Informed of the Renshaw–Seguin Living Arrangement

On March 10, 1989, Emile Robert received correspondence from Ken Seguin to the effect that a former probationer, Gerald Renshaw, would be renting a room in his house the following day. Mr. Seguin informed his Area Manager that he had supervised Gerald Renshaw from 1984 to 1986 and that, to his knowledge, Mr. Renshaw had not been in further trouble with the law. The letter stated:

SUBJECT: EMPLOYEE CONTACT WITH AN EX-OFFENDER

In accordance with Ministry Policies and Procedures, I wish to advise that, as of March 11, 1989, I will be renting a room in my home to Gerald Renshaw who was under my supervision from October, 1984 to April, 1986.

To my knowledge, he has not been in any further difficulties with the law and does not have any pending difficulties with the law.

Kenneth G. Seguin
Probation and Parole Officer.

Mr. Robert discussed the contents of the letter with Mr. Seguin on March 10, 1989, the day he received this correspondence. In his testimony, the Area Manager claimed that he reviewed the Ministry policy on conflicts of interest with Mr. Seguin. Mr. Robert stated that according to policy at that time, it was necessary only for Mr. Seguin to advise him in writing of his contact with a former client. Mr. Seguin was not required to obtain the permission of his Area Manager to have his former probationer reside with him. During this discussion, Mr. Seguin reiterated to Mr. Robert that he had supervised Gerald Renshaw when he was on probation several years earlier and that no further offences had been committed since that time. Mr. Seguin explained that Mr. Renshaw was experiencing difficulties in his relationship with his girlfriend and was looking for a place to live for a short, but indeterminate, period.

Mr. Robert claimed that he instructed Mr. Seguin to postpone Mr. Renshaw's move into his home until Mr. Robert had some time to consider the matter. As mentioned, the letter sent by Mr. Seguin stated that Gerald Renshaw would be residing with him from the following day, March 11, 1989. Mr. Robert testified that Mr. Seguin failed to disclose that Gerald Renshaw was, in fact, already living with him.

The May 1986 policy on conflict of interest governed Ken Seguin at the time he discussed with Mr. Robert the lessee/lessor arrangement of Gerald Renshaw at his home. This policy was applicable to all public servants in Ontario. Conflict of interest was defined as:

... a conflict between a public servant's personal interest and his/her responsibility as a public servant. This includes actual or perceived conflicts and those which have the potential to be actual or perceived.
(Emphasis added)

The policy stipulated that each public servant should identify and disclose to their superior any possible conflict:

Each public servant:

- a) Shall identify and disclose to his/her deputy minister, agency head or minister, as the case may be:
 - any possible conflict of interest, even though its significance may be thought to be marginal;
 - any conflict of interest in which he/she might derive personal benefit from a matter which, in the course of his/her duties as a public servant, he/she is in a position to influence;
 - any position of conflict with the interests of the Crown arising from any of his/her outside activities; and
- b) Shall abide by the advice given to him/her.

It is important to note that three months after Mr. Seguin informed Mr. Robert that a former probationer would be living with him, the Ministry issued a new policy on employee contact with ex-offenders, their families, and friends. It stipulates that the Ministry employee must both advise in writing and seek permission of his or her supervisor to have contact with an ex-offender. Issued on June 21, 1989, portions of the policy stated:

It is the responsibility of every employee in the ministry to ensure that any relationship of a personal nature with an offender, ex-offender and the family and friends of offenders and ex-offenders be reported in writing to the employee's chief administrator. Any professional relationships with ex-offenders, their families or friends must also be reported to the employee's chief administrator.

For the purposes of this policy the term offender refers to any adult or young offender with a criminal conviction. A relationship includes any contact which could potentially affect the ministry as indicated in the purpose statement.

This policy applies equally to all ministry employees.

PURPOSE

The purpose of this policy is to ensure that employees will not be subjected to pressure or be compromised in such a way as to jeopardize the security of ministry facilities, the care, custody and control of offenders, and the effective functioning of ministry programs.

PROCEDURE

When an employee is engaged in a personal relationship with an offender, ex-offender or the family and friends of an offender/ex-offender, the employee must advise the chief administrator in writing of the situation as soon as it is known or ought reasonably to be known by the employee. The chief administrator will determine whether this relationship constitutes a possible threat to the effectiveness and security of a ministry program. The chief administrator will advise the employee in writing of his/her decision, which in certain circumstances may include an order to terminate the relationship. This procedure will also apply to professional relationships with ex-offenders and their families and friends.

When reviewing a reported relationship, chief administrators will consider factors such as a conflict of interest, favoritism, undue influence, and breaches of confidentiality and security before coming to a decision.

Disciplinary action may be taken where the relationship is not reported or an order to terminate is not obeyed.

(Emphasis added)

Mr. Robert testified that he circulated the new June 1989 Ministry policy to his employees when it was issued.

In Mr. Robert's view, it was incumbent on Mr. Seguin to report and seek his permission only if the probation officer had contact with family members of Gerald Renshaw. Mr. Seguin, he said, had advised him in writing that a former probationer would reside with him, in compliance with the former policy, in effect at that time, in March 1989.

Mr. Robert does not think that he reviewed Gerald Renshaw's file at the probation office after his discussion with Mr. Seguin. At that time, Mr. Robert did not know that some of Gerald Renshaw's brothers had been probationers supervised at the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office. Mr. Robert claimed that he knew the probation office had clients whose surname was "Renshaw" but did not know that these individuals were related to "Gerry." Robert Renshaw, Gerald's brother, testified that Mr. Seguin had sexually abused him and that some of the abuse had occurred at the Cornwall Probation Office. He also stated that Mr. Seguin introduced him to Father MacDonald, a priest who several boys and young people in Cornwall alleged had sexually abused them.²⁰ Mr. Robert maintained that if Mr. Seguin had links to siblings of Gerald Renshaw, it was Mr. Seguin's responsibility to advise him of these connections. However, Mr. Robert acknowledged that in retrospect, perhaps he should have asked Mr. Seguin in March 1989 whether Gerald Renshaw was related to the other Renshaw boys who had been on probation in Cornwall.

In my view, Mr. Robert should have performed some due diligence and checked the files at the probation office on Gerald Renshaw and his brothers. As Regional Manager Roy Hawkins stated, Mr. Robert should also have obtained information on Gerald Renshaw's current circumstances.

Mr. Robert considered this an unusual situation. He had asked Mr. Seguin to postpone the move by Gerald Renshaw to his home because Mr. Robert wished to consult the Regional Manager about the matter. Mr. Robert explained at the hearings:

20. Allegations of sexual abuse of these individuals are discussed in Chapter 8, on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Parce que c'était une situation ... qui était pas normal puis que je voulais avoir l'approbation de la Région avant—comme, je voulais me sécuriser comme gérant de secteur pour faire certain que tous les points soient pointés, que tous les “t” soient barrés, pour m’assurer que plus tard, c’est sûr, qu’il n’y ait pas une situation fâcheuse qui arrive puis que je me fasse—
(Emphasis added)

Ten days after receiving Ken Seguin's letter, Emile Robert sent a very brief letter to Mr. Hawkins. Mr. Robert simply enclosed the March 10, 1989, correspondence that he had received from Mr. Seguin, described it as “self-explanatory,” and made the following request: “I would appreciate receiving some direction from you regarding this matter.” When Mr. Hawkins read the letter, he understood that Mr. Seguin intended to rent a room in his house to a former probationer. It was also clear that Mr. Seguin was simply advising his superior and not seeking approval for the living arrangement. The Regional Manager's immediate reaction was that this situation was out of the ordinary.

In Mr. Hawkins' view, contact was to be terminated between a probation officer and a probationer after the supervision ended. Mr. Hawkins was concerned about two issues: (1) access of the former probationer to keys to the office and the security of the Cornwall Probation Office; and (2) assurance that Gerald Renshaw had not been involved in criminal activity in the years after he had been supervised by Mr. Seguin.

Mr. Hawkins sent the following letter to Mr. Robert on March 29, 1989:

I think the most appropriate course of action is as follows:

- (1) Have a CPIC check done on the ex-offender to ensure we know his status in relation to the courts and the criminal justice system.
- (2) After the check is completed, if the ex-offender is clear, advise Mr. Seguin that if Mr. Renshaw should have further encounters with the courts we would appreciate being advised.
- (3) Under no circumstances is Mr. Seguin to write a P.S.R., provide supervision or other services to Mr. Renshaw as a Ministry client.

- (4) Mr. Seguin should be advised to exercise caution re: the keys to the office to ensure that his roomer has no opportunity to duplicate or use same. This is one of our major concerns and I am sure Mr. Seguin will appreciate that.

Last but not least, if you have any concerns please do not hesitate to contact me.

Mr. Hawkins wanted a Canadian Police Information Centre (CPIC) check on Gerald Renshaw; that is, verification of electronic police records to assess whether this man had been involved with the justice system since his probation, as well as details of his criminal record. Mr. Hawkins also advised Mr. Robert that if Gerald Renshaw had encounters with the law in the future, the probation office should be notified, and that Mr. Seguin should not be involved in any supervisory role if Mr. Renshaw again became a Ministry client. As mentioned, Mr. Hawkins also had concerns about the security of the Cornwall Probation Office, in particular that “a former probationer living with a probation officer might have access to the keys, gain access to the office and confidential information on either his own files or other files.”

After Mr. Hawkins sent this letter and discussed these issues with Mr. Robert at the end of March 1989, he had no further involvement with the Gerald Renshaw issue.

Mr. Hawkins did not know the details of Mr. Renshaw’s former conviction or probation three years earlier. Nor was he familiar with Mr. Renshaw’s current situation: his personal circumstances, whether he was employed, or his relationship with Mr. Seguin. None of this information had been provided by Emile Robert. As the Regional Manager said at the hearings:

Well, I think that before an area manager puts forward a request to a regional manager, a regional administrator, for direction that one would expect a fair amount of the biographical and criminal record be communicated.

...

... I think that there could be a fair amount of investigation done and information put forward with regard to the specifics of the client criminal record, nature of offence committed, employment circumstances; a whole host of things could be looked at and included in there.

But really there was no information given to me ...

...

And also one has to wonder about probation officers and clients, is there anything that ought to be of concern about that specifically in relationship to this case. (Emphasis added)

But Mr. Hawkins agreed that he could have asked for this information. He also said that if it had come to his attention that individuals in the Cornwall Probation Office knew or suspected that Mr. Seguin and Mr. Renshaw were in a sexual relationship, this “absolutely” would have changed the situation. Mr. Hawkins elaborated:

Changed in the sense that I think that a sexual relationship is a fairly intimate and personal relationship and we’re talking about a person who had been supervising this individual ... [I]t certainly would raise some alarm bells in my mind. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Hawkins had never encountered such a situation in his entire career at the Ministry. At that time, Mr. Hawkins did not have serious concerns or reservations about Mr. Renshaw residing with Mr. Seguin, but, he added, “possibly in retrospect, I should’ve had a problem with it.” In my view, Mr. Hawkins should have followed up with Mr. Robert and asked the Cornwall Area Manager to provide him with information concerning Ken Seguin and his former probationer, Gerald Renshaw. The Regional Manager, by examining a situation he found unusual, might have obtained important information that would have caused him to question the appropriateness of Mr. Seguin’s relationship with Ministry clients and former clients. Mr. Hawkins did not know that staff in the probation office considered it highly inappropriate that former probationer Gerald Renshaw was moving into the home of his former probation officer, Ken Seguin.

On April 7, 1989, Mr. Robert inscribed on Mr. Hawkins’ letter of March 29, “Completed as above. Informed Ken Seguin as above.” Mr. Robert testified that he had conducted the CPIC check, discussed with Mr. Seguin the issue regarding the keys and security of the probation office, and advised Mr. Seguin that if Gerald Renshaw had further encounters with the law, Mr. Robert should be notified and that Mr. Seguin should not supervise Gerald Renshaw in the future. Although Mr. Robert also considered it an unusual situation, he was not unduly concerned about this living arrangement. Mr. Robert testified that he did not question the good faith of Mr. Seguin. However, as I discuss in this section, when Mr. Downing interviewed Mr. Robert in 2000 about the Renshaw situation, it was clear to the Ministry Special Investigator that Mr. Robert had had concerns in 1989 about Mr. Seguin's association with probationers outside the workplace.

Mr. Robert acknowledged in his testimony that knowing what he now knows, he probably would have handled the situation differently. The former Area Manager also maintained that if Mr. Hawkins had wanted additional information, his superior could have asked him to conduct further investigatory work on Mr. Seguin or Gerald Renshaw. Mr. Robert testified that at no time did Roy Hawkins criticize him for the manner in which he handled the Renshaw situation. In my view, neither the Area Manager nor the Regional Manager of the Cornwall office carefully examined the relationship between Mr. Seguin and his former probationer, nor the propriety of Gerald Renshaw's living arrangement with his former probation officer. This is discussed in further detail in this section.

Reaction of Probation Staff to the Renshaw–Seguin Living Arrangement

In contrast to Mr. Robert, staff at the Cornwall Probation Office testified that they considered the living arrangement of Gerald Renshaw with his former probation officer, Ken Seguin, inappropriate. Mr. van Diepen stated that at the time Gerald Renshaw moved into Mr. Seguin's home, there was discussion about this situation among staff at the Cornwall office. Probation staff were concerned about both the actual and the perceived conflict of interest. Ron Gendron, a probation officer in the Cornwall office, described the arrangement as "bizarre," "startling," "irresponsible," and "inexcusable." As Mr. Gendron said, "I have never heard of a probation officer ever doing that ... I didn't understand why that would happen ... [I]t defies common sense." Gerald Renshaw was a former probation client of Mr. Seguin, and in Mr. Gendron's view, it was inappropriate for the former probationer to live with his probation officer: "[I]t's irresponsible of a probation officer to ever do that ... even if it's an ex-probationer." It was evident to Mr. Gendron that Mr. Robert was once again giving preferential treatment to Ken Seguin.

Mr. van Diepen also "strongly disagreed" with the approach of Ministry officials to the Renshaw—Seguin living situation. At the time that Mr. Renshaw was residing with Mr. Seguin in Summerstown, Mr. Seguin told Mr. van Diepen that Gerald Renshaw owed him a sum of money for a vehicle. In his interview with the Ontario Provincial Police in February 1994, Mr. van Diepen told Constables Genier and McDonnell, "Ken and Gerry were lovers, Gerry owed Ken about $10,000." Jos van Diepen further stated that after Mr. Seguin's death in November 1993, "there were a lot of rumours and discussions ... that Mr. Renshaw had been living there and that there was a relationship other than just a tenant."

When probation officer Carole Cardinal learned that one of the Renshaw boys was living with Mr. Seguin, she was also “surprised” that Ministry officials had not taken issue with what she perceived to be an “unacceptable” and “inappropriate” arrangement. To Ms Cardinal, the fact that Gerald Renshaw was paying room and board to Mr. Seguin was irrelevant, as was the fact that his probation had ended three years earlier. Ms Cardinal testified about the importance of maintaining a personal and professional boundary with clients and former clients, and considered the Renshaw situation a serious conflict of interest: “[H]aving an ex-offender residing with you ... creates ... a huge conflict of interest”; “it was inappropriate and should not have been approved.”

Louise Quinn, an administrative assistant at the Cornwall Probation Office from 1974 to 1995 who later became a probation officer, said Mr. Seguin openly discussed the fact that a former probationer had moved in with him at his home in Summerstown. As Ms Quinn said at the hearings, “Ken was open about that. He talked about it ... [I]t wasn’t a secret.” She also considered the living arrangement “very unusual.”

When interviewing Emile Robert in 2000, Paul Downing discussed the Renshaw move in 1989 into Mr. Seguin’s home. It was clear to the Ministry Special Investigator that Mr. Robert had had “suspicions” and concerns in 1989 about Mr. Seguin’s association with clients outside the workplace. Mr. Downing testified that in his “experience, it’s not very often that someone who is in Ken’s position would normally be permitted to have an offender live with him” or an “ex-offender.” He would have expected Mr. Robert, in his position of Area Manager, to thoroughly review the matter. Mr. Downing elaborated:

There would have to be some sort of reason, whether it be rehabilitation or programming or a lengthy connection with the ex-offender that ... Mr. Robert might be able to explain that made sense and that the risk management to the Ministry and the public safety was considered.

Allegations by Gerald Renshaw of Sexual Abuse by Ken Seguin

Gerald Renshaw stated that he lived with his former probation officer, Mr. Seguin, for approximately one and a half years. He was having difficulties in his relationship with his girlfriend, and Mr. Seguin’s home in Summerstown was near to his place of work. Gerald Renshaw testified that he, Mr. Seguin, and Mr. Seguin’s boss, “Emile,” signed a paper at the probation office that addressed this living arrangement. Mr. Renshaw confirmed that this document was signed after he had moved into his former probation officer’s home. He also confirmed that on February 27, 1989, when he was living with Mr. Seguin, Ken Seguin co-signed a personal loan insurance application in the amount of $9,700 for a vehicle.

Gerald Renshaw testified that he was sexually abused by Mr. Seguin over a number of years. It began when he was on probation under Mr. Seguin's supervision. Gerald Renshaw stated that Mr. Seguin threatened to send him to jail if he did not comply with his sexual demands. Mr. Renshaw also testified that Mr. Seguin socialized with teenaged boys who were on probation. Gerald Renshaw went to bars with his probation officer, and Mr. Seguin allowed Gerald and other probationers to use his car. These young men, who included Gerald Renshaw, were also invited to Mr. Seguin's home. Mr. Renshaw stated that probationers and former probationers consumed alcohol and smoked marijuana at Mr. Seguin's home.

Gerald's older brother, Robert Renshaw, also testified that he was sexually abused while he was on probation and supervised by Mr. Seguin.

Gerald Renshaw stated that he was again sexually abused when he lived with Mr. Seguin. Mr. Seguin threatened him that if he refused to engage in a sexual relationship, he would be forced to pay all of the loan immediately: "If you don't want to do what I want you to do then I want the loan paid off now, which obviously I couldn't do." Mr. Seguin, he said, was well aware that Gerald did not have the resources to pay the loan. Mr. Renshaw also stated that Ken Seguin gave him money to buy drugs while he was living with Mr. Seguin in Summerstown. Mr. Renshaw testified that the sexual abuse stopped only after he moved out of Mr. Seguin's home. Mr. Seguin tried to initiate sexual contact after that time, but he was not successful, said Mr. Renshaw.

Carol Hesse, the older sister of Gerald and Robert Renshaw, visited Gerald while he was living with Mr. Seguin. For a period before her father's death, Carol Hesse had had custody of her brothers, who were minors. Ms Hesse considered herself a good friend of Ken Seguin. She had visited his Summerstown home many times. Mr. Seguin had disclosed personal details about himself, including his sexuality. Carol Hesse knew while her brother Gerald was living with him that Mr. Seguin was gay. But she thought that Ken Seguin behaved as "a big brother" toward the boys; she believed it was not "any different than Gerry living with one of my other siblings" or any other friend.

Carol Hesse did not have any concerns when her brother Gerald decided to move in with Mr. Seguin in 1989. Shortly after, Gerald invited his sister to the Summerstown home. There were two bedrooms in the house. To Carol Hesse's surprise, her brother's bed was made and the room was tidy; she considered Gerald a "slob." After a comment to this effect to her brother, Gerald's face turned red and he left his room. When she entered Mr. Seguin's room, by contrast, the bed was messy and gym equipment covered the floor. Carol Hesse knew that Ken Seguin was neat and meticulous. When she asked her brother whether something was “happening here,” Gerald’s response was, “Shut up. You don’t know what you’re talking about. We’re not supposed to be in Ken’s room anyway.”

The relationship between a perpetrator of sexual abuse and a victim is complex. As discussed in the expert evidence, victims often repeatedly and voluntarily return to the offender. They may not fully comprehend or appreciate that they are victims. Perpetrators capitalize on the confusion of their victims. And as was the case with Gerald Renshaw, they offer inducements such as a car loan and a place to live. The perpetrator may resort to financial, emotional, and other threats as a means of controlling the victim.

I agree with Mr. Downing’s conclusion that Mr. Robert ought to have thoroughly reviewed the living arrangement between Gerald Renshaw and his former probation officer, Mr. Seguin. It is clear in both the 1986 Ontario government policy and in the June 1989 Ministry policy that the government is concerned about both actual and perceived conflicts of interest. It was incumbent on Mr. Robert and his superiors to fully examine the relationship between Mr. Seguin and his former probationer to assess whether an actual or perceived conflict existed in their living arrangements. Both Mr Robert and his superior, Mr. Hawkins, considered the living situation very unusual. Had the Renshaw files been examined by Mr. Robert or other senior officials at the Ministry of Correctional Services, information would have been obtained regarding Gerald Renshaw’s probation as well as the probation of his siblings, who had also been under the supervision of Mr. Seguin. Had the Area Manager, Regional Manager, or other Ministry officials probed the situation more fully, perhaps they would have acquired information that would have raised concerns regarding Mr. Seguin’s relationship with current and former probationers.

Gerald Renshaw stated that he signed a document at the probation office with Mr. Seguin and Mr. Robert that addressed this living arrangement. Had Mr. Robert or other senior Ministry officials discussed Mr. Renshaw’s relationship with Mr. Seguin, they might have learned that Mr. Renshaw had moved into Ken Seguin’s home before Mr. Seguin notified Ministry officials, that Mr. Seguin had co-signed a personal loan insurance bank application with Mr. Renshaw, and that Mr. Seguin was very involved with Gerald Renshaw’s brothers and family. Perhaps Gerald Renshaw would have disclosed information regarding inappropriate behaviour engaged in by Mr. Seguin during his probation, or would have raised or confirmed suspicions respecting Mr. Seguin’s interactions with other probation clients.

The 1989 policy explicitly states that Ministry officials should consider factors such as undue influence, favouritism, and conflict of interest. In my view, had Mr. Emile Robert and other officials examined these factors carefully, they might have advised Mr. Seguin that this living arrangement with this former probationer should not take place. The 1986 Ontario government policy states that a public servant “shall abide by the advice given to him/her,” and the 1989 policy states, “Disciplinary action may be taken where the relationship is not reported or an order to terminate is not obeyed.”

In my opinion, the Ministry of Correctional Services, including the Area Manager and Regional Manager, did not take the appropriate measures to fully examine the living arrangements between Gerald Renshaw and his former probation officer, Ken Seguin. Had the relationship between Mr. Seguin and Mr. Renshaw been scrutinized more carefully, questions might have been raised about the probation officer’s relationships with current and former Ministry clients. It should have been apparent that the living arrangement between Gerald Renshaw and Mr. Seguin raised issues of both perceived and actual conflict of interest.

In 1998, the conflict of interest policy of the Ministry of Correctional Services was updated. The policy was expanded to address the following general categories: outside activities; prohibited use of a position; confidential information; gifts, hospitality, and other benefits; avoidance of preferential treatment including hiring; procurement; political activity; and taking improper advantage of past office. Pursuant to the conflict of interest policy, employees are directed to complete a form concerning possible conflicts of interest and send it to the Deputy Minister. A review is conducted regarding the conflict of interest or potential conflict of interest situation. The employee who submits the form receives a written decision. Pursuant to the current policy:

Any Ministry employee who knowingly enters into, forms or continues a relationship or connection of a personal or business nature with an offender/ex-offender or someone known to be in a close relationship with an offender/ex-offender may reasonably be perceived as being or leading to a conflict of interest or a breach of security and is required to disclose the situation to their immediate chief administrator.

It further states that probation officers must report all conflict of interest and potential conflict of interest situations directly to the Area Manager and to the Deputy Minister. Failure of an employee to comply with this requirement can result in disciplinary measures, which may include termination of employment.

It is my recommendation that the Ministry introduce measures to ensure that its employees receive regular training and updating on conflict of interest principles and the ethical behaviour required of staff at the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services.

The Varley Incident

On the evening of January 8, 1992, four young men arrived at Mr. Seguin's home in Summerstown. One of these males, Mark Woods, was a Ministry client. Travis and Bob Varley, brothers who lived nearby and who often visited Mr. Seguin at his home, were among this group, as was their cousin, Andrew MacDonald. Mr. Seguin supplied alcohol to these four young men. The Cornwall probation officer placed four open beer bottles on the table at his residence and each of the boys drank the beer.

The Ministry client, Mark Woods, was scheduled to attend the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office the following day for a pre-sentence report interview with Mr. Seguin. The pre-sentence report was in relation to the crimes of break and enter and theft.

Mark Woods visited Mr. Seguin at his home that evening as he was worried about the sentence he would receive for the offences and wanted to discuss it with the probation officer. One of the conditions of Mr. Woods' release was a 9 p.m. curfew. Mr. Seguin told the client he should return to his home and not breach his curfew. As the young men were leaving Mr. Seguin's home, one of the Varley brothers went to the refrigerator and took three additional bottles of beer.

After they left Mr. Seguin's residence, Mark Woods was dropped off at his home by the other young men in order to meet his curfew. In the early morning hours of January 9, 1992, at about 4:00 a.m., Travis Varley fatally shot his cousin, Andrew MacDonald, at the Varley home. Travis Varley was charged with second degree murder. He pleaded guilty to manslaughter and several months later was sentenced to two years less a day.

Several important questions arise from the Varley incident. Why did Mr. Seguin allow these young men, and in particular his client, to enter his home? Why did Mr. Seguin supply the young men with alcoholic beverages? Why did Ken Seguin not inform Area Manager Emile Robert of this incident until a week later? Why is important information missing from Mr. Seguin's incident report? Did Mr. Robert allow several months to elapse before he informed his Regional Manager, Roy Hawkins? Why were disciplinary measures not imposed on Mr. Seguin? Why was a Ministry investigation of the Varley incident not undertaken? These are some of the issues that arise in relation to the 1992 Varley incident.

One Week Passes Before Ken Seguin Discusses Varley Incident With the Cornwall Area Manager

Mr. Seguin did not inform Cornwall Area Manager Emile Robert about the Varley incident until one week had passed.

On January 16, 1992, Mr. Seguin told Mr. Robert that the Varley brothers had called him and asked if they could visit the probation officer at his home. Travis and Bob Varley lived nearby in Summerstown, he told his Area Manager, and would occasionally visit. Mr. Seguin claimed that when he opened his door on the evening of January 8, 1992, he did not expect to see two other young men: Mark Woods, a Ministry client for whom Mr. Seguin was preparing a pre-sentence report, and Andrew MacDonald, a cousin of the Varley boys. Mr. Seguin told Mr. Robert that he had been scheduled to meet this Ministry client the following day. Mr. Seguin said that during the visit he learned that a curfew had been imposed on his client. Mr. Seguin told Mr. Robert that he had advised Mr. Woods to return home to comply with his curfew.

Several hours later, Mr. Seguin learned that Travis Varley had shot Andrew MacDonald, one of the young men who had been at his home earlier that evening. The following morning, Mr. Seguin's client called the Cornwall Probation Office to cancel his scheduled appointment with Mr. Seguin.

Mr. Seguin told Mr. Robert that he had been in contact with the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) about the incident. When Emile Robert asked Mr. Seguin why he had allowed the young men to enter his home, the probation officer's response was that he had felt intimidated. The Cornwall Area Manager testified that he did not accept Mr. Seguin's excuse: "[J]'accepte pas ça comme une excuse." After this discussion, Mr. Robert instructed Mr. Seguin to prepare an incident report.

When asked at the hearings whether Mr. Seguin had disclosed at that time that he had served alcohol to his Ministry client and other visitors, Mr. Robert replied that he could not remember: "[J]e me souviens pas s'il avait parlé s'il avait servi de l'alcool ou pas." Later in his evidence, Mr. Robert stated he did not know that Mr. Seguin had supplied alcohol to these young men until he received the police report of the incident several months later, in September 1992.

Mr. Seguin prepared an incident report after this discussion. As Deputy Minister Deborah Newman explained, an incident report is to be generated when something critical has occurred. She considered the incident at Mr. Seguin's home a very significant occurrence. It was Ministry policy that an incident report was to be prepared immediately after the occurrence of such an event. But the incident report is dated January 16, 1992, eight days after the occurrence. It was sent at that time to Mr. Robert, who initialled it. Mr. Seguin wrote in the report that the Ministry client was "extremely agitated" when he visited the probation officer's home on the evening of January 8, 1992, as the client was "concerned about the possible outcome of his court case." Mr. Seguin also said he had told the client that he "could not address his concerns properly without his file and it would be best to discuss it further at the office the following day." The next morning, at approximately 11:00 a.m., Mr. Seguin received a call from this client, who was very distraught. The incident report states:

He was sobbing and upset and requested to cancel the 1:30 p.m. appointment for his Pre-Sentence Report interview. He went on to explain that after the boys dropped him off at home for the 9:00 p.m. curfew the others apparently went to a local hotel, then later proceeded to the Varley residence near Summerstown where at 4:00 a.m., January 9, 1992, Andrew McDonald [sic] was fatally shot. Travis Varley is being held in custody on a charge of 2nd Degree Murder.

Mr. Seguin stated in the report that the “Ministry of Correctional Services’ client” had arrived at his home “unannounced and uninvited.” He also stated that he had provided a witness statement to the Lancaster OPP regarding the events that preceded the shooting.

Mr. Seguin failed to include important information in this incident report—namely, that he had supplied alcohol to the Ministry client and other young men when they visited his home. This omission was significant and, as probation officer Carole Cardinal said, Mr. Seguin’s behaviour was “inappropriate” and raised issues of conflict of interest:

... [Y]ou should never have a client come to your residence when you are preparing a pre-sentence report. The issue of conflict of interest is huge at that point in time. The optics of being objective as a probation officer can certainly be blurred if the person writing your pre-sentence report is going to your home and consuming alcohol.

So those comments, those sentiments, were certainly shared with Mr. Seguin.

A few days after the January 1992 Varley incident, Mr. Seguin discussed the matter with Carole Cardinal. It is noteworthy that Mr. Seguin also failed to disclose to Ms Cardinal that he had served beer to the young men. A few days after this discussion, Ms Cardinal was in Alexandria, where she learned from Constable McDonell, one of the OPP investigating officers, that alcohol had been consumed at Mr. Seguin’s home that night. She approached Mr. Seguin the following day with this information. Ms Cardinal testified that Ken Seguin “did not deny it; however, he downplayed it and made it clear to me that he had completed an incident report outlining particulars and that Mr. Robert as the area manager was aware of this.”

Area Manager Emile Robert claimed that pursuant to Ministry policy, he faxed the incident report to Mr. Roy Hawkins at the regional office, as well as to the Information Management Unit in North Bay. Mr. Robert testified that he vaguely remembers speaking with Mr. Hawkins at that time, who, he claimed, instructed him not to impose any disciplinary actions on Mr. Seguin until information on the Varley incident was received from the police. But Mr. Hawkins denied that he received the incident report in January 1992. He also testified that Mr. Robert did not discuss the Varley incident with him at that time. It was Mr. Hawkins' practice to initial documents that he received. Moreover, had Mr. Hawkins received the incident report in January 1992, it is likely there would have been written correspondence from his office to Mr. Robert, as Mr. Hawkins considered this was a "very major incident." Mr. Hawkins also testified that he is "very doubtful" that Mr. Robert spoke to him shortly after the Varley incident, as he would routinely prepare correspondence on file to reflect the discussion of such a significant matter. Mr. Robert could provide no explanation at the hearings for the lack of receipt of the incident report by Mr. Hawkins. The Regional Manager said that he did not become aware of the Varley incident for several months.

Mr. Hawkins testified that he would have expected Area Manager Emile Robert to take action immediately upon receiving the incident report from Mr. Seguin. In Mr. Hawkins' view, the situation was likely to warrant a Ministry investigation, at which time Mr. Seguin's employment would probably have been suspended.

Special Investigator Paul Downing agreed:

Based on the information that was reported and the incident and the previous knowledge or suspicions that Emile had reported having with regards to Ken's association with clients outside of the workplace and based on my experience as a Ministry inspector, this would clearly be a situation that would normally be investigated by an inspector or one in Level 1 investigation. This is a high profile situation that could bring disrepute to the administration of justice having someone in the justice system, at least from the initial information, possibly involved or have knowledge of. (Emphasis added)

At the very least, Mr. Downing thought there should have been a discussion as to whether such an investigation should be undertaken.

Deputy Minister Deborah Newman agreed. She stated that Mr. Robert should have immediately alerted Mr. Roy Hawkins to the Varley incident and should have forwarded the incident report forthwith to Mr. Hawkins and to the Information Management Unit in North Bay:

... [M]y own view, whether it was in 1992 or it was today, my answer would be the same. Yes, it ought to have been the subject of discussion as soon as possible between the area manager and the regional manager and it ought to have been faxed, in those days, to the Information Management Unit.

It is noteworthy that when Mr. Downing interviewed Mr. Robert in 2000, the former Area Manager of the Cornwall office did not mention either discussing or sending the incident report in January 1992 to Regional Manager Roy Hawkins.

After carefully analyzing the testimony and the documents, I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Robert did not send the January 16, 1992, incident report prepared by Mr. Seguin promptly to Regional Manager Roy Hawkins. Nor did Mr. Robert discuss the Varley incident with Mr. Hawkins soon after the event. Moreover, the Area Manager did not impose any disciplinary measures on Mr. Seguin after the January 8, 1992, incident. Mr. Hawkins did not become aware of the Varley incident for several months.

Mr. Robert testified that he decided not to take any action, such as disciplinary measures, regarding Mr. Seguin's behaviour until he received the police report. This did not occur until September 1992, eight months after the Varley incident. The Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office claimed that upon learning of the incident in January 1992, he simply discussed Ministry policies with Mr. Seguin regarding contacts with clients.

Emile Robert's Contact With the OPP

At the end of August 1992, OPP Detective Constable Randy Millar of the Lancaster Detachment had a discussion with Mr. Robert about Mr. Seguin's involvement with the Varley group and the fatal shooting in Summerstown the previous January. Detective Constable Millar sent a report of the incident to Mr. Robert on September 3, 1992. The report was written after Travis Varley had been convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to two years less a day in custody. The OPP report stated that Travis Varley, the deceased Andrew MacDonald, and other friends "drank liquor and beer quite heavily for approximately 17 hours prior to the shooting." Detective Constable Millar stated that Mark Woods, for whom Mr. Seguin was preparing a pre-sentence report at the time, the two Varley brothers, and the deceased arrived at Mr. Seguin's home at approximately 8:00 p.m. on January 8, 1992. Mr. Seguin allowed them access to his home: "[T]he boys explained that Mark WOODS was worried about what sentence he would get for his crime and wanted to talk to SEGUIN about that." Mr. Seguin served each of the boys a beer. As the group was leaving Mr. Seguin's home at about 8:40 p.m., Mr. Travis Varley went to the fridge and took another three bottles of beer.

As I mentioned earlier, Mr. Seguin did not include the information about the beer in the incident report that he prepared. Although Mr. Robert's evidence on this issue was inconsistent, Mr. Robert claimed that until he received the September 1992 police report from Detective Constable Millar eight months later, he was unaware of the presence of alcohol. He said that he did not know Mr. Seguin had served beer to the four young men or that there had been heavy drinking on the night of the fatality. In other words, Mr. Robert claimed that this information had not been disclosed to him. Mr. Robert considered it unacceptable that a probation officer had allowed his client to enter his home and had served alcohol to the client.

Probation officers in the Cornwall office, such as Carole Cardinal, knew that alcohol was involved in the Varley incident before the police report in September 1992. As discussed, the week after the January 1992 incident, Ms Cardinal learned from one of the OPP investigative officers, Constable McDonell, that alcohol had been consumed at Mr. Seguin's residence. Ms Cardinal and the OPP officer discussed the inappropriateness of this behaviour by probation officer Ken Seguin. Ms Cardinal also said that the Varley "incident was openly spoken about in the office because I was not pleased that Mr. Seguin had entertained and consumed alcohol with these four individuals, and I certainly did voice my comments to other colleagues."

Ms Cardinal prepared the pre-sentence report for Travis Varley, who pleaded guilty in May 1992. She had further discussions with Constable McDonell as well as Crown Attorney Guy Simard, who both expressed concern about the conduct of Mr. Seguin. They stated that they would be discussing their concerns with Area Manager Emile Robert.

Ms Cardinal spoke to Mr. Robert about the discussions she had had with the OPP officer and the Crown attorney when she was preparing the pre-sentence report. Ms Cardinal believes that Mr. Robert was aware at that time that Mr. Seguin had served beer to the Ministry client and to the three other young men; this was because "there was open discussion" in the office about this "inappropriate" behaviour. She also stated that when Mr. Varley pleaded guilty to manslaughter in May 1992, the fact that alcohol was a significant factor in the incident was widely reported in the media. A portion of Ms Cardinal's testimony regarding her exchanges with Mr. Robert follows:

... I remember him specifically saying to me that Mr. Seguin had completed an incident report and had provided a statement to the police with the assistance of Mr. McDonald, who would have been a defence lawyer, and that according to him, he had done everything—Mr. Seguin had done everything that was required and ... that needed to be done.

Ms Cardinal was surprised at the content and tone of the September 3, 1992, report sent by OPP Detective Constable Millar to Mr. Robert. She had expected the police "to voice their dissatisfaction with such ... unprofessional behaviour by a probation officer.” But the report was not critical of Ken Seguin’s conduct and did not reflect the concerns that the OPP and Crown had previously discussed with her.

In the September 3, 1992, report, Detective Constable Millar writes:

During the interview with SEGUIN, I felt SEGUIN was obviously embarrassed and he made it clear he did not make a habit of having clients at his residence. He emphasizes the fact that he did not realize that Andrew MACDONALD and Mark WOODS would accompany Travis and Bob VARLEY on that night.

The OPP officer also wrote that Mr. Seguin stated that “without doubt he will be more selective on who he allows into his house in the future.”

I discuss the OPP’s involvement in the Varley matter more fully in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

Regional Manager Learns of Varley Incident Eight Months Later

Five days after receiving the report of Detective Constable Millar, Mr. Robert sent the report to Mr. Hawkins, Regional Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office. In his correspondence, dated September 8, 1992, Mr. Robert wrote that he was enclosing a “self-explanatory letter” from Detective Constable Millar for “Mr. Hawkins’ perusal.” In this brief memo to Mr. Hawkins, Mr. Robert writes:

During the week following this incident Mr. Seguin had advised me of the visit of Travis Varley, Bob Varley, Andrew MacDonald and Mark Woods and the shock he had when he learned of the fatality.

Due to the fact that Mr. Seguin’s involvement was very brief and that he was embarrassed and made it clear that he had not the habit of having clients at his residence, Constable Millar and I recommend that no further action be taken. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Robert testified that he recommended that no action be taken against Mr. Seguin because, based on his discussions with Detective Constable Millar, (1) Mr. Seguin had no advance knowledge that his client would appear at his home; and (2) Mr. Seguin was embarrassed about the incident. Mr. Robert recommended “no further action be taken,” despite the fact that he knew there had been a serious violation of Ministry policies and that he himself believed that Mr. Seguin’s behaviour had been inappropriate.

Mr. Hawkins testified that he was “shocked” and “outraged” when he received the September 8, 1992, correspondence from Mr. Robert. Mr. Seguin’s involvement in the Varley incident was on January 8, 1992, and eight months had passed before Mr. Hawkins was notified about this matter. Mr. Hawkins thought this “very serious incident” had been treated superficially; more research and investigation were necessary. Moreover, he did not consider the information conveyed to him by Mr. Robert to be very credible. The Regional Manager also thought that the inappropriate conduct and judgment exercised by the probation officer was merely the “tip of the iceberg”:

I was surprised and shocked that this very, very serious incident seemed to be dealt with in such a superficial and trivial way. In fact, I would put my language a little stronger than that, I was outraged by the way this was being handled and the recommendations that were being made. I don’t find the evidence that was accumulated and recorded here as being very credible.

...

... I just don’t think that probationers are having social contact with a probation officer under these circumstances without much more going on than is being disclosed to me. And I think what we’re looking at is the tip of the iceberg. And I suspect that there is a big iceberg not being revealed, and I just don’t see anybody digging more deeply to see whether or not this might be in back of the case. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Hawkins also had concerns from this letter about the manner in which the OPP was treating this incident:

... I think that there was a responsibility to go much more deeply into the circumstances and background of what had taken place. On the face of it, it would appear to me that Mr. Seguin’s statements were being accepted at face value in terms of what he said, and I, quite frankly, have an issue of credibility with it.

Deborah Newman, Deputy Minister at the time she gave her testimony at the Inquiry, thought the September 3, 1992, letter from Detective Constable Millar to Mr. Robert disclosed serious issues that merited a Ministry investigation for the following reasons: (1) Mr. Seguin had failed to reveal in his incident report that he had served alcohol; and (2) the probation officer seemed to have significant judgment issues.

Mr. Hawkins responded to Mr. Robert's correspondence on October 16, 1992. The Regional Manager considered Mr. Seguin's involvement in the Varley matter to be "very serious" and in need of immediate attention and resolution. He raised the possibility of disciplinary action against Mr. Seguin. It is evident from his memo that Mr. Hawkins was concerned about access of the Ministry client to Mr. Seguin's home, the serving of alcohol by the probation officer, and the discussions Mr. Seguin had had with a "person before the courts about sentence." The correspondence from Mr. Hawkins to Mr. Robert is as follows:

After careful review of the materials you forwarded to me on the above-noted employee, it would appear that there is a need for meeting and possibly taking disciplinary action.

I assume Mr. Seguin is familiar with the Ministry policy on contact with offenders and ex-offenders. This being the case, I have obvious questions about the apparent ease of access to Mr. Seguin's residence, which included the serving of alcohol and discussion with a person before the courts about sentence. Mr. Seguin was unaware of the earlier consumption of alcohol by his guests, although the police report would suggest they had consumed alcohol prior to their visit to Mr. Seguin.

In any case, my purpose in writing is not to review the discrepancies, but to ensure the evidence is reviewed carefully with Mr. Seguin and that he be given an opportunity to provide credible comment. If discipline is warranted, so be it.

The employee should receive a copy of the police report and be made aware a copy will go in his personnel file. In addition, there should be a review of the Ministry policy with the employee and, if warranted, discipline should be imposed.

This is a very serious matter and must be dealt with fairly, quickly and with a view to ensuring no recurrence.

Mr. Hawkins asked Mr. Robert to review the matter with Mr. Seguin and to obtain additional information on what had occurred the night of January 8, 1992. As Mr. Hawkins explained, "I was telling him that I regarded this matter much more seriously than either he or the police officer who had completed the report seemed to be taking the matter, and I wanted it to be looked at more seriously and thoroughly." Mr. Hawkins questioned whether Mr. Seguin should continue to be an employee of the Ministry if a pattern of such behaviour by the probation officer was found:

I don't have enough facts, but it's alarming to me, and if there certainly is a pattern of this, I would question whether an employee embarking on that kind of contact with probationers ought to be an employee of the Ministry.

Mr. Hawkins considered the conduct of Ken Seguin "highly suspect"; in his opinion, "the information ... that Mr. Seguin gave was not ... credible information."

It is noteworthy that although Mr. Hawkins viewed the Varley incident as "extremely serious," he did not respond in writing to Mr. Robert's letter for five weeks. Mr. Hawkins could not explain this delay when he testified at the Inquiry.

When Mr. Robert received Mr. Hawkins' October 1992 letter, he knew that the Regional Manager did not agree with his evaluation of the Varley incident. Mr. Hawkins clearly did not concur with Mr. Robert's position (in his September 1992 correspondence) that "no further action be taken" against Ken Seguin. As mentioned, Mr. Robert explained that he had taken this position because Mr. Seguin's "involvement was very brief," Mr. Seguin was "embarrassed," and the probation officer had made it clear that he was not in "the habit of having clients at his residence."

After receiving this letter from his Regional Manager, Mr. Robert decided to send a letter of counsel to Ken Seguin. A letter of counsel is a first warning to an employee that there is behaviour unacceptable to the Ministry that should not be repeated in the future. A letter of counsel is not part of the disciplinary process. As explained by Ms Newman and by Special Investigator Paul Downing, the first step in the disciplinary process is a letter of reprimand. If any employee receives a letter of counsel, in contrast to a letter of reprimand, it is not a subject of grievance.

Mr. Robert decided not to suspend Mr. Seguin, give him an official reprimand, or terminate his employment. Nor did he recommend a Ministry investigation of Mr. Seguin's conduct as a probation officer. The letter sent by Mr. Robert to Mr. Seguin on November 10, 1992, said:

Further to today's meeting I wish to confirm our discussion regarding your involvement with Mr. Mark Woods, a ministry client, on January 9, 1992. Attached is a police report from O.P.P. Detective/Constable R. Miller [sic] which is self-explanatory.

I wish to bring to your attention that it is improper to allow ministry clients to visit your residence and to offer them alcoholic beverages. Further, we have reviewed the ministry policy on employee contact with offenders/ex-offenders. I have enclosed a copy for your reference. I am bringing this matter to your attention in order that future similar incidents can be avoided. You should be advised that if a similar situation should arise, disciplinary action could be imposed.

If you wish to discuss this matter further please do not hesitate to contact me.

About three months later, on February 5, 1993, Mr. Robert forwarded to Mr. Hawkins the November 1992 letter of counsel to Ken Seguin. In Mr. Hawkins' view, the Cornwall Area Manager "took the minimal amount of action, flowing out of my instructions, that could be taken." Mr. Hawkins considered the letter of counsel "a very weak response to a very serious situation." Mr. Robert had simply cautioned Mr. Seguin that it was improper to permit Ministry clients to visit his home and for Mr. Seguin to serve them alcohol. Despite the breach of Ministry policy on employee contact with clients, Mr. Robert, Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office, failed to discipline Mr. Seguin with respect to his contacts with Ministry clients.

No Investigation Recommended

Neither the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office nor the Regional Manager, nor other officials at the Ministry of Correctional Services recommended that an investigation of Mr. Seguin's involvement in the Varley incident be undertaken.

Mr. Robert does not appear to have sought an opinion from Human Resources regarding possible disciplinary measures that could be imposed on Mr. Seguin. The former Cornwall Area Manager stated that had he suspended Mr. Seguin, the suspension would probably have been reduced through the grievance process. When asked why he did not recommend a Ministry investigation into this matter, Mr. Robert responded that such a request was not within his authority but rather was the responsibility of Regional Manager Roy Hawkins. After receiving Mr. Robert's correspondence of February 5, 1993, stating that a letter of counsel had been sent to Mr. Seguin, Mr. Hawkins also did not take any further action.

In Mr. Hawkins' opinion, Mr. Robert could have requested a Ministry investigation of the probation officer's involvement in the Varley matter:

I think he [Mr. Robert] was well aware of the types of discipline that were open to him and if he was either unable or unwilling to do the necessary kind of investigation to get to the root of this, then he certainly would have been aware that I had serious concerns about it. He could have suggested or asked for a Ministry investigation.

... [I]t doesn't have to be the regional administrator who initiates an investigation being done. The area manager could say, "Look, this thing is maybe bigger tha[n] I'm capable of dealing with, could we have the Ministry investigators come in and do it?"

And clearly, Mr. Hawkins himself could have initiated an investigation. As the Regional Manager said in his evidence, he considered the Varley incident a very serious situation, "highly suspect," and was disappointed with Mr. Robert's handling of the matter. Mr. Hawkins acknowledged that in retrospect, a Ministry investigation was something he should have considered:

COUNSEL: ... [I]f you could have done things differently in this particular case, you suggested that one option would have—you could have considered a Ministry investigation?

MR. HAWKINS: Yes, absolutely.

COUNSEL: And looking at it today, that's probably where you would have gone?

MR. HAWKINS: Probably would have been the route I went.

COUNSEL: And if that type of Ministry investigation came back indicating that the matter was viewed as more serious than perhaps as outlined in the OPP letter, then you could have considered more severe discipline?

MR. HAWKINS: More severe discipline, up to and including termination of employment.

Mr. Hawkins agreed that the grievance process had a chilling effect on the willingness of a manager to impose discipline on a Ministry employee. Decisions made by managers were often successfully challenged. The reluctance of managers to impose disciplinary measures, Mr. Hawkins conceded, was clearly a problem.

Deputy Minister Deborah Newman also discussed the impact of the grievance process on the willingness to impose disciplinary measures on Ministry employees: "[I]n order to have discipline that's upheld, there may be times when you think you'd like to take more serious discipline but you know that it won't be upheld and ... if you terminate that employee they will be reinstated." She was not surprised that "it became a consideration for some managers ... [W]e were beaten down by grievances.” Ms Newman said there is a “backlog of 10,000 grievances at any given time” at the Ministry:

This is a very litigious Ministry with a very strong tendency to file grievances as a response and we’ve had cases go to the grievance settlement board where you may think it’s a very clearcut case for termination, and we’ve lost those ... cases and had employee[s] reinstated, so it does get to be—people become weary of trying to do the right thing and getting beaten down, I guess, in the view of some managers.”

But Ms Newman thought a Ministry investigation of the Varley matter should have been undertaken. As she said in her testimony, “[I]f that were my decision at that time ... I would have requested an investigation.” Ms Newman also agreed that if the Area Manager was not inclined to investigate, the Regional Manager could override that decision:

In my opinion, there ought to have been an investigation conducted when the incident report came in to uncover all of the facts, including liaison with the police and sharing of information.

Based on the findings and determinations of the investigation, then there ought to have been a disciplinary meeting and there ought to have been consultation between the regional manager and the area manager as to the appropriate degree of discipline.

Ms Newman considered the absence of an investigation a missed opportunity to seek more information about the behaviour of the Cornwall probation officer. I agree. In my view, Mr. Hawkins, Mr. Robert, and other Ministry officials should have initiated an investigation into the Varley incident and Mr. Seguin’s contacts and relationship with Ministry clients.

Cornwall probation officers, including Carole Cardinal, were unaware that Mr. Seguin had not been disciplined for his behaviour in the Varley incident. It was not until shortly before Ms Cardinal testified at this Inquiry that she learned that the probation officer had not been subjected to any disciplinary measures. Ms Cardinal considered Mr. Robert’s failure to discipline Mr. Seguin another example of preferential treatment by the Cornwall Area Manager. Ron Gendron, another probation officer in the Cornwall office, expressed similar sentiments. He and his co-workers discussed the Varley incident, which they considered extremely inappropriate conduct on the part of a probation officer. As Mr. Gendron said, it was “irresponsible” behaviour and a “flagrant violation.” Ron Gendron also believed that Mr. Seguin was not disciplined for his conduct because he was favoured by Area Manager Emile Robert: there was a “clear violation of rules”; Mr. Seguin was “breaking a conflict of interest rule that the manager knew about ... Emile Robert knew that,” but “there were no consequences.” This was echoed by Mr. van Diepen, who did not think that Mr. Robert gave Mr. Seguin’s involvement in the Varley incident and the breach of Ministry standards the serious attention that it warranted.

Varley Incident Not Reflected in Performance Appraisals of Ken Seguin and Emile Robert

The Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office made no reference to the Varley incident in the performance appraisal of Mr. Seguin. In his evaluation of Mr. Seguin for the period July 1991–June 1992, Mr. Robert did not mention the violation by the probation officer of Ministry standards and his inappropriate behaviour in the Varley incident. On the contrary, Mr. Robert wrote, “Mr. Seguin is a very good employee. He has demonstrated a high level of initiative and proficiency in his work.” Again in Mr. Seguin’s performance appraisal for July 1992–June 1993, there is no mention of the Varley incident or the letter of counsel sent by Mr. Robert to Mr. Seguin in November 1992. And again Mr. Robert writes, “Mr. Seguin is a dedicated employee. He shows initiative and proficiency in his work. I am pleased with his work performance.” Mr. Robert could not explain, when asked at the hearings, why he did not include the letter of counsel in Mr. Seguin’s performance review: “Je pourrais pas vous expliquer pourquoi je l’ai pas mis dans son rapport d’évaluation.” When questioned further, Mr. Robert acknowledged that it was not his practice to include in the performance evaluation disciplinary measures imposed on an employee.

Regional Manager Roy Hawkins testified that he never saw a negative personal evaluation report of Mr. Seguin. It was Mr. Hawkins’ practice to initial the evaluation reports of the probation officers in the Cornwall office. Mr. Hawkins testified that he expected Mr. Robert to include the letter of counsel in Mr. Seguin’s evaluation report. Mr. Hawkins said that if he was concerned that a matter was not referred to in the evaluation report, it was his practice to communicate this to the Area Manager in writing. However, Mr. Hawkins had no recollection of directing Mr. Robert to include the Varley matter and the letter of counsel in Mr. Seguin’s performance appraisal:

If I did have a concern about something that had taken place that I was aware of that should be included within the document, I would communicate that back to the area manager in writing.

I don't recall ever specifically directing an area manager to put something in a report, but it is something that I would expect to be in the report, the evaluation report, in the subsequent year that the letter of counsel had been sent with regard to whatever the matter had been. That would normally be procedure.

Mr. Hawkins testified that although he was aware of the Varley incident in September 1992, he did not see the July 1992–June 1993 appraisal as it was not initialled by him.

Ms Newman was also of the view that the Varley incident should have been included in the performance evaluation. I agree. It was incumbent on the Area Manager to include this information in Mr. Seguin's performance appraisal. It was important that such evaluations clearly reflect the breaches of Ministry standards, the fraternization with Ministry clients, the serving of alcohol, and the inappropriate behaviour by probation officer Mr. Seguin.

Despite Mr. Hawkins' "outrage" at the Varley incident and Mr. Robert's poor handling of the situation, Mr. Hawkins himself did not reflect his concerns in Mr. Robert's evaluation report. In the February 26, 1993, evaluation signed by Mr. Hawkins, the Regional Manager writes:

Mr. Robert has been an Area Manager for nearly eight years in Cornwall and has made a significant contribution in providing stability and direction to staff in that area. The major achievement in this past year locally has been the restructuring of contract services. At the provincial level he has made a major contribution to the employment systems review. Attendance has been excellent with a minimal number of credits used.

As Mr. Hawkins acknowledged in this evidence, this is a positive statement about Emile Robert's performance. This evaluation was signed by Mr. Hawkins three weeks after he received correspondence from Mr. Robert that a letter of counsel had been sent to Mr. Seguin. Yet Mr. Hawkins did not include any comments about the manner in which Mr. Robert had handled the Varley incident: that Mr. Robert did not notify him until eight months had passed, that Mr. Robert had not adequately investigated the incident, and that Mr. Hawkins thought that the letter of counsel was an inappropriate response in the circumstances. Mr. Hawkins had "a number of concerns" about Mr. Robert's competence as a manager and he thought that Mr. Robert handled the Varley situation very poorly, yet none of this is reflected in Mr. Robert's performance appraisal. As Mr. Hawkins conceded, "[T]here isn't any reference to the letter of counsel at all in this," and there is no sense of outrage.

Mr. Hawkins agreed that he could have specified in Mr. Robert's evaluation that these areas required improvement. In my view, Mr. Hawkins should have delineated his concerns about Mr. Robert's competence as a manager as well as his poor handling of the Varley incident in Mr. Robert's performance appraisal. This would have ensured that regional managers who succeeded Mr. Hawkins, as well as other officials at the Ministry of Correctional Services, were apprised of and had access to this important information.

A problem that emerged is that because these Ministry violations and poor management practices were not reflected in the performance appraisals of the probation officer and the area manager, supervisors and area managers who succeeded Roy Hawkins and Emile Robert and other Ministry officials might not have been aware of such matters as the Varley incident.

In my view, Mr. Emile Robert failed to adequately supervise Mr. Ken Seguin and to ensure that the Ministry conflict of interest policies were adhered to. Mr. Robert also failed to sufficiently discipline Mr. Seguin with respect to his inappropriate contacts with Ministry clients and his omission of critical information in the incident report regarding the presence of alcohol. The Ministry of Correctional Services also failed to ensure proper management of the Cornwall Probation Office and failed to thoroughly investigate deficient management practices in relation to the conduct of Mr. Seguin. The Ministry, through its employees, knew or should have known of Mr. Seguin's inappropriate contacts with Ministry clients, which contravened Ministry policies and ethical principles applicable to probation and parole officers. Also, the Ministry and its employees failed to impose discipline on Mr. Emile Robert with respect to the Cornwall Area Manager's deficient management practices regarding Mr. Ken Seguin.

Deborah Newman Sends a Mediator to the Cornwall Probation Office, Emile Robert Is Subsequently Transferred to Ottawa

Mr. Hawkins remained the Regional Manager of the Cornwall office until 1993.

Bill Roy, the Regional Manager who succeeded Roy Hawkins,²¹ noticed the tension between Mr. Robert and his staff: the "snickering" and "sarcasm." He, too, observed that the relationship between Mr. van Diepen and Mr. Robert was very strained. In his opinion, Mr. van Diepen undermined Mr. Robert's authority. The relationship between Mr. Robert and his staff concerned Bill Roy and he discussed these issues with the Cornwall Area Manager. However, the problems persisted. As Mr. Roy said, "It was sort of like there all the time." The situation did not improve.

21. From 1993 to 1997, Bill Roy was the Regional Manager of the Eastern Office in Kingston.

Mr. Robert conceded that there were difficulties with staff and morale, but he attributed most of these problems, particularly before Mr. Seguin's death, to his absence from the Cornwall Probation Office. Beginning in 1991, Mr. Robert was involved in the employment systems review, a Ministry project. Mr. Robert travelled to Toronto, and for about two years, he was seldom in the Cornwall Probation Office.

Throughout the 1990s, the relationship between Emile Robert and his staff deteriorated. The tension and acrimony between the Cornwall Area Manager and his staff escalated during the 1996 Ontario Public Service Employees Union (OPSEU) strike. Mr. Robert testified that on a cold day during the strike, he brought coffee to the employees on the picket line. Carole Cardinal, he said, blocked his access to the office and Mr. Robert called the police. On another day when he arrived at the office at about 7:00 a.m., approximately fifty people were picketing, some of whom were wearing balaclavas. Fluid had been injected into the locks of the doors, which prevented Mr. Robert from entering his office. Administrative assistant Louise Quinn recalled this incident during her testimony. On another occasion, when Mr. Robert was on a conference call, strikers tied a rope from his door handle and attached it to another door, which prevented Mr. Robert from leaving his office. These were only some of the incidents experienced by the Area Manager during the 1996 OPSEU strike.

In 1996, Deborah Newman became responsible for the Cornwall Probation Office in her position at the Ministry as District Administrator. Mr. Robert reported directly to Ms Newman. In that year, after the public service strike, she visited the Cornwall office and interviewed each employee: probation officers as well as administrative assistants. It was apparent to her that "there were very poor workplace relationships between the area manager, Emile Robert, and the staff of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office."

The purpose of the interviews was to identify specific problems in the Cornwall office. Staff expressed the following concerns regarding Mr. Robert:

1. Differential treatment—different standards for different staff
2. Poor interpersonal skills
3. Personal sensitivity and defensiveness
4. Tendency not to accept responsibility and to blame others
5. Staff felt undervalued and not appreciated.

It was evident to Ms Newman that the relationship between the Cornwall Area Manager and his staff had been seriously affected during the public service strike; it "had long-lasting effects in terms of the damage done to relationships." Ms Newman testified that in the 1996 interviews, none of the staff raised with her any issue with regard to allegations of abuse involving either Nelson Barque or Ken Seguin. The discussions were focused on the Area Manager, Mr. Robert.

Ms Newman transferred Mr. Robert in 1997 for a six-month period to the Rideau Correctional and Treatment Centre. She wanted to expose Mr. Robert to other models of management and help him to develop skills in interacting with employees. Mr. Robert had expressed to Ms Newman an interest in an assignment in Ottawa.

Ms Newman completed a performance appraisal for Mr. Robert in 1997. Although the review was on the whole favourable, Mr. Robert received a below-average rating, two out of five, under “Achieving People Strength.” The review describes the working relationships and the low morale in the Cornwall office:

There is a relatively lengthy history of a difficult working relationship between Mr. Robert and the probation officers in the Cornwall office. The staff have raised their concerns with the District office, indicating that working relationships are strained between them and their area manager. This results in poor morale in the work environment. While it is clear that there are some complex dynamics involved, including some difficult to manage staff, there is room for a more flexible approach to some issues. It is likely that this would yield positive results while still holding staff accountable for their performance and compliance with policies and procedures.

It has been agreed that the District Administrator will assist in the resolution of key business issues of concern in the office and that a mediator will be appointed to assist in resolving the working relationship issues. Mr. Robert is encouraged to consult with the District Office on staff relations issues.

When he testified at the Inquiry, Mr. Robert assumed some responsibility for the poor morale in the Cornwall office: “[J]e prenais responsabilité de ma part. Oui, j’étais rigide, puis dans une relation, lorsqu’elle était devenue très difficile, je suis devenue très rigide.”

In the 1997 performance appraisal signed by Ms Newman, the following comment is made with regard to case audits:

While the audits are meticulous and convey a very high standard in auditing, the probation staff find them to be intimidating and somewhat overwhelming. Their experience of the process is negative and they do not feel that there is sufficient positive recognition afforded through this audit tool.

Ms Newman thought a mediator might be of assistance in resolving some of the tensions between the Cornwall Area Manager and his employees. She approached both Mr. Robert and the staff and they were receptive to this suggestion. Ms Newman subsequently engaged the services of Roger Newell, a staff development officer at the Ministry training centre who was skilled in mediation.

Mr. Newell had meetings with staff from the Cornwall office in early 1998. In a document entitled “Tangible Issues and Concerns Raised by Staff About the Manager,” Mr. Newell delineated some of the problems discussed by probation employees. They included:

Low Morale

The following is a list of problem areas identified by staff. With respect to management and management style:

1. Not a team player
2. Promotes dissension
3. Lack of staff support
4. Double standards
5. Delegation of duties
6. Lack of appreciation
7. Poor communication skills
8. Attitude towards POAO
9. Personality issues.

Ms Newman agreed at the Inquiry hearings that the poor relationship between Mr. Robert and his staff and the “dysfunctional work environment” could inhibit employees from reporting important information to their Area Manager.

After Mr. Robert returned to the Cornwall office and the mediation process had taken place, it was evident to Ms Newman that “the damage was irreparable.” Mr. Robert was transferred from the Cornwall Probation Office. As Ms Newman testified:

... [U]ltimately when this mediation concluded it became evident to me that that had not repaired the damage done to the relationship. Essentially the damage was irreparable. Despite the best efforts of all of the parties in mediation it was not successful.

And so it was at that point in time that I engaged Mr. Robert in a transfer to the Ottawa—one of the Ottawa Probation and Parole offices under close supervision.

In late 1998, Mr. Robert left the Cornwall office for Ottawa.

The Establishment of the Independent Investigations Unit in 1992

As a result of complaints of sexual harassment by female employees who attended the Ministry of Correctional Services Bell Cairn Training Centre in Hamilton, as well as complaints from other Ministry employees, the Independent Investigations Unit (IIU) was established in 1992. Corrections officials were of the view that a separate unit should be created within the Ministry to investigate complaints of sexual improprieties and harassment. Until that time, the Management Board Secretariat had been responsible for such complaints throughout the Ontario government.

The first manager of the IIU was Gwen Boniface. Lenna Bradburn assumed this position in September 1993 and remained manager of the IIU until December 1994. The Deputy Minister at that time was Michele Noble and the Assistant Deputy Minister was Don Evans. When Ms Bradburn became the manager of the IIU in 1993, there were approximately four to six investigators and one administrative support person.

The 1992 terms of reference make it clear that the IIU is independent. Under “purpose,” it states:

To demonstrate its genuine commitment to zero tolerance with respect to workplace discrimination and workplace harassment, the Ministry of Correctional Services is establishing a separate unit to provide a neutral, independent, and specialized investigatory capacity.

It is stipulated in the terms of reference that “none of the investigators” of the IIU “will be chosen from existing employees of the Ministry of Correctional Services.” Lenna Bradburn testified that the Ministry was committed to the principle of the independence of the IIU. The intent, she said, was for the IIU to be independent from both management and the union.

The IIU was required to investigate all complaints of workplace discrimination, workplace harassment, and all complaints of sexual impropriety alleged to have been committed by employees of the Ministry toward offenders within its responsibility. The terms of reference stated:

This Unit will investigate the following:

- All complaints of workplace discrimination alleged to have been committed by employees of the Ministry of Correctional Services;
- All complaints of workplace harassment alleged to have been committed by employees of the Ministry of Correctional Services; and

- All complaints of sexual impropriety alleged to have been committed by employees of the Ministry of Correctional Services towards offenders who come within the responsibility of the Ministry. (Emphasis added)

The “scope” provision in the terms of reference reiterated that the IIU was required to investigate all allegations of sexual impropriety, which included both gestures and oral and written remarks. These behaviours were merely examples and were not exhaustive of the acts that fell within the ambit of sexual impropriety:

The unit will investigate all allegations of workplace discrimination or harassment. The unit will also investigate any allegations of sexual impropriety (including gestures, oral or written remarks, etc.) by employees towards others, including offenders. The unit will be expected to give primary focus to any allegations of a sexual nature, and to reprisals of any sort. (Emphasis added)

Ms Bradburn understood that sexual impropriety clearly fell within the responsibility of the IIU, and that the IIU terms of reference mandated investigation in such cases. However, since its establishment, the IIU had essentially investigated complaints of workplace harassment and workplace discrimination. As Ms Bradburn said at the hearings, “over 99 percent” of the work of the IIU dealt with workplace harassment and workplace discrimination from employees of the Ministry. And, Ms Bradburn added, until she received a call concerning an allegation by David Silmsner of sexual impropriety, “I personally don’t recall any other sexual impropriety” case.

Ms Bradburn explained that when a complaint was received, the IIU would determine whether it fell within its mandate: “[I]t didn’t mean that just because everything came in the door, it would get investigated.”

The IIU was required, pursuant to the terms of reference, to notify the police of allegations of sexual assault or other serious criminal acts:

If, at any time during the course of an investigation, the investigators uncover allegations of sexual assault or any other serious criminal activity, they shall determine whether the manager has notified the police, and, if not, the unit shall notify the police pursuant to the ministry’s protocol for contacting police.

Ms Bradburn explained that the IIU would often pursue its own investigation even in circumstances in which it had notified the police. This would occur as long as the IIU did not jeopardize the police investigation or a criminal prosecution. As the manager of the IIU said, “We would be guided by the police or Crown Attorneys with respect to proceeding.”

The following duties and responsibilities of the IIU were also delineated in the terms of reference:

... [T]he Unit will:

- receive and investigate all complaints of workplace harassment or discrimination;
- immediately inform all involved parties that the complaint is under investigation and of the investigation process;
- develop an investigation plan with respect to each complaint;
- except as required to conduct the investigation, maintain confidentiality of the allegations and the investigation;
- maintain documents in a confidential filing system;
- report in writing to the Deputy Ministers summarizing the results of the investigation, including an analysis of the evidence and the conclusions of the investigator, within 60 days of receiving the complaint
 - if the individual was suspended from duty pending the investigation, every attempt should be made to provide a preliminary report to the Deputy Ministers as soon as possible, and in any event, within five business days
 - the individual under investigation will be expected to make himself or herself available to the Unit’s investigators;
- if, during the course of the investigation, the investigator forms the opinion that intermediate remedial measures should be taken before the conclusion of the investigation, the Deputy Ministers shall be advised immediately in writing ...

The terms of reference also stated that the IIU investigator “shall have access to all ministry staff and records for purposes of conducting an investigation.” Moreover, all employees and persons connected with the Ministry of Correctional Services were required to “assist and cooperate with the investigators to the fullest extent” to enable the investigators to discharge their duties and responsibilities pursuant to the terms of reference. The investigators in the IIU were designated by the Minister under section 22 of the Ministry of Correctional Services Act. The IIU investigators had legal powers to execute their duties.

It is important to note that the terms of reference of the IIU did not require that a complaint be made in writing. Ms Bradburn acknowledged that a written complaint was not required to initiate an IIU investigation.

The IIU had a dual reporting relationship. It reported to the Deputy Minister of Correctional Services and to the Deputy Minister of Management Board Secretariat. This was attributable to the fact that although the Deputy Minister of Management Board Secretariat was responsible for workplace harassment and discrimination throughout the Ontario government, the Ministry of Correctional Services had established its own unit to investigate such complaints.

Lenna Bradburn, as manager of the IIU, reported to the Deputy Minister of Correctional Services who, as mentioned, was at that time Michele Noble. Ms Bradburn reported to the Deputy Minister on administrative matters such as the budget, staffing, and resources required by the IIU. In terms of IIU investigations, the Unit generally had contact with the Deputy Minister's Office at the conclusion of its investigation, after the IIU had forwarded its report and recommendations to the Deputy Minister. The Deputy Minister would then decide the appropriate course of action, including whether to implement recommendations put forth in the IIU report such as disciplinary measures. As Ms Bradburn explained, the IIU did not "actually apply discipline to employees or take any kind of action against employees that were found to have substantiated complaints."

Loretta Eley, executive assistant to the Deputy Minister at that time, agreed that it was the IIU's responsibility to assess whether the complaint fell within its mandate and to determine whether it would conduct an investigation. Once the investigation was completed, the IIU was to forward its report to the Deputy Minister. Any follow-up in terms of discipline or other actions fell under the authority of the Deputy Minister of Correctional Services.

When Ms Bradburn became manager of the IIU, one of her responsibilities was to implement operating procedures for the Unit. She also managed the workflow at the IIU and assigned cases to the investigators. A "hotelling" concept was implemented; investigators worked from their home offices and travelled periodically to the IIU office to collect and return files. The IIU dealt with approximately 200 files a year with a sixty-day turnaround time during Ms Bradburn's tenure as manager.

Nowhere in the 1992 terms of reference does it state that the IIU will not conduct an investigation of sexual impropriety if a complaint is made concerning a deceased or former employee of the Ministry. When David Silmsier complained to the Ministry of Correctional Services that his former probation officer, Mr. Ken Seguin, had committed acts of sexual impropriety, the alleged perpetrator was no longer alive. Lenna Bradburn was manager of the IIU at the time when Mr. Silmsier contacted the Ministry.

Regional Manager Receives a Call From David Silmsers: Allegations of Sexual Abuse by a Former Probation Officer at the Cornwall Office

When Bill Roy, Regional Manager (Eastern Region), was on the telephone in Kingston in the late afternoon of December 15, 1993, his secretary and the Youth Services Coordinator walked into his office in a visibly anxious state. They gestured to Mr. Roy to conclude his call and handed him a note that said he needed to respond immediately to someone on the phone. When Mr. Roy read the note and saw their reactions, he ended his call.

The Ministry staff told Mr. Roy that a man, waiting on the telephone, had alleged that he had been abused as a probationer by a probation officer who had recently committed suicide. The caller, Mr. Roy was told, was very agitated. Mr. Roy's secretary explained that as soon as she realized the seriousness of the call, she connected this man with the Youth Services Coordinator because of his reference to probation and to abuse when he was a child. The Youth Services Coordinator did not feel comfortable taking the call and urged Mr. Roy to speak with the man directly. This was highly irregular. Regional managers, Mr. Roy testified, rarely speak directly to clients.

The male caller disclosed to Mr. Roy that he had been abused by Ken Seguin, his former probation officer. He said that he had a deal worked out with Mr. Seguin for a sum of money, but the "son of a bitch killed himself." Mr. Roy became upset and said that he did not wish to discuss the problem in this manner. According to Mr. Roy, David Silmsers responded, "Well, that's just the way it is and ... if I can't get it from him I'll get it from you."

Mr. Roy "started to get worked up." In the approximately twenty-five years that he had worked at the Ministry of Correctional Services, he never had been confronted with a situation such as this. The Regional Manager made it clear to the caller that he was "not inclined to write any cheques" but that he would follow up on this if the caller could provide his full name and telephone number. David Silmsers conveyed this information.

Mr. Roy told Mr. Silmsers that he would follow the Ministry procedures for issues of this nature. He explained that he would contact the Independent Investigations Unit, which was responsible for these types of complaints. He assured David Silmsers that the Ministry would "take it very seriously."

The conversation did not end at that point. Mr. Silmsers said he needed support and counselling and added, "I'm not the only one" or "there are more of us." It was at this point that the Regional Manager realized that there could be other victims. Mr. Silmsers, in an agitated state, said there was a service or centre for abused victims and family members. It was evident that Mr. Silmsers felt he needed counselling for the sexual abuse that had allegedly been committed on him in his youth by his probation officer.

David Silmsers told Mr. Roy that he had already notified the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) about the sexual abuse committed by Ken Seguin. But, he continued, the police, “were jerking me around” so he decided to tell them to “drop the investigation.” He mentioned that he had told the police that he had retained a lawyer and that he intended to pursue the matter civilly. The investigation of the Silmsers complaint by the Cornwall Police Service is discussed in detail in the following chapter of this Report.

The beginning of the conversation with David Silmsers had been fairly heated, but by the end of the call, Mr. Silmsers had settled down and was “mellow.” Mr. Roy realized that he himself had “got hot fast because of his [David Silmsers’s] threats with the money.” Mr. Roy testified that he “really did take” the matter “seriously” and that he had tried to convey this to Mr. Silmsers. Mr. Roy concluded the call with the assurance that he:

... would be passing this on to the team ... to the office that would investigate it, and failing that, because of how I guess I had behaved I said, “I’ll phone you back.” I didn’t want to lose him.

Mr. Roy was surprised that David Silmsers had contacted his office in Kingston. As the Regional Manager acknowledged, “I guess he was reaching out for something.”

Bill Roy had been the Regional Manager for about four months when he received the call from David Silmsers. The Cornwall Probation and Parole Office was one of six offices supervised by Mr. Roy.

Bill Roy Contacts the IIU, the Deputy Minister’s Office, and the Police

After receiving the December 15, 1993, telephone call from David Silmsers, Mr. Roy contacted a number of Ministry officials. The first call he made was to the Independent Investigations Unit, to Manager Lenna Bradburn. Mr. Roy knew that the IIU investigated complaints of sexual improprieties or misconduct and that he should contact this Unit. He believed he was following Ministry policy by reporting the call from David Silmsers to the IIU.

On December 16, 1993, Mr. Roy spoke to Ms Bradburn. He reported that he had received a call from a person who alleged he had been sexually abused by his probation officer, Ken Seguin, who was a former Ministry employee. This probation officer, Ms Bradburn learned, had committed suicide three weeks earlier. Mr. Roy advised the IIU manager that the alleged victim, a young offender at the time of the abuse, “had been privately seeking restitution through his lawyer from the deceased party.” When Ms Bradburn received this call in December 1993, it was the first time she had encountered a complaint of this nature.

On the same day, Mr. Roy also contacted the CPS and the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) to report the complaint from David Silmser. Mr. Roy spoke with Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet, head of the Criminal Investigation Branch at the Cornwall Police Service, regarding Mr. Silmser's allegations of sexual abuse by Ken Seguin. The police force, Mr. Roy learned, was well aware of these allegations, which had been the subject of investigation. But Staff Sergeant Brunet relayed that the police investigation had been stopped at the request of the complainant. Staff Sergeant Brunet said the Cornwall police were upset at Mr. Silmser's "change of heart" but that it was police policy, in such circumstances, to discontinue the investigation. As mentioned, details of the CPS investigation of Mr. Silmser's allegations of historical sexual abuse are discussed in detail in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service.

Bill Roy also contacted the OPP Lancaster Detachment. The officer to whom he spoke said that the OPP was aware of the Silmser allegations against probation officer Ken Seguin, that he had been dealing with David Silmser for some time, and words to the effect that Mr. Silmser was "not reliable." When Paul Downing interviewed Bill Roy about the Silmser complaint several years later, in 2000, Mr. Roy told the Special Investigator that the OPP officer's comments "caught him off guard."

Mr. Roy was surprised to learn that both the CPS and the OPP were aware of David Silmser's allegations against one of his former employees but that neither he nor other Ministry officials had been contacted regarding this complaint of sexual impropriety. As I recommended earlier in this chapter, in the discussion of probation officer Nelson Barque, it is essential that the police and the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services develop a protocol to share such information.

On December 17, 1993, a call took place between Bill Roy's office and David Silmser. Mr. Silmser was very upset as he had expected the Ministry to contact him after his call with Mr. Roy. Mr. Silmser threatened to contact the Ottawa Citizen newspaper and to sue the Ministry of Correctional Services for a half million dollars if the Ministry did not promptly address his complaint.

Mr. Roy contacted Loretta Eley, the executive assistant to the Deputy Minister, to alert her to the Silmser allegations. Ms Eley learned that a former probationer had alleged that he had been sexually abused by Ken Seguin, his probation officer. Ms Eley was also told that Mr. Silmser had been "negotiating a civil remedy" with Mr. Seguin before his death and that he was worried he would not receive his compensation. She also learned that he was threatening to contact the media and to launch a lawsuit against the Ministry if it did not respond to his complaint.

Ms Eley testified that Mr. Roy did not discuss Mr. Silmser's request for counselling and support for himself and others who had been sexually molested.

Ms Eley claimed that had she been privy to this information, she would have referred Mr. Silmsers to resources in the community:

... I would have responded to it ... [W]e have resources that we can refer people to, and the fact that he was no longer a client, if he's calling us asking for help then we would certainly refer him to community resources.

Ms Eley considered this a serious matter. This was also the first time Ms Eley had encountered an allegation of sexual improprieties on a probationer by a Ministry employee.

December 17, 1993

Discussions Between the IIU Manager and the Deputy Minister's Office:

No Action Required of the IIU at This Time, Legal Branch Will Take the Lead

A conversation took place between Lenna Bradburn, manager of the IIU, and Loretta Eley, executive assistant to the Deputy Minister, on December 17, 1993. The two senior Ministry officials discussed the Silmsers complaint and the contact made by both Bill Roy and Ms Bradburn with the OPP and the CPS. The police had indicated that Mr. Silmsers was not interested in pursuing the matter criminally but rather was focused on obtaining a civil remedy.

According to the notes of Ms Bradburn, Ms Eley "advised Legal Branch would lead and there was no action required of IIU at this time." Ms Bradburn testified that Ms Eley was not instructing her but rather that it was their "shared view" that the Legal Branch of the Ministry would "take the lead" on this issue, given the references to the alleged criminal activity and the financial settlement. Ms Bradburn testified that it was her decision alone, as manager of the IIU, that "there was no action required of IIU at this time."

Ms Eley claimed Ms Bradburn's note that the "Legal Branch would lead" was an inaccurate reflection of their exchange on December 17, 1993. The Deputy Minister's executive assistant contended that she was simply communicating to the IIU manager that she would alert the Legal Branch to the Silmsers complaint in case the Ministry was sued. It was simply a "courtesy" to the Legal Branch.

The IIU Learns That Other Victims May Be Involved

In the mid-afternoon of December 17, 1993, Lenna Bradburn spoke to Bill Roy. The allegations by Silmsers were discussed as well as the police contact. Inscribed in Ms Bradburn's notes are the following statements:

- Silmser has suggested that the ministry should be offering counselling to him and others like him
- draws parallel with Grandview.

Clearly, the manager of the IIU knew that David Silmsers was asking the Ministry for counselling for the sexual abuse he had suffered from his probation officer, Ken Seguin. It is also evident from Ms Bradburn's notes that Mr. Silmsers disclosed that there were other victims of sexual abuse, who should also be offered counselling by the Ministry of Correctional Services.

Bill Roy's Last Communication With David Silmsers

Bill Roy contacted David Silmsers by telephone in the late afternoon of December 17, 1993. Mr. Silmsers told the Regional Manager that he was not an "asshole" sitting by the phone, and he again threatened to contact the Ottawa Citizen if the Ministry did not deal with his complaint in an expeditious manner. Mr. Silmsers said he was not surprised that he had not heard from a Ministry investigator and added that this was precisely the way he had been treated by the police. The delays and problems in the CPS investigation of the Silmsers complaint are discussed in Chapter 6. Mr. Silmsers made it clear to Mr. Roy that there was no point in phoning him again and that he expected an investigator from the Ministry to contact him. Mr. Roy left a record of this call on Lenna Bradburn's voicemail.

This call on December 17, 1993, was the last contact Mr. Roy had with David Silmsers. Unfortunately, despite Ms Bradburn's request that Mr. Roy follow up with Mr. Silmsers's complaint, the Regional Manager did not do so. Neither did Ms Bradburn or her staff in the IIU contact Mr. Silmsers or investigate his complaint, despite the mandatory language in the IIU's terms of reference, that an investigation must be conducted for all allegations of sexual improprieties.

Decision Silmsers Must Lodge His Complaint in Writing: Failure of the IIU to Investigate the Complaint

Despite the fact that there was no such requirement in the IIU terms of reference, a decision was made that the Silmsers complaint should be made in writing before an investigation of the alleged sexual impropriety could be undertaken. After discussions between Loretta Eley and Lenna Bradburn, it was decided that Mr. Silmsers would be asked to forward his complaint in writing to the Deputy Minister's Office if he wished to pursue his allegation of sexual abuse by his former probation officer. A decision was also made that Mr. Roy was the appropriate Ministry official to communicate this request to David Silmsers.

In a memo to Loretta Eley on December 22, 1993, Ms Bradburn writes:

I wish to take this opportunity to advise you of the action which has been taken regarding concerns raised by Mr. Silmsers.

As you are aware, Mr. Silmsers is a former probation client who has alleged that a probation officer, now deceased, sexually assaulted him some twenty years ago. Mr. Silmsers has recently contacted Bill Roy, Eastern Region, advising Bill that he had been seeking a private civil remedy with the probation officer prior to his apparent suicide.

I have spoken to Staff Sergeant Luke Brue [Luc Brunet], Cornwall City Police, and Constable Randy Miller [Millar], Lancaster OPP, who were both unable to provide any information which would substantiate Mr. Silmsers's allegations against the deceased probation officer.

As a result of our conversation on December 20, 1993, I spoke to Bill Roy this date requesting he contact Mr. Silmsers to advise him that if he wished to pursue his allegation with the Ministry, to forward his complaint to the Deputy Minister's Office. Bill indicated that he would try to contact Mr. Silmsers by telephone, with follow-up correspondence.

If you have any questions regarding the above, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Several important questions arise. Why was it decided that the Silmsers complaint must be in writing? Why was the complaint to be forwarded to the Deputy Minister's Office? Why did the IIU not investigate this matter as mandated in its terms of reference? And why did the Ministry not make further contact with David Silmsers after this decision was made? Although this memo states that Ms Bradburn asked Bill Roy to contact Mr. Silmsers to convey the information that a written complaint must be sent to the Deputy Minister's Office, no such communication between the Ministry of Correctional Services and David Silmsers took place.

A fundamental question is why the decision was made that the complaint must be in writing before an IIU investigation would take place. Ms Bradburn agreed in her evidence that a written complaint was not required in the IIU terms of reference. It had simply, she said, been a practice for complaints of workplace discrimination and harassment received by the IIU in the past to be submitted in writing. But this had merely been a practice, and importantly, this was a complaint of sexual impropriety by a former probationer, not a complaint of workplace harassment. Ms Bradburn agreed that probationers are in a vulnerable position with regard to the probation officers who supervise and exercise authority over them. But the manager of the IIU gave no thought at that time to the fact that requiring a complaint in writing might have created an obstacle for David Silmser to pursue his complaint with the Ministry.

Loretta Eley, executive assistant to the Deputy Minister, also agreed that policy did not require that complaints be submitted to the Ministry in writing: “[I]t’s not in our policy anywhere that you must put your complaints in writing.” Nor did Ms Eley consider that this requirement might prevent David Silmser from pursuing his complaint with Correctional Services.

Both Ms Bradburn and Ms Eley were also asked at the hearings why a written complaint was to be sent to the Deputy Minister’s Office. According to the IIU terms of reference, complaints of sexual impropriety clearly fell within the responsibility of the Unit. Ms Bradburn claimed that it was because there had been criminal allegations, the police were aware of Mr. Silmser’s complaint, there was mention of the involvement of a lawyer, and there had been a reference to Grandview, with the “inference” that a “financial settlement” was sought. But the manager of the IIU agreed that complaints of sexual impropriety alleged to have been committed by Ministry employees fell squarely within the mandate and responsibility of the IIU. When asked why she was conferring with the Deputy Minister’s Office and making decisions with Loretta Eley, Ms Bradburn explained that she had become manager of the IIU only two months before Mr. Silmser made his complaint and she thought she should consult the Deputy Minister’s Office.

To Ms Eley, “it seemed very reasonable” for Ms Bradburn to instruct Bill Roy to contact David Silmser and ask him to submit his complaint in writing before it was decided whether an IIU investigation would be undertaken. When asked why the executive assistant to the Deputy Minister was involved in this discussion about an IIU investigation, Ms Eley responded, “probably because I was new and didn’t know any better.”

To compound the problem, the Regional Manager at the Ministry did not contact David Silmser to inform him of the added necessity of filing a written complaint. Lenna Bradburn had directed Mr. Roy to telephone Mr. Silmser to ask him “to put his complaint in writing to the Deputy Minister in detail.” But Mr. Roy was of the view that a “further call” from him “would be less than useful” and suggested that he should instead send Mr. Silmser written correspondence. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Roy never sent David Silmser the written correspondence. He testified that there were two reasons for this decision: (1) after reviewing the matter with his superior, Mr. J. O’Brien (Regional Director, Eastern Region), they “decided to not write until a letter could be written by K. Hogg,” a lawyer at the Ministry; and (2) Mr. Roy claimed that he did not know David Silmsner’s address.

These explanations are not convincing. As Mr. Roy acknowledged, he knew David Silmsner’s full name and his phone number, and it would not have been very difficult to find his address. This was not attempted, nor did Mr. Roy follow up with the Legal Branch at the Ministry to determine whether they had corresponded with Mr. Silmsner. Mr. Roy claimed that he had planned, in accordance with Ms Bradburn’s request, to send a letter to Mr. Silmsner to ask that a written complaint be sent to the Deputy Minister’s Office. But this never occurred.

Lenna Bradburn testified that she was surprised that David Silmsner had not been asked to put his complaint in writing. She expected “the information would be communicated to Mr. Silmsner.” The IIU manager agreed there was a lack of communication, a gap in terms of how the Ministry dealt with Mr. Silmsner’s complaint. There was also no follow-up by Ms Bradburn or her staff in the IIU to determine whether Mr. Silmsner had received this information.

Mr. Roy testified that when he reported the Silmsner complaint to Ms Bradburn at the IIU, he expected the Unit to investigate the allegations. Mr. Roy claimed that he had some “misgivings” about requiring David Silmsner to put his complaint in writing: “It’s indicating to an alleged victim that he didn’t complain correctly.” And Mr. Roy added, “[P]utting another hoop in front of someone who’s already complained about being abused wasn’t exactly something I wanted to do ... I did think it was a little cumbersome ... [Y]ou’re going to add another layer ... [T]his [complaint] has already been registered.” Mr. Roy also questioned whether he was the appropriate person in the Ministry to repeatedly telephone Mr. Silmsner: “I’m re-phoning ... I’m not sure if we needed ... a regional manager to keep phoning David Silmsner the way I did.” Despite Mr. Roy’s concern that a written complaint to the Deputy Minister’s Office was “another hoop” Mr. Silmsner had to jump through, the Regional Manager did not discuss these issues or his misgivings with Lenna Bradburn. As is clear in Chapters 2 and 3 of this Report, on the impact of child abuse, victims of sexual abuse may have difficulty committing to writing the abuse they suffered as children.

Ms Deborah Newman also thought the stipulation that the complaint be made in writing was an obstacle and unnecessarily stringent:

In retrospect, certainly that’s a fairly rigid approach and I don’t see why it couldn’t, for example, have had an investigator or Mr. Roy contact Mr. Silmsner and take his complaint, write it down and forward it to the IIU.

Former Deputy Minister Morris Zbar made similar comments in his evidence. He said that the IIU could have “closed the loop and contacted” Mr. Silmsers to obtain the details of the allegations of sexual abuse by Cornwall probation officer Ken Seguin.

Bill Roy did not know that the IIU never investigated David Silmsers complaint of sexual impropriety by his probation officer. It was only when Mr. Roy received materials in late 2007 in preparation for his testimony at the Inquiry that the former Regional Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office learned that “nothing did happen” with regard to the Silmsers allegation. To his surprise, “it didn’t go any further.”

Similarly, Loretta Eley did not know the outcome of the Silmsers complaint to the Ministry of sexual improprieties committed by Cornwall probation officer Ken Seguin. After the executive assistant to the Deputy Minister received Ms Bradburn’s December 22, 1993, memo, she did not know if Mr. Roy had followed up to inform Mr. Silmsers that he was to submit a written complaint to the Deputy Minister’s Office. And as Ms Eley said about seven years later to Special Investigator Paul Downing in her 2001 interview, she did not know who made the decision that the IIU would not investigate the Silmsers complaint and had “no idea why an investigation would not have taken place.”

It is evident that Ministry of Correctional Services officials placed obstacles in the way of an investigation of Mr. Silmsers allegations of sexual abuse by his former probation officer. Moreover, the Ministry failed to follow up with Mr. Silmsers to ensure that this complaint was investigated and given the serious attention that it warranted.

Failure to Examine Ministry Files From the Cornwall Probation Office: Another Lost Opportunity

Lenna Bradburn, manager of the IIU, testified that there was no investigation of the Silmsers allegation in late 1993 that he and others had been sexually abused by a probation officer from the Cornwall Probation Office. Nor was any counselling offered to David Silmsers or other potential victims. Had an IIU inspector interviewed Mr. Silmsers, and had the files of probation officers at the Cornwall office been examined, a pattern of irregularities and improprieties would have emerged.

Ms Bradburn was not aware that in 1989, Ministry officials knew Ken Seguin was living with Gerald Renshaw, a former probationer, at his home in Summerstown. Nor was she informed about the Varley incident in 1992, in which four young men, one of whom was a Ministry client, visited Ken Seguin at his home. As previously discussed, Mr. Seguin supplied them with alcohol, and following this visit, one of these young men fatally shot another member of the group. Ms Bradburn also did not know that Nelson Barque, another probation officer, had left the Ministry as a result of allegations of sexual involvement with probationers under his supervision. The IIU manager did not know about these prior incidents because there was no investigation of the Silmser complaint, the probation files of the Cornwall office were not reviewed, and these events were not brought to her attention by Mr. Roy.

Mr. Roy, Regional Manager, did not take measures to ensure that David Silmser's files at the Cornwall office were examined to determine when he had been on probation and the probation officers who had supervised him. Nor were files of other probationers under Mr. Seguin's supervision examined. Mr. Silmser had told Mr. Roy in the first telephone call on December 15, 1993, that there were "others like me." He had asked Mr. Roy for counselling and support, not only for himself but for others who had similarly been subjected to sexual acts by their probation officer in Cornwall. An audit was not conducted of Ken Seguin's files to determine which probationers were under his supervision and whether they had been subjected to sexual improprieties by this Cornwall probation officer or other probation officers at that office. As Mr. Roy acknowledged at the hearings, "[I]t wasn't done." The Regional Manager added, "[I]t seems like some kind of dereliction," but "I had a lot of other stuff going on—to do I mean, that I didn't follow this particular case, no."

Nor was Loretta Eley, executive assistant to the Deputy Minister, aware of the Varley incident, or of former probationer Gerald Renshaw's living arrangements and his relationship with Mr. Seguin. Ms Eley also did not know that Cornwall probation officer Nelson Barque had sexual relationships with his probationers. When Special Investigator Paul Downing presented this information to her, which was on file at the Ministry, Ms Eley said she was not familiar with either the documents or this information. As she acknowledged to Mr. Downing, "I would like to comment that in hindsight, it would appear that the information you presented to me was not gathered and provided in a coordinated fashion to people making decisions surrounding this matter."

Ms Eley agreed that it was important for Ministry officials making decisions on the Silmser matter to have this information:

... it's a fairly long list of—quite significant issues that's presented, and I can't help but think that someone would have benefited by knowing those in making a decision.

...

... It's too bad that wasn't all known to everybody ...

...

... [I]t would be useful to have all that information when you were making a determination about what action you would take; it would be helpful to have that information.

There was no investigation of the Silmsers complaint by the IIU or by other Ministry officials. Deputy Minister Deborah Newman acknowledged that had the Ministry of Correctional Services taken steps to investigate and address the Silmsers complaint in 1993, it is possible that additional victims of abuse by probation officers in the Cornwall office would have come forward. Ms Newman thought that the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office should have conducted a file review of the probationers under Ken Seguin's supervision. An investigation could have been conducted at that time by the Ministry, and information could have been shared with the police. Ms Newman agreed that had the IIU conducted an investigation in 1993 when Mr. Silmsers contacted the Ministry, had there been a discussion with staff at the Cornwall Probation Office regarding the Silmsers allegations, and had a review of Ken Seguin's files been conducted, additional victims of the probation officer might have come forward:

... [I]n 1993 ... I think it's a reasonable point that had there been further steps taken it's possible that additional victims may have come forward. So I think at the time that this occurred, in hindsight, certainly having the area manager conduct a file review of other cases under Mr. Seguin's supervision, I don't know what that would have yielded. I rather doubt he wrote about improprieties in his case notes. Nevertheless, I think it could have been an additional step taken by the Ministry at the time to have conducted that file review to see if any irregularities emerged from the file review and then to have potentially either conducted interviews or referred the matter to the police.

COUNSEL: If the IIU had investigated or if there had been discussions with colleagues or if there had been a staff meeting or if there had been follow-up of probationers, all of those steps may have resulted in more alleged victims coming forward; correct?

MS. NEWMAN: I think that's fair to say, and I think I would certainly acknowledge that, in hindsight, I think that could have been potentially helpful ...

It is clear that the Ministry of Correctional Services and its employees, including Ms Bradburn and Ms Eley, (1) failed to ensure that an investigation of David Silmser's complaint of sexual abuse took place as mandated by the terms of reference of the IIU; or (2) contributed to the failure of the IIU to investigate Mr. Silmser's complaint of sexual abuse by his former probation officer.

Not only was there no IIU investigation of Mr. Silmser's complaint; there were no efforts made to determine whether other probationers had been sexually abused by Mr. Seguin. An examination of the probation files at the Cornwall office was not undertaken. Nor were David Silmser or other possible victims of abuse offered counselling or support to help them deal with the impact.

A House Note from the Ministry dated February 4, 1994, discusses the Silmser complaint and states that a similar complaint had been made in 1981 about another probation officer, Nelson Barque:²²

BACKGROUND:

- On December 15, 1993 the eastern regional office received a telephone call from a former male probationer who alleged that his probation officer (PO) had sexually molested him when he was 15 or 16 years old.
- On November 25, 1993 that same PO was found dead in his residence. The cause of death was determined by police as suicide by hanging.
- The complainant related to the regional manager that his lawyer had been negotiating a financial settlement with the PO's lawyer a few days prior to his death.
- The complainant further indicated there were "lots of others out there" and stated his view that supportive counselling should be provided in these matters.
- The regional manager advised that this matter would be reported to the Independent Investigation Unit (IIU). Both the IIU and appropriate police forces were notified on December 15, 1993.
- Police have subsequently confirmed that the complainant had advised them of the alleged sexual assault in the fall of 1992 and they had investigated it at that time. The complainant later withdrew his allegation before any charge was laid.

22. House Notes are a form of briefing note. The Ministry's Information Management Unit is located in North Bay. It is responsible for accumulating information reported in the field in the form of incident reports. Incident reports are sent to the Information Management Unit, where the House Note is created. The notes are sent to the Assistant Deputy Minister's Office and reviewed by the Assistant Deputy Minister's executive assistant, signed off at the Assistant Deputy Minister Office level, and sent up to the Deputy Minister's Office. Some were reviewed at that level. Some were referred to the Minister and political staff.

- The OPP are investigating this matter and the IIU manager, although the IIU is not investigating, is coordinating the ministry's communication with the complainant.

...

- During the latter part of January, media attention focused on the actions of the church and the investigation being conducted by the Ottawa Police Force into the previous investigation by the Cornwall Police Force. The Toronto Star newspaper reported on February 3, 1994, that the OPP plan to re-open the investigation of the sex abuse complaint against the priest.
- On February 3, 1994, a member of the Cornwall probation and parole staff was interviewed by the Lancaster OPP who have re-opened their investigation into the suicide of the probation officer. The area manager will be interviewed February 10, 1994.
- In late 1981, a similar allegation was made about another probation officer in this office. The area manager, at that time, conducted a preliminary investigation and then referred the matter to the former Inspections Branch. When confronted with results of the investigation which substantiated the allegations, the probation officer voluntarily resigned.

The suggested response of the Minister in this House Note was as follows:

RESPONSE:

- All allegations of sexual assault made by a client are taken seriously by the ministry and referred to the appropriate authorities for investigation.
- This incident is currently under investigation and I am unable to comment further at this time.

There were amendments to the terms of reference of the IIU after the Silmsr complaint to the Ministry. Ms Bradburn was involved in developing the amendments, which came into effect in 1994.

It is significant that the 1994 amendments state the following for cases involving sexual improprieties: "[I]n the event that the respondent is no longer a Ministry employee, the IIU will not conduct an investigation, unless the Ministry can provide redress." An important question that arises is why the Ministry added this clause to limit the circumstances in which a former employee would be investigated by the IIU for sexual improprieties of clients, such as probationers.

The Criminal Investigation and Security Unit (CISU), another investigative body within the Ministry, was created in 2001. The mandate of the CISU encompassed investigations of allegations of sexual impropriety but not allegations of workplace discrimination and harassment.

The IIU was disbanded in 2006. A review had previously been conducted of workplace discrimination and harassment policies by a consultant, Mr. Devlin. There was a perception by some Ministry staff that the IIU was not independent, and it was recommended in Devlin's review that the IIU be disbanded. In 2006, the Human Rights Tribunal mandated that the IIU be shut down and replaced with independent investigators for cases of workplace discrimination and harassment. The Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services now retains external investigators to conduct investigations of workplace discrimination and harassment complaints.

Cornwall Probation Officers Express Concerns to Ken Seguin About Socializing With Probationers

In the late 1980s or early 1990s, two probation officers in the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office decided to approach Mr. Seguin to discuss his conduct with probationers. Ron Gendron and Jos van Diepen had concerns about Mr. Seguin's social interactions with probationers and thought he was placing himself in an extremely vulnerable and risky situation.

Mr. Gendron testified that Mr. Seguin's "social interaction with clients was too commonplace." Mr. van Diepen also described the conflict of interest position in which Mr. Seguin continually placed himself. The situation had been escalating for a number of years, and the Gerald Renshaw living arrangement was a pivotal event that precipitated this discussion by these two probation officers with Mr. Seguin. In Mr. Gendron's words, "[T]he Renshaw thing, Ken living with a client, was just ripe for abuse." The Cornwall probation officer discussed some of his concerns in his evidence:

... Ken driving to ... it's great to drive a client to a treatment centre, but along the way, you're in a private vehicle with a client.

...

Everything from liability to an accident to—a client could say anything. There's no witnesses around. There's nobody to see, to hear.

... There's safety issues. What happens if the client ... before treatment decides ... these are people that have mental health issues and you're now in a vehicle with somebody. You're not equipped to deal with that sort of thing. Many things can happen. It was just something that I felt that you put yourself in that position and bad things can happen.

And so I think Mr. van Diepen and I felt that it was necessary to approach Ken, that these things—these social interactions kept happening. He was going to get himself into some trouble. (Emphasis added)

Both Mr. Gendron and Mr. van Diepen testified that at the time of this meeting they had no concerns Mr. Seguin was having sexual contact with Ministry clients. Mr. van Diepen had worked with Mr. Seguin at the Cornwall Probation Office since 1975, and Mr. Ron Gendron had been there since 1984.

Mr. Gendron and Mr. van Diepen were apprehensive about approaching Mr. Seguin with these issues. Mr. Seguin was a senior probation officer, he had worked in the Cornwall office for many years, and he was favoured by the Area Manager, Emile Robert. Mr. Seguin was viewed as someone close to management.

Jos van Diepen and Ron Gendron walked into Mr. Seguin's office and explained that they wanted to talk to him about some concerns. The discussion that ensued was very brief. The probation officers cautioned Mr. Seguin about his social interactions with clients and warned him that such behaviour with probationers could have adverse repercussions. Mr. Seguin did not react; he made no comment. After this meeting, Mr. Gendron did not believe that Mr. Seguin "was going to change his behaviour" with Ministry clients.

Emile Robert, the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office, was well aware that Mr. Seguin was socializing with probationers, according to Ron Gendron. Mr. Gendron considered Mr. Robert part of the problem and expected that a person in management would propose solutions and take measures to ensure that his probation officers did not become involved in potential conflict of interest situations. Mr. Gendron thought that if he approached Mr. Robert with these concerns, the Area Manager would not address or try to rectify the situation. As Mr. Gendron said, "Nothing would be done. There certainly would be no meaningful action taken." In fact, Mr. Gendron thought that if he raised such issues with Mr. Robert, there might be negative consequences for him:

... I thought he was showing favouritism to Ken and there were double standards that this—it could come back and have repercussions for me. That's not why I didn't—you know, I wasn't scared of that. It was a thought I had. (Emphasis added)

Concerns About Ken Seguin's Behaviour Persist:
Probation Officers Ron Gendron and Jos van Diepen
Follow Seguin to Cornwall Square Mall

In 1993, approximately six months before Ken Seguin's death, Mr. Gendron heard a rumour involving Mr. Seguin from officers of the Cornwall Police Service at the courthouse. There were rumours that there was a problem between Father Charles MacDonald and David Silmser, that there was a possible financial settlement with the Church, and that Mr. Seguin might be connected to this. As Mr. Gendron said, "We knew whatever it was it was being hushed and that's what really made the rumours go ... [I]t was sort of like there was this atmosphere of trying to keep it confidential."

Mr. Gendron decided to discuss these rumours with Mr. van Diepen. The windows of their offices overlooked the parking lot, and they would watch Mr. Seguin smoke cigarettes and fraternize with Ministry clients. Mr. Gendron "wondered if he was gay." Both these probation officers continued to have concerns regarding Ken Seguin's social interaction with Ministry clients. As Mr. Gendron said, "we were concerned" that Ken was "going over that social line with clients." In the summer of 1993, a few months prior to his death, Mr. Seguin began to leave the probation office on his breaks. He would get into his car, drive away from the office, and return fifteen to twenty minutes later. This was "very unusual" behaviour for Mr. Seguin. Mr. Seguin was a creature of habit in terms of his conduct at the office. But in 1993, the summer before he died:

[s]uddenly, there was this radical change in his behaviour. All of a sudden, he started taking off in his vehicle during the morning break. And we're both sort of saying, "Well, that's kind of weird; what's that all about?"

One morning, Mr. van Diepen and Mr. Gendron decided to follow Mr. Seguin when he left the office on a break. As Mr. van Diepen told the Ontario Provincial Police in a 1994 interview, "[O]nce Ron Gendron and I spied on him at the Cornwall Square."

Mr. Gendron and Mr. van Diepen maintained that they still were not concerned that Mr. Seguin was engaging in sexual relations with probationers. They believed that Mr. Seguin was socializing with clients away from the site of the Cornwall Probation Office.

Mr. van Diepen and Mr. Gendron followed Mr. Seguin by car from the probation office. Mr. Seguin drove to the Cornwall Square mall, parked his vehicle, and walked to the food court. When Mr. van Diepen and Mr. Gendron entered this area, they saw Mr. Seguin simply drinking coffee. He remained at the mall for ten minutes, and returned directly to the Cornwall Probation Office. Mr. Gendron was relieved that they did not witness any inappropriate conduct by Mr. Seguin on that morning in 1993. Mr. Seguin continued to leave the office on his breaks in the months before his death.

Ken Seguin's Suicide

Changes in Ken Seguin's Behaviour

Probation officers and administrative staff at the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office observed behavioural changes in Mr. Seguin prior to his death. Carole Cardinal noticed that the probation officer was preoccupied and was not socializing as much with his colleagues. Administrative assistant Marcelle Léger observed Mr. Seguin's "mood swings, which was something unusual for him ... [H]is humour was just not quite the same." Ron Gendron described Mr. Seguin as "a little edgy." Two or three months before he took his life, Mr. Seguin mentioned repeatedly to administrative assistant Louise Quinn that he was "broke," that he could no longer afford to go on trips, that it was expensive to live in Summerstown, and that "he couldn't do as much as he wanted to." Prior to his death, his colleagues watched Mr. Seguin pace and smoke cigarettes in the parking lot of the probation office.

Ron Leroux, Mr. Seguin's neighbour and friend, also noticed a change in Ken Seguin's demeanour in the months before his suicide. Mr. Seguin seemed unfocused, was often upset, and would frequently go on long drives, sometimes as far as Montreal. Mr. Leroux was aware of calls from David Silmser, who alleged that his probation officer, Ken Seguin, had abused him. Ron Leroux knew that David Silmser had threatened to disclose the abuse to the police and to Ken's boss, Mr. Emile Robert, if Mr. Seguin did not raise the prescribed sum of money. Mr. Leroux testified that he overheard discussions between Malcolm MacDonald and Ken Seguin regarding the Silmser calls.

Mr. Seguin also told Gerald Renshaw about the repeated calls from David Silmser and the demand for money. Mr. Renshaw did not understand at that time why Mr. Silmser was making these demands. Mr. Seguin's anxiety and nervousness in the months before his death were very apparent to Gerald Renshaw.

Both Ron Leroux and Gerald Renshaw were with Ken Seguin on November 24, 1993, the evening before his death. Mr. Leroux and Mr. Seguin drove to Cornwall earlier that night to visit Gerald Renshaw and his girlfriend, Cara Barry. The two men returned to Summerstown, and Ron Leroux stood on Ken Seguin's front lawn, chatting about fishing and other matters. Mr. Seguin had been invited to Mr. Leroux's home the following day to celebrate American Thanksgiving.

The two men heard Mr. Seguin's telephone ringing; Ken Seguin said it was "David." Ron Leroux testified that he told Mr. Seguin not to respond to the call. He did not comply and Mr. Leroux could hear Mr. Seguin in the distance, raising his voice to the caller. Ron Leroux decided to return to his home. This was the last time Mr. Leroux saw Ken Seguin before he took his life.

As is discussed in this and succeeding chapters of this Report, David Silmsers alleged that he had been sexually abused by Ken Seguin, his probation officer. Mr. Silmsers stated that the abuse began in the 1970s when he was fifteen years old and that it was repeated. The abuse, he said, occurred at the Cornwall Probation Office and at Ken Seguin's home. He stated that Mr. Seguin offered him alcohol at his home before he sexually assaulted him and that the probation officer threatened to revoke his probation if David refused to participate in specific sexual acts.

In statements made to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), Mr. Silmsers said that prior to Mr. Seguin's death, he called Mr. Seguin at work and told him that he wanted a financial settlement for the abusive acts that he had committed on David Silmsers. According to Mr. Silmsers, Mr. Seguin told him to contact his lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald. Mr. Silmsers told Mr. MacDonald that he wanted $100,000 as compensation for the abuse. According to Mr. Silmsers, Mr. MacDonald said that he would speak to Ken Seguin and that Mr. Silmsers would receive a response on either Wednesday, November 24, or Friday, November 26, 1993. By the evening of Wednesday, November 24, Mr. Silmsers had not heard from Mr. Seguin. As a result, he decided to telephone Mr. Seguin at his home between 7:00 and 9:00 p.m. on Wednesday, November 24. Mr. Silmsers asked Mr. Seguin if he was prepared to enter a settlement with him by Friday. Mr. Seguin responded that he was uncertain whether he could come up with the money. He told Mr. Silmsers that Malcolm MacDonald would contact him the following morning. Mr. Silmsers said that he told his former probation officer that if he did not enter the settlement by Friday, he would retain a lawyer and commence a lawsuit against him. There was no response from Mr. Seguin, at which time David Silmsers said goodbye and ended the call.

Malcolm MacDonald was acting for Ken Seguin before the probation officer's death. Mr. MacDonald told the OPP that Mr. Silmsers had advised him in a call on November 15, 1993, that he wanted money for the abuse and that if he did not get it, he would initiate a complaint with the Ministry. Malcolm MacDonald advised Mr. Silmsers that he would get back to him by the end of the week. Malcolm MacDonald stated that on November 19, 1993, they discussed the amount of $10,000 per year for ten to twenty years. On November 22, a few days before his death, Malcolm MacDonald met with Ken Seguin to discuss the matter.

Ken Seguin's Death

Mr. Seguin had a number of dental surgeries scheduled prior to his death. On November 25, 1993, at 10:00 a.m., he had an appointment for a root canal procedure. His usual practice on such days was to arrive at the probation office early, work for a few hours, and then go for his dental surgery.

Mr. Seguin was known for his punctuality. He did not miss scheduled appointments. On the morning of November 25, 1993, the nurse from the dental office contacted the probation office as Mr. Seguin had not appeared for his procedure. Staff at the Cornwall Probation Office made telephone calls to his home in Summerstown but were unable to reach Mr. Seguin. Louise Quinn, administrative assistant Lise Bourgon, and Area Manager Emile Robert tried repeatedly to reach Mr. Seguin but were unsuccessful. Emile Robert sensed an air of panic in the Cornwall office: “un air de panique dans le bureau.”

When Mr. Leroux left his home on the morning of November 25 between 8:00 and 9:00 a.m., he noticed Ken Seguin's car in the driveway. This was unusual as Mr. Seguin generally left for work at about 7:15 a.m. But then Mr. Leroux remembered that Mr. Seguin had a root canal procedure and thought this explained why the probation officer was not at work that morning.

Mr. Robert's concern about the probation officer increased when he returned to the office after lunch and learned that no contact had been made with Mr. Seguin. On Louise Quinn's suggestion, Mr. Robert decided to drive to Mr. Seguin's home. He asked Jos van Diepen if he would accompany him to Summerstown, as he was the union representative. Mr. van Diepen declined but Ron Gendron agreed to go with the Area Manager. Mr. Robert decided to contact the OPP.

There was little conversation between Mr. Robert and Mr. Gendron as they travelled to Summerstown. It was clear to Mr. Gendron that his Area Manager was very concerned. Mr. Seguin's car was parked in the driveway when they arrived at his home. They knocked on the door, but there was no response. They tried to peer into the windows. The doors to his house and to the boathouse were locked.

Emile Robert went to a neighbour's home and introduced himself as Ken Seguin's employer. The neighbour told Mr. Robert that he had not seen Mr. Seguin that morning.

As Mr. Robert and Mr. Gendron were leaving Mr. Seguin's property, the OPP arrived. Constable Patrick Dussault and Mr. Robert searched for a key to the Seguin home but were not successful. They also climbed onto a ladder to peer into the windows on the second floor of Mr. Seguin's home. They did not see anything unusual.

Mr. Robert and Mr. Gendron returned to the Cornwall Probation Office.

Ron Leroux Finds Ken Seguin's Body

When Ron Leroux arrived at his home in Summerstown on the afternoon of November 25, 1993, his wife, Cindy, told him that probation officials and the police had been to Mr. Seguin's house that day. Mr. Leroux walked over to Mr. Seguin's home and knocked on the back door, but there was no response. He knew the place where Mr. Seguin hid a spare key to his house.

Ron Leroux and his wife, Cindy, entered Mr. Seguin's home. Mr. Leroux noticed that the laundry room door was slightly ajar, and he saw bloodspots across the kitchen table. The house was otherwise immaculate. As they climbed the stairs to the second floor, Mr. Leroux saw the banister "covered in blood" and then Ken Seguin's "charcoal grey" body "hanging on the door" of the bathroom. The shower curtain was broken. They saw a knife, a saw, and blood on the bathroom floor.

Ron Leroux went to the end table near Mr. Seguin's couch, took his telephone directory, and made a call to Father Charles MacDonald at his parish. Mr. Leroux testified that he left an angry message on the priest's voicemail blaming him for Ken Seguin's death: "If they could have come up with the money faster, sooner ... Ken said that's all they could raise, $15,000." Father MacDonald "came up with $32,000 from Rocky" (referring to Bishop Eugène LaRocque). Ron Leroux also wanted to call Malcolm MacDonald, but his wife, Cindy, insisted that they contact the police. She dialled 911. Mr. Leroux decided to keep Mr. Seguin's personal telephone directory.

When the OPP arrived at the Seguin home, Ron Leroux was asked by the police to provide a statement. Mr. Leroux told Constable Dussault about the visit with Gerald Renshaw the previous evening and chatting with Mr. Seguin outside his home, but he did not disclose the telephone call from David Silmsen. When asked by Commission Counsel why he had failed to reveal the call from Mr. Silmsen on the evening before Mr. Seguin's death, Mr. Leroux responded: "I told him [Ken Seguin] I wouldn't tell anything about the problem. He trusted me ... I didn't want to betray his trust."

Detective Constable Randy Millar instructed Mr. Leroux to sit in his police cruiser so that more details could be elicited about the circumstances surrounding Mr. Seguin's death. Detective Constable Millar asked Ron Leroux about his relationship with Ken Seguin. He also asked Mr. Leroux to describe the time they had spent together visiting Gerald Renshaw in Cornwall the night before Mr. Seguin's death, and the discovery of Mr. Seguin's body the following day. Mr. Leroux testified that he became very agitated with Detective Constable Millar, particularly when he asked him this question: "Do you think maybe Ken was in love with you and was depressed because you got married and now you're going to Maine[?]" Detective Constable Millar testified that he asked this question to determine whether Ron Leroux and Ken Seguin were in a sexual relationship. It was Detective Constable Millar's recollection that Mr. Leroux told him that Ken Seguin was gay. The OPP officer thought that perhaps Mr. Seguin had become depressed when Ron Leroux married Cindy.

OPP Detective Constables McDonell and Fagan took a statement from Mr. Leroux a few months later, in March 1994, and again the connection between David Silmser and Mr. Seguin was not disclosed by Mr. Leroux. Mr. Leroux did not tell the police officers about the Silmser call on November 24, 1993, and the demand on Mr. Seguin to come up with a substantial amount of money.

Mr. Leroux testified that he decided to take Ken Seguin's telephone directory after he found his body, as he knew it contained names and phone numbers of probationers and former probationers. He did not want the police to have this information. Nor was Mr. Leroux forthcoming about the retention of Mr. Seguin's telephone directory when he was interviewed by the police four months after the death of Mr. Seguin. He told Detective Constables McDonell and Fagan:

While I was in the house I found Ken's phone book and that's where I got Father Charlie's phone number. I had put the phone book in my pocket and forgot to put it back. The same night I gave the phone book to Doug Seguin, Ken's brother, in front of Gerry Renshaw.

I went to the wake and funeral but I never saw Father Charlie again.

Mr. Leroux explained: "That's the story I gave ... because I thought you could get ... arrested for removing some evidence." In fact, Ron Leroux gave Mr. Seguin's telephone book to Gerald Renshaw. He contacted Mr. Renshaw on November 25, 1993, after he discovered Ken Seguin's body, and they discussed the telephone directory. Gerald Renshaw knew the directory contained the names of probationers, some of whom had attended parties at Mr. Seguin's home. He was also aware that the police were investigating the circumstances surrounding Mr. Seguin's death, and he did not want the police to have access to the information in the telephone directory. Gerald Renshaw suggested to Ron Leroux that he deliver the directory to Doug Seguin, Ken's brother. As Mr. Renshaw said in his testimony, he did not "trust" the police and did not want the officers to take Ken Seguin's telephone book. Doug Seguin received the telephone directory from Mr. Renshaw, and he ultimately gave it to the OPP. A discussion of the police investigation of Ken Seguin's death follows in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

According to the statement made by Malcolm MacDonald to the OPP, Mr. MacDonald received a call from David Silmsers on Friday morning, asking about the settlement. Mr. MacDonald informed Mr. Silmsers that Ken Seguin was dead.²³

Cornwall Probation Staff Learn of Seguin's Death

After Mr. Robert returned to the probation office from Mr. Seguin's home on November 25, 1993, he received a call from the OPP. The Area Manager was told that a neighbour had entered Mr. Seguin's house and found the probation officer dead in his bathroom, probably a suicide. Mr. Robert was in shock.

Mr. Robert convened a meeting in the conference room of the probation office on the afternoon of November 25, 1993, to inform his staff of the tragic news. Probation staff were also shocked. The suicide was later confirmed by Coroner Conway: "Deceased was found hanging by an electrical cord in the bathroom of his house. He had also slashed his wrists before hanging ... [D]eath is attributed to suicidal hanging."

Lise Bourgon, an administrative assistant at the probation office, approached Mr. Robert on the afternoon of November 25, 1993. She told the Area Manager that rumours had been circulating that Mr. Seguin was under investigation by the police. When Mr. Robert asked Ms Bourgon why she had not advised him of this earlier, her response was that she was a member of the union and he was management. Mr. Robert was also upset that the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) had not contacted him about the allegations against Mr. Seguin.

Mr. Robert notified Regional Manager Bill Roy of Ken Seguin's death. He informed Mr. Roy on November 25, 1993, that Mr. Seguin was "found hanging at his residence" and that the OPP from the Lancaster Detachment was in the process of contacting Mr. Seguin's next of kin. Mr. Robert asked Mr. Roy if a "debriefing team" could come to the Cornwall office to help staff cope with this tragedy.

Mr. Seguin's funeral was held at St. Andrew's Church on November 29, 1993. Mr. Roy and the staff at the Cornwall Probation Office attended the funeral.

Mr. Leroux claimed that he had a discussion with Mr. van Diepen at the viewing at Ron Wilson's funeral home on Pitt Street, the day before the Seguin funeral. He said that Mr. van Diepen told him that he had warned Ken Seguin on repeated occasions about his behaviour with young probationers. Mr. Leroux

23. The OPP initiated an investigation into allegations of obstruction of justice in relation to the settlement with David Silmsers in 1994. This is also discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

was angry with Mr. van Diepen for not helping Mr. Seguin with his problems and for not taking measures to move him from Probations at the Ministry of Correctional Services to another branch of the government. When Mr. van Diepen testified, he denied that this conversation had taken place.

Prior to Ken Seguin's death, probation staff were aware of a possible connection between Mr. Seguin and the Silmsers' complaint against Father Charles MacDonald. As mentioned, prior to Ken Seguin's death, Ron Gendron had heard rumours at the courthouse concerning David Silmsers, Ken Seguin, and Father MacDonald. The rumour involved a financial settlement. Mr. Gendron testified that he had heard this rumour from the Cornwall police: "There was something about financial settlement, the church ... [N]obody knew what it was about ... but we knew whatever it was it was being hushed." Mr. Gendron said it crossed his mind that this could be an allegation of sexual misconduct. He testified that he had discussed this rumour with his colleague, Jos van Diepen, who had been concerned about Mr. Seguin's inappropriate behaviour as a probation officer. Mr. van Diepen also denied that this discussion with Ron Gendron had taken place at that time, and maintained that it was only after Mr. Seguin's death that he became aware of these rumours concerning David Silmsers, Mr. Seguin, and Father MacDonald.

Similarly, Carole Cardinal was aware of an investigation involving Father MacDonald. At the courthouse in Alexandria and from colleagues at the Children's Aid Society, Ms Cardinal heard discussions in September 1993 that "D.S." had made a complaint against Father Charles MacDonald. She learned that Constable Perry Dunlop of the Cornwall Police Service had taken Mr. Silmsers' statement to the Children's Aid Society. She and others concluded that "possibly Ken" was involved "because of his close association with Father Charles MacDonald ... [T]hey were such close friends." Ms Cardinal noticed that "Mr. Seguin became very unfocused in the months ... prior to his death," which, she said, further raised her suspicions that he was involved.

Carole Cardinal's husband, Claude Lortie, was a police officer in the Cornwall Police Service. Ms Cardinal testified that her husband told her he had been assigned a complaint against a priest. Moreover, Ms Cardinal knew that her husband needed to reschedule his meeting with the complainant because of a surgical procedure. Ms Cardinal testified that her husband never discussed that the complaint also involved her co-worker, Ken Seguin. As I discuss in the following chapter, the Silmsers' file was transferred to Constable Heidi Sebalj at the Cornwall Police Service. Ms Cardinal maintained that it was not until Mr. Seguin's death that she learned David Silmsers had alleged that Mr. Seguin had sexually abused him when he was a probationer under Mr. Seguin's supervision.

It is clear to me, from my review of the evidence, that staff at the Cornwall Probation Office knew that Ken Seguin was engaging in inappropriate contacts with Ministry clients. In fact, Mr. Downing concluded that Jos van Diepen knew more than he was willing to admit and believed that Mr. van Diepen had significant knowledge regarding Mr. Seguin's associations with probationers. This information should have been reported to their superiors at the Ministry, such as the Area Manager or others in management.

As I discuss in detail in the following chapters, it was on December 9, 1992, that David Silmsers first reported to the Cornwall police his allegations of historical sexual assault by Father Charles MacDonald and Ken Seguin.

On January 28, 1993, Sergeant Ron Lefebvre, Constable Heidi Sebalj, and Constable Kevin Malloy of the CPS interviewed David Silmsers in relation to this allegation of historical sexual assault by Father MacDonald and Mr. Seguin. On February 16, 1993, David Silmsers gave the Cornwall police a written statement describing his allegations of abuse by Father MacDonald. This statement also indicated that Ken Seguin had sexually assaulted him. On March 10, 1993, David Silmsers signed his statement at his home in the presence of Constable Sebalj and Sergeant Lefebvre. There was discussion about the allegations against Ken Seguin, and Mr. Silmsers told the police officers he didn't think he could deal with the Seguin issue at that time.

On November 2, 1993, Greg Bell and Pina DeBellis of the Children's Aid Society interviewed David Silmsers. During the interview, Mr. Silmsers alleged that Father Charles MacDonald, his former probation officer, Ken Seguin, and schoolteacher Marcel Lalonde had sexually assaulted him. Mr. Silmsers reported that he had had a number of telephone conversations with Malcolm MacDonald and Ken Seguin to discuss a financial settlement in the days preceding Mr. Seguin's death. The last of these calls occurred on the morning of November 25, 1993 when Malcolm MacDonald advised Mr. Silmsers of Mr. Seguin's death.

The following chapters of the Report, on the Cornwall Police Service, the Children's Aid Society, the Ontario Provincial Police, and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall discuss in detail the Silmsers allegations of abuse by Ken Seguin, Father MacDonald, and Marcel Lalonde.

Mr. van Diepen claimed that it was only in November 1993, on the day of Ken Seguin's death, that he learned from Ron Gendron of the allegation of David Silmsers regarding Ken Seguin. Mr. van Diepen told the OPP in a 1994 statement that Malcolm MacDonald had told him in December 1993 that there was a "proposed settlement of $11,000.00," that "Ken gave a statement admitting Ken gave him a hand job," and that "Malcolm was trying to work out a deal."

After Mr. Seguin's suicide, the Area Manager and other Ministry officials failed to react to increasing evidence that Mr. Seguin had engaged in sexual and other inappropriate conduct with probationers under his supervision. The Ministry of Correctional Services and its employees failed to initiate a review of Mr. Seguin's files. Nor did the Ministry conduct an investigation of the operations and management of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office.

As I discuss in this chapter, probationers who had been supervised by Mr. Ken Seguin and Mr. Nelson Barque began to disclose over the next years that they, too, had been sexually abused by these Cornwall probation officers. Had the Ministry and its employees undertaken a review of the files of these probation officers and had an investigation of the operations of the Cornwall office been initiated, more victims of abuse would have been found, men who were in great need of support and counselling.

Nelson Barque Charged With Gross Indecency and Indecent Assault of Probationer Albert Roy

Albert Roy was sixteen years old when he was criminally charged with stealing a car in Cornwall. He was under the influence of alcohol at the time. This was the first time he had been in trouble with the law. Mr. Roy testified that he was sentenced to twelve months probation in 1977 and that the conditions of his probation included a curfew, abstaining from alcohol, and meeting regularly with his probation officer.

Albert Roy was initially assigned to probation officer Ken Seguin. However, within about three months, when Mr. Seguin was away from the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office on vacation, Nelson Barque became his probation officer. Mr. Barque instructed Albert to meet him weekly because he was not performing well at school. Mr. Barque sexually abused Albert Roy during this period of supervision. Mr. Barque asked Albert Roy to meet him in the evenings at the probation office, where he would touch him inappropriately. Mr. Roy recalled the lock on Mr. Barque's office door. Mr. Barque would also give him beer, in violation of the probation order, and take him on drives. He also touched Albert Roy sexually while in the parking lot at the power dam in Cornwall. And Mr. Barque sexually assaulted Albert at the probation officer's home in St. Andrews.

Albert Roy was reassigned to probation officer Mr. Seguin. He thought Mr. Seguin was Mr. Barque's supervisor and therefore decided to disclose the sexual abuse to him. But to Albert Roy's surprise, Mr. Seguin's immediate reaction to the probationer's disclosure was to tell him "that me and him could have more fun than I ever had with Nelson." Mr. Roy testified that Mr. Seguin soon also began to sexually abuse him. Albert Roy did not report the abuse to anyone else at the time because “in [his] eyes there was no one else to tell.” He would see Mr. Seguin and Mr. Barque socializing and joking in the building with police officers. As discussed, the probation office and the police were in the same building. The courthouse was located in the next building. Albert Roy said the following in his testimony at the Inquiry:

You have to remember where the probation department was. It was on top of the police station and the courthouse was next door.

And I would see both probation officers talking and joking and slapping on the back and shaking hands with police officers and lawyers. And ... after I told Ken about Nelson and Ken started to abuse me, I just felt that there was nowhere else to go. Like, Ken turned out to be worse than Nelson.

So like, what’s going to be my next one? And I really didn’t believe there was anywhere to go ... I didn’t see any possibility of having somewhere to go.

I mean, Nelson—Ken seemed to be that chance ... I hear Ken talking in the office, I’d hear Nelson talk about Ken or whatever. It was always talk that he decided where the files go, and he took care of things. So when I went to Ken, I was under the impression that I was going to Nelson’s supervisor. So in my mind, at that time, as a 16 year old, I went to the top. Where else do I go? (emphasis added)

Albert Roy said that Mr. Seguin abused him at the probation office, at Mr. Seguin’s home, and in his car. Like Mr. Barque, Mr. Seguin also asked Albert to report to the probation office after hours, in the evening. Albert Roy testified that Mr. Seguin threatened to have him imprisoned if Albert reported the abuse to anyone:

... [H]e had made some threats to me that if I told anybody else he’d be the first one to know like if I told the police, and I believed that because ... I used to see him in the hallways with the police with his arm around them or slapping on the back or joking ... And like I told you before, when Nelson abused me, I told Ken and then he abused me. So like, where was that going to go from there, you know, in my mind at that time.

Albert Roy said that as the abuse progressed, “Ken became more demanding as far as time and he started to monitor” where the probationer “went during the weekend or at night.” As Mr. Roy said, “[I]t got to the point where Ken was running my life.” Albert could no longer function this way. He mustered the courage to tell Mr. Seguin that he refused to allow the probation officer to “touch” him any more:

He actually did me a favour because he pushed me to just beyond what I was going to accept, I was going to take. And I got angry and for a brief period, I had enough gumption to tell him, you know, “I’m not going to see you anymore,” “I’m not going to let you touch me anymore, you’re not going to have me anymore.”

Now, I know I told him that he could do whatever he wanted to do because I told you one of his threats were that if I didn’t report to him, he could put me in jail. And I told him when I left that office, “You do whatever you’re going to do, whatever you have to do, but I am not coming back,” and I never did.

Albert Roy was sixteen years old when he was abused by Mr. Seguin.

It was not until many years had passed that Albert Roy decided to report the abuse of his former probation officers, Mr. Barque and Mr. Seguin, to the Cornwall Police Service. This occurred in November 1994. Mr. Roy was at that time thirty-five years old.

Mr. Roy testified that he first disclosed the abuse committed by these probation officers to Bob Payette, his social worker, and to Dr. Almudevar, his psychiatrist. Mr. Roy sought counselling from these professionals to help him deal with the effects of the sexual abuse he had sustained as a youth when he was on probation. It took him fourteen years from the time the abuse ceased, in 1977, to seek therapy for his trauma. He did not disclose the sexual abuse to anyone until that time. His social worker, Mr. Payette, encouraged Albert to report the abuse. Mr. Roy went to the Cornwall Police Service and met with Constable Heidi Sebalj.

Mr. Roy was unaware of the reason for Mr. Barque’s resignation in 1982. No one from the probation office contacted him after Mr. Barque’s departure from the Cornwall office to determine whether other probationers, such as Albert Roy, were victims of sexual abuse by Mr. Barque.

In January 1995, Mr. Barque was charged with indecent assault and gross indecency of Albert Roy. The investigation of Mr. Barque by the police and the involvement of Crown in the prosecution and sentencing will be described in detail in the following chapters of this Report. Nelson Barque pleaded guilty in July 1995. He was sentenced to four months custody and eighteen months probation.

Nelson Barque Supervised by Cornwall Office During His Probation

Mr. Emile Robert thinks it was through the media that he learned Nelson Barque had been charged and pleaded guilty to sexual abuse of a minor. The Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office contacted the Cornwall Police Service. He was upset that the police had not advised him that charges had been laid against a former probation officer at the Cornwall office for abusing a probationer.

On July 10, 1995, Nelson Barque pleaded guilty to indecently assaulting Albert Roy. Mr. Robert decided to ask a probation officer from Ottawa to prepare the pre-sentence report to ensure that it was independent and impartial. On August 14, 1995, the pre-sentence report was prepared by Nicole Barbeau.

Mr. Barque, as mentioned, received a sentence of four months incarceration followed by eighteen months probation for the indecent assault of probationer Albert Roy. The sentencing hearing was held on August 18, 1995, before Judge G. Renaud. Mr. Barque was fifty-six years old.

After he had served his term in prison, Mr. Barque was assigned to a probation officer at the Cornwall office. Mr. Barque asked that he be supervised in Cornwall, not Ottawa. Mr. Robert acceded to this request. The Area Manager decided that because Mr. Gendron had no previous history with Mr. Barque, he was the appropriate person to supervise the former probation officer. Mr. Barque had resigned in 1982, prior to Mr. Gendron's appointment at the Cornwall Probation Office. Regional Manager Bill Roy's advice was never sought as to whether it was appropriate for the former Cornwall probation officer to be supervised by that probation office. Mr. Roy agreed that guidelines should exist on this issue. The Regional Manager of the Cornwall office also agreed that for reasons of public perception and for the victim, who was a probationer abused by that probation officer at that office, Mr. Barque should have been supervised by a probation office in another location.

Ron Gendron had never met Nelson Barque. Shortly after Mr. Gendron joined the Cornwall Probation Office in 1984, he learned from his co-workers that Mr. Barque's departure had been the result of sexual improprieties with a probationer. He knew that the other probation officers in Cornwall were in a conflict of interest position and that they could not supervise their former colleague.

Mr. Gendron was aware that Mr. Barque's conviction for indecently assaulting a former probationer was "a high profile case." Mr. Gendron supervised Nelson Barque in 1996 while he was on probation. Administrative assistants at the Cornwall Probation Office were instructed to advise Mr. Gendron immediately when Mr. Barque reported for his appointment, so that his waiting time in the common area of the office was minimized. Some of Mr. Barque's former colleagues, such as Mr. van Diepen, came into contact with Nelson Barque during his period of probation, which was awkward and "somewhat uncomfortable."

In my view, the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services should develop a protocol that addresses the supervision by probation and parole officers of former probation officers and other staff who are convicted for sexual and other inappropriate conduct with probationers. Issues such as the venue of the probation and actual and perceived conflict of interest by probation officers supervising the client should be addressed in the protocol.

Mr. van Diepen testified that after Mr. Barque was convicted for his indecent assault of Albert Roy, Mr. Robert did not convene a meeting or discuss the offence with probation staff at the Cornwall office. Mr. van Diepen considered the Barque conviction a significant event, and he and other colleagues had questions. Neither the Area Manager of the Cornwall office nor other senior officials in Correctional Services organized a meeting of staff in the Cornwall office regarding the conviction of Nelson Barque for engaging in sexual behaviour with a probationer.

During his supervision period, Ron Gendron discussed with Mr. Barque the offence committed on Albert Roy but did not learn any information beyond what was contained in the police report. Mr. Gendron's concern was recidivism—that Nelson Barque not re-offend. Mr. Gendron testified that he asked Mr. Barque whether he had sexually abused probationers other than Albert Roy. His response, which was unforthcoming, was that Albert Roy was the only probationer with whom he had engaged in sexual behaviour. Mr. Gendron was aware that Mr. Barque had resigned from his position in Cornwall as a probation officer because of sexual improprieties with a probationer under his supervision. Ministry officials such as Mr. Robert did not initiate a review of Nelson Barque's files to assess whether other probationers had also been victims of abuse by him. The Area Manager claimed that old files had been destroyed and it would have been difficult to identify Mr. Barque's more recent files as they were not on a computer system.

In my view, the Area Manager or other Ministry officials should have initiated a review of Mr. Barque's existing files to determine whether other probationers under his supervision were also subjected to sexual improprieties.

Ron Gendron stated that Mr. Robert did not discuss or provide guidance to him on the supervision of Nelson Barque during his probationary period. Mr. Gendron did not know at this time that Albert Roy had also alleged that he had been sexually abused by another probation officer in Cornwall, Ken Seguin. Regional Manager Bill Roy was also unaware of this information.

Deputy Minister Deborah Newman testified that she also did not know at that time that Mr. Barque had been convicted of engaging in sexual acts with a probationer under his supervision. She stated that it was not until fall 1999 that she learned of Mr. Barque's conviction for perpetrating indecent acts on probationer Albert Roy. Ms Newman supervised the Cornwall Probation Office from 1996 to 1998. Her focus was on the poor working relationship between Area Manager Emile Robert and his staff. When Ms Newman met with members of the Cornwall staff individually, none of them raised the inappropriate relationships of Mr. Barque and Mr. Seguin with probationers.

The Ministry Issue Note of December 16, 1994, discusses both the charges of indecent assault by Nelson Barque and the allegations of sexual assault by Ken Seguin:

ISSUE: PROBATION AND PAROLE CORNWALL
FORMER PROBATION AND PAROLE OFFICER CHARGED WITH INDECENT ASSAULT AND GROSS INDECENCY ON FORMER CLIENT

...

SUMMARY:

- On December 14, 1994 a former Probation and Parole Officer (PPO) was charged with two counts of indecent assault and one count of gross indecency on a former probationer.
- The offenses allegedly occurred 17 years ago (1977).
- The former PPO has been released on a judicial interim release order and will be appearing in court next month. The court date remains to be determined.
- In late 1981, allegations had been made concerning the former PPO. At that time, the area manager had conducted a preliminary investigation and referred the matter to the former Inspections Branch for investigation. The results of the investigation substantiated the allegations. When confronted with the findings, the PPO voluntarily tendered his resignation. Police were consulted in relation to this matter.
- In late November 1994, a staff member currently employed with the Cornwall probation and parole (P&P) office, who had been in service at the Cornwall P&P office in 1977 when these incidents allegedly occurred [sic], was interviewed by the OPP in relation to these charges.
- On November 28, 1994, ministry officials at the eastern regional office also received enquiries from the Cornwall City Police regarding the former PPO who is the subject of these most recent charges. Police were attempting to determine whether the subject of the complaint had in fact been employed with the ministry and whether or not he had been the subject of an internal investigation. Police enquiries were directed to the ministry's Investigation Unit and to the Human Resources Branch.

- The accused has been identified as a former PPO in the December 14, 1994 radio broadcast, as well as in an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen December 14, 1994. It is anticipated that media coverage of this incident will be extensive.

BACKGROUND:

- On December 14, 1994 a former PPO was charged with two counts of indecent assault and one count of gross indecency on a former probationer. These offences are alleged to have occurred [sic] 17 years ago.
- Cornwall City Police have confirmed that the complainant(s) in these charges are not the same as those involved in the 1981 complaint which resulted in an internal investigation by this ministry. The 1981 complainants, however, will become part of a joint investigation between the Cornwall City Police and the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP).
- These recent allegations follow in the wake of a prior investigation into allegations of sexual assault by another PPO also previously employed in the Cornwall office. This PPO committed suicide by hanging on November 25, 1993. See Issue note Corpal. 123 version 14, September 29, 1994.
- In January 1994, media in the Cornwall area began reporting extensively on a sex scandal cover up involving the church, the police and the deceased probation officer. In September 1994, a police officer was subsequently charged under the Police Services Act for reporting his concerns about the priest and the probation officer to the Cornwall Children's Aid Society.

Ms Newman testified that she did not receive the Issue Note.²⁴ As I recommend in this Report, it is important that the Ministry develop an information management system to ensure that information on critical incidents is collected systematically and that it is easily retrievable and accessible to Ministry officials at the local and regional levels.

24. Ms Newman testified that she became aware of this several years later, in about 1999 or 2000.

Albert Roy initiated a civil lawsuit against the Ministry of Correctional Services, the estate of Ken Seguin, and Nelson Barque in July 1996. Emile Robert was involved in the discovery stage of the litigation. A settlement was ultimately reached in December 1999, and the civil action by Albert Roy was dismissed.

On June 18, 1998, Mr. Barque met with OPP Detective Constable Don Genier and Detective Constable Joe Dupuis regarding the allegations of abuse made by C-45 and Robert Sheets. Mr. Barque denied having sexual contact with C-45 but admitted that he had been involved in sexual activity for one to one and a half years with Robert Sheets when Mr. Sheets was on probation. The sexual contact took place at Robert Sheets' apartment, at his parent's home, in the probation office, and at Mr. Barque's residence. Mr. Barque showed pornographic movies to Mr. Sheets. He also supplied Robert Sheets with wine and gave him money. Mr. Barque admitted before his death to having sexual relationships with Robert Sheets, C-44, and Albert Roy. As will be discussed in further detail in this Report, the OPP was planning to charge Nelson Barque in early July 1998 with indecently assaulting two other probationers, Robert Sheets and C-45. Ten days after the OPP interview of Mr. Barque involving allegations of indecent assault of C-45 and Robert Sheets, Mr. Barque committed suicide. On June 28, 1998, Nelson Barque was found dead in a local park from a self-inflicted gunshot wound to his head.

Allegations of Sexual Improprieties on Project Truth Website

In the summer of 2000, Jos van Diepen's daughter learned from a friend that a website called Project Truth contained allegations that her father had an association with a pedophile clan. The nineteen-year-old disclosed to her mother what she had seen on the Internet. When Mr. van Diepen's wife, Sharon, told him about the information on the website, he became distraught and angry.

Mr. van Diepen and his wife accessed the Project Truth website. On it was an affidavit by Ron Leroux stating that Mr. Leroux had been at parties at the homes of Ken Seguin and Malcolm MacDonald, as well as at St. Andrew's Parish house, where he had seen a number of individuals, including Mr. van Diepen. Mr. Leroux said that he had witnessed sexual improprieties committed on minor boys at these locations by members of a pedophile clan that included named priests, Ken Seguin, and others. Mr. Leroux also asserted that at Mr. Seguin's funeral, Mr. van Diepen had disclosed that "he told Ken to watch his step for years" and that Mr. Seguin had left a "full report," "a confession" on his desk before his suicide. Mr. van Diepen was very upset to learn that his name was associated with a pedophile clan and that it was suggested he had been aware of Mr. Seguin's inappropriate behaviour but had chosen not to report it.

Mr. van Diepen Raises Concerns About the Website to Area Manager Claude Legault

When Area Manager Claude Legault²⁵ returned to the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office on August 8, 2000, after a vacation, he became aware of the Project Truth website. He learned of allegations that Jos van Diepen knew several people reputed to be associated with sexual abuse and that Mr. van Diepen had knowledge of inappropriate sexual behaviour by some of these individuals, including probation officers, but had not taken any action.

Mr. van Diepen met with Mr. Legault. He was “adamant that these were all false allegations,” and he was “concerned about the impact this would have on his reputation in the community” and how it could “compromise his ability to do his job as a probation and parole officer.” Mr. van Diepen asked Mr. Legault whether the Ministry could provide him with legal counsel to initiate measures to shut down the website.

Staff in the Cornwall Probation Office knew that Mr. van Diepen’s name was associated with sexual abusers on the Project Truth website and that he was worried about his reputation as a probation and parole officer. As Ms Sue Lariviere said at the hearings, Mr. van Diepen “was pretty distraught ... Mr. van Diepen was definitely affected by it, and he felt that he was probably in a vulnerable position because of it and I think the whole office was anyway.” Mr. Legault confirmed that other probation officers were also concerned about the website “[n]ot only for the information relating to Ken, but ... how it depicted the office as a whole and us as probation officers.”

Mr. Legault decided to alert Ms Deborah Newman to the existence of the Project Truth website. On August 11, 2000, he wrote Ms Newman a lengthy e-mail describing some of the information on the website, the effect it was having on his staff, and the concern that Mr. van Diepen might have known about the sexual abuse committed by Mr. Seguin. Mr. Legault said he had spoken to Mr. van Diepen, who was “upset to be the subject of innuendoes and unfounded allegations, and to be guilty by association.” Mr. van Diepen, wrote Mr. Legault, was also worried about “where he stands with the Ministry”:

The general mood around the office was quite dejected this week, and I had further discussions with some staff. Their concern is not only (and not mainly) over the fact that this is again in the news, but especially over the fact that it raises doubts about the credibility of Jos’ claims that he never knew anything about Ken Seguin’s sexual abuses. Things could get worse next week when many staff members are back from vacation, including Don Billard, Carole Cardinal and Ron Gendron; discussions and questions will continue about the allegations on this website ... Since his return to work, Jos has not discussed this website with staff, thus increasing their doubts.

25. Claude Legault became the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office in December 1998.

Mr. Legault listed for Ms Newman the following concerns of staff:

—Have we been duped by Jos when he claimed that he had no knowledge of any of the abuse by Ken Seguin and others?

—Why is he not talking to his colleagues to re-assure them that there is no truth to the allegations in the website?

—Staff were confident that with the efforts made by everyone to be “above board,” it would be clear for everyone who the good guys and bad ones were; this only serves to once again blur the distinction, and create doubts over everyone (or as they say, everyone is painted with the same brush).

—What is the Ministry’s position on these allegations? Is it business as usual, as if nothing happened? Should Jos be suspended as a result of these allegations, as other staff have been following allegations against them and until an investigation cleared them of any wrongdoing? Should or have police been contacted to see if they have or are investigating these allegations? (Emphasis added)

As Mr. Legault explained at the hearings, staff in the Cornwall office made a “commitment” in 1999 that “we were going to regain our integrity and our credibility ... one day at a time, one client at a time, by having a clear, consistent process and having the reassurance that we can trust each other fully.” However, the “website information seemed to cast some doubt over that in the mind of certain staff members.”

Mr. Legault made it clear in his correspondence to Ms Newman that Cornwall staff were waiting for the response of the Ministry. In his view, the Ministry should be transparent and forthcoming with information and should encourage clients to disclose the abuse. He thought the actions of the Ministry should make it evident to the public that there was no “cover-up” and that other probation officers and Ministry officials were “different” from such individuals as Ken Seguin, Nelson Barque, who had engaged in sexually inappropriate and other improper conduct. Mr. Legault also recommended that clients who disclosed abuse be encouraged to seek counselling through The Men's Project or other social services:

I think that the rest of the staff would also like to hear what the Ministry's position or intentions are as a result of these allegations/revelations. The present silence leads them to wonder where we stand. I have repeated my position that we must continue to demonstrate a transparent and consistent approach, in which we never try to "tuck this under the carpet," but instead are forthcoming with information and encourage our clients to disclose any abuse and to seek counselling through the Men's project or other service agencies; it is the only way for our clients and the public to see that we are not involved in any form of cover-up, and that the rest of us are different from Ken, Nelson, and the rest. But I feel that it is not my position that they are after at this time, it is the Region's and the Ministry's. I would like to suggest that an e-mail from you or a visit to this office would be welcomed.

Mr. Legault also told Ms Newman that Sue Lariviere had been served with a subpoena to appear as a witness in the trial of Marcel Lalonde, a teacher charged with sexually abusing children. A Ministry client had disclosed to Ms Lariviere that Mr. Lalonde, who was still teaching, had sexually abused him. Mr. Legault wrote:

It now appears that the police investigation revealed that Mr. Lalonde had other victims, and that in one instance he introduced one of these victims to Ken Seguin and they both sexually abused him. Sue was worried that her testimony would again open the door to the whole Project Truth allegations, and that she would be questioned about Ken ... etc. (Emphasis added)

The criminal investigation, charges, and trial of Marcel Lalonde are discussed in the following chapters of this Report.

Richard Nadeau Contacts Mr. van Diepen

Within a couple of weeks of discussing his concerns about the Project Truth website with Mr. Legault, Mr. van Diepen was contacted by telephone at work by Richard Nadeau. Mr. Nadeau identified himself, claiming that he was a private investigator working for a lawyer who was not named, and said he wanted information on Ken Seguin. Mr. Nadeau did not reveal that he was responsible for the information on the website.

Mr. van Diepen replied that because he was a Ministry employee, he could not provide any particulars to Mr. Nadeau regarding Mr. Seguin. Mr. Nadeau persisted, and asked the probation officer to suggest ways in which he could obtain such information. He was especially interested in gaining access to a memo that had apparently instructed Ken Seguin to hold all his interviews with his office door open and not to have Ministry clients visit his home. Mr. van Diepen suggested that Mr. Nadeau contact the Ministry's Communications Branch or try to obtain the information through Freedom of Information. Mr. Nadeau told Mr. van Diepen that he might be subpoenaed, which would compel the probation officer to divulge the requested information. He also indicated that an unnamed lawyer would be contacting Mr. van Diepen. Mr. van Diepen prepared an incident report the following day, in which he described the content of the call with Mr. Nadeau.

The August 25, 2000, incident report was sent to Mr. Legault, who forwarded it by e-mail to Ms Newman. Mr. Legault also advised her that Keith Ouellette, "one of the victims of Ken Seguin," had visited the Alexandria office and had discussed the Project Truth website. Mr. Ouellette had stated that Richard Nadeau was a former victim who was communicating with other victims and retaining legal counsel. Although Mr. Legault did not know whether Mr. Nadeau was part of a group that was suing the Ministry, he wrote that "Mr. Nadeau is certainly very close to the action."

Mr. Nadeau again made contact with Mr. van Diepen. On August 28, 2000, he arrived at the van Diepen residence and spoke to Mr. van Diepen's daughter. Jos van Diepen was not home at the time. Mr. Nadeau returned on the afternoon of September 2, 2000. As he came up the driveway, Mr. van Diepen's daughter identified him as the man who had previously visited their home. Mr. van Diepen asked him for his name. By this time, Jos van Diepen was aware of Mr. Nadeau's association with the Project Truth website. Upon learning his name, he told Mr. Nadeau in strong language that "it would be a good idea to leave at once." As Mr. van Diepen wrote in the incident report prepared a few days after the visit, Mr. Nadeau "immediately left my premises with all haste and with my strongest encouragement."

Deborah Newman Initiates an Administrative Review at the Ministry of Correctional Services, Paul Downing Is Appointed

Ms Deborah Newman was very concerned when she learned of the Project Truth website in August 2000. She was briefed on its contents and learned that there were allegations of sexual improprieties committed by former Ministry employees. The website contained allegations that Mr. van Diepen had been at parties in the company of some alleged abusers and that this Cornwall probation officer knew about some of the sexual misconduct. She and other Ministry officials at the regional and local levels, such as Area Manager Claude Legault, had been dealing with disclosures of abuse committed by former probation employees at the Cornwall office. As discussed, measures had been taken to ensure that staff were equipped to deal with these disclosures and that the alleged victims had access to counselling and support. The Project Truth website was “a very significant concern” to Ms Newman, who decided to initiate a Ministry review to obtain additional information on the allegations “in relation to improprieties involving Ministry employees or Ministry clients.”

Ms Newman contacted Gary Commeford, Director of Management and Operational Support at the Ministry. She informed Mr. Commeford of the anonymous website, on which allegations were made about inappropriate activities engaged in by former and current employees of the Cornwall Probation Office. When Ms Newman became the Assistant Deputy Minister in September 2000, Mr. Commeford reported directly to her.

Ms Newman discussed the prospect of an “administrative review” of the information on the website. They agreed that Paul Downing, Special Investigator at the Ministry of Correctional Services, who reported to Mr. Commeford, would be the appropriate person to conduct the review. Mr. Downing was formerly a police officer, had good investigative skills, and had significant experience in both the community and institutional divisions of the Ministry. There were allegations on the website regarding a chaplain, Father Maloney, who had a contract with the Ministry of Correctional Services for work at the Cornwall jail, in the institutional division of the Ministry.

On August 8, 2000, Deborah Newman, Mickey Stevenson, and Lori Potter spoke by telephone with Paul Downing to discuss his role in the administrative review. He was told to examine the contents of the Project Truth website and to determine whether there was a risk to Ministry clients or to public safety. Ms Newman was aware that an OPP investigation was ongoing.²⁶ Mr. Downing was permitted to liaise with the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) and the Crown with respect to the allegations on the website regarding Ministry employees. However, Ms Newman made it very clear that she did not want the Special Investigator to “impede the criminal investigation of the police.” Mr. Downing was instructed to collect the information requested and to submit a report. After this discussion, Ms Newman briefed Morris Zbar, the Assistant Deputy Minister at that time.²⁷

26. The OPP was conducting an investigation called Project Truth. Its mandate was to investigate pedophile activity in the Cornwall area. Some of the suspects were prominent and respected citizens of Cornwall and included lawyers, Catholic priests, teachers, probation officers, businessmen, a former chief of police, and a Crown attorney. This is discussed in detail in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

27. Morris Zbar became Deputy Minister in August 2000.

It is evident from Ms Newman's notes of August 8, 2000, that Mr. Downing's primary focus was on current employees in the Ministry of Correctional Services: "current staff the priority." As Ms Newman said in her evidence:

... [O]ur overriding concern and need-to-know was whether or not there were any current individuals at risk from current employees.

At this stage, I was aware, as you know, that we had deceased employees and I was aware that further disclosures were coming forward in relation to those deceased probation officers, but there had never been an allegation about anyone, other than from a Ministry perspective, those two deceased probation officers.

So our first concern was to determine whether there was any current and ongoing risk being presented by any current employees.

As reflected in her notes, Ms Newman was concerned about the Ministry's responsibilities in the event that current employees were suspected of engaging in sexual improprieties: "what resp do we have as a min if suspect staff involved?"

Ms Newman stressed in her evidence that Mr. Downing was instructed to conduct an "administrative review," not an "investigation" of the alleged sexual abuse. He was to gather information to assist Ms Newman and other senior officials in their assessment of what actions, if any, the Ministry should take.

On August 11, 2000, Mr. Commeford told Mr. Paul Downing he was to "take the appropriate steps to contact the authorities involved" in the Project Truth investigation and that his "role" was "to establish a liaison for the purpose of protecting the interest of the organization." Mr. Commeford also made clear in his testimony that Mr. Downing was performing an administrative review of the material on the anonymous website; he was essentially a case manager and his role was not to investigate the allegations of sexual improprieties.

There were two other entities at the Ministry of Correctional Services at that time that conducted investigations: the Professional Standards Bureau and the Independent Investigations Unit (IIU). As mentioned, the IIU was established in the early 1990s to investigate workplace discrimination, harassment, and sexual improprieties involving Ministry employees and clients. Allegations by David Silmser of sexual abuse by probation officer Ken Seguin had been reported to the IIU in 1992 but, as I discussed earlier in this chapter, the Unit failed to investigate the Silmser complaint.

Ms Newman kept the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office apprised of the discussions. She informed Mr. Legault on August 13, 2000, that Special Investigator Paul Downing would “case manage” issues surrounding the website, that he would be in contact with the law enforcement agencies, and that the Ministry wanted to ensure that it did not interfere with the police investigation:

He will be our liaison with the police, Crown and others and will inquire of Project Truth as to whether any Ministry staff (including Jos) are under investigation. This is very sensitive ground, because we cannot in any way interfere with an ongoing police investigation. On the other hand, we obviously have to protect the interests of the Ministry and our clients.

Ms Newman did not think it was appropriate to share this information with the staff at the Cornwall office:

Claude, this is highly confidential and sensitive and I don't think there is too much we can say to staff right at the moment. I think you can assure them that you and I have communicated about this, and that I am taking steps to review the matter.

Contact With Law Enforcement Agencies: OPP and the Crown

In August 2000, Mr. Downing contacted Detective Inspector Pat Hall of the OPP, who was involved in the Project Truth investigation, regarding four men named on the website: Ken Seguin, Nelson Barque, Father Kevin Maloney, and Jos van Diepen. Mr. Downing was interested in obtaining information from Inspector Hall on these individuals, former and current employees at the Ministry of Correctional Services. Mr. Downing wanted to determine whether Ministry policies had been breached by these four people. A meeting was arranged for early September 2000.

Mr. Downing also made contact with Crown Attorney Shelley Hallett, who he understood was working with Inspector Hall on these cases. In an e-mail to Ms Hallett on August 14, 2000, Mr. Downing explained his role as “case manager” for the Ministry regarding Project Truth:

My initial interest is to connect with those individuals that may hold information that could assist the Ministry in determining what, if any action should be considered surrounding employees.

I was referred to your office and to Pat Hall, Detective Inspector, Ontario Provincial Police. I spoke with Pat on Friday and he agreed to meet with me in early September to review information that may be relevant to Ministry staff. It was Pat's opinion that to date no significant information has been discovered that might implicate improper conduct (non-criminal) on the part of Ministry staff.

However, it would be my responsibility to gather, identify and/or determine as to whether information regarding Ministry employees falls within the parameters of Ministry policies and rules that govern employee conduct.

Ms Hallett wanted to review the case law and speak to legal counsel at the Ministry of Correctional Services before she gave Mr. Downing permission to discuss these issues with the OPP investigators. The outcome of these discussions was that Paul Downing was allowed to meet with the OPP.

Paul Downing Examines the Allegations on the Project Truth Website

Paul Downing's involvement in this Cornwall matter spanned from August 8, 2000, until September 6, 2001. Throughout this period, he reported to Mr. Commeford. Mr. Downing was a designated inspector pursuant to the *Ministry of Correctional Services Act*²⁸ for the purpose of conducting Ministry inspections or investigations. Mr. Downing explained that he had the powers (1) to compel an employee to provide a statement regarding the matter under investigation; and (2) to seize without a warrant information, documents on Ministry property or associated with Ministry business. Ministry employees who obstructed investigations or withheld information were subject to dismissal. Section 22 of the Ministry of Correctional Services Act states:

The Minister may designate any person as an inspector to make such inspection or investigation as the Minister may require in connection with the administration of this Act, and the Minister may and has just cause to dismiss any employee of the Ministry who obstructs an inspection or investigation or withholds, destroys, conceals or refuses to furnish any information or thing required by an inspector for the purposes of the inspection or investigation.

Mr. Downing's work began with an examination of the Project Truth website. There were allegations of a "pedophile network" in Cornwall that "started its operations in the 1950s." There were also assertions of a "cover-up" involving named individuals from the Cornwall Police Service, the Church, the legal profession, and Cornwall probation officer Ken Seguin. There was a list of men—one of whom was Nelson Barque—who knew each other, attended the same parties, and “shared boys.” Under the heading “The Suspects ‘The Pedophile Clan,’” was the following statement:

28. R.S.O. 1990, c. M.22.

Since the first information leaked out in 1992, suspicions that a ring of pedophiles was operating in and around the city of Cornwall began to gain momentum. A “pedophile ring” consisting of prominent businessmen, clergy, judicial and political personalities, correctional and probation services officers, and other community personalities began to spread over the community like a dark cloud.

There was also the statement that probation officer Jos van Diepen had been aware of inappropriate behaviour by his colleagues and others but decided not to disclose the improprieties: “So did Joss [sic] van Diepen know as he was Ken’s coworker and he too did nothing.” Mr. Downing read the affidavit by Ron Leroux, which identified individuals who had attended parties at Ken Seguin’s home, including Mr. van Diepen. The “clan” of pedophiles described by Mr. Leroux involved Mr. Seguin as well as Father Kevin Maloney, who provided chaplain services at the Cornwall jail for the Ministry of Correctional Services.

Further Communication Between Deborah Newman and Paul Downing:
The Need for a More Formal Investigation

Ms Newman²⁹ read the contents of the Project Truth website on August 18, 2000, and conveyed her concerns to Mr. Downing about the statements pertaining to Mr. van Diepen. In an e-mail, Ms Newman asked Mr. Downing to interview Mr. van Diepen:

... I am very concerned by the contents as they pertain to Jos van Diepen, Probation Officer, Cornwall P & P and would like to discuss with you upon your return from vacation. At minimum, I am thinking that it would be wise to have you interview Jos to get his response to the allegations made in the website.

In early September 2000, Mr. Downing suggested to Ms Newman a more in-depth, formal, and structured approach to his review of the Project Truth website allegations. Although he understood the distinction between case management and investigation of the incidents, Mr. Downing thought that certain Ministry staff needed to be questioned. Moreover, he thought that it was necessary to take investigative steps to obtain possible evidence. He recommended to Ms Newman that he develop an investigative plan:

29. She was Regional Director, Community and Young Offender Services. She became Assistant Deputy Minister in September 2000.

If you are available on September 5, 2000 I suggest that we talk about Project Truth. It would appear that a more formal and structured approach should be implemented to properly manage this matter.

As you are aware, Case Management responsibilities and actually investigating an incident(s) are very different functions. It would appear that certain Ministry staff need to be asked specific questions. Prior to those staff being approached, certain investigative steps should be taken to secure possible evidence.

It would be my suggestion that we discuss a number of developing issues and then implement an investigative plan. The plan would then be shared with Gary Commeford.

Ms Newman agreed that “a formal investigation is required in light of all of the information that has come to light in the past couple of weeks.” Therefore, Mr. Downing was given the “green light” to conduct a more formal investigation of the allegations on the Project Truth website.

Paul Downing Prepares Summary Review, Decision Made to Proceed With Stage One Investigation Only

Mr. Downing prepared a summary of the information on the Project Truth website pertaining to Jos van Diepen, Father Kevin Maloney, Ken Seguin, Nelson Barque, and Richard Hickerson, which he then forwarded to Ms Newman and Mr. Commeford on September 9, 2000. After providing this “Case Management Administration Summary Review,” Mr. Downing attached a list of recommendations, divided into two stages, for his superiors to consider.

Under Stage One, Mr. Downing suggested that he interview Mr. van Diepen based upon “reasonable suspicion” that the probation officer either acted improperly or failed to act, contrary to the Ministry’s rules and policies. For the same reasons, Mr. Downing also recommended that he interview Father Maloney. In order to determine what actions were taken by management “when information was received regarding alleged improper conduct” by employees, Mr. Downing proposed that he interview the Area Manager responsible for the Cornwall Probation Office in 1992 to 1993 as well as the District Administrator. Mr. Downing knew his superiors wanted him to assess the following risk factors: “[A]re clients at risk, is the Ministry at risk, the general public at risk?”

The Ministry’s Special Investigator also suggested a second stage. If the outcome of the Stage One examination was that there was credibility to the allegations, Mr. Downing wanted to undertake a more comprehensive investigation, which would have involved obtaining information from individuals not employed by the Ministry of Correctional Services. This extended to Constable Perry Dunlop of the Cornwall Police Service, from whom he wished to obtain a statement on the names of unidentified sources on the Project Truth website and other “relevant evidence.” Mr. Downing also wanted to review the CBC radio series Breach of Trust, a multi-part investigative series on the existence of a pedophile ring in Cornwall.³⁰ In addition, he suggested that he obtain a statement from Ron Leroux, as well as seek the identity of three unnamed sources on the website and interview these people.

Mr. Downing proposed that in Stage Two he contact OPP Detective Inspector Pat Hall and Shelley Hallett of the Ministry of the Attorney General, Criminal Crown Office, both of whom were involved with the Project Truth investigation. He further suggested that he contact the office of the Minister of the Solicitor General/Correctional Services to obtain information apparently provided by Perry Dunlop regarding Ministry employees.

Mr. Downing received approval from his superiors to proceed only with Stage One of his review. Ms Newman and Mr. Commeford testified that the overriding concern in the administrative review was that Paul Downing not interfere with the OPP investigation. The Assistant Deputy Minister believed that interviewing individuals such as Perry Dunlop might “taint the police investigation.” Deputy Minister Morris Zbar agreed; interviewing people outside the Ministry of Correctional Services such as Mr. Dunlop or Mr. Silmsen “was going beyond his mandate.” The Stage Two investigation was never approved, even after Mr. Downing completed Stage One, which culminated in a report to Ms Newman and Mr. Commeford on October 10, 2000.

In the Stage One review, Mr. Downing contacted the Cornwall jail on September 12, 2000, and spoke to Acting Superintendent Bob Dixon regarding Father Kevin Maloney’s contract as a chaplain with the Ministry. The following day he spoke to Father Maloney to arrange an interview. The Catholic priest unequivocally denied that he was involved in any of the sexual misconduct alleged on the Project Truth website. Father Maloney confirmed that he continued to provide chaplain services to inmates and staff at the Cornwall jail. Mr. Downing also spoke to Michael Stephenson, Regional Director of the Eastern Region, who was not aware of any credible information that suggested Father Maloney was a risk to current clients of the Ministry of Correctional Services.

30. Aired in 1999.

When Mr. Downing met with Father Maloney on September 27, 2000, the priest denied that he had been to Ken Seguin's residence in Summerstown for parties or for any other reason. Father Maloney also "flatly" denied the allegations on the Project Truth website that he had engaged in sexual conduct with young males.

Mr. Downing also made contact with Brian Scott, Acting Manager of the Independent Investigations Unit (IIU), regarding the 1992 complaint by David Silmser to Bill Roy, Regional Manager (Eastern Region) that he had been sexually abused by probation officer Ken Seguin. As discussed earlier in this chapter, Mr. Downing learned in his interview with Bill Roy that Mr. Roy had reported the Silmser complaint to the IIU. He also became aware of the discussions between Lenna Bradburn, the IIU manager in 1992, and Loretta Eley, executive assistant to the Deputy Minister.³¹ It was Mr. Downing's understanding that Ms Eley had informed Ms Bradburn that the "Legal Branch" would deal with the matter and that "no action" was required of the IIU at this time.

It was Mr. Downing's opinion that Mr. Roy had followed Ministry policies by reporting the complaint in an expeditious manner to the IIU:

Ministry documents confirm that RM [Regional Manager] Roy followed Ministry policy when he contacted the IIU and the OPP regarding David Silmser's allegations. Ministry documents record that the Deputy Minister's (DM) office instructed the IIU not to proceed with an investigation regarding Silmser's allegations. Ministry documents record that instructions issued by the DM's office were that the Ministry's Legal Branch would provide the lead regarding David Silmser's complaint. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Downing considered it the mandate and responsibility of the IIU to investigate allegations of sexual improprieties between Ministry employees and clients. The Special Investigator questioned the decision to have the Legal Branch handle the Silmser complaint of sexual abuse by probation officer Ken Seguin. As Mr. Downing testified, "I am not quite sure why Legal Branch would be dealing with it. It would be my opinion that they are not skilled and trained investigators."

Mr. Downing also contacted Jos van Diepen. On September 27, 2000, the day before his scheduled interview with Mr. van Diepen, Mr. Downing met with OPP Detective Inspector Pat Hall. Mr. Downing sought information on current 31. Mr. Downing also interviewed Loretta Eley.

Ministry employees under criminal investigation by Project Truth. Inspector Hall told Mr. Downing that the OPP had not found any wrongdoing by Father Maloney and that no criminal charges would be laid against the priest. It is noteworthy that this was prior to the Crown rendering its opinion that no charges should be laid against Father Maloney.

Inspector Hall also told Mr. Downing that the OPP had obtained a statement from Mr. van Diepen, which he was prepared to show him. Inspector Hall said he thought Mr. van Diepen had not been completely truthful and that the probation officer knew more than he had disclosed to the Project Truth investigators. Although the OPP Detective Inspector allowed Mr. Downing to read the van Diepen statement, he did not want the Ministry official to make a copy of it. Mr. Downing testified that it would have been very helpful to have the van Diepen statement for his administrative review and for the report that he was to submit to senior Ministry of Correctional Services officials. Inspector Hall did not disclose to the Ministry Special Investigator that the OPP had taken statements from other members of the staff at the Cornwall Probation Office. Mr. Downing testified that he was given very “limited information” by the OPP.

When Mr. Downing examined Mr. van Diepen’s statement to the OPP, he noticed that the probation officer had made several significant changes to the statement recorded by Constables Genier and McDonell, the police officers who had interviewed Mr. van Diepen in February 1994. For example, “I know Ken’s boyfriends” was changed to “I know some of Ken’s male friends” and “I know Malcolm’s boyfriends” was changed to “I know some of Malcolm’s male friends.” Mr. Downing did not “believe that the interviewing officers made that many mistakes in recording the statement.” As the Ministry Special Investigator said:

For the person interviewed to go back and change—make so many changes, it would suggest to me that the person being interviewed, Jos, after seeing what he may have said was uncomfortable with that in writing and wanted to make changes.

Mr. van Diepen told the OPP officers in his 1994 interview that he knew Ken Seguin had contacts with Ministry clients outside the Cornwall Probation Office.

Mr. Downing met with Claude Legault, Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office, on September 27, 2000. Mr. Legault drove Mr. Downing to several sites mentioned in the Project Truth website, including Ken Seguin’s home in Summerstown.

Mr. Downing interviewed Mr. van Diepen on September 28, 2000, the day after he met with Detective Inspector Pat Hall. Mr. van Diepen was reluctant to meet Mr. Downing as he wanted funding from the Ministry to retain a lawyer to accompany him to the interview. Nevertheless, the probation officer appeared for the scheduled interview, which was held in Kingston at the Eastern Regional Office. His wife, Sharon, was with him.

At the interview, Mr. van Diepen told Mr. Downing that he'd been an employee at the Ministry of Correctional Services for twenty-five years and that when he joined the Cornwall Probation Office, he was the third probation and parole officer. The other two probation officers were Mr. Nelson Barque and Mr. Ken Seguin.

It was clear to Mr. Downing that Mr. van Diepen knew Mr. Seguin had been socially involved with Ministry clients outside of work. He told Mr. Downing:

... I know that some of his clients did seem to interact with him socially. Probationers stopped by his house in Cornwall and also met with him at a local tavern. They were adult Ministry clients. (Emphasis added)

This was contrary to the Ministry rules. As Mr. Downing explained, the Ministry rules were established “to ensure the integrity of a professional relationship between our employees and our clients or offenders under our care through the courts.” The importance of these rules, he said, is “for the administration of justice to show that ... those who work in the justice field are able to remain objective and to provide a service to the court that in reality and perception is fair and transparent.” It was Mr. Downing's understanding that these rules applied to current and former Ministry clients.

It is noteworthy that when Mr. Downing asked Mr. van Diepen if he had given a statement to the OPP, the probation officer's initial response was “I don't remember.” As Mr. Downing testified, this “comment about he didn't remember giving a statement ... just didn't make sense to me as an investigator.” The Special Investigator had also noticed that several differences existed between the information Mr. van Diepen conveyed to the OPP and the information he was communicating to Mr. Downing in the September 2000 interview:

... [H]is statement to Pat Hall ... seemed [to indicate] that he had further knowledge about Ken's personal life and his association with certain individuals in the community and the nature of that content.

There were also internal inconsistencies in his statement to Mr. Downing on different issues, such as whether he had reported his knowledge of Mr. Seguin's inappropriate behaviour to his superiors at the Ministry. Mr. van Diepen told Mr. Downing that notwithstanding his “poor relationship with Emile Robert,” he had told his Area Manager his “concerns regarding Ken Seguin's relationship with clients,” but that Mr. Robert did not respond or institute measures to ensure that Mr. Seguin modified his behaviour. Mr. Downing questioned Mr. van Diepen’s truthfulness.

Mr. Downing gave his assessment of his interview with Mr. van Diepen:

Based, again, on his initial statement to the police, the changes I witnessed, his position at the beginning of my interview and the movement throughout that interview, I don’t think that—I think that Jos was reluctant and I’m not sure why. I think that he had information that he could have been more forthright about. He could have better explained some of his conduct or actions that he shared with me during the interview.

I believe that he did have significant knowledge with regards to Ken’s association with offenders within the community, contrary to Ministry rules. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Downing also interviewed Emile Robert, the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office. After asking him several questions about Ken Seguin regarding the Varley incident and Mr. Seguin’s relationship with Gerald Renshaw, among other issues, it was evident to Mr. Downing that Mr. Robert had known or at least reasonably suspected that Mr. Seguin “was associating with Ministry clients outside of business,” which “certainly and clearly contravened Ministry policy.” As with Mr. van Diepen, there did not appear to be any evidence to suggest that Mr. Robert knew the association between Mr. Seguin and Ministry clients involved sexual improprieties. But “again, similar to Jos,” Mr. Downing thought that during the interview “Emile was reluctant and not forthright.” This applied to the Varley incident, for example. Mr. Downing thought that there was clearly an issue of credibility. Mr. Downing also thought that the Varley incident should have been investigated:

Based on the information that was reported and the incident and the previous knowledge or suspicions that Emile had reported having with regards to Ken’s association with clients outside of the workplace and based on my experience as a Ministry inspector, this would clearly be a situation that would normally be investigated by an inspector or one in Level 1 investigation. This is a high profile situation that could bring disrepute to the administration of justice having someone in the justice system, at least from the initial information, possibly involved or have knowledge of. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Downing also questioned Mr. Robert's judgment with regard to the Gerald Renshaw matter.

Transfer of Mr. van Diepen From Cornwall Probation Office to Integrated Justice

As a result of the information on the Project Truth website and Mr. van Diepen's concern about his reputation as a probation officer in Cornwall, a number of discussions took place with Mr. Legault and Ms Newman concerning a possible reassignment of Mr. van Diepen within the Ministry. In an e-mail on September 7, 2000, Mr. van Diepen wrote:

In a novel defence to a breach of probation, one client has already argued that he was afraid to report to me because I was a pedophile. On that occasion I again asked for legal counsel and that was pooh hood [sic]. Although the client was convicted, he received a mere slap on the wrist and, in the meantime, the slur against me was protected by the bounds of the courtroom ... I feel like an enigma within a riddle.

Ms Newman offered Mr. van Diepen a temporary assignment with the Integrated Justice Project in September 2000. This assignment was designed to remove him from the preparation of pre-sentence reports and active client supervision.

After the Integrated Justice Project wound down, Mr. van Diepen worked in North Bay with the Ministry's technology group. He travelled to his home in St. Andrews on weekends. In 2004 or 2005, Mr. van Diepen returned to his position as a probation officer in the Cornwall Probation Office. Mr. Legault assigned him exclusively to first-time offenders—clients who did not have a probation record and who consequently had not been on probation in the 1968–1993 period.

Paul Downing Submits His Report to Deborah Newman and Gary Commeford

Paul Downing sent his report, entitled "Administrative Review Cornwall Probation and Parole Office Project Truth Website Publication," to Deborah Newman and Gary Commeford on October 10, 2000. Mr. Downing enclosed and summarized the interview reports of Jos van Diepen, Emile Robert, Bill Roy, and Father Kevin Maloney. He also provided a list of pertinent documents. In the report, Mr. Downing discussed Nelson Barque: the McMaster report in 1982, in which Mr. Barque acknowledged that he had been sexually involved with two probationers; Mr. Barque's resignation from the Ministry in May 1982; his subsequent employment at Équipe Psycho-sociale; and the reference for Mr. Barque provided by Cornwall Area Manager Peter Sirrs. He also discussed Mr. Barque's resignation from Équipe Psycho-sociale in 1986, after Executive Director Pierre Landry confronted him with allegations of sexual misconduct. He discussed Mr. Barque's conviction in 1995 for indecent assault and his suicide in 1998, when he was being investigated by the OPP in Project Truth.

With respect to probation officer Ken Seguin, Mr. Downing concluded that "for some time prior to PPO Seguin's death in 1993, a number of Cornwall Probation and Parole staff suspected, while other staff ought reasonably to have known, that PPO Seguin was contravening Ministry rules and policies governing employee contact with offender/ex-offenders." The Ministry Special Investigator also stated in his October 2000 report that there was no investigation at the Ministry of Correctional Services regarding David Silmser's allegations of sexual misconduct by probation officer Ken Seguin "or other matters relevant to the supervision of Ministry clients at the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office."

Mr. Commeford testified that he was "appalled" when he became aware of the issues raised in the Downing report; probationers and inmates are "vulnerable individuals and it's unacceptable to expose them or have them exposed to this type of behaviour by Ministry staff." The Director of Management and Operational Support was disturbed to learn not only that Mr. Barque had had sexual relations with Ministry clients but that Area Manager Peter Sirrs had provided a letter of reference to the executive director of Équipe Psycho-sociale:

That we would give a letter of reference to somebody who in fact left under those circumstances, very concerned. As well ... Mr. Barque's sexual involvement with clients was more than concerning to me.

Mr. Downing's findings regarding the management of the Cornwall office were also of great concern to Mr. Commeford. Mr. Robert's failure to address the Varley incident for many months, said Mr. Commeford, was "disturbing," "unacceptable," and "very poor management."

Mr. Commeford further learned from the Downing report that David Silmser had disclosed to Mr. Bill Roy in 1992 that he had been sexually abused and that Mr. Roy had contacted the IIU, but that no investigation was undertaken. Instead, the Silmser matter was referred to lawyers in the Ministry. Mr. Commeford believed that Mr. Seguin had managed to stay "under the radar" for a significant period.

Assistant Deputy Minister Deborah Newman had similar concerns about the Cornwall probation staff and management when she read Mr. Downing's report. Mr. Downing said that there appeared to be an office culture in Cornwall that tended to turn a "blind eye" to the breach of Ministry policies. For example, Mr.

van Diepen appeared to know about Mr. Seguin's personal relationships with Ministry clients outside the office and Mr. Barque's pornographic material in his office. She was also troubled about Mr. Robert's judgment when she read the Downing report. Ms Newman learned that Regional Manager Roy Hawkins had allowed a former probationer, Gerald Renshaw, to live with Mr. Seguin. Additionally, the Assistant Deputy Minister was concerned that an IIU investigation of David Silmser's complaint had not been undertaken. Ms Newman thought that follow-up interviews were necessary, particularly with regard to the absence of an investigation of the Silmser complaint by the IIU.

A conference call between Ms Newman, Mr. Commeford, and Mr. Downing took place on October 16, 2000. Mr. Downing was asked to conduct additional interviews. Mr. van Diepen had claimed in his interview with Mr. Downing that he had approached Mr. Robert and had discussed Mr. Seguin's association outside the office with probationers. Mr. Downing was asked to contact Mr. Robert to determine whether, in fact, Mr. van Diepen had raised this issue with the Cornwall Area Manager. He was also asked to follow up on the letter of reference that Mr. Sirrs had provided for Nelson Barque in his application for a position at Équipe Psycho-sociale. Assistant Deputy Minister Deborah Newman thought there were gaps in information concerning the Silmser allegation of sexual assault by probation officer Ken Seguin, and she questioned whether the Ministry had appropriately handled this complaint. As Ms Newman said in her evidence:

... So when Mr. Downing came back after having completed these interviews identified in his plan, there were some clear gaps in information and questions about—that we wanted to find out more about in relation to what happened when Mr. Silmser came forward in 1993, because that was sketchy information at that point for us at best.

...

So we wanted to get a better sense of what had happened in 1993. So a number of follow-up interviews were necessary in order to determine that. It was an area of concern obviously in terms of had the Ministry handled this appropriately.

The absence of an IIU investigation was puzzling and of concern. Mr. Downing was asked to interview Loretta Eley, the Deputy Minister's executive assistant at the time of the Silmser complaint. As Ms Newman explained, it was "unclear at that stage, without conducting further interviews, as to what had actually happened and why, in fact, there wasn't a Ministry investigation."

Mr. Downing contacted Emile Robert on October 18, 2000. Both verbally and in a letter to Mr. Downing, the former Cornwall Area Manager denied that

Mr. van Diepen had discussed with him concerns about Mr. Seguin's relationship with Ministry clients:

Further to your memorandum of October 18, 2000, this is to confirm that Mr. Van Diepen, PPO, Cornwall, never raised any concerns with me regarding Mr. Séguin's personal relationship with Ministry clients prior to Mr. Séguin's death.

Mr. Downing also contacted Peter Sirrs, the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office at the time Nelson Barque was an employee at the Ministry of Correctional Services. Mr. Downing explained that he wished to discuss the reference Mr. Sirrs had provided to Mr. Pierre Landry concerning the employment of Mr. Barque. As I discussed earlier in this chapter, Mr. Sirrs initially told Mr. Downing that he did not have telephone contact with Mr. Landry and that he did not write a letter of reference. When Mr. Downing conveyed that he, in fact, had a copy of the reference letter to Mr. Landry, Mr. Sirrs replied that "somebody must have forged it." Mr. Downing considered Pierre Landry's version of events to be more credible than that of Mr. Sirrs.

On November 9, 2000, Mr. Downing had a telephone conference call with Deputy Minister Morris Zbar, Assistant Deputy Minister Newman, Mr. Commeford, and Mr. John Rabeau. Mr. Downing was asked to send his report "ASAP to Legal branch." Senior Ministry officials had several questions about the complaint by David Silmser. In particular, why did the IIU not investigate the allegation of sexual abuse by a probationer officer, and who made the decision to refer it to the Legal Branch?

Mr. Downing spoke with Denise Dwyer, a lawyer in the Ministry's Legal Branch on November 16, 2000. The Legal Branch prepared a report on the Silmser matter. The Ministry of Correctional Services claimed solicitor/client privilege at the Inquiry, and consequently, I was precluded from reviewing the contents of the report.

As mentioned, Mr. Downing interviewed Loretta Eley, the executive assistant to Deputy Minister Michele Noble, when the Silmser complaint was made to the Ministry of Correctional Services. Ms Eley agreed that the Silmser complaint was within the mandate of the IIU but claimed she could not recall who had made the decision in the Deputy Minister's office to transfer the matter to the Legal Branch and for the IIU not to proceed with the investigation.

New Disclosures of Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Probation Officer Ken Seguin

In early 2001, Mr. Downing was informed that there were three new disclosures of sexual abuse of Ministry clients by Cornwall probation officer Ken Seguin.

Mr. Downing asked Ministry Inspector Mark McGillis from the Correctional Investigation and Security Unit to interview and obtain statements from the complainants.

One of the complainants, identified at the Inquiry as C-48, alleged that Mr. Seguin had abused him in the 1970s when he was on probation at the age of fifteen or sixteen. The complainant said Mr. Seguin had threatened that if he disclosed the abuse, he would be sent to training school. A portion of the May 2001 statement is reproduced below:

After approximately two or three months of probation the inappropriate touching became regular. We would meet two or three times a week. He said if I told anyone he would tell them I was lying, that I would go to Alfred Training School. He said I would go there for a long time. He held it over my head all the time. He would threaten me with that. He started to come on to me stronger.

...

I am 46 years old now and I am still having nightmares about it. I always buried myself in drugs to get away from my memories. He wrecked my life.

Inspector McGillis interviewed C-49, who also alleged that he had been sexually abused by his probation officer, Ken Seguin, from 1988 until the early 1990s. The former probationer said that he and Mr. Seguin had supplied drugs to one another. The third individual, also a former Ministry client, was not interviewed as he refused to proceed with the complaint.

Paul Downing Instructed to Close the File: No Historical Review of Former Probation Clients and No Disciplinary Measures Taken Against Ministry Employees

In early September 2001, Mr. Downing was instructed to close the Cornwall file: "Consultation with Gary Commeford. File closed. Crown Law office dealing with matters relevant to Project Truth." Mr. Commeford explained that Denise Dwyer, a lawyer at the Ministry, would be dealing with the matter. Mr. Downing testified that "there was no explanation as to why I was to close the file." And he added:

... [I]t's my opinion, based on my experience, that lawyers aren't investigators ... so I'd be surprised unless they again employed one of the investigation units ... or some outside source, that they would actually be conducting an investigation themselves.

At this time, both Mr. Downing and Mr. Commeford's involvement with the Cornwall file came to an end.

Mr. Commeford provided a number of reasons at the Inquiry hearings for the decision of the Ministry to close the Cornwall file. He explained that the two perpetrators, probation officers Mr. Seguin and Mr. Barque, were no longer alive. In addition, the perception at the Ministry was that the current Cornwall Area Manager, Mr. Claude Legault, had been dealing well with the situation and had established a number of protocols. In Mr. Commeford's opinion, "it did not appear" that "present clients were at risk." The Ministry was involved in a number of lawsuits at the time, of which government lawyers at the Legal Branch had carriage. Mr. Commeford and other senior officials at the Ministry "were all hoping" that Project Truth and the police forces would deal with this matter.

Former Deputy Minister Morris Zbar and Deputy Minister Deborah Newman echoed many of the same explanations. As Mr. Zbar said, his "primary concern" was that there was no current risk to Ministry clients; when he was "assured" that "there was no danger currently," he "felt somewhat relieved."

No further investigations were conducted by the Ministry to identify the victims who had been sexually abused by Cornwall probation employees in the past. No efforts were made, for example, to conduct a historical review of the files of Mr. Seguin and Mr. Barque. As Deputy Minister Newman said, "quite frankly it wasn't something we deliberately turned our minds to," but she acknowledged:

... [I]t's a good point—if there was anyone who came forward through that process, that might have been an additional step that we could have taken, notwithstanding the practical difficulties of trying to source people out ...

Former Deputy Minister Zbar also agreed that an effort to locate victims of abuse who might require psychological or other counselling services would have been beneficial:

... [A] file review might not have been 100 percent complete but it could—the question that was posed was, "Would it have been useful?" And I, on reflection, think it might have been useful. It could have—even if it discovered one additional individual, that's useful.

...

... I acknowledge the fact that it would not have been a bad idea. I didn't think of it; my officials didn't bring it to me. We didn't do it.
(Emphasis added)

It is clear from the evidence that the Ministry of Correctional Services failed to review the files of former Cornwall probation officers Nelson Barque and Ken Seguin in order to identify further victims of abuse.

Despite the problems raised in the Downing report regarding staff and managers of the Cornwall Probation Office, no disciplinary measures were taken by the Ministry of Correctional Services against any individuals. Mr. Downing had raised serious concerns regarding Peter Sirrs, Emile Robert, and Jos van Diepen, yet no disciplinary action was taken by Ministry officials. Nor were disciplinary measures initiated against those involved in the Silmser complaint.

Senior Ministry officials knew that Mr. Sirrs had provided a letter of reference for Mr. Barque to the executive director of a mental health organization for children and adolescents, Équipe Psycho-sociale. Mr. Barque had admitted that he had engaged in sexual improprieties with Ministry clients, yet the Cornwall Area Manager did not caution the executive director against hiring Mr. Barque for a position at Équipe Psycho-sociale. In Ms Newman's notes of a meeting she had on November 14, 2000, with Mr. Zbar, Mr. Commeford, lawyer Denise Dwyer, and Mr. Rabeau, she wrote: "Peter Sirrs—pos. ref.—issue of liability." Mr. Barque was in a position of trust, he had violated Ministry rules, and Mr. Sirrs had exercised very poor judgment. But at the hearings, Ms Newman said no action could be taken against Mr. Sirrs after the Downing report because the former Cornwall Area Manager had retired from the Ministry of Correctional Services.

Area Manager Emile Robert knew or at least had a reasonable suspicion that Ken Seguin was socializing with clients outside the office, contrary to Ministry policy. Moreover, Mr. Robert had waited eight months to report the Varley incident to his supervisor at the regional office. Furthermore, the decision of Mr. Robert and Mr. Hawkins to allow former probationer Gerald Renshaw to live with the Cornwall probation officer was problematic and an area of concern to Assistant Deputy Minister Newman. In her notes, Ms Newman refers to the lengthy gap, Mr. Robert's "wilful blindness," the granting of permission to Ken Seguin to live with a former probationer, and the issue that there was "no level of inquiry until police involved." With regard to the failure to discipline Roy Hawkins, Ms Newman explained that he, too, had retired from his employment at the Ministry.

Senior Ministry officials knew that there were clear contradictions between the statement Mr. van Diepen gave to the OPP and the information he conveyed to Mr. Downing concerning his knowledge of Mr. Seguin's inappropriate interactions with Ministry clients. Mr. Downing told his superiors that he, like OPP Inspector Hall, thought Mr. van Diepen knew more about Ken Seguin's relations with probationers than he was willing to disclose to the Ministry Special Investigator. Recorded in Ms Newman's notes of November 14, 2000, is: "Jos—contradicted himself→close friend?—trying to distance himself." Section 22 of the Ministry of Correctional Services Act states that an employee can be dismissed if he or she does not furnish information for the purposes of an investigation or an inspection.

The question that arises is why no disciplinary measures were imposed on Mr. Robert or Mr. van Diepen, employees of the Ministry of Correctional Services at the time Mr. Downing's report was completed in October 2000. Ms Newman stated in her evidence that Mr. Robert had been transferred from Cornwall and was working at the Ottawa Probation and Parole Office at the time of the release of the report, under the strict supervision of Mr. Gilbert Tayles, the equivalent of a regional manager. When asked whether after the Downing report it was important to convey the message to Mr. Robert that his judgment as Area Manager of the Cornwall office had been extremely poor, Ms Newman responded:

I think we were well past that with Mr. Robert and, you know, given that this was now, I don't know, many years later—what, almost 20 years later that we already knew what we were dealing with and in trying to monitor, supervise and support Mr. Robert to become a better manager.

Ms Newman also took the position that Mr. van Diepen's knowledge of inappropriate conduct of his colleagues at the Cornwall office was "inconclusive":

I think there was a sense that—in relation to Mr. van Diepen, that the information provided was inconclusive as to what he did or did not know.

Ms Newman and Mr. Zbar stated that these issues had been referred to the Legal Branch of the Ministry and that as a result of the legal advice received, it was decided that no disciplinary action would be taken against Mr. Robert and Mr. van Diepen. Ms Deborah Newman said:

I think that in relation to those events that transpired some decades earlier, we acted on the basis of the legal advice that we got.

Was I happy with that advice? No. Nevertheless, we employ our lawyers to give us advice and we consider that advice and we did so in this case.

In my view, a central reason why senior officials at the Ministry did not invoke disciplinary measures was that they were concerned that the employees would grieve. In Ms Newman's notes of the November 14, 2000, meeting with

Mr. Zbar, Mr. Commeford, Ms Dwyer, and Mr. Rabeau, she writes: “if E. & J. grieve, this cld all be made public thru griev. process.” Ms Newman confirmed that “E” and “J” refer to Emile Robert and Jos van Diepen and stated:

There’s a notation that if they’re disciplined in terms of next steps, that they would—there would be a strong possibility that they would grieve and this would be made public through the grievance process ...

... We, unfortunately, have thousands of grievances. We work in a very litigious environment and a difficult labour relations environment and we would simply need to be prepared and to prepare the minister to answer any questions with confidence in the House.

The Ministry was clearly worried about the publicity that could result from these grievances and, in particular, the problems at the Cornwall office regarding sexual abuse by employees. This explains why employees such as Mr. Robert and Mr. van Diepen were not disciplined for violating Ministry policies and rules. In my view, individuals who failed to comply with Ministry statutes, policies, and rules should have been disciplined.

Mr. Zbar and other witnesses testified that at that time, the Ministry had “serious labour relations challenges.” It “had the unenvious record of leading the government in grievances,” and he and other Correctional Services officials were “trying to find a way of addressing those things.” The former Deputy Minister recalled discussing with Ms Newman the possibility of negative publicity about Mr. Robert and Mr. van Diepen if grievances were initiated as a result of disciplinary measures. But he and Ms Newman claimed that publicity associated with grievances brought by the employees was not a consideration in the decision not to impose disciplinary action against these individuals. I do not find this convincing. In my opinion, the failure of the Ministry and its officials to impose disciplinary measures on the Area Manager and staff in the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office is attributable, in large part, to their concern about the grievances that would be initiated, as well as their concern regarding negative publicity that could ensue regarding the acts of Ministry employees.

Ministry officials were very concerned about the information that emerged from the Downing investigation and report. Two probation officers in Cornwall had committed, or were alleged to have committed, sexual acts on probationers; it appeared that staff and successive area managers knew that socializing was occurring outside the office, contrary to Ministry policy; and staff and area managers at the Cornwall office had exercised very poor judgment with regard to reporting improper conduct to their superiors. In my view, the Ministry of Correctional Services ought to have imposed disciplinary measures on Emile Robert with respect to his deficient management practices in relation to the conduct of Mr. Seguin, and on Mr. van Diepen for failing to report his knowledge of Mr. Seguin’s inappropriate conduct with Ministry clients.

Increasing Number of Sexual Abuse Disclosures Confront the Cornwall Probation Office

It was in the late 1990s that disclosures of sexual abuse began to steadily stream into the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office (Table 5.1). As mentioned, there had been two disclosures in 1982 of sexual and other inappropriate conduct with probationers by probation officer Nelson Barque. But it was not until 1997 that disclosures of sexual improprieties committed by probation staff began to be regularly received by the Cornwall office. Even at the time Ministry officials gave their evidence at the Inquiry in 2008, victims continued to make disclosures of sexual abuse to the Cornwall Probation Office.

Table 5.1

Disclosures of Historical Sexual Impropriety by Year Reported³²

Date of disclosure	Number of disclosures
1982	2
1997	1
1999	2
2000	3
2001	5
2002	3
2003	2
2004	0
2005	4
2006	7
2007	4

According to the chart, the first eighteen disclosures took place before 2004, when this Public Inquiry was established by the Ontario government. Ms Lariviere testified that there were thirty-six claims of abuse from 1982 to 2007.³³ All of these allegations involved abuse committed in the years 1968 to 1993.

32. The table was prepared by Area Manager Claude Legault and probation officers Carole Cardinal and Sue Lariviere.

Claude Legault became the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office in December 1998. He had previously been a probation and parole officer in Hawkesbury. Prior to assuming this position, Mr. Legault was aware of the tense office environment at the Cornwall Probation Office. The Cornwall office had a reputation for strained staff-management relations and difficult working relationships. Mr. Legault also had discussions with Mr. Emile Robert and Ms Deborah Newman in preparation for his new role as the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office.

Mr. Legault was intent on conveying to the Cornwall probation staff that they would not be “prisoners of the past.” It was important to the new Area Manager that the Cornwall office regain its integrity and credibility.

It was apparent to Cornwall probation staff that Mr. Legault had a very different orientation from his predecessor, Emile Robert. Mr. Gendron discussed in his evidence Mr. Legault’s positive and new approach. Similarly, probation officer Carole Cardinal discussed the different management styles and described them as “day and night.” She stated that Mr. Legault was both concerned about and supportive of his staff in the Cornwall office.

Mr. Legault described the initial disclosures in the late 1990s as “very difficult,” “emotional,” and a “very draining experience” for both the client and probation staff. The new Area Manager discussed the impact the disclosures had on staff at the Cornwall office: “[I]t took it from rumours and allegations to something that was very real and very concrete that was right in front of us. And we were a small group—there [were] only seven PO’s.”

Probation officers Sue Lariviere and Carole Cardinal described how shocked they were to receive these allegations of abuse. As Ms Cardinal said, “I found it very upsetting and it was beyond me how a colleague could do this to people we’re supposed to be helping.” The first person who disclosed to Ms Lariviere said that he had been sexually abused by Mr. Seguin at the Cornwall office on 502 Pitt Street. In 1999, this client was sitting in the waiting room at the probation office as he had an appointment for a pre-sentence report. He was about thirty years old and was visibly upset. Ms Lariviere invited the client “to step outside for some fresh air” as “he did not want to come in the office.” As they walked around the block, the man disclosed to Ms Lariviere that he had been sexually abused by Ken Seguin in that very office at 502 Pitt Street.

As with Ms Lariviere, the first disclosure of sexual abuse to probation officer Carole Cardinal was in 1999. A Ministry client who had an appointment to meet

33. Thirty-three of the disclosures were received by the Cornwall Probation Office.

Ms Cardinal later in the day was already at the office when she arrived for work at 8:30 a.m. He was “very anxious” and “agitated,” and as soon as he saw her, the client told Ms Cardinal that “he did not want to be in this office.” He explained that “he had been sexually abused by Ken Seguin” and he “started crying.” As Ms Cardinal testified, “I did the best I could at the time and that was to reassure him.” She also informed him of available support services to deal with his trauma.

What became readily apparent to Area Manager Mr. Legault and his staff was that they knew very little about sexual abuse, they had no training on disclosures, and no Ministry protocol existed to advise staff of the appropriate procedures to be followed.

In the “Factual Overview of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office’s Institutional Response to Disclosures of Sexual Impropriety” prepared by Mr. Legault, Ms Cardinal, and Ms Lariviere, the need for training of probation officers is discussed:

As officers received disclosures it became clear to all that we did not have sufficient knowledge on male sexual victimization and how to handle disclosure effectively. Typically the probation officer would spend a few hours with the offenders during the disclosure and then a few hours with the manager de-briefing and discussing next steps. Recurring questions emerged around how and when to effectively refer the offender to other services. Probation officers did not want to be perceived as “shutting down” the disclosure but at the same time realized that, at some point the offender needed to be referred to professional counseling services.

When Ms Newman resumed her position as Regional Director of the Cornwall Probation Office in November 1999, after a secondment to the federal government, she learned of these disclosures of sexual abuse by Mr. Seguin. Ms Newman testified that it was only at this time that she became aware of “some of the patterns” and that there was “a history here.” Probationers had made allegations of sexual abuse by probation officer Mr. Barque that had occurred seventeen years earlier, in 1982. Yet it was only in late 1999 that she learned about these disclosures by Ministry clients of abuse perpetrated by Mr. Barque.

Ms Newman was responsible for the Cornwall Probation Office from 1996 to 1998 in her position as District Administrator at the Ministry of Correctional Services and from November 1999 until 2000 as Regional Director of the Eastern Region. In September 2000, Ms Newman became the Assistant Deputy Minister for Community and Young Offender Services.

Deborah Newman had worked in the same office as Bill Roy in 1993 and consequently was aware of David Silmser's allegations of sexual abuse by Cornwall probation officer Ken Seguin. She viewed it at that time as "an isolated historical event." When Ms Newman became the District Administrator of the Cornwall Probation Office in 1996, "it didn't come back to [her] mind that there had been an issue with sexual abuse in the past." She thought that incoming regional managers of the Cornwall Probation Office should have been apprised of the past events and problems, including those involving Nelson Barque and Ken Seguin. Had she had this information, Ms Newman would have had the opportunity to examine these issues regarding sexual and other inappropriate conduct of probation officers with probationers under their supervision and could have initiated measures to address the situation. As Ms Newman said in her testimony, when questioned by counsel:

COUNSEL: ... [I]t's fair to say that by the time you arrived on the scene in early 1996 there had been a number of extraordinary occurrences, including Mr. Barque's conviction for sexual assault of a probationer, including, you know, the details pertaining to Mr. Seguin and that information. So there was certainly plenty to have talked about. Is that not fair?

MS NEWMAN: Yes, that's fair.

COUNSEL: And I have to assume that as the incoming regional manager it would have been helpful to you to have that factual background; correct?

MS NEWMAN: Yes.

COUNSEL: And had you had that background I've got to think that you might have focused on additional matters in Cornwall, matters in addition to Mr. Robert's performance as area manager.

MS NEWMAN: I think that's fair.

COUNSEL: Right. Because I'm assuming that you would have wanted to certainly get to the bottom of some of these incidents and you would also have wanted to ensure that whatever had happened in the past there was not going to be a blind eye turned in the present or in the future in that office, correct?

MS NEWMAN: Absolutely.

She thought the Ministry's information system did not ensure that officials assuming new positions became aware of the history and problems of the probation and parole offices that became their responsibility. I agree with her assessment.

It was only in late 1999, when Ms Newman returned from her secondment with the federal government, that she learned of the issues concerning Nelson Barque's inappropriate sexual behaviour in the 1980s, his plea of guilty in 1995 for indecent assault of Albert Roy, the 1998 criminal charges, and Mr. Barque's suicide. Despite the fact that she was responsible for the Cornwall office from 1996 to 1998, Ms Newman said she was not aware of the allegations and conviction of Nelson Barque for sexual acts until late 1999.

Ms Newman met with Area Manager Claude Legault and the Cornwall probation staff. She testified that Mr. Legault and probation officers Sue Lariviere and Carole Cardinal "were front and centre" in stressing "the need for training and the need for support" of the alleged victims:

The staff were very concerned about not feeling that they had been trained and that they weren't skilled in taking disclosures of male sexual abuse and the trauma that's associated with that.

So they were concerned ... obviously were concerned about the events themselves and the suffering of individuals and their clients, but they were also concerned that they felt ill-equipped to provide a safe and supportive environment for offenders coming forward to make such disclosures and this is an area of particular expertise that very few people have.

Ms Newman explained that their "preoccupation" at that time was "understanding male sexual abuse trauma," ensuring staff had the requisite skills to receive the disclosures, establishing procedures for the disclosure process, and "supporting people coming forward."

The Cornwall Area Manager contacted The Men's Project, which at that time was providing services for the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) Project Truth investigation.³⁴ Ms Newman agreed to funding to ensure that the appropriate training took place in an expeditious manner. The Men's Project provided three days of training to Cornwall probation officers on topics such as male sexual victimization, how to receive disclosures of abuse, and the referral of clients to specialized services. Mr. Legault was intent on ensuring that Ministry clients could safely disclose sexual improprieties and abusive acts.

34. The Project Truth investigation is discussed in detail in Chapter 7 of the Report.

Ms Lariviere explained that in the training sessions emphasis was placed on establishing a relationship with the client. The purpose of developing a rapport is to ensure that the disclosing individual feels that he is "safe in the environment." The probation officers also learned that they should not "question the validity of what" the person is "saying," and should "support" them throughout the disclosure. Probation officers Sue Lariviere and Carole Cardinal received most of the disclosures of abuse at the Cornwall office.

Area Manager Claude Legault and his staff developed a "Protocol for the disclosure of male offenders of abuse in relation to former Probation Officers and Project Truth related cases." When a probationer arrived at the Cornwall office for an appointment, a CPIC check was done to obtain his criminal record and to identify the probation officers who had previously supervised the offender. Criminal records were examined to determine if the offender had been on probation between 1968 and 1993. Appearance of the name of either Mr. Seguin or Mr. Barque was the first "red flag." The individual was asked if anything "inappropriate" occurred during the period of supervision. In the assessment process, each client was also asked if there was a "history of sexual abuse in their past."

The protocol emphasized that if an offender discloses, the probation officer must be empathetic and supportive; probation officers were instructed "not to argue on the merits of the disclosure or deny what happened" but to "allow him to disclose his version of the events." The probation officer was advised to encourage the client to report the abuse to the police and to stress that there could be other victims. The protocol also instructed probation officers to inform the client that Ministry officials have a duty to report the disclosure of abuse to the police.

Information pamphlets on The Men's Project were to be provided and victims were encouraged to seek counselling services as soon as possible. Probation staff were instructed to offer the phone number of the Mental Health Crisis Team at the Cornwall Hospital and to stress the importance of having a support system. The probation officer was to follow up with the client shortly after the disclosure.

All actions of the probation officer were to be documented on OTIS, the Offender Tracking Information System. OTIS, which began in 1999 and was gradually phased in throughout 2001 and 2002, was the first system that allowed the notes of probation officers to be filed electronically. Also, an incident report was to be prepared as soon as possible after the disclosure. It was to be sent to the Area Manager, the Regional Office, and the Information Management Unit in North Bay.

It is my recommendation that training on sexual abuse, particularly male sexual victimization, should be mandatory for all probation officers in the province. In addition, a protocol should be developed by the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services (MCSCS) for probation officers throughout Ontario on disclosure of abuse by Ministry clients.

Relocation of Cornwall Probation Office

It was apparent to the Cornwall Area Manager and staff in 1999 that victims had difficulty disclosing their abuse at the probation office. Claude Legault thought it was necessary “to get out of that location because of the history attached to it, the stigma for a lot of clients who were totally unable to step foot in the building.” Several Ministry clients alleged that they had been abused by their probation officers in these premises. In December 2001, the Cornwall Probation Office was moved from 502 Pitt Street to 331 Pitt Street.

Hiring Procedures for Probation Officers and the New Probation and Parole Service Model

Mr. Legault testified that when hiring probation officers for the Cornwall Probation Office, a CPIC search is now conducted to ensure the candidate does not have a criminal record. References are also contacted. The Cornwall Area Manager also stated that the manner in which a probationer is supervised has changed. Probationers are no longer supervised by one person but by a team. Ministry clients are supervised by probation officers as well as by professionals in mental health and those involved in substance abuse and anger management.

In 1999–2000, a new probation and parole service delivery model (PPSD model) was introduced by the Ministry of Correctional Services. It sought to provide a new manner of supervising and programming for offenders. One of the prime objectives of the PPCS model is to protect the public by increasing and intensifying the supervision and monitoring of offenders who are serving sentences in the community. Pursuant to this model, there is core rehabilitative programming (such as anger management and substance abuse), group intervention, and a more concentrated focus on criminogenic factors (factors known to have the highest correlation with re-offending). The PPCS model is based on research that examined both the risks and the needs of clients, and it seeks to provide comprehensive and individual services for the particular client. As explained by Deputy Minister Newman, the new model is an evidence-based system with a comprehensive assessment of each individual’s risk factors and needs. Once the assessment is completed, clients are placed into different streams of probation supervision, ranging from less intensive to highly intensive. As Mr. Legault stated, the model changed ownership of the client to one that involves emphasis on partnering with community agencies. Former Deputy Minister Morris Zbar explained that the major intent of the new model is to provide the offender with an opportunity to deal with the problems that caused him or her to get into trouble with the law in the first place. Mr. Legault stated that the Cornwall Probation Office was among the first in the region to implement the new model.

As mentioned earlier, OTIS was implemented by the Ministry of Correctional Services at about the same time. This system is province wide. There is an electronic system now for maintaining records of all probationers under the supervision of the Ministry. As explained by Deputy Minister Newman, probation officers insert their case notes into the system electronically, fostering better continuity of care for probationers. Former Deputy Minister Morris Zbar testified that in his view, OTIS, coupled with the new delivery model, has enhanced the ability of the MCSCS to ensure that clients are treated appropriately and in a comprehensive manner.

Under the Public Service of Ontario Act, there is now whistle-blowing protection for employees. Any employee in the Ministry can go directly to the Deputy Minister to report any allegations without reprisal. The matter is investigated confidentially, and the identity of the individual who brought forward the allegations is not disclosed.

No Historical Review of Files Undertaken in Cornwall Probation Office to Identify Other Victims of Sexual Abuse

No historical review of files in the Cornwall Probation Office was undertaken for the purpose of assessing whether there were other Ministry clients who had been sexually abused by probation staff. Different reasons were put forth at the Inquiry for the failure of the Cornwall Probation Office to try to identify victims of abuse by Ministry employees. Mr. Legault stated that when the office received its disclosures in 1999, the OPP Project Truth investigation was still in process. He believed that the OPP would be determining through its investigation whether other former probation clients had been sexually abused. He also said that there were logistical problems in conducting such a search. Prior to 1997, closed files were not archived. Files that had been inactive for three years were shredded. The Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office explained that “a lot of those files may not be available ... [A]t best we could have gone back ... to probably '93 or '94.”

No notices were placed in local or regional newspapers by the Ministry to ask those who had been probation clients in particular years to contact the Cornwall Probation Office. Nor were letters sent to such individuals to ask them whether Mr. Barque or Mr. Seguin had supervised them during their probation. No efforts were made to notify these former probationers, according to the evidence of probation officers at the Cornwall office. When Ms Lariviere was asked at the hearings whether any thought had been given to searching for former clients of Mr. Barque and Mr. Seguin, she confirmed that this had not been discussed at the Cornwall office. She added, “I don’t think I ever thought about that” and acknowledged that this “idea” was “probably a good one.”

I do not accept the explanations for the failure to conduct a historical review of the probation files. Efforts should have been made to identify as many victims as possible of probation officers Nelson Barque and Ken Seguin with the existing files in the Cornwall Probation Office. At the very least, a review should have been undertaken of the files from 1993. Also, the Ministry could have placed notices in the local Cornwall and regional newspapers and other media asking former probationers from the particular period to contact the probation office. This would have helped to ensure that some of the former probation clients who has been abused by their probation officers, persons in positions of trust and authority, received the necessary support and counselling to help them deal with the trauma they had endured in their youth and continued to endure in their adulthood.

When she gave her evidence at the Inquiry, Deputy Minister Newman expressed “deep regret” on the part of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services for the harm suffered by clients abused by Ministry employees. She stated that Ministry officials understood that people in the Cornwall community had lost trust and faith in government institutions such as the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services. The Deputy Minister referred to the two former probation and parole officers who had been involved in events that led to the establishment of the Inquiry. On behalf of the Ministry, Ms Newman undertook to continue to provide support for those individuals who disclosed these incidents.

Deputy Minister Newman stated that the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services is “not the same institution that we were.” However, she acknowledged that further improvements could be made, which she delineated. They included information sharing between the Ministry and its Justice partners, the Crown and the police; improvements with respect to file reviews by employees at the Ministry; recognition of the importance of giving clear and comprehensive direction to all employees regarding conflict of interest; and information management to ensure that information on critical incidents is collected systematically by the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services. Deputy Minister Newman said:

... I would like to talk about the Ministry's deep regret.

So we're aware that the faith and the trust of the members of the Cornwall community has been compromised and part of the mandate of this Inquiry is to lead the community healing and reconciliation process.

I want to assure you that the Ministry shares this goal and that we are striving to regain the community's trust.

So we acknowledge, certainly, that two former probation and parole officers were involved in the events giving rise to this Inquiry.

We've been working diligently, as I've described, to deal with disclosures of sexual abuse that come to our attention and to strongly support victims coming forward.

The Ministry deeply regrets any harm that our clients may have suffered, and we will continue with individuals coming forward and disclosing incidents to support them in the most compassionate way possible.

I have noted that the Ministry has evolved greatly since these historical events transpired.

We're not the same institution that we were when these events occurred but we certainly acknowledge that further improvements can be made.

I commend the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services for expressing its regret for any harm that its clients may have suffered and for taking steps to deal with disclosures of sexual abuse as well as for the support of victims. As was explained by a number of the context experts, sexual abuse is generally underreported. As a result, there may still be victims of abuse by Ministry employees of the Cornwall Probation Office who have not yet come forward. Because of this, and because there have been a number of confirmed cases of sexual abuse of young people by an employee of the Cornwall Probation Office, as well as many other allegations of sexual abuse reported against this probation officer and another, the Ministry and/or the Cornwall Probation Office should make a public appeal and consider making an apology. As a part of its efforts to provide support, the Ministry and/or the Cornwall Probation Office should offer counselling to any alleged victims of abuse by Ministry employees who come forward.

Recommendations

Protocol Regarding Allegations of Sexual Assault/Abuse

1. The Ministry should develop a protocol for probation and parole officers throughout Ontario on how to appropriately respond to disclosures of sexual assault/abuse³⁵ by Ministry clients.

File Reviews

2. The Ministry should develop a protocol to ensure that file reviews are conducted in circumstances in which there are allegations of sexual improprieties against Ministry employees by clients under their supervision. The protocol would address whether the review would be conducted internally or whether a request would be made for the review to be conducted by or with the assistance of the police. If an internal review is conducted, the Area Manager should examine the case notes of other clients under the employee's supervision and conduct interviews with them.
3. In the event that a probation and parole officer leaves or dies under suspicious circumstances, it is recommended that the Area Manager conduct a file review of the probation and parole officer's active caseload. If any patterns are discovered that arouse suspicion of improper conduct toward clients, a formal internal Ministry investigation should be launched, including a review of historical files and interviews with clients and former clients.

Statement of Ethical Principles

4. The Code of Conduct for probation and parole officers entitled Statement of Ethical Principles, which was introduced in 1995 and was recently reviewed and updated, should continue to ensure that clear and comprehensive direction is given to all employees regarding conflict of interest, and that all dealings with those currently or formerly under the Correctional Services' authority are fair, impartial, and free from impropriety. This statement should be distributed in handbook format to all probation and parole employees. This handbook should be updated as required.

35. The reference to sexual assault/abuse refers to the sexual abuse of children and young people, whether current or historical, unless defined otherwise.

Record Keeping

5. The Ministry should institute policies and procedures to ensure that information on critical incidents is collected systematically by and is easily accessible to Ministry officials at the local and regional levels and that this information is communicated to incoming Area Managers and to other officials assuming supervisory positions at the Ministry.
6. Any breach of the Statement of Ethical Principles or similar inappropriate behaviour on the part of an employee that is referenced in an incident report should also be referenced in the employee's performance appraisal.

Training

7. The Ministry should ensure that its employees receive regular training and updating on conflict-of-interest principles and on the ethical behaviour required of staff at the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services as set out in the Statement of Ethical Principles.
8. The Ministry should implement province-wide, mandatory, ongoing, regular training for all probation and parole officers on sexual assault/abuse, particularly male-on-male sexual assault/abuse. This training should also provide guidance on how to deal appropriately with disclosures of sexual assault/abuse, including dealing in a sensitive manner with individuals who have disclosed sexual assault/abuse, and referring these individuals to specialized support services.
9. It is important that probation and parole officers receive ongoing training regarding their statutory reporting duties to the Children's Aid Society under the Child and Family Services Act to ensure that children at risk are protected.

Screening

10. The Ministry should implement and/or augment stringent screening practices for the hiring of new probation and parole officers. This screening should involve not only contacting candidates' references and performing criminal record checks on all candidates, but also an extensive interview process designed to ensure that the candidate is appropriately suited to dealing with those who are part of a vulnerable population.

Supervision

11. The Ministry should develop a protocol that addresses the supervision by probation and parole officers of former probation and parole officers and other staff who are convicted for sexual and other inappropriate conduct with probationers. Issues such as the venue of the probation and actual and perceived conflict of interest by probation officers supervising the client should be addressed in the protocol.
12. A protocol should be implemented or augmented to ensure that when after-hours meetings with probationers occur, another staff member is present and that the file notes include a reference to the time, location, reason for the after-hours consultation, and a sign-off by the other employee who was in the office.

Need for Internal Investigation

13. If a probation and parole officer who is suspected of or has been charged in regard to sexual assault/abuse chooses to resign, the allegations should still be fully investigated by the Ministry. An investigation may reveal other potential victims who should be contacted. Any alleged victims of the accused individual should be offered support and counselling.

Discipline of Ministry Employees

14. Fear of grievances or the publicity associated with them should not be a consideration when determining whether to discipline Ministry employees.

Reference Letters

15. The Ministry should develop or augment protocols to ensure that detailed information regarding any breach of the Statement of Ethical Principles or similar inappropriate behaviour by an employee or former employee will be mentioned in the employee's or former employee's personnel file and any reference letter prepared in regard to the employee or former employee. The Ministry should implement measures to ensure that detailed information on the reasons for an employee's departure from the Ministry, including details of inappropriate and sexual conduct, are included in the employee's personnel file.

Office Communications

16. Given that good interpersonal relationships are vital to continued excellent public service, senior supervisors should be alerted to deteriorating relationships and these issues should be addressed in a timely fashion. In the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office, a “poisoned” work environment created an impediment to disclosures of suspicions of sexual assault/abuse of probationers.
17. The Ministry should take measures to ensure that employees are aware of “whistleblower” legislation in Ontario and that any concerns they bring forward in regard to fellow employees concerning inappropriate behaviour with clients are confidential.

Information Sharing

18. The Ministry should consult with its Justice partners, police, and Crown attorneys, in developing a protocol with respect to the sharing of information regarding complaints or allegations of sexual assault/abuse against current and former Ministry employees.

Public Appeal

19. The Ministry should make a public appeal, urging any victims of sexual assault/abuse to come forward. Given that there have been a number of confirmed cases of sexual assault/abuse of young people by an employee of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office, that there have been many other allegations of sexual assault/abuse of young people reported against this probation officer and another, and that sexual assault/abuse is known to be generally underreported, it is likely that there are still victims of sexual assault/abuse within the Cornwall area who have not yet come forward. Therefore, the Ministry should convey the message that any individuals who come forward with allegations of sexual assault/abuse will be treated with respect, dignity, and compassion. The Ministry should offer counselling and support to any alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse who come forward.
20. The Ministry should consider making a public apology to all confirmed victims of sexual assault/abuse of young people by an employee in the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office. Given that the Apology Act, which came into force in Ontario in April 2009, allows institutions to make apologies without admitting civil liability, it is also recommended that the Ministry consider extending such an apology to alleged victims who have reported allegations that have not been confirmed through a civil or Ministry process and to victims who have either opted not to come forward or who are yet to come forward. Although Deputy Minister Deborah Newman read an apology when making recommendations to the Inquiry, a similar apology from the Director of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office could be a positive step toward healing for victims and alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse by probation staff.

Institutional Response of the Cornwall Community Police Service

Introduction

The Cornwall Community Police Service (CCPS), one of the oldest police forces in the country, was established in 1789 as the Cornwall Police Force. At the time, its jurisdiction consisted of one square mile, bordered to the east by Marlborough Street, to the west by Cumberland Street, to the north by Ninth Street, and to the south by the St. Lawrence River. In 1957, the City of Cornwall amalgamated with the Township of Cornwall and expanded its municipal boundaries to its current area of 61.8 square kilometres, extending from Grant's Corner, along Cornwall Centre Road and South Branch Road, up to the west line of Lacweld, over to the International Bridge, and to the Gray's Creek area. The Cornwall Police Force and Cornwall Township Police Force merged to take jurisdiction over the new municipal area.

Cornwall Deputy Chief Danny Aikman testified that Cornwall's close proximity to Montreal, Ottawa, the United States border, and Akwesasne territory makes it a prime area for smuggling and organized criminal activity which creates unique challenges for the Cornwall Police Service (CPS).¹ He also stated that Cornwall's socio-economic situation results in criminal activities such as drug trafficking.

Prior to the mid-1990s, Cornwall was divided into two large patrol zones. However, as a result of the recommendations of a 1995 community advisory committee,² the police service divided the city into six smaller zones, to enable officers to have more in-depth knowledge of the community that they were patrolling.

1. Throughout this chapter of the Report the service will be referred to as the Cornwall Police Service (CPS).

2. Deputy Chief Aikman stated that in 1995, Chief Repa formed a community advisory committee to provide feedback regarding community needs and a report was provided to him containing recommendations.

The Cornwall Police Service is governed by a vision, mission and value statement. Its vision is “a safer Cornwall,” and its mission is to work in partnership with the community to make Cornwall a “safer place to live, work and visit.” The values articulated in the statement are that staff and members of the police force subscribe to (1) the preservation of life and property; (2) respect for one another and the persons encountered in their daily duties; (3) loyalty; (4) teamwork; (5) clear and open communication, consultation, and shared decision making; and (6) integrity and professionalism.

After the 1957 amalgamation of the Cornwall Police Force with the Cornwall Township Police Force, the service consisted of fifty-one officers. This number rose to sixty-three in 1970, seventy-seven in 1980, and eighty in 1990. The number of officers remained at approximately eighty for the next decade or so, and as of 2006, the police force has consisted of eighty-four officers.

The duties of a police officer, as set out in the Police Services Act,³ include preserving the peace, preventing crimes, assisting victims of crime, executing warrants, laying criminal charges, and participating in criminal prosecutions. The Act also states that police officers must perform duties assigned by the chief of police, and they must complete the prescribed training.

There is a chain of command in the Cornwall Police Service, which requires officers lower in rank to report to and follow the orders of their superiors. The chain of command from lowest to highest rank is as follows:

Constables: serve as front-line police officers

Sergeants: supervise constables

Staff sergeants: have responsibility for a bureau or unit and fulfill an administrative role

Inspectors: supervise sergeants and staff sergeants.

“Detective” is placed before the rank of officers working in the Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB), the division of the CPS that handles cases that are particularly time consuming or that require specific expertise, such as sexual assault, robbery, assault, fraud, and domestic violence. For example, a constable in the CIB is called a detective constable, and a sergeant in this division is referred to as a detective sergeant.

The Deputy Chief of Police reports to the Chief of Police and is responsible for the operational and administrative aspects of the police force. The Deputy Chief assists the Chief in implementing provisions in the Police Services Act and is responsible for creating, revising, and reviewing policies and procedures.

3 . R.S.O. 1990, c. 15, s. 42(1).

He or she also assists the Chief of Police with employment matters, pay equity issues, and other administrative matters.

The Chief of Police is responsible for administering the police force and overseeing its operation in accordance with the objectives, priorities, and policies established by the Police Services Board, and for ensuring that members of the police force carry out their duties in accordance with the Police Services Act and the Regulations. The Chief of Police is also responsible for maintaining discipline in the police force, ensuring that the police force provides community-oriented police services, and administering the complaints system.⁴

Those who have served as Chief of Police of the Cornwall Police Service from the 1940s to present are listed below:

1943–1953	Frank Hunter
1953–1974	Allan Clarke
1974–1984	Earl Landry Sr.
1984–1993	Claude Shaver
1994–1995	Carl Johnston (Acting Chief)
1995–2003	Anthony Repa
2004–present	Daniel Parkinson

The Cornwall Police Service is headed by a Board of Commissioners, a civilian body that oversees police functions. The Police Services Act states that municipal police services boards are “responsible for the provision of adequate and effective police services in the municipality.”⁵ This responsibility includes duties such as determining objectives and priorities with respect to police services; establishing policies for the effective management of the police force; appointing, directing, and monitoring the Chief of Police; and administering the budget for the police force.⁶ The Board appoints the Chief and Deputy Chief of Police.⁷

The Cornwall Police Service is organized into various administrative and operational divisions, including the Criminal Investigation Bureau, which, as mentioned, investigates sexual assaults. Although there was a period in the 1990s when it was titled E Unit, the CIB has existed since at least 1970. Some of the officers in charge of the CIB have been Richard Trew, from 1986 to 1990, Stuart McDonald, from 1990 to 1992, Luc Brunet, from 1993 to 1999, and Garry Derochie, from 2001 to 2005.

4. Police Services Act, s. 41(1).
5. R.S.O. 1990, c. 15, s. 31(1).
6. See Police Services Act, s. 31(1) and 39(3).
7. Police Services Act, s. 31(1)(d).

The Youth Bureau,⁸ a sub-unit of the Criminal Investigation Bureau, was established in 1984. It began as a division that investigated offences under the Young Offenders Act.⁹ It governed the criminal prosecution of youths between the ages of twelve and eighteen. The Youth Bureau began to investigate incidents involving child victims, such as child abuse, and in the mid-1990s the investigation of all sexual offences¹⁰ became the responsibility of the Youth Bureau. There were two officers in the Youth Bureau between 1990 and 1995.

In 2000, the Youth Bureau became the Sexual Assault and Child Abuse Unit (SACA), which consisted of five officers. The increase in officers working in this area was the result of the rise in the number of complaints received by the Cornwall Police Service as a result of Project Truth, the Ontario Provincial Police investigation into allegations of sexual abuse of young males by influential citizens in the Cornwall area, which began in 1997. Project Truth is discussed in detail in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police. Since 2005, the number of officers in SACA has decreased to three.

Below are organizational charts of the Cornwall Police Service in various periods: 1970, the mid-1980s, 1993, and 2005.

Organization Structure, November, 1970

8. It was previously known as the Juvenile Branch.

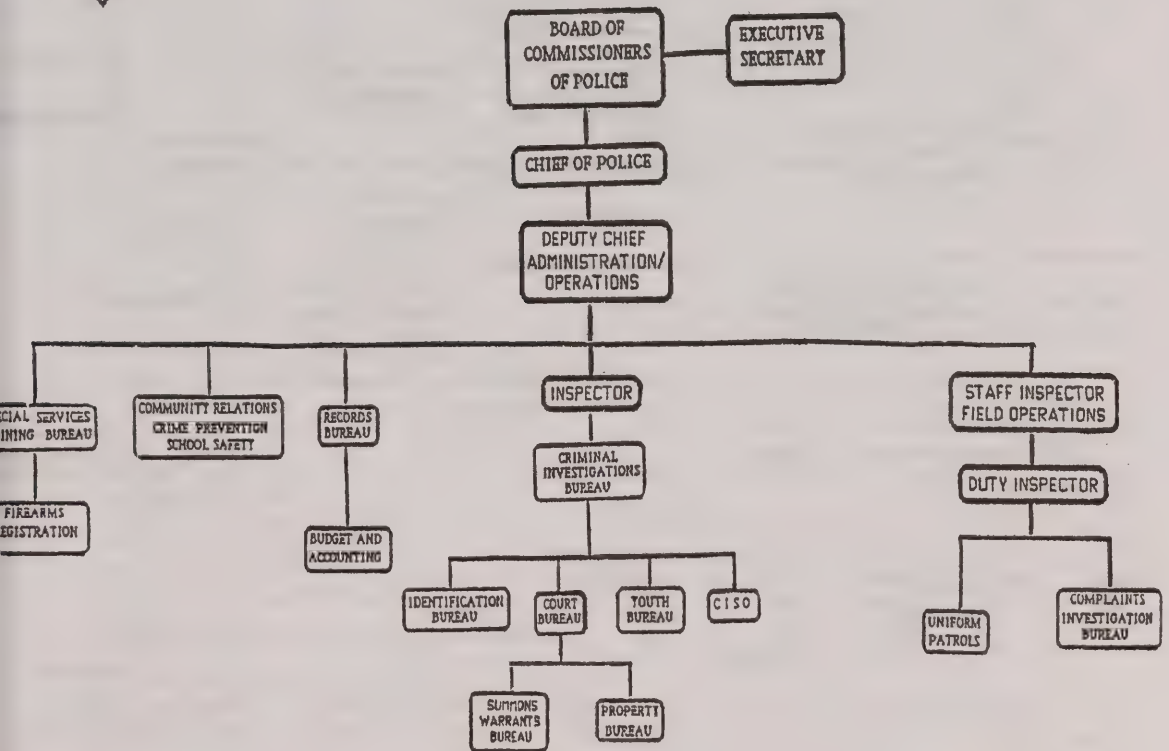

9. R.S.C. 1985, c. Y-1.

10. While sexual assault investigations were generally done by the Youth Bureau, some may have been conducted by the "E" Unit.

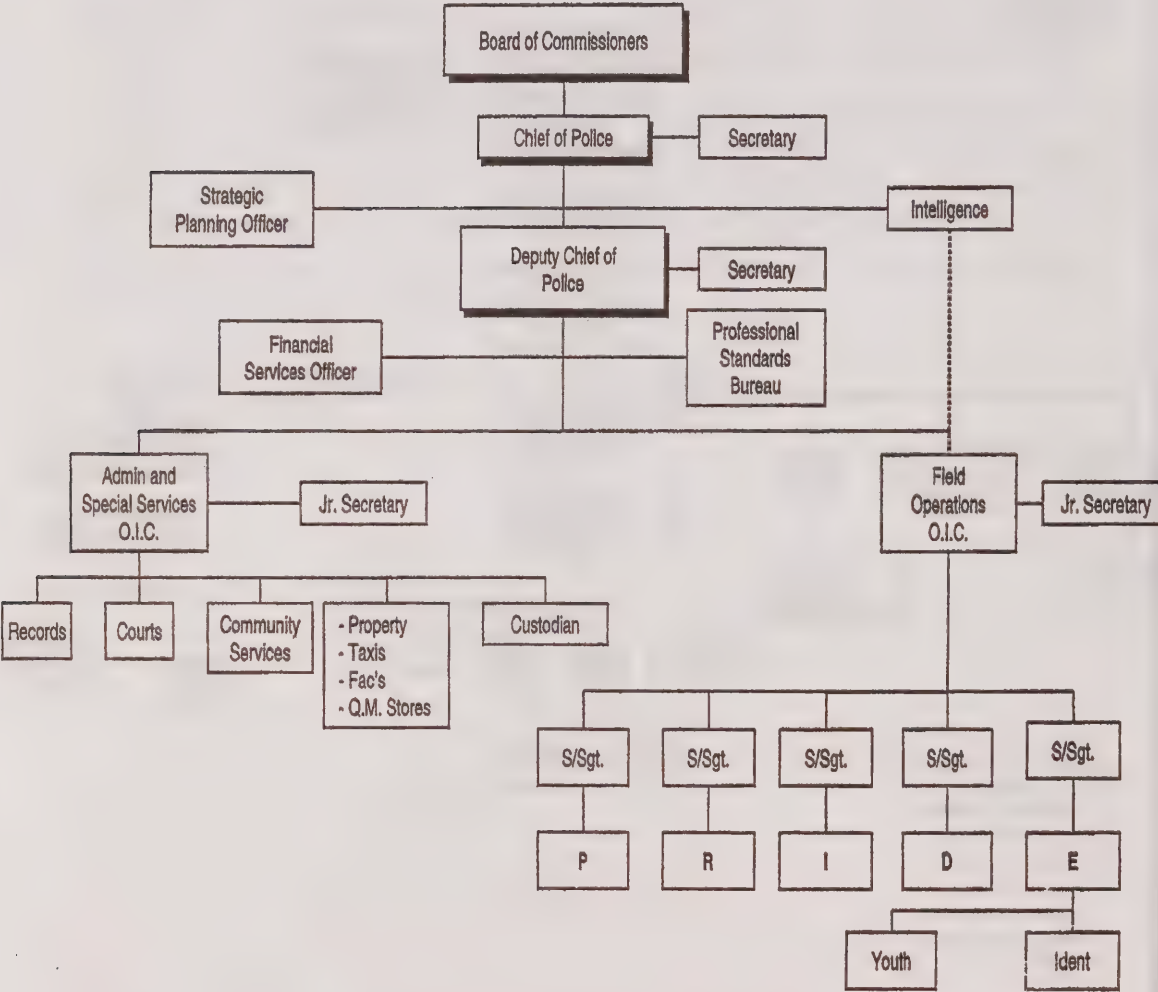

ORGANIZATIONAL STRUCTURE

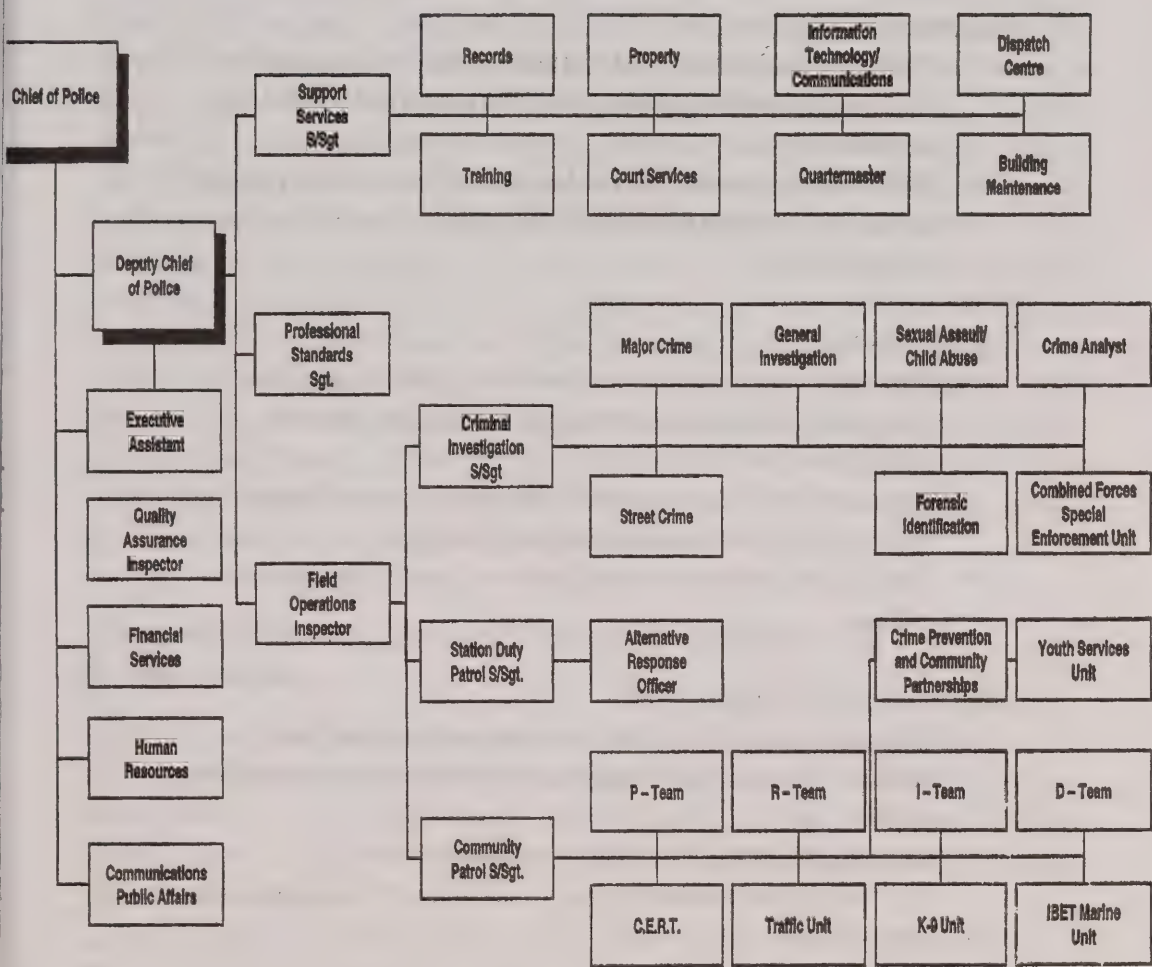

1984-85

CPS Organizational Structure, 1993

CPS Organization Structure, 2005

The CPS adheres to a policing model known as “community policing,” which focuses on crime prevention through working with stakeholders in the community. Cornwall Chief of Police Daniel Parkinson explained that the shift toward community policing in Canada began in the mid- to late 1980s. Community policing has been a guiding principle in the Police Services Act since 1990, and the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police and the Ontario Ministry of Public Safety and Security issued a community policing model in the 1990s. The model lists the following five components:

Community Development

- Programs initiated and led by the community that contribute to crime prevention, public education and other community policing goals
- Encouraging communities to become full partners in policing
- Initiatives intended to identify and address some of the root causes of crime

Police Learning

- Development of systems both within a police service and provincially to ensure continuous learning for members of police services
- Education for police leaders in strategic planning, change management, and organizational engineering
- Delivery of problem-oriented policing training for frontline officers

Police Service Re-Engineering

- Change management to revise police service structures, human resources and administration processes, and operational policies
- Strategic planning for effective police services
- Technology enhancement and streamlining of administrative processes

Enforcement

- Enforcement activities that optimize services to the community
- Focused enforcement in response to community safety concerns
- Involvement of communities in determining objectives and priorities

Community/Police Partnerships

- Full and equal partnership between the police and community
- Maintenance of public order, the prevention of crime, and the response to crime, are the shared concerns and responsibilities of the community and the police
- Permanent mechanisms to permit meaningful community input into all aspects [of] policing in a community.

The response of the Cornwall Police Service to allegations of historical sexual abuse of children and young persons in the Cornwall area will be examined in this chapter. Investigations of complaints by individuals who alleged that probation officers, members of the clergy, teachers, federal government employees, child-care workers, and staff under the supervision of the Children's Aid Society abused them in their youth will be described and analyzed. Recommendations will be made on such issues as training of officers for sexual abuse investigations, and in particular historical child sexual abuse cases, as well as victim support and accommodation, note taking, and interviewing. The supervision of officers conducting these investigations at the police force will also be addressed to ensure that such cases are given the attention and resources necessary to be pursued expeditiously and thoroughly. The importance of sharing information on such cases among officers in the Cornwall Police Service and other police forces such as the Ontario Provincial Police, as well as with institutions such as the Children's Aid Society, will also be discussed.

Allegations of Sexual Assault Made by Probationers of Nelson Barque

As discussed in Chapter 5, on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, Nelson Barque was a probation and parole officer in Cornwall from 1974 to 1982. He was the probation officer for Robert Sheets, C-44, Albert Roy, and C-45, all of whom alleged that Mr. Barque sexually abused them.

Mr. Barque was C-44's probation officer from 1980 to 1982. In a statement he provided in 1982 to Inspector Clair McMaster of the Ministry of Correctional Services, C-44 claimed that Mr. Barque had given him alcohol in breach of the conditions of his probation and was sexually involved with him from 1981 to 1982. C-44 was approximately twenty years old at this time. He claimed that Mr. Barque had engaged in sexual acts with him on several occasions both at the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office and at the probation officer's home.

In a statement to OPP Detective Constable Don Genier in June 1998, Robert Sheets claimed that he met Mr. Barque through C-44 when Mr. Sheets was about eighteen years old. At this time, in the late 1970s, Mr. Ken Seguin was Mr. Sheets' probation officer. Mr. Barque subsequently became Mr. Sheets' probation officer in January 1982. Mr. Sheets stated that Mr. Barque gave him money and alcohol and that he did work for the probation officer at Mr. Barque's home. A sexual relationship ensued. Robert Sheets alleged that the sexual activity occurred about once a week until Mr. Barque resigned from his position as a probation officer at the Cornwall office in May 1982. Mr. Sheets also stated that most of the sexual activity took place at Mr. Barque's home in St. Andrews and that on a couple of occasions it occurred at the home of Ken Seguin, who was not present at the time. Mr. Sheets also claimed that Mr. Barque had blankets in his office, but Mr. Sheets had refused to engage in sexual activity at the Cornwall Probation Office.

As mentioned in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, the Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation Office, Peter Sirrs, received a call in April 1982 from Ronald St. Louis, with whom Robert Sheets had been living as a boarder. Mr. St. Louis stated that Mr. Sheets had initiated a fight with C-44 and another individual, causing considerable damage to his residence, and moreover, had threatened Mr. St. Louis with bodily harm. Mr. St. Louis told Mr. Sirrs that the Cornwall police had not taken any action against Mr. Sheets but rather had referred Mr. St. Louis to Mr. Barque, Robert Sheets' probation officer. Mr. St. Louis told the Cornwall Area Manager that Mr. Barque was not only aware of Robert Sheets' use of alcohol and drugs but had in fact provided alcohol and drugs to Mr. Sheets and was sexually involved with the probationer.

As discussed in Chapter 5, after the incident at the St. Louis home, Mr. Barque met with Staff Sergeant Maurice Allaire of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and Justice of the Peace Keith Jodoin, Administrator of the Provincial Court. Mr. Jodoin had cautioned Mr. Barque on his supervision of Robert Sheets and told him that he must take action with regard to Mr. Sheets' unacceptable behaviour. Mr. Barque discouraged further police action and indicated he would report back to Staff Sergeant Allaire. However, the officer did not hear from Mr. Barque on this subject.

Mr. Sirrs spoke to Cornwall Police Sergeants Masson and Laroche on April 9, 1982, who advised him that they had previously received a complaint from Gerald Levert, superintendent of the building in which the Cornwall Probation Office was located. As mentioned earlier, the superintendent reported unusual activity involving Mr. Barque and young males at the office at night, which had been observed by janitorial staff. The police officers allowed Mr. Sirrs to read some

CPS occurrence reports in which a probationer alleged that Mr. Barque and Mr. Sheets had a sexual relationship. Sergeant Masson indicated to Mr. Sirrs that he thought Mr. Barque was too frequently in the company of Robert Sheets.

The CPS officer acknowledged that he had been aware of rumours about a sexual relationship between Mr. Barque and Mr. Sheets for some time, but Sergeant Masson stated that he did not have sufficient information to lay criminal charges, particularly since the individual who had provided the information about the sexual relationship would not act as a witness. Sergeant Masson reported that Mr. Barque had intervened with the police on several occasions to ensure that no action was taken against his probationers. As discussed, there was an incident with Robert Sheets during which Mr. Barque was cautioned that he would be charged with obstruction if he did not stop interfering with the Cornwall police. Sergeant Masson indicated to Mr. Sirrs that he had informally counselled Mr. Barque with regard to the rumours and the probation officer's close association with probationers, including Robert Sheets. Mr. Barque, he said, had acknowledged that he needed to do something about this situation.

As discussed, the Ministry of Correctional Services conducted an internal investigation of Mr. Barque in April and May 1982 concerning the allegations of sexual misconduct. Mr. Barque tendered his resignation to the Ministry before the conclusion of the investigation. After resigning, Mr. Barque provided the Ministry with a statement in which he admitted to instigating a sexual relationship with probationers C-44 and Robert Sheets and to providing alcohol to these probationers in breach of their respective probation orders.

In my view, the Cornwall Police Service did not conduct a proper investigation into Nelson Barque's sexual involvement with probationers in 1982. Mr. Barque had admitted his sexual involvement with C-44 and Robert Sheets to officials at the Ministry of Correctional Services. Had CPS officers undertaken a thorough investigation of the matter, not only would they have obtained further details regarding Mr. Barque's sexual involvement with Robert Sheets and C-44 but they might have also discovered other sexual and other inappropriate conduct of the probationer officer with additional probationers such as Albert Roy and C-45. Had criminal charges been laid against Mr. Barque at that time, the former probation officer would probably not have been able to later obtain positions working with children. As discussed, Mr. Barque was a social worker from 1982 to 1986 with Équipe Psycho-sociale, an agency involved with children and adolescents with mental health issues. In his position at Équipe Psycho-sociale, Mr. Barque interacted with children at two elementary schools in Cornwall and met privately with these children. As mentioned, Mr. Barque subsequently obtained a supply teaching contract for a year with the Conseil des Ecoles Séparées de Stormont, Dundas et Glengarry, in 1992.

In my view, the Cornwall Police Service failed to properly investigate the allegations made in 1982 that Cornwall probation officer Nelson Barque was engaging in sexual relations with probationers. Mr. Barque continued to interact with children and other young people at schools and at a mental health organization despite his admission that he had had sexual relations with probationers under his supervision.

Approximately twelve years later, in November 1994, Mr. Barque was once again brought to the attention of the Cornwall Police Service. Albert Roy, a former probationer of both Mr. Barque and Mr. Ken Seguin, alleged that he had been sexually abused by these probation officers while on probation in Cornwall in the mid-1970s. These disclosures were made to the CPS by Albert Roy one year after Ken Seguin committed suicide.

Albert Roy reported that Mr. Seguin had been his probation officer in 1977, when he was sixteen years old. He stated that after about three months, while Mr. Seguin was on vacation, Mr. Roy had been placed under the supervision of Mr. Barque. Mr. Roy stated that Mr. Barque had sexually abused him during this time. He said that when he reported the abuse to Mr. Seguin, this senior probation officer also began to sexually abuse him.

As mentioned in Chapter 5, on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, Albert Roy had previously disclosed the abuse to his psychiatrist, Dr. Almudevar, and to a social worker, Bob Payette. He was encouraged to contact the Cornwall police regarding these allegations of abuse.

On November 24, 1994, Albert Roy was interviewed by Constable Heidi Sebalj of the Cornwall Police Service. Mr. Roy stated that he would have liked to be provided with emotional support while he discussed with the police these difficult and personal details of the sexual abuse.

Mr. Roy told Constable Sebalj about the repeated instances in which Mr. Barque had touched him inappropriately, which included incidents at the Cornwall Probation Office. He also discussed sexual activity that had taken place at Mr. Barque's home. The incident report filed by Constable Sebalj mentions only the incidents at Barque's home and not the inappropriate touching at the probation office.

The day after the interview, Constable Sebalj and Albert Roy went out together to try to locate Mr. Barque's home. Information from the Ontario Ministry of Transportation indicated that Mr. Barque's home was located in St. Andrews, which was within the jurisdiction of the Ontario Provincial Police. Because Albert Roy was unable to identify the probation officer's home, the Cornwall Police Service and the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) decided to investigate the allegations jointly. This is further discussed in this Report in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

Constable Sebalj obtained Mr. Barque's file from the Cornwall Probation Office as well as a copy of the Ministry of Correctional Services investigation concerning allegations of unprofessional conduct by Mr. Barque. She also contacted C-44, who said he did not want to be involved in a police investigation. Constable Sebalj interviewed Pierre Landry, Mr. Barque's former employer at Équipe Psycho-sociale.

Mr. Roy told Constable Sebalj that he was afraid to be in a room alone with a man. Nevertheless, several of the police officers involved in Albert Roy's case were men. Mr. Roy testified that he was never asked by these police officers whether he would prefer to deal with a female officer. Albert Roy was asked to meet with OPP Detective Constable Chris McDonell regarding another case that the officer was working on. Mr. Roy stated that Constable Sebalj did not adequately explain why he needed to meet with Constable McDonell.

Albert Roy provided Detective Constable McDonell with a statement on December 6, 1994, at Constable Sebalj's office, with essentially the same information regarding his abuse by Ken Seguin and Nelson Barque that he had provided to Constable Sebalj. Mr. Roy testified that he found Detective Constable McDonell's demeanour threatening and that during the interview it would have been apparent to Constable Sebalj that he was uncomfortable with the male OPP officer. As I state in the context of the investigation of the allegations of sexual abuse of David Silmsen, it is important that the police services develop a protocol to ensure that victims of childhood sexual abuse make their disclosures to and are interviewed by officers of the gender with which they feel most comfortable.

On December 14, 1994, OPP Detective Constable William Zebruck informed Constable Sebalj that he had arrested and charged Nelson Barque regarding the sexual acts allegedly perpetrated on Albert Roy. This ended the involvement of the Cornwall Police Service in this investigation. Constable Sebalj arranged a meeting between Albert Roy and Detective Constable Zebruck. Mr. Roy provided Detective Constable Zebruck with a statement on December 16, 1994. Mr. Barque pleaded guilty in July 1995 to the indecent assault of Albert Roy and received a sentence of four months custody and eighteen months probation. This is discussed in further detail in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

Detective Wendy Leaver, an expert in the investigation of sexual offences and historical sexual offences, stressed the importance of ensuring that victims are as comfortable as possible during the interview process. Dr. Peter Jaffe, an expert in child sexual abuse, testified that taking multiple statements can be harmful to victims of historical abuse. Despite the fact that Constable Sebalj was aware Albert Roy was uncomfortable with men, she did not take measures to ensure that he interacted with female police officers. Furthermore, Mr. Roy was asked to provide Detective Constables McDonnell and Zebruck with statements in which he repeated essentially the same information he had already provided to Constable Sebalj.

As part of the Albert Roy investigation, Constable Sebalj had met with C-44 on December 1, 1994. Initially he had refused to become involved, but after Nelson Barque had pleaded guilty to the indecent assault and gross indecency of Albert Roy, Constable Sebalj received a telephone call from C-44's adoptive father, who said his son should cooperate with the prosecution of Mr. Barque. On December 21, 1995, C-44 provided Constable Sebalj with an audiotaped statement regarding his allegations of historical sexual abuse by Nelson Barque.

Constable Sebalj wrote to Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald on February 7, 1996, to seek advice on C-44's allegations against Nelson Barque. She referred to the May 1982 report on Mr. Barque by the Ministry of Correctional Services and the statement by Mr. Barque in which he admitted to engaging in sexual activity with and providing alcohol to C-44. The Crown attorney forwarded these materials to the regional Crown, Peter Griffiths.

On February 27, 1996, Constable Sebalj met with Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald. Mr. MacDonald informed her that because C-44 was twenty-one years old at the time of the sexual activity and had consented to the sexual acts with Mr. Barque, criminal proceedings would not be successful. This will be further discussed in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

A year later, in February 1997, another victim, C-45, provided Cornwall Police Constable René Desrosiers with a statement alleging that Nelson Barque and Ken Seguin had abused him when he was a probationer under supervision supervised at the Cornwall Probation Office. C-45 stated that he was in grade 10 at the time. Constable Desrosiers told C-45 that either the CPS or another force would look into the matter. However, Constable Desrosiers did not follow up to determine whether the Cornwall police or any other police agency was conducting an investigation, nor did he follow up with C-45 or the probation office with regard to this allegation of sexual abuse.

As will be discussed further in this chapter, the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative, known as OMPPAC, became available to the Cornwall Police Service in July 1989. OMPPAC is an automated data entry and records management system. It was designed to permit the electronic recording of information.

Prior to 1989, the CPS relied on written reports for information on incidents reported and investigations conducted by the police service. Information was recorded on contact cards. The cards contained contact information on the complainants, witnesses, suspects, and individuals charged with offences.

After OMPPAC was introduced, officers at the CPS were required to insert information such as incident reports and their respective investigations into the electronic system. The system permitted different searches to be conducted, such as the name of the perpetrator or victim or the incident number. Once the data was entered, CPS officers and officers in other police services that were members of OMPPAC could view the information. This enabled information to be shared within and between police forces. OMPPAC also had the capability of creating a “project file,” which was accessible only to designated officers.

As I repeatedly state in this chapter, it was important that Cornwall police officers promptly record on OMPPAC information about their files. Moreover, it was essential that officers who subsequently became responsible for such files check OMPPAC to obtain information on the history of a case such as the alleged victims, potential witnesses, persons interviewed, and other important information on the sexual abuse investigation.

Constable Desrosiers testified that he was not aware that Constable Sebalj had been involved in a previous investigation of Mr. Barque regarding allegations of abuse by probationer Albert Roy that resulted in plea of guilty by Mr. Barque to indecent assault on a male. As I discuss in this chapter, members of the Cornwall Police Service in this and other cases did not know the history of the involvement of other Cornwall officers with the alleged perpetrators of sexual abuse. It is critical that officers record and insert their notes of investigations into OMPPAC or other electronic databases to ensure that other police officers have access to this information. Moreover, it is essential that officers check the electronic databases to obtain information in each case.

In October 1997, C-45 contacted the OPP and provided Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Joseph Dupuis with a statement regarding his allegations against Nelson Barque. On June 18, 1998, the OPP took cautioned statements from Nelson Barque with respect to C-45 and Robert Sheets. As mentioned, Nelson Barque committed suicide ten days later, on June 28, 1998. The OPP involvement in this matter is discussed in further detail in the following chapter, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

The Cornwall Police Service should have followed up on the complaint of C-45 with regard to his allegations against Nelson Barque. Officers at the CPS should also have performed a database search for the name of the perpetrator to determine if Mr. Barque had been the subject of other, earlier ongoing investigations. The Cornwall Police Service did not conduct a thorough investigation of Mr. Barque regarding the allegations of sexual abuse perpetrated by this probation officer.

The Earl Landry Jr. Investigation

The Cornwall Police Service (CPS) first became aware in June 1985 of allegations of sexual abuse of young boys by Earl Landry Jr.

A complaint was made to the Cornwall Police Service by the mother of a boy who was an alleged victim. On June 24, 1985, Inspector Richard Trew received information that Earl Landry Jr., the son of the former police chief in Cornwall, had sexually assaulted a boy of about eight years old at King George Park. Earl Landry Sr. had retired as Chief of Police from the Cornwall Police Service the previous year, in April 1984.

Inspector Trew considered this a high-profile case. He decided to contact Cornwall Chief of Police Claude Shaver, that night at his home. At the morning management meeting at CPS the following day, Chief Shaver expressed concern about the Earl Landry Jr. case and wanted to ensure that experienced and highly qualified police officers were assigned to the investigation. He decided that Staff Sergeant Stanley Willis and Sergeant Ron Lefebvre should be responsible for the Landry Jr. investigation. Inspector Trew supervised Staff Sergeant Willis, who in turn supervised Sergeant Ron Lefebvre.

Staff Sergeant Willis had a personal relationship with Earl Landry Jr.'s brother Brian. Chief Shaver testified that although he did not know about this friendship at the time, it did not surprise him as the men were about the same age and Cornwall is a small community. He said that he considered this a "high priority" case and took a special interest in it because of its potential "negative effects on the Police Department." However, Chief Shaver did not consider it a possible conflict of interest, actual or perceived, for the Cornwall Police Service to investigate this case of child sexual assault by a former CPS police chief's son. The investigating officers assigned to the case by Chief Shaver, Staff Sergeant Willis and Sergeant Lefebvre, had both served under Chief Earl Landry Sr. Despite this, Chief Shaver stated that he "would never even consider going outside" to an external police force for this investigation. In my view, given that Earl Landry Sr. was the former police chief of CPS, that he had retired the previous year, and that most of the officers at CPS in 1985 had reported to him, Chief Shaver should have given serious consideration to asking an outside police force to investigate the child sexual molestation charges against Earl Landry Sr.'s son. To complicate the situation, Chief Shaver assigned Staff Sergeant Willis as an investigating officer on the case. This CPS officer had a personal relationship with the suspect's brother. And Chief Shaver had a personal relationship with Earl Landry Sr. and had known him since he was a child. Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie, who conducted an internal review of the investigation in 1999, testified that in hindsight, given that Earl Landry Jr. was the son of the former police chief and that CPS officers such as Staff Sergeant Willis were friends of Earl Landry Jr.'s brother Brian, it would have been advisable for another police force to conduct the 1985 investigation. I agree. It was important, to avoid either an actual or perceived conflict of interest, that Chief Shaver request that an external police force investigate the allegations of abuse of children against the former police chief's son.

Sergeant Ron Lefebvre initiated the investigation on June 25, 1985, the date he was "called by Chief Shaver ... to report to his office."¹¹ He interviewed the child's mother that day as well as the alleged victim. The following day, Earl Landry Jr. was questioned by the CPS. The questioning took place in the police officer's lounge at the CPS.

Chief Claude Shaver Pays a Visit to Earl Landry Sr.'s Home

On June 26, 1985, Chief Shaver decided to drive to the home of Earl Landry Sr., the former Cornwall police chief. When Chief Shaver left the police station, Earl Landry Jr. was being questioned by CPS officers. Chief Shaver did not call Earl Landry Sr. in advance of this visit, nor did he inform the investigating officers that he was going to the former police chief's home to alert him to the allegations against his son. Chief Shaver testified that he decided to see Earl Landry Sr. because he had known him "since [he] was a little kid," he "felt badly for him," and he thought he should personally inform the former chief of his son's arrest.

Earl Landry Sr. was in his workshed when Chief Shaver arrived at the Landry home. Chief Shaver told Earl Landry Sr. that his son was being questioned at the police station for the alleged sexual molestation of a child. The former police chief was extremely surprised and became visibly upset. Chief Shaver said to Earl Landry Sr., "Chief, if you think that he didn't do it, I can arrange a polygraph in Ottawa." He told Earl Landry Sr. the names of the investigating officers on his son's case. He spent a few hours at Earl Landry's home trying to console him. His wife was very ill, and Earl Landry Sr. was worried about the effect this information about their son would have on her health.

When Claude Shaver gave his evidence at the Inquiry, he understood that it was inappropriate for him to visit Earl Landry Sr. to discuss his son's detainment and questioning at the police station. He said that in retrospect, he "probably should not have gone to see the father" and was aware that it could be perceived as a conflict of interest. He further said:

11. Note that Sergeant Ron Lefebvre did not testify at the Inquiry. A motion was made to excuse Ron Lefebvre from giving evidence due to medical reasons. The motion was granted on November 26, 2008.

I guess my heart overruled my head. Would I do the same thing today? No, and would advise people not to because it seems obviously when you put it under the scrutiny that we're under here ... it can be perceived badly or badly in the community if that happened ... I certainly concede the fact that I would make a different decision today than I did then.

In my view, it was clearly inappropriate for Cornwall Police Chief Claude Shaver to have visited the former chief's home to discuss with Earl Landry Sr. the police questioning of his son, Earl Landry Jr., regarding allegations of child sexual abuse.

When Earl Landry Jr. was being questioned at the police station, Sergeant Lefebvre asked the suspect whether he would be willing to take a polygraph test. Earl Landry Jr. agreed to undergo a polygraph test.

Earl Landry Sr. Contacts the Investigating Officer in His Son's Case: The CPS Investigation Ends

The morning following the visit from Chief Shaver, Earl Landry Sr. decided to contact Staff Sergeant Willis, the investigating officer at CPS on his son's case. Inscribed in Staff Sergeant Willis' notes at 6:55 a.m. on June 27, 1985, is the following:

Earl Landry Sr. called HQ to advise me that things were happening too fast. Earl Jr. is very nervous. He relates that for the present time he will not be going to Ottawa to take a Polygraph test. He states: Perhaps arrangements can be made later on.

It is clear that active investigation on this complaint of child sexual abuse ended the morning of June 27, 1985, immediately after the call from Earl Landry Sr. Despite the comment from Earl Landry Sr. that "[p]erhaps arrangements can be made later on" for a polygraph test for his son, there is no indication that the CPS investigating officer followed up on this. It is important to note that Earl Landry Jr. had initially agreed to take the polygraph test when he was detained and questioned at the police station. Had Chief Shaver not spoken to Earl Landry Sr., it is possible that Earl Landry Jr. would not have consulted his father and would have taken the polygraph test. The CPS investigating officers did not try to find other possible victims of Earl Landry Jr., such as children seen at the park with this alleged perpetrator. Nor were attempts made by CPS to conduct a joint investigation with the Children's Aid Society (CAS) on this case. It is noteworthy that at this time the CAS and CPS were involved in joint investigations of other alleged perpetrators of abuse.

On June 27, 1985, Sergeant Lefebvre presented the results of his investigation to his supervisor, Staff Sergeant Willis. The child complainant, although the age of a grade 5 student, was in a lower grade. Sergeant Lefebvre stated in a CPS interview several years later that he did not have sufficient evidence to proceed with a charge against Earl Landry Jr. He was concerned about the mental capacity of the child and that there was no corroborative evidence. Earl Landry Jr. was not prosecuted for this alleged offence. No criminal charges were laid at this time against the former police chief's son for the alleged sexual acts with this young boy.

The Cornwall Police Service did not conduct a thorough investigation in 1985 into the allegations of child sexual abuse made against Earl Landry Jr. It is also clear that the CPS failed to properly supervise the officers involved in the investigation, such as Sergeant Ron Lefebvre.

Chief Claude Shaver testified that he met Assistant Crown Attorney Alain Ain a few weeks later at a social function. Claude Shaver stated that he did not know at this time that Sergeant Ron Lefebvre had concluded there were no reasonable and probable grounds to lay criminal charges against Earl Landry Jr. The case was discussed by the two men at this function. According to Chief Shaver, Alain Ain told him that there was insufficient evidence to proceed with a case against Earl Landry Jr. because the child victim was not capable of testifying as a result of his mental capacity.¹²

Another problem was the lack of contact with the Children's Aid Society by the CPS investigating officers. When Staff Sergeant Derochie reviewed the Earl Landry Jr. case several years later, he was unable to find an explanation for the failure to conduct a joint investigation with the CAS. As he acknowledged, it is possible that if the CAS and CPS had jointly investigated the Earl Landry Jr. case in 1985, other victims would have been identified. Instead, after a two-day investigation, the CPS decided not to pursue the matter. It was not until 1999, thirteen years later, that Earl Landry Jr. pleaded guilty to molesting five victims. One of those five victims was the eight-year-old boy in the 1985 case investigated by Sergeant Lefebvre.

In fact, the Children's Aid Society had relevant medical information regarding this case in 1985. A letter to the CAS stated that the boy's mother brought him to a medical clinic after he disclosed he had been sexually molested by Earl Landry Jr. It stated that the child:

12 . Alain Ain did not testify at the hearings on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General; he was deceased at the time of the Inquiry.

... was interviewed alone and confirmed without leading questions that on several occasions “about three times” Earl Landry attempted to penetrate him anally with his penis but “he only got in a little way.” “It hurt.” “It got wet with sticky stuff.” He did not attempt any other sexual activity ...

Physical examination revealed no abnormalities. His genitalia were normal and there were no anal fissures or evidence of trauma although on rectal examination he stated “it hurts like when Earl did it.”

As Staff Sergeant Derochie said, if the CPS had been aware of this medical letter, there would have been some evidence to corroborate the child victim’s statement.

When Staff Sergeant Derochie conducted his internal review of the 1985 Earl Landry Jr. case, he criticized the CAS for not entering Earl Landry Jr.’s name on the provincial suspected abuser registry. In addition, he was critical of the lack of a CAS file on Earl Landry Jr. In his 1999 report to Chief Anthony Repa, Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote:

- that there is no file on Landry at CAS, and that, although he should have been, he was never entered on the Province’s suspected abusers registry;
- that CAS caseworker Dupuy’s notes, which should be on file at their office, are not.

Other problems with the CPS case noted by Staff Sergeant Derochie in his report were the lack of notes by the investigating officer, Sergeant Ron Lefebvre, his supervisor, Staff Sergeant Willis, or the Crown attorney. He noted:¹³

- that Lefebvre’s notes cannot be found and may have been destroyed along with all reports dating back to 1985 as part of our scheduled destruction of records;
- that Staff Sergeant Willis recalls the investigation vaguely and would not have made notes;
- that the Crown Attorney has no file on this matter, it would have been destroyed long ago.

This was a pervasive problem in the Cornwall Police Service. Staff Sergeant Derochie found that record keeping was inadequate in several child sexual assault cases, including the Landry Jr., Antoine, and Silmsen investigations. In his view, this appeared to be a systemic problem. I agree. The use of loose-leaf notebooks, the destruction of notes, poor note keeping, and inadequate supervision are deficiencies that are prevalent in these and other investigations of historical sexual abuse conducted by the CPS.

13. Notes from Sergeant Lefebvre and some notes from Staff Sergeant Willis were later found and produced at the Inquiry.

There was no discipline imposed, formally or informally, on any officers in relation to the Landry Jr. investigation. Sergeant Ron Lefebvre was not disciplined or counselled for his inadequate investigation in 1985 of the allegations of sexual abuse by Earl Landry Jr. Nor were disciplinary measures imposed on the officers who supervised the Landry Jr. investigation. Moreover, Chief Shaver was not subject to any measures for his disclosure of information to Earl Landry Sr. during the ongoing CPS investigation of Earl Landry Jr.

CAS Contacts the CPS in 1993: Another Disclosure by a Child of Sexual Molestation by Earl Landry Jr.

In 1993, further allegations of sexual abuse by Earl Landry Jr. were reported to the Cornwall Police Service. In September 1993, psychologist Dr. Wayne Nadler contacted the Children's Aid Society to report that a young male patient had disclosed that Earl Landry Jr. had sexually molested him. On October 22, 1993, CAS worker Pina DeBellis contacted Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet, the head of the Cornwall Police Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB). Staff Sergeant Brunet was also the liaison person with the CAS. He was told about the disclosure by this male patient, who was about nine years old at the time of the alleged sexual abuse, which had occurred repeatedly for approximately a year. The unnamed patient had made it clear that he did not wish to pursue this matter with either the police or the CAS.

Ms DeBellis told Staff Sergeant Brunet that the Children's Aid Society wanted to investigate the matter. Earl Landry Jr. and his wife were foster parents for C-54, and the CAS was concerned. Staff Sergeant Brunet told Ms DeBellis that he was aware of the previous complaint against Mr. Landry in 1985 of sexual abuse of a young boy.

Staff Sergeant Brunet created an OMPPAC incident number for this file and a general occurrence report. He also did a Canadian Police Information Centre (CPIC)¹⁴ and an OMPPAC search. He had learned from the police records department that there was an incident of sexual assault for Earl Landry Jr. on June 24, 1985, and that no criminal charges had been laid. He arranged for Sergeant Ron Lefebvre, who had been assigned the 1985 Landry Jr. investigation, to speak to CAS worker Pina DeBellis.

14. The Canadian Police Information Centre is a computerized system that provides Canadian law enforcement agencies with information on crimes and criminals.

CAS supervisor Bernie Lamarche called Staff Sergeant Brunet on October 27, 1993, to discuss the case. Two days later, Ms DeBellis had a conversation with Staff Sergeant Brunet, who said he would try to contact the alleged victim from the 1985 investigation and initiate an investigation. For more than two years, however, Staff Sergeant Brunet did not work on the Landry Jr. investigation. In January 1996, he was contacted by CAS worker Carole Leblanc.

As Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote in his 1999 report, Earl Landry Jr. subsequently pleaded guilty to molesting C-54, who had been in his and his wife's foster care at the time of the allegations of sexual assault. Staff Sergeant Derochie also noted that the CAS, again, did not insert Earl Landry Jr.'s name into the Child Abuse Registry.

More Disclosures in 1996

On January 9, 1996, Carole Leblanc called the CPS about Earl Landry Jr. and spoke to Staff Sergeant Brunet, the CAS liaison officer. Ms Leblanc reported that a male, C-52, had disclosed to an addiction counsellor on November 29, 1995, that he had been sexually molested when he was a child by an employee of the City's Parks and Recreation Department. The victim was referred to the CAS, which identified the suspect as Earl Landry Jr.

Ms Leblanc stated that the victim had reported that he had been fondled and masturbated at King George Park between the ages of twelve and sixteen by Earl Landry Jr. He had been told by the alleged perpetrator that it was a rite of passage. The CAS had interviewed the victim on January 3, 1996, and had an audiotape of the interview.

Staff Sergeant Brunet created a general occurrence report and registered it on OMPPAC. He decided to assign the file to Constable Scott Hanton on January 10, 1996. Staff Sergeant Brunet gave no thought to the prospect of asking another police force to investigate the matter, which involved the son of a former Cornwall police chief. The Staff Sergeant briefed Constable Hanton on the 1985 complaint to the Cornwall Police Service and the allegation received in 1993 concerning Earl Landry Jr. Constable Hanton had no experience investigating historical sexual assault cases and was not part of the CIB. The Cornwall Police Service and Staff Sergeant Brunet should have taken measures to ensure that the officer assigned to the Landry Jr. case had training in investigating such cases.

As Staff Sergeant Derochie made clear in his report, "The case was bounced around from investigator to investigator for more than a year." Although Constable Hanton had carriage of the file in January, he asked Staff Sergeant Brunet if it could be assigned to the Youth Bureau/SACA in March. Staff Sergeant Brunet instructed the Constable to continue the Landry investigation. On April 5, 1996, Constable Hanton filed a supplementary occurrence report to the effect that he had spoken to the victim, who did not want criminal charges to be pursued. Again Constable Hanton asked that the investigation be assigned to the Youth Bureau.

Staff Sergeant Brunet was not satisfied with the progress of the Landry investigation. He did not think it had been thorough. In May 1996, Staff Sergeant D'Arcy Dupuis, Constable Hanton's superior on uniformed patrol, told Staff Sergeant Brunet that the Constable would not be able to pursue the Landry Jr. investigation. On May 28, 1996, the investigation was reassigned to Constable David Bough, who had carriage of the file until September 1996. The police force at that time was preoccupied with homicide investigations, and this case of historical sexual assault was again pushed aside. Staff Sergeant Brunet knew that the Landry file was not being given the attention it warranted. Again, the file was bounced to another officer at the CPS. In September 1996, Sergeant Brian Snyder was assigned to the CIB and became responsible for the Landry file. I discuss Sergeant Snyder's involvement in this case in the next section. It wasn't until May 26, 1997, eight months later, that Earl Landry Jr. was interviewed. He was criminally charged, more victims came forward, and additional criminal charges were laid. Yet it wasn't until November 18, 1999, that Earl Landry Jr. was sentenced. He pleaded guilty to the criminal charges of sexual assault of five complainants and was sentenced to five years imprisonment.

As Staff Sergeant Derochie stated, it took far too much time to initiate the investigation after the 1996 complaint was made to the CPS. There was a backlog of cases at the police service, too many different officers had responsibility for the file, and the case did not progress in a timely manner. I agree with Staff Sergeant Derochie's conclusions.

Sergeant Brian Snyder Assumes Responsibility for Landry Jr. Investigation

Sergeant Brian Snyder became responsible for the Landry Jr. investigation on September 30, 1996. He was very aware of the need to conduct a comprehensive investigation without further delay. Sergeant Snyder knew that the file had bounced from one officer to the next and that little attention had been paid by the CPS to these allegations of historical sexual assault. Yet this complaint against Earl Landry Jr. by C-52 was again not investigated promptly. Sergeant Snyder's supervisors at the CPS should also have ensured that this case received priority and that it was investigated without delay.

Sergeant Snyder contacted Carole Leblanc of the CAS on February 12, 1997, and informed her that he was investigating the allegations by C-52. The CPS officer listened to the audiotape of the CAS interview. This was Sergeant Snyder's first contact with the CAS since he was assigned the file. But it was not until March 17, 1997, that Sergeant Snyder met with the alleged victim, C-52, to discuss the details of the sexual assault by Earl Landry Jr. C-52 was upset about the delay in the investigation. Sergeant Snyder also spoke at about this time to another alleged victim, C-51.

On April 2, 1997, Sergeant Snyder met with the two complainants, and the CAS had a risk management conference to discuss whether Earl Landry Jr.'s employer should be contacted. Sergeant Snyder made contact with officials at City Hall, and Earl Landry Jr. was arrested at the end of May 1997.

On May 26, 1997, Sergeant Snyder met with Earl Landry Jr., who admitted the allegations made by C-52. Mr. Landry was arrested. Mr. Landry's release terms included a clause not to associate with C-51 or C-52, and another to stay away from public parks and facilities where persons under the age of fourteen might be found. A curfew was also imposed and Earl Landry Jr. was required to live at the home of his father. In addition, he was required to undergo an assessment. There were no restrictions on his interaction with his three young sons.

On June 17, 1997, Sergeant Snyder interviewed Earl Landry Jr.'s wife, Lucie. She told the officer that her husband had confessed that he had sexually abused eight or nine young people in the past, before criminal charges were laid. Lucie Landry said that he had molested vulnerable children. After the first set of charges, other victims came forward. The trigger for C-53's disclosure was media articles on the criminal charges that had been laid against Earl Landry Jr. There were additional charges against Earl Landry Jr. in 1997. C-54, another complainant, disclosed that he had also been abused, and more criminal charges were laid on September 3, 1997.

On September 5, 1997, Earl Landry Jr., accompanied by his aunt, arrived at the Cornwall Police Service and spoke to Sergeant Snyder. The accused told the CPS Sergeant that his mother and aunt had gone to see C-54 to ask why he was instituting criminal charges. Sergeant Snyder did not follow up with the complainant after he received this information from Earl Landry Jr.

It is clear in correspondence from Crown Attorneys Lynn Robinson and Murray MacDonald in 1997 and 1998 that the Crown had become exasperated with the inattention of Sergeant Snyder to the Landry file. Their concerns were non-response to letters, disclosure issues, and delays that they believed could negatively affect the success of the Landry prosecution. Crown Attorney Lynn Robinson discussed the perception of "ineptitude" in a memo to Murray MacDonald.

1. On 07 July 97 I tell investigator re: counselling records—I never receive a response.
2. 1 Oct 97—I follow up—no response.
3. 27 May 98—Receive more s. 278 documents dated May & June 97.

[Therefore] TWO CONCERNS

1. why no response to my letter?
2. if documents obtained a year ago—why only disclosed to Crown now?

WOULD YOU KINDLY ADDRESS THIS WITH SOMEONE
AT C.P.S. THIS ACCUSED IS EX-CHIEF'S SON & THE APPEARANCE OF INEPTITUDE WILL NOT GO UNNOTICED
BY V'S & MEDIA.

A letter to Chief Repa by Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald on May 28, 1998, outlined some of the concerns:

Dear Sir:

You will recall a conversation we had several weeks ago on the subject of my bringing to your attention problems relating to particular officers. Likewise, you will recall our mutual desire of having an information “pipeline” between your desk and mine which is intended to educate members as opposed to sanctioning them (this is based on my philosophy that erring officers, like Crowns, make their share of mistakes over the course of time!)

The case at hand relates to a high-profile sexual assault currently being prosecuted by this office. The case is now before the General Division. The considerable delays in receiving and response will harm the Crown's case and cause unnecessary litigation over the complainant's personal records and related confidentiality interests.

My request, in a nutshell, is that Crown requests for relevant information be acted upon as quickly as reasonably possible. If, however, delays are anticipated (your folks are as busy as my people), then it will be helpful for the relevant members to contact the Crown immediately and arrangements can then be discussed. (Emphasis added)

It is clear from the evidence that Sergeant Snyder failed to conduct the investigation of Landry Jr. in a timely manner. Chief Repa responded to the Crown attorney's letter on June 9, 1998. He apologized for the breakdown in communication and assured Mr. Murray MacDonald that he had discussed these issues with his senior officers and would ensure that the matter was “given the attention deserved.”

Earl Landry Jr. Breaches His Conditions of Release and Is Arrested by Sergeant Snyder

Sergeant Snyder saw Earl Landry Jr. alone with his children on October 26, 1997, at McDonald's restaurant. Brian Snyder was off duty at the time. The CAS had stipulated that his wife, Lucie, could not leave the boys alone with Earl Landry Jr. and that any access to his children was to be supervised. Sergeant Snyder reported his observations to the CAS on the same day that he saw Earl Landry Jr. at the restaurant.

On June 25, 1998, C-54 told Sergeant Snyder that he no longer wished to pursue the criminal charges against Earl Landry Jr. Sergeant Snyder tried to determine why C-54 had changed his mind. He learned through the discussion that Earl Landry Jr. had offered C-54 a computer if the charges were dropped against him. In Sergeant Snyder's view, this was an obstruction of justice. Sergeant Snyder was also told that Earl Landry Jr. was staying overnight at his wife's apartment in breach of his recognizance.

On the evening of September 4, 1998, Sergeant Snyder travelled to the home of Mrs. Landry. He saw Earl Landry Jr. there, after the time of his curfew. This was in violation of the conditions of Mr. Landry's release. Sergeant Snyder contacted Earl Landry Sr., who said he did not know where his son was at that time. Sergeant Snyder arrested Earl Landry Jr. Both he and the Crown tried to revoke Earl Landry Jr.'s bail but were not successful.

Earl Landry Jr. pleaded guilty to the charges laid against him and received a custodial sentence of five years.

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie Identifies Several Problems in the Landry Jr. Investigation

Staff Sergeant Derochie identified in his 1999 review several problems in the Earl Landry investigation that were also present in other historical sexual assault investigations at the Cornwall Police Service. They included delays in the investigation, case management issues in the CIB, poor note taking, and the short retention period of reports. Historical sexual assault cases, he concluded, were not considered high priority at the CPS:

... There does exist in this matter, however, a number of the same shortcomings previously identified in other historical sexual assault investigations.

Those concerns include:

—that notes were attached to completed investigative reports and so were destroyed at the end of the retention period of those reports;

- that occurrences/incidents which contained allegations of historical sexual assaults which could not be prosecuted or pursued, for any number of reasons, were classified as Police Information and so had a very short retention period;
- that historical sexual assaults were/are not pursued with a same type of urgency which recently occurring assaults were/are given;
- that case management issues in CIB remain unresolved and a continued source of concern.

Staff Sergeant Brunet agreed that note taking and retention periods for documents were inadequate. He also agreed that there were delays in the Landry investigation for which he was responsible.

I have to concede that I was trying to monitor it the best I could with the other cases that I had at the time and there were certainly some issues. The end results is there were some delays, and I have to accept responsibility for that. (Emphasis added)

As Staff Sergeant Derochie testified, the Landry Jr. investigation, the investigation of the Jeannette Antoine complaint, and the investigation of the Silmser complaint all suffered from the same deficiencies: case management problems, poor record keeping, and delay. These historical sexual abuse investigations had the same shortcomings.

At the conclusion of the December 1999 report, Staff Sergeant Derochie recommended that the Cornwall Police Service “develop policies in the form of General Orders which address the issues raised in this Review, both with regard to the investigation and the records keeping.”

Chief Repa responded to the Derochie report on the Landry Jr. investigation a few days later, on December 13, 1999. The Cornwall Chief of Police stated that the “highest priority must always be given to complaints of sexual assault or child abuse.” He instructed that the current policy on sexual assault procedure be updated to a General Order. He also directed that the following actions be taken to ensure a prompt response to complaints of child abuse and sexual assault:

- Until the Order is completed, a Standing Order is to be forthwith drafted that the aforementioned categories are to be immediately assigned for investigation and that a follow-up report shall be submitted every [fourteen (14)] days until the investigation is concluded, whether or not there is any activity.
- The Staff Sergeant and/or Sergeant assigned to the Criminal Investigation Bureau shall review and manage all of the categories to ensure that the files are being actively worked on.

- The Professional Standards/Audit Staff Sergeant shall audit the areas on a regular basis to ensure compliance.
- Ascertain if there is currently a backlog of cases and if so, whether the temporary secondment of staff to SACA would assist in the bureau becoming current.
- All allegations of sexual assault, sexual offences, child or elder abuse are to be referred to CIB, even though the Uniform Bureau may be assigned the follow-up or have cleared the matter.
- The Criminal Investigation Bureau manager and supervisor have responsibility for the case management of noted offences.

The reporting requirement on OMPPAC was extended from seven to fourteen and then to thirty days after a meeting with Chief Repa and Officers Garry Derochie, Luc Brunet, and Richard Carter, and D'Arcy Dupuis. As Staff Sergeant Derochie explained, this was to ensure activity so that historical sexual assault cases were treated with the same urgency and importance as other investigations. It is noteworthy that a thirty-day reporting requirement was the standard OMPPAC requirement for all cases. Therefore, cases of historical sexual abuse were not accorded priority.

On December 30, 1999, Chief Repa issued a Standing Order on the investigation of sexual assaults. It made clear that historical sexual assaults should be treated with the same priority as current sexual assault cases. It also delineated the responsibilities of the Criminal Investigation Bureau regarding case management, as well as monitoring the progress and timeliness of these files. The Professional Standards Bureau became responsible for conducting random audits of these cases:

STANDING ORDER INVESTIGATION OF SEXUAL ASSAULTS

Effective immediately the Officer in Charge of the Criminal Investigation Division will be responsible for the case management of all reported cases of:

- offences which are sexual in nature;
- child abuse; and
- abuse of the elderly.

Such investigations will be given the highest priority and shall be referred to the Criminal Investigation Division for investigation.

The investigating officer will report on the status of the case by means of a supplemental report every thirty (30) days.

The OIC of the Criminal Investigation Division shall closely monitor the progress of all such investigations and will ensure that they are completed in a timely manner.

Historical sexual assaults will be given the same considerations as those incidents which have just recently occurred.

The OIC of Professional Standards Division shall, in the capacity of Service Auditor, conduct random audits of such investigations.
(Emphasis added)

In 2002, the December 2000 General Order was amended. As Chief Repa explained, two important provisions were deleted: (1) the section that stated that historical sexual assault should be treated with the same urgency as current sexual assault cases; and (2) the section on random audits.

Staff Sergeant Snyder Has Contact With C-52 Prior to Testifying at the Inquiry

A few months before testifying at the Inquiry, Staff Sergeant Snyder¹⁵ went to the home of C-52, one of the complainants, on March 19, 2008, to discuss the Landry Jr. investigation. He was dressed in uniform. During this visit, Sergeant Snyder asked C-52 about the incident in which C-52 came to the police station to complain there had been little progress on the investigation. The CPS officer claimed he was trying to refresh his memory before he gave his evidence at the Inquiry.

Staff Sergeant Snyder testified that he did not in any way try to make suggestions or to influence C-52. He said that he had visited C-52 on his own initiative and did not consult anyone before arriving at C-52's home. Staff Sergeant Snyder claimed that it did not occur to him at the time that this visit was inappropriate or could be intimidating to C-52, a victim of child sexual assault. In hindsight, he acknowledged that it was a mistake to visit C-52's home, particularly in uniform, in preparation for his testimony at the Inquiry, which was examining the response of the Cornwall Police Service to allegations of sexual assault by victims in the community.

15. Brian Snyder was promoted to Staff Sergeant in November 2006.

Staff Sergeant Snyder made notes of his visit to C-52's home in March 2008. However, the CPS officer did not disclose these notes to the Inquiry until two weeks before he testified at the hearings. When asked to explain the time lag for the disclosure, Bryan Snyder replied, "There's no reason."

It is evident that Staff Sergeant Snyder was reluctant to disclose his notes of his visit and exchange with C-52 in March 2008. It was clearly inappropriate for the officer to make contact with C-52 and to visit the home of this victim of childhood sexual abuse to discuss the Landry Jr. investigation prior to testifying at the Inquiry.

Did the Former Police Chief Obstruct the CPS in Its Investigation of His Son Earl Landry Jr.?

In summer 2000, the Cornwall Police Services Board was named defendant in a civil action instituted by C-53's family. C-53, one of the victims of Earl Landry Jr., and members of his family instituted a legal action against the CPS as well as Earl Landry Jr., Earl Landry Sr., the City of Cornwall, and the Children's Aid Society. It was alleged in the statement of claim that the former police chief, Earl Landry Sr., abused his influence in the CPS to protect his son from being criminally charged with sexual assault. It was asserted that the CPS was aware of these actions and had a duty to protect the plaintiffs and members of the public.

On August 16, 2000, Chief Repa wrote a memo to Staff Sergeant Derochie, Head of the Professional Standards Division. He stated that the civil allegations "are serious and alleged conduct of a criminal nature." He directed Staff Sergeant Derochie to begin a criminal investigation immediately of Earl Landry Sr. and other involved members of the Cornwall Police Service "to ascertain the facts." Chief Repa was concerned about the allegation of attempts to obstruct justice by the CPS.

Chief Repa did not consider asking an external police force to conduct this investigation. It would have been appropriate for the Cornwall Chief of Police to refer this investigation to another police force to ensure objectivity. It was also important as members of the community in Cornwall could otherwise conclude that the CPS was attempting to cover up improper influence by the former police chief.

Staff Sergeant Derochie filed a general occurrence report in which he outlined the allegations against the CPS in the statement of claim filed by C-53's family. He was concerned that the former police chief, Earl Landry Sr., who had retired from the CPS in April 1984, had used his position to influence the police officers investigating allegations of sexual assault against his son. Staff Sergeant Derochie also knew that he needed to determine whether the CPS officers involved in the criminal investigation of Earl Landry Jr. had acted inappropriately. He asked Staff Sergeant Snyder to assist him and appointed him lead investigator.

Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote to the lawyer representing C-53's family on August 24, 2000. He advised Mr. Arthur Lüst that, in light of the serious allegations of possible obstruction of justice set forth in the statement of claim, the "Cornwall Police Service had commenced a criminal investigation to ascertain the facts." Mr. Lüst responded by letter that he was surprised the CPS had not asked an external police force, such as the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), to conduct this investigation but rather had decided to "investigate itself." His letter of August 30, 2000, reads:

Dear Mr. Derochie:

Re: [C-53] et al. v. Landry Jr. et al.
Your File: PROSTDSI (I-I)

I have received your letter of August 24, 2000 with some surprise.

To that end, I am curious as to why the Cornwall Police Service would investigate itself given the rather severe nature of the allegations put forward in the Statement of Claim. Surely, in this case, it is the Ontario Provincial Police that ought to investigate this matter if there are any facts to ascertain whether there is a potential for an obstruction of justice charge against any individuals linked with the Police Service in Cornwall.

Your thoughts on this matter would be greatly appreciated as I intend to move forward the action as it presently stands. Given the nature of the litigation, any interview of my clients cannot be utilized in the civil action in as much as your defence of the claim goes. It is for this reason, among others, I am somewhat surprised that it is the Cornwall Police Service that would initiate their own investigation in this matter.

Kindly advise me as to what your position is.

Arthur Lüst, esq.

Staff Sergeant Derochie and the CPS were in a possible conflict. The CPS was being sued and the Staff Sergeant was the contact person for the civil lawyers in defending the claim against the CPS. At the same time, Chief Repa had instructed him to conduct a criminal investigation of the issues.

The CPS did not ask the Ottawa Police Service, the OPP, or another external police force to conduct the criminal investigation into allegations of improper influence by Earl Landry Sr. and the possible involvement of CPS officers. Nor did the CPS seek the advice of the Crown regarding the possible conflict.

On September 15, 2000, Sergeant Snyder became involved in the investigation of the allegations of conspiracy and attempt to obstruct justice. He arranged interviews with victims and their families, as well as with CPS officers involved in the 1985 Earl Landry Jr. case. He also arranged to meet with employees of the Parks and Recreation department of the City of Cornwall. Sergeant Snyder, either alone or with Staff Sergeant Derochie, spoke to the following CPS officers: Stanley Willis, Richard Trew, Ron Lefebvre, and former chief Claude Shaver.

After completing these interviews over several months, Sergeant Snyder concluded that there was no evidence to suggest that there was a conspiracy to prevent Earl Landry Jr. from being charged with sexual assault. He concluded that both Staff Sergeant Willis and Sergeant Ron Lefebvre had conducted a proper investigation, that Crown Attorney Alain Ain had been consulted, and that it had been determined Earl Landry Jr. would not be criminally charged. They believed that the victim “had a great deal of difficulty communicating any information regarding the victimization due to various intellectual limitations” and “was not capable of giving adequate testimony.” Yet as I mentioned earlier, a medical report in 1985 stated that the child had described the sexual abuse without any leading questions.

Sergeant Snyder did not consider it inappropriate that the former police chief had contacted Staff Sergeant Willis respecting his son’s case. Moreover, Sergeant Snyder knew that Staff Sergeant Willis was a good friend of Earl Landry Jr.’s brother Brian. Sergeant Snyder also knew that the CPS investigation ended after the call by Earl Landry Sr. to the Cornwall police officer. It was also Sergeant Snyder’s conclusion that Chief Shaver did not obstruct justice by communicating with Earl Landry Sr. when the former chief’s son was being questioned by CPS officers. As I stated previously, it was clearly inappropriate for Chief Shaver to disclose information relating to an ongoing investigation of Earl Landry Jr. to his father, Earl Landry Sr., the former police chief of the CPS.

It is important to note that neither Sergeant Snyder nor Staff Sergeant Derochie interviewed Earl Landry Sr. in their 2000–2001 criminal investigation. After receiving the conclusions of Staff Sergeant Derochie and Sergeant Snyder in their report, that Staff Sergeant Willis and Sergeant Ron Lefebvre had not engaged in inappropriate conduct during the 1985 criminal investigation of Earl Landry Jr., Chief Repa decided that it was not necessary to interview the former police chief. In my view, the Cornwall Police Service ought to have interviewed Earl Landry Sr. in its investigation of whether the former police chief obstructed justice or acted inappropriately in the police investigation of his son Earl Landry Jr. for allegations of sexual assault of young people.

Another Conflict of Interest?

Staff Sergeant Derochie became concerned in September 2000 about a possible conflict of interest with regard to the insurer of the CPS, which he discussed with Chief Repa. In notes dated September 5, 2000, Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote:

I told the Chief that in my opinion CGU Ins. & certain people at City Hall have reached the conclusion that the allegation made by the plaintiff, i.e. that Landry Sr. used his influence as Chief or former Chief to protect his son from being charged. If that is the case then we are at a point of conflict with them i.e. how can we be confident that CGU will represent our interests if they believe Landry Sr. was involved in some sort of mis-conduct. They can not accuse Landry Sr. without involving/accusing the investigators, which in turn would involve everyone else, i.e. Chief Shaver, Insp. Trew et al. I discussed this concern with the Chief and he agrees that we have a problem that I should consult a lawyer.

In September 2000, the insurance company was reluctant to pay the legal fees for Earl Landry Sr.

Chief Repa acknowledged that he had placed Staff Sergeant Derochie in a difficult and “contradictory” position. Staff Sergeant Derochie was responsible for the criminal investigation of possible obstruction of justice by Earl Landry Sr. Yet Chief Repa asked Staff Sergeant Derochie to prepare a report to urge the insurer to pay. Chief Repa stated that, in hindsight, he realized that he should not have asked Staff Sergeant Derochie both to conduct the criminal investigation and to write a report to the insurers urging them to pay Earl Landry Sr.’s indemnification costs:

It was not until a few months ago when I was reading all of the documents on this that I realized that I had put Staff Sergeant Derochie, unbeknownst to me—it was there, I saw it, but I didn’t see it—I didn’t appreciate the situation I had put him in. He was in a contradictory situation.

Had I appreciated back then in the summer of 2000 and the fall what I had done to Staff Sergeant Derochie by making him wear two hats, he’s saying in essence to the insurance providers, Earl Landry Sr. is innocent and on this hand he's going out and trying to ascertain criminal—do a criminal investigation on him.

That was completely my fault. I didn't see it. I mean, I was aware of it but I just did not—it didn't hit me.

A few months ago when I realized what was happening, I realized I made an error.

In my view, the Cornwall Police Services Board failed to establish policies and failed to give direction to the Chief of Police to ensure that conflicts of interest were identified and appropriately managed within the context of investigations related to allegations of historical sexual abuse. In addition, Chief Repa and the Cornwall Police Service failed to take measures to ensure that conflicts of interest were identified and dealt with appropriately in the context of the investigation of allegations of historical sexual abuse by Earl Landry Jr. Furthermore, the Cornwall Police Service unreasonably delayed the investigation into allegations of sexual abuse made against Earl Landry Jr. It also failed to ensure that investigators had the appropriate training for cases of historical child sexual abuse.

The Investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc

Constable Brian Payment Assigned the Leblanc Investigation

On January 24, 1986, Staff Sergeant Stanley Willis asked Constable Brian Payment to investigate allegations of sexual abuse involving Jean Luc Leblanc. At that time, Mr. Leblanc worked as an instructor at the training institute at Transport Canada. Staff Sergeant Willis explained that the Children's Aid Society (CAS) had received a complaint and that the alleged child victim, Scott Burgess, was a student at a local Cornwall school, Central Public. Constable Payment, who at that time was in the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) Youth Bureau, went to the child's school that day. He was dressed in plain clothes.

At Central Public School, Constable Payment spoke to Bruce Duncan of the Children's Aid Society about the case. He was told that the alleged victim had disclosed to a teacher, Dawn Raymond, about two weeks earlier that he had been sexually molested by Mr. Leblanc. The student, Scott Burgess, did not want his parents to know about the sexual assault.

Constable Payment had intended to meet with the alleged victim, fourteen-year-old Scott Burgess. But when the CPS Constable arrived at the school, he was told by the Principal that he could not speak to the student without the consent of his parents as it was contrary to school policy. Constable Payment explained to the Principal of Central Public School that in sexual abuse cases, it is important that the police interview the victim as soon as possible. Nevertheless, the Cornwall police officer was denied access to the student.

However, Central Public School authorities allowed the CAS official, Mr. Bruce Duncan, to speak to Scott Burgess. Mr. Duncan assured Constable Payment that he would contact him after the interview. Constable Payment was concerned that the child had disclosed two weeks earlier, yet the Cornwall police had not been contacted until this time. Constable Payment asked the CAS official not to discuss the details of the sexual assault case with the victim but rather to ask the child if he was willing to meet with a police officer. Scott Burgess was interviewed by Mr. Duncan on the afternoon of January 24, 1986.

As will be discussed in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society, when Mr. Duncan met with Scott Burgess, he was told that Scott's brother, Jody, might also be a victim. Mr. Duncan decided to visit the Burgess home that afternoon. He met with Jody Burgess, who told the CAS intake worker that a man named Bill McKinnon had sexually molested his friend Jason Tyo and others. Jody Burgess did not disclose at that time that Mr. Leblanc had sexually abused him. Mr. Duncan spoke to Scott Burgess again, who revealed that acts of fellatio and anal sex had been perpetrated on him by Jean Luc Leblanc.

That evening, Constable Payment went to the CAS office. Scott Burgess had agreed to an interview with the police officer. Constable Payment discussed in his evidence the benefits of joint interviews with the CAS and the police. They spare the child victim multiple questioning. Also, the police can ensure that CAS officials do not ask the child leading questions, as this can adversely affect the outcome of a prosecution.

As discussed, Constable Payment had asked Mr. Duncan when he had his initial contact with Scott Burgess not to ask the child details about the alleged sexual assault. No protocol existed between the Children's Aid Society and the Cornwall Police Service at that time, and Constable Payment was worried that leading questions would be asked. As he explained in his testimony, a police officer and a CAS worker have very different objectives. CAS officials are focused on the protection of the child rather than on the success of a criminal prosecution. Yet despite the police officer's request, Bruce Duncan spoke to Scott Burgess about some of the details of the sexual assaults by Mr. Leblanc.

At the CAS office, Constable Payment interviewed Scott Burgess, who was in grade 7 at the time. He took a statement from him. Mr. Duncan was present. This was the third time that day that Scott was interviewed about the abuse. The child described acts of fellatio committed multiple times by Mr. Leblanc. He had been instructed by Mr. Leblanc not to disclose these acts to anyone.

Dawn Raymond, the woman to whom Scott Burgess had disclosed sexual activities with Mr. Leblanc, wrote a statement for the police at the CAS office at the time Constable Payment interviewed Scott. Dawn Raymond was a teacher at an elementary school in Cornwall, Gladstone Public School, and had taught Scott Burgess and Jason Tyo. The boys had begun to visit her at her home the previous summer and she “became more of a friend,” a person in whom the children would confide. The boys told Mrs. Raymond that Jean Luc Leblanc took them on trips, that they slept at his house, and that they had regular contact with him. She met Mr. Leblanc on December 21, 1985, when he offered to drive her to the airport. It was on about January 7, 1986, after she returned from her trip, that Jason Tyo came to her school and disclosed to Dawn Raymond that Mr. Leblanc had performed fellatio on and had anal sex with Scott Burgess. A few days later, Scott confirmed that he had been sexually molested by Mr. Leblanc. He also revealed that Mr. Leblanc had performed fellatio on Jason Tyo.

Constable Payment reviewed Dawn Raymond’s statement after his interview with Scott Burgess and asked her to sign it. Her statement clearly said that one of the child victims had told her that fellatio and anal sex had been perpetrated on Scott Burgess by Mr. Leblanc. Yet Constable Payment did not include the allegations of anal sex in the will-state of Scott Burgess. Constable Payment agreed that this was important information as it affected the criminal charges that could be laid against Mr. Leblanc. Other important information omitted in the will-state of Scott Burgess was about the trips that the child went on with Mr. Leblanc.

Interview at the Burgess Home

Constable Payment arrived at the Burgess home on the evening of January 24, 1986. He and Mr. Duncan spoke to Mr. and Ms Burgess about Scott’s disclosure and asked them to be supportive of their son. The officer and the CAS official explained that it is difficult for victims of sexual abuse to come forward. There were seven children in the Burgess family.

Constable Payment spoke with Jody Burgess in his bedroom. Jody told the officer that Mr. Leblanc was “his friend.” The boy described some acts of the sexual molestation, but it was evident that he was reluctant to discuss all the details of the abuse. Jody Burgess needed some time to decide whether he was comfortable disclosing more information to the police officer about Mr. Leblanc. Jody also mentioned a man, “Bill,” who sexually molested him and who had pictures of “many little kids.”

Constable Payment did not interview any of the other children in the Burgess home to determine whether they, too, had been subjected to sexual abuse by Jean Luc Leblanc. Cindy Burgess, Scott and Jody’s sister, was at home when

Constable Payment arrived that evening. She was in the kitchen at the time the CPS Constable spoke to Mr. and Mrs. Burgess and knew the reason for the visit by the Cornwall police. Cindy Burgess was fifteen years old at the time. When Constable Payment was asked at the Inquiry why he did not interview Cindy or other children in the Burgess household, his response was, “I don’t know if it’s tunnel vision, but it would seem at that time, that ... he was involved with boys.”

Constable Payment agreed that in retrospect, it would have been a good idea to speak to the other children in the Burgess home to determine whether they, too, had been sexually assaulted by Mr. Leblanc. Constable Payment learned several years later that Cindy Burgess was also sexually abused by this man.

As a result of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc in 1999, Cindy Burgess was interviewed, as were her siblings Scott and Jody. Mr. Leblanc was subsequently prosecuted for a number of sexual acts committed on children and received a ten-year custodial sentence in 2002. I discuss Project Truth and the OPP investigation and prosecution of Mr. Leblanc in the following chapter of this Report. Clearly, both Constable Payment and the CAS ought to have interviewed other children in the Burgess household to determine if they had been sexually abused. I discuss the CAS involvement in this case in Chapter 9.

The day after Constable Payment visited the Burgess home, January 25, 1986, Jody Burgess decided that he was prepared to disclose more information to Constable Payment about the sexual activities engaged in by Mr. Leblanc. Constable Payment took a statement from the boy. Jody Burgess told the officer that once a week for a three- or four-year period, Mr. Leblanc performed fellatio on him. The officer learned that when Mr. Leblanc engaged in sexual activities with Scott or Jody Burgess or their friend Jason Tyo, the other boys were often present. Jody said that the sexual molestation by Mr. Leblanc stopped in October 1985, before Halloween. Constable Payment testified that he thought he had discussed with Jody Burgess the trips and overnight stays with Mr. Leblanc, but this information was also not included in the will-state of this child complainant.

On the same day, Constable Payment took a statement from Jason Tyo, the friend of the Burgess brothers. Jason Tyo was also a student at Central Public School. He disclosed acts of fellatio by Mr. Leblanc on him, Jody Burgess, and Scott Burgess. That day, Constable Payment decided to visit Bill McKinnon, as his name had been mentioned by the boys. He confronted Mr. McKinnon at his apartment, but the suspect denied he had been involved sexually with the children. Mr. McKinnon was seventy-one years old and appeared to Constable Payment to be somewhat senile and confused. When Constable Payment testified, he had no recollection of Bruce Duncan mentioning that Jody Burgess had disclosed that Mr. McKinnon possessed photographs of children.

Constable Payment testified that he met with the Crown, Don Johnson, on January 27, 1986. According to Constable Payment, Mr. Johnson read the statements of each of the three boys as well as the statement of Dawn Raymond. The case was discussed. It was agreed that a charge of gross indecency should be laid against Jean Luc Leblanc. Constable Payment did not recall any discussion with the Crown regarding information omitted from the statements, such as the trips and overnight stays at Mr. Leblanc's home and the anal sex mentioned in Dawn Raymond's statement.

Mr. Johnson and Constable Payment also discussed the allegations against Bill McKinnon and the possibility of a CPS investigation. According to Constable Payment, Mr. Johnson raised a concern about Mr. McKinnon's competency to stand trial—he was elderly and perhaps senile. Charges that could be laid against Mr. McKinnon were not pursued at this meeting.

It is of significance that Constable Payment failed to file an occurrence report on the allegations against Bill McKinnon. This prevented other police officers who received complaints against this man from linking him to the Burgess/Tyo allegations. When asked why he did not file an occurrence report, Constable Payment replied, “[I]t's something that I just never thought of at the time.” And he acknowledged, “In hindsight I probably should have made the occurrence.” The officer should clearly have filed an occurrence report to alert other police officers of the allegations of child sexual abuse by Bill McKinnon. Constable Payment did not investigate this matter further.

Charges Laid Against Jean Luc Leblanc

On January 27, 1986, charges of gross indecency were laid against Mr. Leblanc with respect to the acts of fellatio committed on Scott Burgess, his brother Jody, and Jason Tyo. The allegations spanned from 1981 to 1985. At that time, Constable Payment clearly understood the difference in the gravity of the offence between an act of fellatio and an act of anal intercourse, but no charges were laid with respect to the acts of anal intercourse. He knew that anal intercourse was considered more serious. Constable Payment conceded that had the statements of the complainants contained references to the anal sex, “there would have been other charges.” This was an omission on the part of Constable Payment that was likely to have had an impact on the sentence of Mr. Leblanc.

Constable Payment arrested Jean Luc Leblanc on January 27, 1986, and transported him to the police station. The accused refused to provide a statement. Mr. Leblanc contacted a lawyer, and he was released by Justice of the Peace Keith Jodoin. Of significance is that Mr. Leblanc's release did not contain a condition prohibiting him from communicating with the victims or other children and young persons. Constable Payment could not explain why he did not include this but agreed that the release “definitely” should have included this condition. This omission was critical in terms of failing to protect young persons from this perpetrator. Mr. Leblanc continued to have contact with children.

When Mr. Leblanc returned to his home in January 1986 after his release, he asked Constable Payment why the children had spoken to the police. Constable Payment responded that the children must have felt uncomfortable and thought that Mr. Leblanc’s behaviour was wrong, to which Mr. Leblanc replied, “If they felt uncomfortable all they had to do was tell me not to do it any more and I would have stopped right away.” Constable Payment inscribed these words in his notebook; this was an inculpatory statement.

Constable Payment could not recall whether he contacted Jason Tyo or his family to let them know that charges had been laid against Mr. Leblanc. He thought he might have informed Mr. Burgess about the criminal charges but was not certain. No policy existed that officers promptly contact sexual assault victims or their families when criminal charges were laid against the alleged perpetrators. As Constable Payment acknowledged, “[U]nfortunately the police didn’t get back to some of the victims or their families often.” Interactions between the police and victims of childhood sexual abuse and their families clearly needed to be improved and addressed at the Cornwall Police Service. It is my recommendation that the Cornwall Police Service ensure that sexual assault victims—and in the case of child sexual assault victims, their parents, and family members—are apprised of the investigation, the laying of charges, and the court proceedings.

Constable Payment informed Bruce Duncan of the CAS about the Leblanc criminal charges. When Mr. Duncan called the Burgess home on January 28, 1986, the day after the Leblanc arrest, he spoke to Mrs. Burgess. According to Mr. Duncan’s notes:

—Jason has told Scott’s teacher and other kids at school. Scott has denied at school.

—Parents out last night for supper and Jody was crying as detective told him Jean Luc broke down when they took him in. (Emphasis added)

Constable Payment denied that he had any contact with the children at that time about the arrest. He denied discussing Mr. Leblanc’s “break-down” with the child victims when the perpetrator was arrested.

Jean Luc Leblanc’s trial took place on November 6, 1986. Mr. Leblanc pleaded guilty to two out of the three charges. The charge with respect to Scott Burgess was withdrawn at the request of the Crown. Mr. Leblanc received a suspended sentence and three years probation. Constable Payment was not involved in the plea negotiations. Nor was he in court on the day of the trial and only later learned of the sentence and that one count had been withdrawn. Constable Payment had wanted the Crown to proceed on all three charges as he thought they were well founded. He was also concerned about the effect of the withdrawn charges on Scott Burgess. It would be difficult, he said, “explaining to him why his was dropped and not the others.” Yet Constable Payment does not think he contacted Scott Burgess to discuss the withdrawn charges. He thought that perhaps Bruce Duncan might have discussed the outcome of the Leblanc case with Scott Burgess. However, Scott Burgess testified that he had not been not contacted about the withdrawal of charges involving the sexual acts on him or Mr. Leblanc’s 1986 sentence. In my view, it is of great importance that victims and alleged victims of historical child abuse are informed by the police of the outcome of the proceedings against the perpetrator and the sentence imposed by the court. It is also critical that it be explained to such victims and alleged victims that the Crown must meet a high burden of proof in criminal prosecutions and that an unsuccessful prosecution does not mean that the abuse did not in fact occur.

The probation order issued to Mr. Leblanc again did not contain a condition prohibiting him from interacting or associating with the victims, children, or other young people. Constable Payment was not aware at this time that the probation order did not include this condition, which would have provided some protection to former victims of Mr. Leblanc or other children at risk of abuse by this man. In Constable Payment’s view, the probation order should have stipulated that the perpetrator have no contact with the victims or other young persons:

[I]n retrospect now that I’ve found out that he’s re-offended that maybe something should have—as in my release papers, I should have had the “no contact.”

Jason Tyo testified that he was abused by Mr. Leblanc after his 1986 conviction. Mr. Tyo further said in his evidence:

... I’m disappointed with the sentence there. A lot of things could have been avoided if he was sentenced properly then ...

Like if he was sentenced, like a more harsh sentence, he wouldn’t have been able to re-abuse or re-abuse myself if he would have been put into jail then or a little more than a slap on the knuckles he got ...

...

And again, not to be hypocritical, but for sure if he would have got sentenced harsher then, things in my life could be much different now, a lot different ...

Jean Luc Leblanc was charged and convicted of additional sexual offences as a result of the OPP investigation approximately twelve years later, in 1999.¹⁶ As mentioned, one of these was in relation to Cindy Burgess, the sister of Scott and Jody. Mr. Leblanc pleaded guilty to a number of sexual charges against children in the Cornwall area as a result of the Project Truth investigation, which I discuss in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police. It was only when Constable Payment was preparing for his testimony at the Inquiry that he learned that Mr. Leblanc had been designated a long-term offender.

It is clear that the alleged victims of the Leblanc sexual abuse were not kept informed by the police of the progress and outcome of the 1986 prosecution. They were distressed to learn that Mr. Leblanc was not given a custodial sentence for the multiple acts of sexual abuse on them. Nor were they involved in the sentencing of the man who had sexually abused them in terms of input into the victim impact of the abuse. Moreover, they stated that had the Cornwall police kept in contact with them, they would have probably disclosed additional details about Jean Luc Leblanc and Bill McKinnon. Scott Burgess testified that he would have also disclosed his sister Cindy's abuse if he had been asked such questions in the CPS investigation:

COUNSEL: You've told us today that you didn't tell anybody back in 1986 that your sister, Cindy, was being abused by Jean Luc Leblanc too. Is that right?

16. As I discuss in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police, CPS Constable Tyo contacted OPP Detective Sergeant Randy Millar on September 10, 1998, to convey information on Jean Luc Leblanc. The CPS had received information in August 1998 from Mrs. Vivian Burgess, mother of Jody and Scott Burgess, that Mr. Leblanc had been seen with young boys in and around the Cornwall area. Detective Sergeant Millar testified that at that time he was supervising five or six detectives in investigations of serious criminal offences including homicides and robberies. Constable Tyo told Detective Sergeant Millar in the September 1998 call that Jean Luc Leblanc had been convicted of gross indecency in 1986, and was now in OPP jurisdiction. As I discuss in this Report in the chapter on the institutional response of the OPP, Detective Sergeant Millar did not direct officers under his supervision to conduct any surveillance of Mr. Leblanc at that time or follow up on the information relayed by Constable Tyo. Detective Sergeant Millar testified that he did not take any action with regard to the Leblanc matter at that time because his officers were involved in other investigations and they did not have the resources.

SCOTT BURGESS: Correct.

COUNSEL: Do you remember if you were ever asked if she was being abused?

SCOTT BURGESS: No, was never asked.

COUNSEL: Back in 1986, did you know at that time that Cindy had been abused by Jean Luc?

SCOTT BURGESS: Yes.

COUNSEL: And how did you know that?

SCOTT BURGESS: He made us stand there and watch.

COUNSEL: So you actually witnessed her abuse.

SCOTT BURGESS: Correct.

COUNSEL: ... [I]f somebody in 1986 had asked you the question “Has your sister, Cindy, ever been abused?”, what do you think you would have said?

SCOTT BURGESS: Yes.

COUNSEL: You would have told them?

SCOTT BURGESS: I would have told them. (Emphasis added)

Nor were these child victims offered counselling for the acts of sexual abuse repeatedly committed on them. The importance of police contact with victims of sexual abuse and of providing information on the progress of the investigation and prosecution as well as counselling and support are recommendations in this Report that should be implemented by police forces in cases of sexual assault of children, current and historical.

This was clearly not provided to the Burgess children and Jason Tyo. Moreover, other children in the Burgess household should have been interviewed by the Cornwall police. It is also evident that important information was missing from the will-states of the child victims. It is possible that if some of this information had been included, such as the anal intercourse, Mr. Leblanc might have been convicted of other sexual offences and would have received a longer sentence. This would have helped ensure that he was not in contact with other children. In fact, as I discuss in this Report, Mr. Leblanc subsequently became a school bus driver and transported children in the Upper Canada School District. Chapters 7 and 11, on the institutional responses of the Ontario Provincial Police and the Ministry of the Attorney General, describe the charges, prosecution, and sentencing of Mr. Leblanc in 2001 and 2002 of sexual offences against multiple child victims. Mr. Leblanc was designated a long-term offender in 2002.

The Cornwall Police Service and the CAS ought to have ensured that they conducted joint interviews with all the child victims to minimize the number of interviews and trauma to the children. This was also important to the success of the criminal prosecution. In addition, the CPS and the CAS ought to have been in better communication to ensure that the children and their families received the necessary information and support during the investigation.

The Burgess children, Jason Tyo, and other children and young people were not adequately protected when Mr. Leblanc was released after his arrest before his trial. Nor were they protected after he served his sentence for sexually abusing Jody Burgess and Jason Tyo. Both the release and the probation order should have contained a condition that Mr. Leblanc not communicate or be in the company of the victims or young persons.

I have concluded from my review of the evidence that Constable Brian Payment failed to conduct a thorough investigation in the Jean Luc Leblanc case. It is also my finding that the Cornwall Police Service failed to properly supervise Constable Payment in the context of this investigation of child sexual abuse.

I discuss the CAS involvement in this case in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society.

The Marcel Lalonde Investigation

Constable Kevin Malloy had been assigned to the Youth Bureau of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) for only about five days when he became responsible for the Marcel Lalonde investigation. When Constable Malloy contacted C-60, one of the alleged sexual assault victims, on January 9, 1989, this was the officer's first sexual assault investigation. He was assigned this file by Staff Sergeant Brendon Wells. Constable Malloy had never received any training in sexual assault investigations when he was transferred to the Youth Bureau in January 1989.

When Constable Malloy spoke to C-60 on January 9, 1989, this alleged victim of Marcel Lalonde stated that he had been "lured to culprit's house by alcohol—woke up—culprit performing copulation on him." He told the CPS officer that he had been fifteen years old at that time. C-60 made it clear to Constable Malloy that he did not want to testify at Mr. Lalonde's trial in the event that the teacher was criminally prosecuted.

C-57, another alleged victim, asserted that he had been sexually assaulted by Marcel Lalonde, whom he had met at a community theatre group. He told Constable Malloy in an interview on January 10, 1989, that Mr. Lalonde had fondled and performed fellatio on him at a crew party at Mr. Lalonde's home after the play. C-57 said that he had consumed a significant amount of alcohol when Mr. Lalonde asked him to take off his trousers, that he had protested, but that he ultimately did comply with the perpetrator's request.

Marcel Lalonde was a teacher at Bishop Macdonell School. C-57 was sixteen years old and in grade 10 when he was allegedly sexually assaulted by Mr. Lalonde. In this January 1989 interview, Constable Malloy learned that C-57 came from a unfortunate family situation and that Mr. Lalonde was sympathetic and offered assistance to help this teenager resolve his problems. C-57 looked up to and trusted this adult figure. As Constable Malloy inscribed in his notes:

Problems with family life—parents fighting constantly. Father is an alcoholic. Went to culprits house to “escape.” Suspect looked up to as an adult he could trust & help him with problems. Impressed by the fact an adult would treat him as an equal.

Mr. Lalonde, a teacher, had provided alcohol to a sixteen-year-old, a minor. This violated the Liquor Licence Act. Constable Malloy acknowledged that this raised questions for him at that time.

C-57 told the CPS Constable that a similar situation had occurred two weeks later. Again, after C-57 had consumed a large amount of alcohol, Mr. Lalonde fondled him and engaged in sexual acts with the teenager. Mr. Lalonde instructed C-57 not to disclose any of these encounters to anyone.

During the course of the police interview, C-57 mentioned that C-60 had been at Mr. Lalonde's house as well as another person (C-59), who was a busboy at Jack Lee's Bar at the time. This person told C-57 that he had also been intoxicated and fallen asleep at Mr. Lalonde's house. The busboy woke up to find Marcel Lalonde grabbing him. C-57 also said that Mr. Lalonde wanted to take pictures of him and that there was an album at Mr. Lalonde's house with photos of nude males.

C-57 believed he could identify some of the other young men at Marcel Lalonde's home at that time. He was asked to look at yearbooks at the police station and identified two young boys, whom Constable Malloy testified were probably C-65 and C-63. Constable Malloy's interview notes of January 10, 1989, state:

Culprit had moved to Millville Ave—victim attended by invitation and saw 2 males—in his backyard—told victim they were two of his students. They were enjoying themselves, calling him Marcel, drinking beer.

Mr. Lalonde was an elementary school teacher. If these were two of his students, they were young boys. It was unusual to call a teacher by his first name, and these two boys were certainly under the legal age to drink alcohol. Despite learning this, it did not enter Constable Malloy's mind that perhaps he should contact the Children's Aid Society (CAS) to report a reasonable suspicion of abuse.

C-57 stated that the perpetrator had moved to Millville Avenue, and he named the community theatre group. C-57 told Constable Malloy that he wanted the Cornwall police to conduct an investigation and that he was prepared to proceed with the complaint.

Constable Malloy came to the conclusion that based on C-57's interview, there were not reasonable and probable grounds to criminally charge Marcel Lalonde. In the Constable's view, C-57 had consented to the sexual acts:

... [I]n my mind, it was a consent issue. It was a seduction with alcohol and a consent to act.

...

... [H]e voluntarily did the things that Lalonde asked him to do. And I don't—it was my personal opinion that he wasn't that intoxicated to allow that to happen.

C-57 explained to Constable Malloy that he had not reported the abuse to the police for the past eight years because he had difficult life circumstances, which involved both alcohol and drug problems. He had sought treatment and was now prepared to deal with his childhood trauma. Constable Malloy agreed at the hearings that this was a sound reason for waiting this number of years before disclosing the abuse to the police.

Constable Malloy also learned in this interview that the prime motivation for the disclosure by C-57 was his concern for the vulnerability of other children or youth who came into contact with Marcel Lalonde. C-57 was worried that they, too, could become victims of sexual abuse. The document in the CPS file stated:

Although the victim is perfectly willing to testify in court against the culprit, and to relate this incident, his prime motivation is to prevent the culprit from preying upon other confused youths, and using his position of authority to gain their trust. (Emphasis added)

Constable Malloy followed up with C-58, another alleged victim of childhood sexual abuse, who provided a statement to the Cornwall police officer. It was clear to the Constable that there were similarities in the sexual assault allegations of C-57 and C-58. C-58 also stated that he was intoxicated at the time he was sexually abused. He said that he had passed out at Mr. Lalonde's home and when he woke up, his pants had been removed. Mr. Lalonde told him that he had performed fellatio.

Constable Malloy also tried to contact C-61. He called his home and spoke to C-61's mother, who informed the officer that her son was away at university and was writing exams.

C-65 was another person who was interviewed by Constable Malloy in January 1989 in connection with the Marcel Lalonde investigation. C-65 was aware of the alleged perpetrator's sexual preferences. However, C-65 claimed that he had not been sexually assaulted by Mr. Lalonde. It was evident to Constable Malloy that C-65 was highly anxious during the interview and was very uncomfortable discussing these matters with the Cornwall police officer.

On January 13, 1989, Constable Malloy sought permission from his supervising officer, Staff Sergeant Wells, to extend his report date on the Lalonde occurrence. In correspondence, Constable Malloy wrote that the "case involved possibly four victims of sexual assault"; in addition to C-57, other potential victims were C-60, C-61, C-58, and C-65. Constable Malloy said that he needed to investigate the matter further.

Constable Kevin Malloy Contacts the Crown

It was not Constable Malloy's practice to consult the Crown before deciding whether to lay criminal charges against an individual. Staff Sergeant Wells confirmed in his testimony that this was not a typical practice at the Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB) at the time. Nevertheless, Constable Malloy contended that he needed legal direction from a Crown attorney in the Lalonde case. The Constable did not have experience in historical sexual assault cases. Although in his opinion there were no probable and reasonable grounds, he wanted confirmation from Crown Attorney Don Johnson. It is noteworthy that Constable Malloy did not consult his colleagues or supervisor at the Cornwall Police Service on this issue. Constable Malloy had no recollection of meeting with either Staff Sergeant Wells or Inspector Richard Trew.

Constable Malloy contacted Don Johnson and met him at the Crown office. According to Constable Malloy, Mr. Johnson shared the view that this was a consensual act and that there were no reasonable and probable grounds to lay a criminal charges against Marcel Lalonde. Constable Malloy also said that he discussed with the Crown the prospect of obtaining a search warrant of Mr. Lalonde's home to retrieve photographs the teacher had of young unclothed persons. According to Constable Malloy, the Crown attorney told him that there were no grounds to obtain a search warrant. Don Johnson testified that he has no recollection of this meeting or of such discussions with Constable Malloy. The involvement of the Crown in the Marcel Lalonde case is further discussed in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

It seems that Constable Malloy met with the Crown before he had completed his interviews with the alleged victims. According to the officer's notes, he met with Mr. Johnson on January 10, 1989. Constable Malloy claimed that he had a second meeting but there is no record of this second meeting.

Constable Malloy testified that he did not prepare a Crown brief for Mr. Johnson, he did not take any notes at the meeting, and the Crown did not send him any written correspondence regarding these discussions. Yet he claimed that he spoke to Don Johnson more than one time. Mr. Johnson again could recall no such discussion with Constable Malloy.

When he testified, Constable Malloy agreed that there is no issue of consent when young persons are sexually molested when they are asleep. The Cornwall police officer also agreed that it was his, not the Crown's decision, whether reasonable and probable grounds existed to lay a criminal charge against Mr. Lalonde for sexually abusing young persons.

After Constable Malloy interviewed the alleged victims and witnesses mentioned above, he did not contact the CAS or the school at which Marcel Lalonde was a teacher in order to protect children who might be at risk of sexual abuse. Nor did he contact the community theatre at which Mr. Lalonde was involved with these youths.

The Lalonde File Is Placed in Abeyance

On June 22, 1989, Constable Malloy asked his supervisor, Staff Sergeant Wells, if the Lalonde file could be placed in abeyance for a short time as he wished to interview the “suspect.”¹⁷ Staff Sergeant Wells gave the officer permission to place the file in abeyance. Constable Malloy testified that he was hoping word would get out that people in the community were making these allegations about Marcel Lalonde and that more victims and witnesses would come forward. As Constable Malloy said at the hearings, “It’s Cornwall, a small city; word travels fairly quickly.” The CPS Constable was hopeful that new evidence would emerge in the Lalonde case regarding these historical allegations of sexual abuse of young persons. This file, for which Constable Malloy was responsible, remained in abeyance when he went on sick leave almost four years later, in March 1993.

Constable Malloy remained on sick leave until May 1996. It seems obvious that when officers are away on such extended sick leave, their files should be reviewed and reassigned to other officers. The Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) had been operational for a number of years and this file should have come to the attention of Cornwall Police Service officers.

The alleged perpetrator, Marcel Lalonde, was never interviewed by Constable Malloy. As I discuss in this chapter, Constable Malloy also did not interview the alleged perpetrator in another sexual abuse investigation, the Antoine case. This officer, with no training in sexual assault investigations, who had been in the Youth Bureau for a very short time before he was assigned these complex cases of historical sexual abuse, made the decision not to interview the suspect and not to pursue the investigation in the hope that over time more victims would contact the Cornwall police. Clearly his lack of training, experience, and supervision are reasons why this file simply sat in a box in Constable Malloy’s office for years. Marcel Lalonde continued to teach and had contact with young children at Bishop Macdonell School. Yet Constable Malloy did not contact the elementary school or the Children’s Aid Society. Although he was unclear about his obligation to inform other agencies or employers about this case, he did not discuss this issue with his supervisors in the Youth Bureau.

As I discuss in the following pages, Marcel Lalonde was charged in 1997 and subsequently convicted years later for committing sexual offences against young persons. A search warrant was conducted and pictures of nude young people were found in Mr. Lalonde’s home. Marcel Lalonde was criminally charged eight years after Constable Malloy had been assigned the Lalonde file in 1989. C-58 was one of the victims/complainants in the 2000 criminal prosecution.

It is clear that Constable Malloy failed to conduct a thorough investigation into the allegations of sexual abuse made against Marcel Lalonde. Constable Malloy was never sanctioned or disciplined by the Cornwall Police Service for his inadequate investigation of allegations of childhood sexual abuse committed by Mr. Lalonde.

17. A file placed in abeyance was not closed, but no further work was pursued on the case.

In 1989, Constable Malloy had information on the alleged sexual assaults from C-57, who was prepared to proceed with the case. He also had a statement from C-58 and information from C-60. There were several potential victims of abuse known to Constable Malloy in April 1989, who included C-57, C-58, C-59, C-60, C-65, and a boy identified in the yearbook. Constable Malloy agreed that in historical sexual assault cases, it is important for the investigating officer to develop a rapport and a trust relationship with the victim. The more the victim feels comfortable with the officer, the more likely he or she will provide details of the alleged criminal offence and agree to testify if criminal charges are laid. Constable Malloy acknowledged that there were common elements in the stories of these victims, for example, alcohol consumption by the young males, some of whom were sexually assaulted when they were asleep. Yet Constable Malloy decided to put the file in “abeyance until further evidence comes in.” He stated:

... I was asking that the file be placed in abeyance in the hopes that evidence would be forthcoming, people would ... the word would get out or somebody would come forward and say I want to file a complaint and I'm willing to take part in the process.

Staff Sergeant Wells testified that June 22, 1989, appears to be the last time he was involved in the Lalonde investigation. He was unaware that Constable Malloy had not interviewed “the suspect,” Marcel Lalonde. Nor did the CPS supervisor know that Constable Malloy did not undertake any further investigation after filing the June 22, 1989, supplementary occurrence report asking that the file be placed in abeyance for a short period. Staff Sergeant Wells testified that this should have come either to his attention or to that of Inspector Trew, who shared supervision duties: “Inspector Trew or myself were together the check and balance system.” They had equal responsibility to ensure that incidents like this were followed up. Yet it is evident that the “check and balance system” did not operate as it should have in the Marcel Lalonde case.

Staff Sergeant Wells agreed that because this was Constable Malloy's first case in the CIB and his first historical sexual assault investigation, the Constable should have received guidance and been actively supervised during this police investigation. For example, follow-up with potential witnesses and victims, contact with members of the theatre group, and an interview with the alleged perpetrator are some of the issues that could have been discussed with Constable Malloy in the context of this investigation. Staff Sergeant Wells agreed that perhaps the fact that he and Inspector Trew had shared responsibilities had complicated the supervision of Constable Malloy in the Lalonde investigation.

Staff Sergeant Wells also agreed that if Constable Malloy did not take further action on this file after it was placed in abeyance, this was not proper police file management. It is possible, he testified, that this file fell through the cracks.

As discussed, the Lalonde investigation for which Constable Malloy was responsible in 1989 remained in abeyance when he went on sick leave in March 1993. Staff Sergeant Wells agreed that it was the responsibility of Constable Malloy's supervisors, of which he was one, to keep abreast of the Lalonde and other files of Constable Malloy when the officer went on sick leave and when he left the Youth Bureau.

Marcel Lalonde continued to teach and have contact with young children until he was arrested in 1997.

In my view, the Cornwall Police Service failed to conduct a thorough investigation in 1989 into the allegations of sexual abuse made against Marcel Lalonde. Moreover, Staff Sergeant Wells and Inspector Trew failed to properly supervise Constable Malloy in the investigation of the allegations of historical sexual abuse against Marcel Lalonde. Because of the inattention to the file and the failure to contact the CAS and the school, children continued to be at risk of abuse by Mr. Lalonde.

CPS Learns of Allegations of Historical Sexual Abuse of David Silmsner by His Teacher, Marcel Lalonde

On August 9, 1994, Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet received information from the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) that in the course of the Project Blue CAS investigation,¹⁸ David Silmsner had alleged that his former teacher at Bishop Macdonell School had sexually abused him. Detective Inspector Tim Smith of the OPP wrote a letter to Acting Chief Carl Johnston with this information, which was then conveyed to Staff Sergeant Brunet. The CPS Staff Sergeant learned that Mr. Silmsner had disclosed this information to CAS staff Greg Bell and Pina DeBellis several months earlier, on November 2, 1993. David Silmsner testified that he had been abused by his teacher, Marcel Lalonde, at Bishop Macdonell School when he was thirteen or fourteen years old. He stated that Mr. Lalonde took him to his home in Cornwall and sexually abused him on two occasions.

Staff Sergeant Brunet was not aware that the Cornwall Police Service had previously investigated allegations of sexual abuse of other victims by Marcel Lalonde.

It was Staff Sergeant Brunet's practice to check OMPPAC and the Canadian Police Information Centre (CPIC) in such circumstances. Although he did not

18. The Project Blue investigation will be discussed in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society.

record this, the Staff Sergeant believes that he accessed both OMPPAC and CPIC to see if Marcel Lalonde's name appeared. He testified that he could not find any information on the suspect. Mr. Lalonde remained a teacher in Cornwall at that time.

Staff Sergeant Brunet contacted the CAS on August 9, 1994. He spoke to Mr. Lorenzo Murphy the following day and asked him to send the CAS interview of David Silmsers to the Cornwall police. Staff Sergeant Brunet followed up on this request by sending a letter to Mr. Murphy. On August 24, 1994, Staff Sergeant Brunet again contacted the CAS and spoke to Executive Director Richard Abell. The Staff Sergeant received a cassette and transcript of the interview two days later, which had been dropped off by Mr. Abell at the CPS front desk. Staff Sergeant Brunet was the liaison person with the CAS. At no time had he been advised by the Children's Aid Society of the November 1993 Silmsers allegations of abuse by his former teacher, Marcel Lalonde. As he said in his evidence, "The first time I was made aware of this is when Chief Johnston sent me the letter from [OPP] Inspector Smith in August" 1994.

Staff Sergeant Brunet testified that he did not contact the school or School Board at that time because Detective Inspector Smith stated in his correspondence with Acting Chief Johnston that the OPP had suggested to the CAS that it advise the School Board of these allegations against the teacher. But Mr. Bell of the CAS did not provide assurance that the agency would contact the School Board. According to the July 1994 correspondence, Mr. Bell told the OPP he would consult his superiors on this issue. Detective Inspector Smith wrote: "Mr. Bell advised me he would consult with his Supervisors and pass on my comments before any decision would be made to contact the School Board."

On September 12, 1994, Staff Sergeant Brunet sent David Silmsers a letter asking him to meet. Mr. Silmsers had called Acting Chief Johnston a few days earlier to let him know that he did not intend to provide a statement regarding Marcel Lalonde as he was worried it would end up in the media. This had been Mr. Silmsers's previous experience, after his disclosure to the CPS of his allegation of sexual abuse by Father Charles MacDonald and probation officer Ken Seguin. The letter sent by Staff Sergeant Brunet asked whether Mr. Silmsers would consider "providing full disclosure of the allegation against Mr. Marcel Lalonde to another police agency that could independently investigate the complaint." Mr. Silmsers did not respond to this letter.

After a couple of months had passed, Staff Sergeant Brunet decided to close the file. He considered David Silmsers uncooperative for failing to pursue the allegations of abuse and for failing to provide further particulars to the police. This is unfortunate because in February 1994, David Silmsers provided a statement to the OPP regarding his allegation of abuse against Marcel Lalonde. Staff Sergeant Brunet was not aware of this.

In my view, it is important that officers investigating such cases receive training in order to fully comprehend the impact of historical child sexual abuse and the impediments to disclosing details of such abuse to the police. Moreover, Mr. Silmser had contact with the Cornwall police in 1992 and 1993 regarding his allegations of sexual abuse by Father MacDonald and Ken Seguin, which had been difficult for him. He was also very upset that his statement to the police had been divulged to the media.

On December 13, 1994, Staff Sergeant Brunet advised Bill Carriere of the CAS that the CPS was “closing the file until Mr. Silmser was ready to discuss the case.” Staff Sergeant Brunet wrote the following in the general occurrence report:

At this time, it is obvious that Mr. Silmser made a general allegation of being sexually assaulted by Mr. Marcel Lalonde. He did not give any details that would allow our service to pursue the matter any further. Mr. Silmser has refused to cooperate with C.A.S. & the Cornwall Police Service. He was provided the opportunity to deal with another agency and has failed to pursue that avenue. S/Sgt. Brunet feels that everything possible has been done to pursue this complaint but without cooperation of the victim, no further action can be taken.

After discussions with Acting Chief Johnston, Staff Sergeant Brunet placed the general occurrence report of the Silmser allegation of abuse by Marcel Lalonde in a project file. This prevented other members of the Cornwall Police Service as well as other police forces from accessing this information on allegations of child sexual abuse by Mr. Lalonde.

Further Allegations of Abuse Made by Victims of Marcel Lalonde

In October 1996, Constable René Desrosiers was asked by his supervisor, Sergeant Brian Snyder, to follow up on a disclosure of abuse made by C-68 to probation officer Sue Lariviere. At that time, C-68 was in custody at the Cornwall jail. Constable Desrosiers was not aware that the Cornwall police had received complaints of abuse in the past and had conducted a previous investigation of allegations of sexual assaults of youth by Marcel Lalonde.

When they investigated the Lalonde allegations in 1996 and 1997, neither Constable Desrosiers nor his supervisor, Sergeant Snyder, knew that Constable Malloy had investigated this matter in 1989. Constable Desrosiers testified that he had checked the CPS cards but saw no record pertaining to Marcel Lalonde. The CPS officer did not know that Constable Malloy had documents relating to alleged victims of Lalonde in a box at the Cornwall Police Service. Clearly, it was of great importance that Constable Desrosiers, Sergeant Snyder, and other officers involved in the Lalonde investigation, including other police forces, had knowledge of and access to documents and material relating to the allegations of abuse by this perpetrator. As is evident in my review of other CPS investigations, this was a serious problem.

Constable Desrosiers met with Ms Lariviere, who stated that C-68 had disclosed that he had been sexually abused when he was twelve years old and in grade 7 at Bishop Macdonell School in the late 1960s, by his teacher, Marcel Lalonde. He alleged that the sexual abuse by Mr. Lalonde had occurred repeatedly.

Constable Desrosiers went to the Cornwall jail to discuss these allegations with C-68. The alleged victim disclosed that the abuse had taken place on camping trips. Because the alleged acts had occurred outside the City of Cornwall and within the jurisdiction of the OPP, Constable Desrosiers contacted the OPP at the Lancaster Detachment and spoke to Constable Joe Dupuis. He also spoke to Mr. Kevin Linden at the Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry Roman Catholic Separate School Board. Ms Lariviere had previously contacted the School Board to alert Mr. Linden to the allegations of sexual abuse. Constable Desrosiers explained to Mr. Linden that the OPP would investigate this matter.

Constable Desrosiers subsequently learned that the OPP laid charges against Marcel Lalonde in 1997 for the alleged abuse of C-68.

On January 31, 1997, Constable Desrosiers received a call from C-45 and his brother, who lived in the Ottawa area. C-45 disclosed that both he and his sibling had been sexually assaulted by Marcel Lalonde. The two brothers met with Constable Desrosiers on February 3, 1997.

C-45's brother told Constable Desrosiers that Marcel Lalonde had been his teacher in grade 8 at Bishop Macdonell School. He alleged that Mr. Lalonde had fondled and performed fellatio on him at the teacher's home. He had been given alcohol. Mr. Lalonde, he stated, took pictures of him with a Polaroid camera and had a box of pictures. He also mentioned "Father Charles," but Constable Desrosiers made it clear that this interview was confined to allegations against Marcel Lalonde and that another police officer or police force would investigate the allegations against the priest. Unfortunately, the victim's allegations against the priest were not recorded in Constable Desrosiers notes. When C-45's brother subsequently testified at Father MacDonald's preliminary inquiry, he was challenged for not disclosing this information to the Cornwall Police Service. This is discussed in further detail in the following chapters of this Report. Constable Desrosiers claimed that he briefed his supervisor about the allegations regarding Father Charles MacDonald but could not recall if it was Sergeant Snyder.

Constable Desrosiers also interviewed C-45 on February 3, 1997, and took a statement regarding his allegations of sexual abuse by Mr. Lalonde. Marcel Lalonde was also his former teacher. Similar to the other alleged victims,

Mr. Lalonde had invited C-45 to his home and had offered him alcohol. C-45 became intoxicated, passed out, and woke up to find Mr. Lalonde performing oral sex on him. This alleged molestation was repeated. C-45 said that he also saw Polaroid photos of Mr. Lalonde's former students, nude. C-45 recognized some of the students in the pictures. C-45 took the photo of himself from Mr. Lalonde's home.

In the interview with Constable Desrosiers, C-45 also mentioned probation officers Nelson Barque and Ken Seguin. C-45 alleged that when he was in the Cornwall Probation Office for a pre-sentence report, Mr. Ken Seguin and Mr. Nelson Barque had engaged in sexually inappropriate behaviour. Constable Desrosiers told C-45 that the CPS or another force would investigate the allegations against Nelson Barque. This did not, however, occur. He also told the complainant that probation officer Ken Seguin was dead and that as a result, the police would not pursue this matter. When this disclosure was made, Constable Desrosiers did not know that Mr. Barque had been criminally charged and had pleaded guilty in 1995 to sexual acts involving Albert Roy. Again, Constable Desrosiers claimed that he advised his supervisor about the allegations against Mr. Barque. However, the Constable did not follow up with other officers in the Cornwall Police Service or the OPP regarding the allegations that had been made against these probation officers. Once again, this is unfortunate because C-45's allegations connected Nelson Barque, Ken Seguin, and Marcel Lalonde. This information was clearly significant and important to include in a linkages analysis.

Sergeant Brian Snyder's Involvement in the Lalonde File

On January 28, 1997, Detective Constable Don Genier of the OPP informed CPS Staff Sergeant Brunet that other victims had come forward after learning that Marcel Lalonde had been charged with sexual assault. One of the alleged victims was C-8. Staff Sergeant Brunet assigned the matter to Sergeant Snyder, who was briefed on February 4, 1997, regarding the complaints. Sergeant Snyder learned that the OPP had a video of Marcel Lalonde with C-8, which Detective Constable Genier brought to Sergeant Snyder on March 13, 1997. Sergeant Snyder was aware that Marcel Lalonde had a connection with David Silmsers, another alleged victim.

Sergeant Snyder informed Constable Desrosiers at that time that he was also working on an investigation of Marcel Lalonde. He asked Constable Desrosiers to assist him. Sergeant Snyder gave Constable Desrosiers four or five names of other alleged victims and asked the Constable to follow up with these individuals. The OPP was also investigating allegations of sexual abuse by Marcel Lalonde.

This is further discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

Constable Desrosiers pursued his investigation with respect to C-45 and his brother in 1997. He held a photographic line-up to ensure that the former teacher could be identified. He asked the complainants to identify the different homes of Marcel Lalonde at which they had been abused. Constable Desrosiers also went to City Hall to identify the owner of the home in which Mr. Lalonde was living. The Constable was trying to establish grounds for a search warrant of Mr. Lalonde's residence.

Sergeant Snyder tried to contact David Silmsen through his wife, Pam Silmsen, on February 18, 1997. Mr. Silmsen made it clear, through his spouse, that "he does not believe he can deal with it right now," he had "too much on his plate," and was "having a hard time and wants to get through the MacDonald case first." After his call with Pam Silmsen on February 19, 1997, Sergeant Snyder did not follow up with David Silmsen regarding his allegations against Marcel Lalonde.

C-8 informed Sergeant Snyder in an interview on March 3, 1997, that he had given a statement to Perry Dunlop in January 1997.¹⁹ C-8 told Sergeant Snyder that Perry Dunlop had typed his statement for him.²⁰ Sergeant Snyder contacted Perry Dunlop at his home to request C-8's original statement. Problems with disclosure of Perry Dunlop's notes and other material are discussed later in this section, as well as in the chapters on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police and the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Sergeant Snyder also made contact with alleged victim C-66 in early March. C-66 provided a statement on March 17, 1997. He stated that Mr. Lalonde, a teacher at his school, had sexually assaulted him. C-66 said that Mr. Lalonde had encouraged him to come to a specific location by asking him if he was interested in a bicycle. C-66 alleged that the assault took place in a garage.

It is very clear that Sergeant Snyder did not record his notes in a proper manner. The CPS officer left blank lines between his notations and blank lines at the end of the page. He used a loose-leaf notebook. Sergeant Snyder should have been inscribing his notes on each line and should have ensured that there were no blank lines on each page of his notes. Sergeant Snyder agreed that his practice of missing lines was not acceptable. He could not provide an explanation for such note taking and acknowledged in his evidence that this was not the "best practice" because other people "can fill in blanks."

19. Perry Dunlop was a CPS Constable but was absent from the force from January 1994 to May 1997.

20. C-8 was a former student of Marcel Lalonde.

C-58 was another alleged victim with whom Sergeant Snyder spoke in the last two weeks of March 1997. It is clear that Sergeant Snyder did not have information from Constable Kevin Malloy's 1989 investigation. When he testified, Sergeant Snyder said he couldn't recall if he had checked the card catalogue to obtain information on Constable Malloy's investigation of Mr. Lalonde several years earlier. Sergeant Snyder did not know that C-57 and C-58 had disclosed to Constable Malloy that they had been abused by Mr. Lalonde. C-58 was a victim whom Sergeant Snyder had in fact interviewed. Yet the CPS officer was not aware that C-57 and C-58 had both alleged that they had been given alcohol and that C-57 had asserted that Mr. Lalonde had a photograph album.

Sergeant Snyder agreed that it would have been useful to have this information about Constable Malloy's 1989 investigation of Marcel Lalonde in his investigation of the same alleged perpetrator in 1997.

Marcel Lalonde Is Arrested

It was on April 29, 1997, that Marcel Lalonde was arrested by Constable René Desrosiers and Sergeant Snyder. On the previous day, Constable Desrosiers had obtained a search warrant of Mr. Lalonde's home, which he executed the same day as the arrest.

Constable Desrosiers and Constable George Tyo found five photo albums in the bedroom of Mr. Lalonde's home. Many of the pictures from a Polaroid camera were of teenagers who appeared to be between the ages of fifteen and seventeen. They were drinking alcohol in Marcel Lalonde's home but they were clothed. There were photographs of both C-45 and C-48. Five photos of nude young persons were found, three of which were of the same male posing on a couch. CPS Constable Desrosiers thought that this nude male was over eighteen years old.

Constable Desrosiers notified the OPP of the arrest and of the seizure of the photo albums in Mr. Lalonde's home. OPP officers also examined the photos. The OPP had charged Mr. Lalonde with indecent assault a few months earlier, in January 1997. This is discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police. Constable Desrosiers prepared a list of the young people identified in the photographs and tried to contact them. Some of these individuals did not want to participate in criminal proceedings against Mr. Lalonde. No additional charges were laid.

After the arrest, Constable Desrosiers and the Crown assigned to the case began to receive disclosure requests from Marcel Lalonde's defence counsel. At this time, Sergeant Snyder delegated the entire file to Constable Desrosiers. Sergeant Snyder was Constable Desrosiers' supervisor.

The preliminary inquiry was held in January 1998. It dealt with both the CPS and the OPP charges against Marcel Lalonde. Constable Desrosiers was called as a witness at the preliminary inquiry.

Constable Perry Dunlop was called by the defence to give evidence. Several months earlier, Sergeant Snyder had asked Constable Dunlop to give him relevant material in his possession. Sergeant Snyder had given Constable Desrosiers on April 29, 1997, a statement from Constable Dunlop of the information he had, which had been placed on OMPPAC. Constable Desrosiers assumed Perry Dunlop had provided all relevant information.

It became evident at the preliminary inquiry that Constable Perry Dunlop had not disclosed all the documents in his possession, including those pertaining to C-8. Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm asked Constable Desrosiers to obtain from Perry Dunlop all notes, newspaper clippings, and relevant documents. This is discussed further in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Adjournment of the Lalonde Trial

The Lalonde trial, originally scheduled for February 1999, was adjourned to October 4, 1999. The matter was further adjourned in October due to disclosure issues. A few days before the scheduled trial, Mr. Lalonde's lawyer, William Markle, sought disclosure of the notes of two meetings that Perry Dunlop may have had with C-8 on September 11 and December 12, 1996.²¹

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie, who was in the Professional Standards Bureau, was alerted to this on September 30, 1999. He considered this an urgent matter. He instructed Constable Desrosiers and Staff Sergeant Brunet to follow the chain of command and to obtain disclosure from Constable Dunlop. At that time, Sergeant Garry Lefebvre was Constable Dunlop's immediate supervisor.

Staff Sergeant Derochie understood that "disclosure had been a continuous problem":

... [A]t the end of the day, I wasn't confident that we had or we knew all of what Perry had; he, from time to time, mentioned that he had a wall of documents or boxes of documents at home and I thought it was—it was well now the time to find out exactly—what he had in these boxes.

On October 4, 1999, the date scheduled for the Lalonde trial, Constable Desrosiers learned that the defence was seeking a further adjournment because it had not received complete disclosure of documents in the possession of Constable Dunlop. The adjournment was granted and a new trial date was set for September 11, 2000.

21. It is important to note that in October 1997, Constable Dunlop gave material to the OPP. Included in this were notes made by Constable Dunlop of contact with C-8. However, the CPS did not receive from the OPP the notes it had received from Constable Dunlop. During the Lalonde investigation, the OPP and CPS made separate disclosures to the Crown. Constable Desrosiers testified that he was not aware of the contents of the documents the OPP disclosed to the Crown in the Marcel Lalonde investigation.

Such delays were of great concern to Staff Sergeant Derochie. As he said in his testimony, “[T]his is an unnecessary delay”; the accused has a “right to a speedy trial” and the Staff Sergeant was worried that a “Charter argument” by defence counsel might be successful when the matter was again before the courts.

On October 4, 1999, Staff Sergeant Derochie met with CPS Staff Sergeant Carter and Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm at the Project Truth offices. Ms Wilhelm expressed her frustration regarding disclosure of the Lalonde material. She had no confidence that the Crown had received all the documents from Perry Dunlop. She told Staff Sergeant Derochie that she could not say to the defence with any certainty that she had made full disclosure. Garry Derochie wrote the following in his October 4, 1999, notes: “There is concern by all involved in this particular prosecution as well as others that Dunlop’s past and continued involvement in these matters may have severe consequences.”

Constable Dunlop was “speaking with other witnesses” and “taking statements” from them. Staff Sergeant Derochie considered this highly “improper.” He was very concerned that Perry Dunlop’s conduct could be fatal to the prosecutions against Marcel Lalonde.

Staff Sergeant Derochie told the Crown prosecutor that he would issue specific orders to Constable Dunlop to comply with the disclosure requests. Staff Sergeant Derochie’s notes state:

... [H]e [Dunlop] will be further instructed that Crown alone will determine what materials are relevant, not himself ... [H]e will also be told that he must stop investigating, privately, these criminal allegations ...

Staff Sergeant Derochie had never before encountered an officer who was conducting such investigations off duty and who refused to fully disclose his interview notes and documents. Constable Dunlop’s behaviour in conducting such off-duty investigations without the authority of his supervisors at the CPS is discussed in fuller detail in this Report.

On October 5, 1999, Constable Desrosiers learned that a CPS investigation of Mr. Lalonde had taken place in 1989. Constable Desrosiers understood that this material was also subject to disclosure. While it is evident that Constable Dunlop’s lack of disclosure may have caused some disruption in this case, once Constable Malloy’s investigation finally came to light it was subject to immediate disclosure and would have been a primary reason for the request to adjourn the trial.

Staff Sergeant Derochie had read the transcript of the preliminary hearing at which Constable Dunlop had testified and the defence counsel's disclosure request, and he thought there might be perjury. As Staff Sergeant Derochie inscribed in his notes of October 6, 1999, "I believe that he may have committed perjury and that he was obstructing justice by not making full and complete disclosure of notes and other evidence."

Staff Sergeant Derochie decided to seek the opinion of a Crown lawyer regarding Perry Dunlop's conduct. He was concerned about the "optics" of the Cornwall Police Service rather than an external police force conducting an investigation of Constable Dunlop in these historical sexual assault cases. As Staff Sergeant Derochie said at the hearings:

I wanted to get the opinion of a Crown on how I should proceed. These were, as we both agreed, unusual circumstances.

There had also been some concerns expressed to us that whatever we did, if we decided to go down this route, that it may—we should not investigate it ourselves, that we should seek a referral to another police department to do that. That it would be viewed—the optics of it wouldn't be good if we were doing the investigation on Perry Dunlop given our history with him.

Staff Sergeant Derochie contacted Mr. Marc Garson, Director of Crown Operations, West Region. In his notes, Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote, "reason for meeting is to get his opinion on how we, CPS, should begin the invest. into Dunlop's involvement with the Lalonde matter, and to express our concerns about the impact Dunlop is having on Project Truth."

Staff Sergeant Derochie met with Mr. Garson on October 29, 1999, and in a letter on November 19, 1999, the Crown lawyer set out his legal opinion. He made it clear that Constable Perry Dunlop was not part of the investigation team responsible for the prosecution of Marcel Lalonde. Despite repeated instruction by the CPS, Constable Dunlop continued to communicate with complainants and to speak publicly about the Lalonde investigation. Mr. Garson also discussed the testimony of Perry Dunlop at the preliminary inquiry of Marcel Lalonde in January 1998, in which Constable Dunlop under oath told the court that he had turned over all his notes in his investigation to the police. Yet this was not the case. Mr. Garson discussed the constitutional obligation of the Crown to make full disclosure and the accused's right to make full answer and defence under section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. He advised the officer responsible for the Lalonde investigation to meet with Perry Dunlop and to instruct him to hand over all his material connected to the Lalonde matter. If he failed to comply, judicial review before a judge should follow. Mr. Garson was clearly concerned about the impact of Mr. Dunlop's behaviour:

As Constable Dunlop is neither an investigating officer nor a witness to this proceeding, it is our view that his continued involvement in interviewing witnesses, seeking out additional information and discussing the case in a public forum while it remains pending before the courts, may result in undue harm to the due and proper administration of justice.

Mr. Garson also made it clear that an external police agency, not the Cornwall Police Service, should conduct a criminal investigation into the Dunlop matter regarding the "apparent inconsistency" between Perry Dunlop's evidence at the preliminary inquiry and the "subsequent disclosed materials":²²

You have also brought to our attention the apparent inconsistency between the testimony of Constable Dunlop at the preliminary hearing in January 1998 and the subsequent disclosed materials provided from the request. Our preliminary observation in this matter is that it would be a potential conflict for your police service to commence any form of criminal investigation into this matter given the history of events that have occurred. Accordingly, should you decide that this issue merits such investigation, we would recommend that you contact an external policing agency to conduct same.

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie Meets With Cornwall Police Chief and the OPP: Ottawa Police Contacted

After receiving the Crown's letter, Staff Sergeant Derochie had a meeting with Chief Anthony Repa on November 26, 1999.

Staff Sergeant Derochie told Chief Repa that, in his view, Constable Dunlop may have misled the court and given perjured evidence at the Lalonde preliminary inquiry. In the officer's view, this warranted an investigation. Furthermore,

22. Note that Mr. Garson said that it was not within the Crown's mandate to give advice regarding the action to be taken by the police service in dealing with Constable Dunlop: "You have requested our advice on the action that should be taken by the police service in dealing with the conduct of Constable Dunlop. It is not within our mandate to advise the police on issuing orders or directives to officers nor is it appropriate for us to comment on the applicability of the Police Services Act to the specific conduct of an individual officer. Our opinions are limited to legal advice on issues pertaining to the criminal investigations and prosecution of persons charged with an offence."

there was also evidence to suggest that Constable Dunlop “may have conducted himself in a similar manner during the Charles MacDonald preliminary hearing in Ottawa.” Staff Sergeant Derochie recommended that an external police force investigate the possible criminal conduct of Constable Dunlop. He stated that Constable Dunlop had named as defendants in a civil action the Cornwall Police Service and several senior police officers. He was concerned there could be a potential conflict of interest if the CPS conducted the criminal investigation. Chief Repa agreed with the recommendations of Staff Sergeant Derochie.

In a meeting with Chief Repa, OPP Inspector Pat Hall, and Staff Sergeant Derochie, the purported concerns of Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier regarding Constable Dunlop’s testimony in the Father Charles MacDonald preliminary inquiry in late 1997 were also discussed. The charges and criminal prosecution involving Father Charles MacDonald are described in the following chapters in this Report.

In discussions with Chief Repa, Staff Sergeant Derochie raised the misconduct of Constable Dunlop in breach of the Police Services Act. Constable Dunlop was disobeying Inspector Trew’s 1997 order²³ and he continued to meddle in criminal investigations in which he had no official role.

In December 1999, Chief Repa asked Chief Brian Ford of the Ottawa-Carleton Regional Police Service to investigate Constable Dunlop on the following two issues:

1. The first matter involves the apparent inconsistency between the testimony of P.C. Dunlop at a preliminary hearing held in Cornwall in January 1998 and written material which was subsequently disclosed to the Crown Attorney.
2. The second matter relates to information received from OPP Detective Inspector Pat Hall, lead investigator for Project Truth. It is his information that Ottawa Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier has concerns relative to P.C. Dunlop’s conduct at a preliminary hearing which was held in Ottawa late in 1997 or early 1998.²⁴

In July 2000, Chief Repa received a letter from Sergeant Rolland Lalonde of the Ottawa-Carleton Regional Police Service. After the investigation of Constable Dunlop had been completed, it was concluded that there was no reasonable

23. Inspector Trew had ordered Perry Dunlop to disclose to the OPP his notes, tapes, statements, and other information on the alleged victims of sexual assaults. This is discussed further in this Report.

24. Crown Attorney Pelletier’s concerns about Constable Dunlop will be discussed in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

prospect of conviction of Constable Perry Dunlop for perjury. Sergeant Lalonde indicated in the letter that Crown Marc Garson had said that “to prove perjury would be extremely difficult due to recent case laws on corroboration and we would have to prove Dunlop’s intention to mislead the court. It is Mr. Garson’s opinion that there was no reasonable prospect of conviction.” Criminal charges, therefore, were not laid against Perry Dunlop.

Staff Sergeant Derochie’s Orders to Constable Perry Dunlop in January 2000

On January 10, 2000, Staff Sergeant Derochie, after consulting the Crown and CPS legal counsel, issued orders to Constable Dunlop on disclosure of all evidence in his possession related to the Marcel Lalonde investigation conducted by OPP Project Truth, the CPS, or other police agencies. There were prohibitions on communicating with any victim or witness in the Lalonde criminal proceedings, as well as with the media and the public:

1. You shall disclose to Assistant Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm any and all evidence in your possession that in any way relates to the Marcel Lalonde investigation, including but not limited to any notes, documents, statements, reports, photographs, video/audiotapes that you have made or received and computer printouts of all information recorded on computer hard drive or disc that you have access to or may have used. Your disclosure will include a will say statement detailing all meetings with complainants, witnesses and any other involvement you may have had in this prosecution.
2. You shall disclose to OPP Project Truth or any other investigating police agency, including the Cornwall Police Service, any and all evidence in your possession that in any way relates to allegations of sexual abuse that is or may be investigated by such police agency. Evidence referred to in this order includes but is not limited to any notes, documents, statements, reports, photographs, and/or video/audio tapes you may have made or received and computer printouts of all information recorded on computer hard drive or disc that you have access to or may have used. Your disclosure will include a detailed will say statement describing all meetings with complainants, witnesses and any other involvement you may have had in those investigations.
3. You shall not communicate directly or indirectly with any victim or witness to the Marcel Lalonde criminal proceeding, any Project Truth or other similar criminal proceeding to which you are or may be named as a witness. If you are contacted by any victim or witness in any of the above prosecutions, you will not discuss the case, you will make detailed notes of such contacts in your duty notebook and you will forthwith disclose, to the officers in charge of the case in question, any such contacts. For the purpose of these orders, the officers in charge are, for Project Truth—Detective Inspector Pat Hall of the Ontario Provincial Police and for all others, Acting Inspector Richard Carter of the Cornwall Police Service.

4. You shall not communicate directly or indirectly with any member of the public or the media regarding the subject matter of this order or your involvement in any criminal proceedings. You remain subject to the provision contained in Cornwall Police Service Directive Number 59, Media Release and News Release Policy.
5. You shall cease and desist from investigating any criminal activity that may be the subject matter of the OPP Project Truth investigation while on or off-duty. Any complaints brought by an individual to your attention shall be transferred forthwith to OPP Project Truth. Where the jurisdiction of Project Truth is inapplicable, an OMPPAC incident shall be created, a report submitted to the Cornwall Police Service and direction sought from your supervisor regarding your continued involvement. You shall make detailed notes, of all such contacts and referrals, in your duty notebook.
6. Effective on the issuance of these new orders, all previous orders issued to you relative to these matters are hereby rescinded and you will be subject to these new orders until advised otherwise.

Constable Dunlop was required to sign this document, which he did on January 17, 2000.

This was the first and only time in his police career that Staff Sergeant Derochie had issued orders of this nature.

Everything was unique about this. The whole—I've never run into anything like this in my entire career, starting from 1993 onwards.

This was a—this is a unique, unique situation. You shouldn't have to order police officers to provide disclosure. You certainly shouldn't have to order them in writing to provide disclosure; that's part of their basic duties.

After this order, Constable Dunlop began to provide disclosure of documents to Staff Sergeant Derochie. Material of relevance to the Lalonde investigation was sent to Constable Desrosiers. Constable Dunlop also told Staff Sergeant

Derochie that his lawyer at that time, Charles Bourgeois, had tapes and other material. Staff Sergeant Derochie's notes of February 29, 2000, say: "Bourgeois may well have evidence relative to this matter. Bourgeois would also have been involved with [C-8]."

Constable Desrosiers tried to obtain the videotape of C-8's interview with Perry Dunlop from his lawyer, Charles Bourgeois. He spoke with Mr. Bourgeois in mid-May 2000 and asked him to notify the CPS Constable if he had the tapes. Constable Desrosiers never heard from Mr. Bourgeois. Constable Desrosiers called Mr. Dunlop's home in July 2000 and asked his wife, Helen, if Perry Dunlop would meet him to discuss the videotape. Ms Dunlop asked the Constable to wait on the phone while she discussed this issue with Perry. She then told the CPS Constable that any inquiries should be directed to Mr. Dunlop's lawyer Howard Yegendorf.

C-8 Discloses Before Lalonde Trial That Abuse on School Trip Never Happened

Shortly before the Lalonde trial, Constable Desrosiers and Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm met with C-8 to prepare him for trial, scheduled for September 11, 2000. C-8 was visibly distraught when he appeared for the September 7, 2000, meeting. Richard Nadeau had contacted C-8 as he wanted to put C-8's statement on his website. Mr. Nadeau had also asked C-8 if he would participate in a class action lawsuit. C-8 made it clear that he did not want his statement on the website. The Crown agreed to conduct some research on this issue.

And then, to their surprise, C-8 informed Constable Desrosiers and the Crown attorney that alleged abuse on a school trip in Toronto had never happened. In a statement to the police, C-8 had alleged that Mr. Lalonde had sexually abused him on a trip to Toronto and he had given this evidence at the Lalonde preliminary inquiry. The Crown instructed Constable Desrosiers to take a statement of this new information, and she left the room.

When Constable Desrosiers took the statement, he asked C-8 whether Constable Dunlop had influenced him when C-8 filed his 1997 statement with the police. C-8 replied that Perry Dunlop had typed out his statement. He also said that the story had been concocted in order "to add fuel to the fire":

... Marcel wanted me to just be a shaperone [sic] for the trip, and nothing happened at the school trip with Marcel, things only happened on the boat and when it first started at the house. Perry had told me that if anything happened at the school, they had a lot of money and that I could sue them. (Emphasis added)

Constable Desrosiers asked the complainant whether he had fabricated any of the other allegations. C-8 assured the officer that all the other incidents with Marcel Lalonde had taken place. Constable Desrosiers met with the Crown, and the statement was disclosed to the defence. He then briefed Sergeant Garry Lefebvre about the disclosure, and perjury charges against C-8 were contemplated but not pursued.

When the Crown and Constable Desrosiers subsequently met with C-8, the complainant told them that he wanted to take the stand, tell his story, and speak the truth. C-8 also mentioned that Perry Dunlop had contacted him from British Columbia and had left a message with a phone number. Perry Dunlop had left the Cornwall Police Service in June 2000 and had moved with his family to British Columbia. Constable Desrosiers was concerned that Mr. Dunlop was contacting a complainant.

When Constable Desrosiers spoke to C-8 on the telephone later that day, C-8 was very upset as Mr. Nadeau had threatened to place on his website, within the hour, information about C-8's smuggling operation on his boat. C-8 said he wanted to make an official complaint to the police concerning the Nadeau call. The CPS contacted the OPP.

The Conviction of Marcel Lalonde

The Lalonde trial took place in September 2000. C-57 testified at the trial. Constable Desrosiers also gave evidence. Marcel Lalonde was convicted on November 17, 2000, on charges regarding four complainants—C-45, C-8, C-66, and another individual—and was acquitted of charges in relation to three complainants. It is noteworthy that despite C-8's recantation of a past complaint, the trial judge accepted C-8's evidence regarding the abuse by Mr. Lalonde. Madam Justice Métivier held that C-8's "testimony at trial [was] internally coherent and supported by the evidence of Mr. Lalonde himself." She further stated that she accepted C-8's "evidence at trial notwithstanding his additional, but now, withdrawn, evidence at the preliminary and that given in earlier statements. I find that the Crown has proven beyond a reasonable doubt the charges in count seven and eight, and I find Mr. Lalonde guilty as charged."

The Lalonde investigation by Project Truth and the trial are discussed in the chapters on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police and the Ministry of the Attorney General.

It is clear from my review of the investigation of Marcel Lalonde that Cornwall police officers in this and several other investigations did not have information on earlier work that the police force had conducted on the case, such as previous interviews with witnesses and alleged victims of the perpetrator. Either the information was not properly recorded or it was not placed onto systems from which it would have been retrievable by other officers. Moreover, officers failed to access OMPPAC when it was introduced in 1989, or other electronic databases such as CPIC, to determine whether other police forces had information on the alleged perpetrator of historical child sexual abuse. It is critical that the Cornwall Police Service institute measures to ensure that police officers record their notes of these cases on electronic systems such as OMPPAC to ensure that other officers who become involved with a case have easy access to the history of the investigation.

Another serious problem in the Lalonde investigation was that there was a failure to share information and failure to notify other institutions such as the Children's Aid Society and the School Board in order to protect other children and students at risk of abuse by the alleged perpetrator.

It is also evident that Constable Kevin Malloy was not adequately supervised by Staff Sergeant Brendon Wells and the Cornwall Police Service during the Lalonde investigation. Moreover, the Cornwall Police Service did not properly train officers such as Constable Malloy on the conduct of investigations into sexual abuse, and in particular historical child sexual abuse. As mentioned, the Cornwall Police Service also failed to institute and apply proper practices to ensure cooperation with and notification to other public institutions, including the School Board and Children's Aid Society in the context of this historical sexual abuse investigation of teacher Marcel Lalonde. The Cornwall Police Service also did not enforce practices and procedures that would have ensured that notes and records were properly kept and stored and that they were retrievable by other officers involved in the Lalonde investigation.

I discuss in further detail the failure of the Cornwall Police Service to ensure that Perry Dunlop complied with his obligations and duties as a police officer and as a member of the Cornwall Police Service, which included the duty to disclose information relevant to criminal investigations, the duty to provide truthful evidence in criminal proceedings, and the duty not to conduct unauthorized criminal investigations.

The Jeannette Antoine Investigation

Jeannette Marie Antoine was born in 1960. At the age of one and a half, she was removed from her natural parents by the Children's Aid Society (CAS). She became a Crown ward in 1964. Jeannette Antoine was moved from one foster home to another during her childhood. Shortly before her fifteenth birthday, in 1975, she was placed in a CAS group home on 220 Second Street West in Cornwall.

In March 1976, Jeannette Antoine and the five other residents in the group home ran away. They contacted the CAS and spoke to officials about their treatment at the Second Street group home. Jeannette Antoine alleged that she and other residents of the group home had been abused. As I discuss in greater detail in the chapter on the Children's Aid Society, there is no mention of allegations of sexual misconduct, only of physical abuse, in the 1976 CAS files. All but one of the staff involved with the Second Street group home tendered their resignations over a dispute regarding the extent to which physical force should be used, if at all, to discipline children in care. Bryan Keough remained employed by the Children's Aid Society.

The 1989 Complaint and the Involvement of CPS

In 1989, Jeannette Antoine came to the attention of the Children's Aid Society. There were allegations at that time, which the CAS later found to be unsubstantiated, that Ms Antoine had physically assaulted her nine-year-old daughter. During the course of the CAS investigation, Jeannette Antoine discussed with CAS caseworkers Greg Bell and Suzie Robinson the abuse she had sustained at the Second Street group home when she was a child. She described not only the physical abuse but also the sexual acts of staff members at the group home. Ms Antoine was not satisfied with the outcome of this matter in the mid-1970s and, in particular, that Bryan Keough continued to be an employee of the Children's Aid Society. Ms Antoine's concerns were brought to the attention of the executive director of the CAS, Mr. Tom O'Brien, who decided to turn the matter over to the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) to investigate.

The CAS Executive Director Meets With CPS and the Crown

At the request of CAS Executive Director Tom O'Brien, a meeting was convened with the Cornwall Police Service to discuss the Jeannette Antoine allegations. On September 25, 1989, Mr. O'Brien met with Deputy Police Chief Joseph St. Denis, Inspector Richard Trew, and Crown Attorney Don Johnson. The CAS executive director outlined the events of 1975–1976 in the Second Street group home. No instances of sexual molestation were discussed. It was decided at this meeting, held in the Crown's office, that the matter had been adequately dealt with and that there was no need for the involvement of Cornwall police. As Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie commented in a 1995 report on the Antoine file, "There appeared to be reluctance by both the police and the Crown Attorney to investigate this matter when it surfaced in 1989."

Mr. O'Brien arranged a second meeting with the Cornwall police for September 29, 1989, as he wanted to discuss the allegations of inappropriate sexual behaviour in the group home. This information had been obtained by caseworker Suzie Robinson as a result of her discussions with Jeannette Antoine the previous month, in August 1989. Mr. O'Brien sought the permission of the CAS Board of Directors to give the 1975–1976 documents on Jeannette Antoine and the Second Street group home to the police.

The second meeting with the Cornwall police was held in the office of Deputy Chief St. Denis. Present at the meeting were Mr. O'Brien, Staff Sergeant Brendon Wells, Deputy Chief St. Denis, and possibly Inspector Trew. The CAS documents were given to the police and the allegations of sexual molestation in the group home were discussed.

Mr. O'Brien, who was nearing retirement, was anxious to have the CPS investigation of the Jeannette Antoine matter completed in an expeditious manner. He wanted the matter resolved before his successor, Richard Abell, assumed the position of executive director of the Children's Aid Society.

Constable Kevin Malloy Assigned the Antoine Investigation

Constable Kevin Malloy's initial contact with Jeannette Antoine was in the context of other allegations surrounding her daughter in 1989. There had been an allegation that her child had been sexually molested by a family acquaintance. It was at the conclusion of that investigation that Greg Bell, a CAS social worker, asked Ms Antoine to share with Constable Malloy her childhood experience at the group home on Second Street. At this September 1989 meeting, Jeannette Antoine discussed the abuse she had sustained while in the care of the CAS at this group home. Constable Malloy told Ms Antoine that if she wanted to pursue the matter criminally, he would need a written statement and she should contact him. A few days later, after CAS Executive Director Tom O'Brien had his two meetings with the Cornwall police discussed above, Constable Malloy was assigned by his supervisors, Staff Sergeant Wells and Inspector Trew, the investigation of the allegations of abuse at the Second Street home.

Constable Malloy considered Jeannette Antoine "less than cooperative." He had asked the complainant for a written statement, "but it was not forthcoming." The Constable did not appear to have an understanding of the difficulties involved for a victim of childhood sexual abuse to write a statement. This was in large part attributable to the fact that Constable Malloy had no training in historical sexual abuse cases or in sexual assault generally. Constable Malloy explained, "There's other investigations that have to take place also, so I just left it with her in the hopes she was going to call me or show up." The CPS Constable took the position that "he had plenty of victims who were cooperating and he could not afford to be running after Antoine," wrote Staff Sergeant Derochie in his review of this investigation in the mid-1990s. This case was historical: allegations of abuse in 1975–1976. In Constable Malloy's view, "he had cases in which victims were in immediate danger and thus justified his inattention to Antoine's complaint." As I discuss in fuller detail, Staff Sergeant Derochie conducted a review of the Antoine investigation in 1994 at the request of Deputy Chief St. Denis.

A critical problem from the inception of the Antoine investigation was the lack of documentation by Constable Malloy. As Staff Sergeant Derochie commented in his report, Constable Malloy “did not keep proper notes of his involvement in this matter”:

The complaint was never registered on OMPPAC, no incident report was ever created, and reports were not submitted. (Emphasis added)

Constable Malloy was well aware of the importance of registering complaints on the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC). Even though OMPPAC was new at the time,²⁵ Constable Malloy and other officers in the Cornwall Police Service understood that each new investigation was required to be registered with an incident report on the OMPPAC system. As Constable Malloy acknowledged at the hearings, “It was my responsibility to put a report on it.” The Cornwall police officer understood that documenting the Antoine case and registering it on OMPPAC enabled other officers at the CPS, including his supervisors, to track the progress of the investigation. It also alerted other police forces, municipal and provincial, that this investigation was taking place in Cornwall.

As I discuss later in this section, when other Cornwall police officers subsequently became involved in the Antoine case in 1994, they would have had access to information on the file such as persons interviewed by Constable Malloy in the 1989 investigation. Particularly because this was a historical sexual assault case allegedly committed in 1975, it was important that a comprehensive written record exist, as people’s memories fade over time and witnesses may die or move out of the province or country. Had Constable Malloy properly documented this case and registered it on OMPPAC, CPS Constable Shawn White and other police officers involved in the Antoine case in later years would have had the information from 1989 to pursue the Antoine investigation.

CPS Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet agreed that registering the matter on OMPPAC is important for both supervision of the file at the first level and management at the second level such as by the deputy chief. By not using OMPPAC, he said, information is denied to other members of the police force such as those supervising an investigation. Staff Sergeant Brunet also acknowledged that registering on OMPPAC is important for historical sexual abuse cases in which perpetrators may have multiple victims in several jurisdictions. Registering on OMPPAC enables other police forces to obtain critical information on the case.

Staff Sergeant Derochie described the failure to register the Antoine matter on OMPPAC as the “ultimate mistake.” He stated that not only did Constable Malloy

25. OMPPAC came online in July 1989.

“not create an OMPPAC incident for the complaint” but he had “no notes indicating that he is investigating the allegations.” As Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie wrote in his report:

Nothing is reported in his notebook until February 5th, 1990, at which time he indicates that Ms. Antoine has provided a statement and that she has been interviewed. His notes on this day end abruptly and a blank space appears in his notebook, which is inconsistent with his normal note keeping. There is no further mention of this investigation in his notes.

Although, according to notes made by the Director of C.A.S. to the effect that he was in contact with Malloy on this matter, Malloy makes no such notations. The C.A.S. Director also notes that he is attempting to get this matter dealt with and infers that police are dragging their feet. (Emphasis added)

Constable Malloy’s supervisors were Staff Sergeant Brendon Wells and Inspector Richard Trew. Staff Sergeant Wells was his direct supervisor, and Inspector Trew was the officer responsible for the Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB). Unfortunately, Staff Sergeant Wells was on leave for part of October 1989. He underwent surgery in November 1989 and was on leave until June 1990. Inspector Trew reported to the Deputy Chief, who in turn reported to the Chief of the Cornwall Police Service; this was the chain of command.

Staff Sergeant Wells expected Constable Malloy to submit proper reports and to generate an OMPPAC incident number as soon as he had interviewed the alleged victim. Inspector Trew agreed that not registering this matter on OMPPAC was significant and that the Antoine case fell through the cracks. As Staff Sergeant Derochie emphasized, it is “critical ... to record all complaints on OMPPAC immediately.” This would have ensured that if there were personnel changes within the police force as a result of illness, accidents, or transfers, the police officers who replaced the investigating officers were able to access information on the status of the Antoine matter. Chief Claude Shaver also agreed that the Antoine complaint should have been registered on OMPPAC, the investigating officer should have made detailed notes of his involvement in this matter, and reports should have been submitted.

There was clearly a lack of supervision of Constable Malloy by senior officers at the Cornwall Police Service. As Staff Sergeant Derochie said, Constable “Malloy’s supervisors, all the way up the chain of command, had knowledge of the investigation.” However, no senior officer appears to have noticed that an incident report had not been created on OMPPAC, and none of the senior officers seemed to have asked Constable Malloy for reports on the Antoine matter. In fact, Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote, "It could be suggested that Senior Management of the Service showed no interest in the investigation." Yet, he said, "you have Ms Antoine making allegations that go to the very heart of what the CPS is all about ... [I]t's an important investigation"; "No one appears to have realized that the allegations were very serious." Deputy Chief St. Denis stated that he relied on Inspector Trew to supervise Constable Malloy and to follow the progress of the Antoine case.

Staff Sergeant Derochie stated that Constable Malloy was carrying a considerable caseload at the time. In his view, given the importance of the Antoine complaint, he should not have been assigned other cases.

The CAS executive director, Mr. O'Brien, contacted the Cornwall police several times in 1989 to obtain information on the progress of the Antoine matter. In a telephone call with Mr. O'Brien in mid-December 1989, Constable Malloy told the executive director that Jeannette Antoine was not cooperating, as she had not provided a statement to the police. In his view, there did not appear to be a real complaint. Constable Malloy planned to close the case after consultation with the Crown attorney. Again, Constable Malloy demonstrated that he had inadequate knowledge, due to his lack of training, of victims of childhood abuse.

Four-Month Delay in the Antoine Case

The Antoine case remained inactive for four months. On February 5, 1990, Jeannette Antoine arrived at the Cornwall police station with a handwritten statement. Constable Malloy stated that he was surprised by her visit.

Constable Malloy interviewed Ms Antoine, who appeared to him to be predominantly concerned about the physical abuse allegedly committed by CAS worker Bryan Keough. Even though Ms Antoine stated that she had been sexually abused by CAS workers when she lived in the group home on Second Street, she seemed to Constable Malloy to be interested in pursuing only the allegation of physical abuse. In Constable Malloy's notes of the February 5, 1990, interview, he wrote: "I asked [for] more details in the sexual grabbing or rubbing and she stated 'Well, I'm really only mad about the beatings.'" Constable Malloy testified that he had difficulty dealing with this complainant and that her story appeared to be "helter-skelter" and lacked coherence. He acknowledged at the hearings that some of the difficulties he encountered with Ms Antoine may have been attributable to the emotional and psychological impact of a victim of sexual abuse. Moreover, Ms Antoine may also have been uncomfortable speaking with a male police officer about the sexual acts. In fact, in the CPS reinvestigation of the Jeannette Antoine allegations in 1994, Constable Heidi Sebalj was present with Constable Shawn White for some of the interviews with the complainant, as Ms Antoine was uncomfortable discussing the details of the abuse with a male officer.

Constable Malloy did not pursue the sexual allegations made by the complainant. Rather, he made the assumption that Ms Antoine did not want to proceed with the sexual acts allegedly perpetrated by staff in the CAS group home.

Nor did Constable Malloy interview or try to locate the victims/witnesses named in Ms Antoine's statement. For example, Ms Antoine suggested there was inappropriate sexual behaviour between a fellow resident, C-85, and Bryan Keough. Yet Constable Malloy made no attempts to find C-85 to ask her about some of the allegations in Ms Antoine's statement. At the hearings, the CPS Constable responsible for the Antoine investigation could not explain why he failed to interview other potential witnesses.

Another problem in the investigation was that Constable Malloy never interviewed Bryan Keough, whom Jeannette Antoine alleged had engaged in sexual behaviour with children at the CAS-operated home. This was even though Constable Malloy knew that Mr. Keough remained an employee of the CAS at that time. Of significance was that in January 1990 the CAS was considering Bryan Keough's application "to be a foster parent with a view to adopting a specific child." This is further discussed in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society.

Between February 5, 1990, when Constable Malloy received Ms Antoine's statement, and April 4, 1990, when the local Crown sent correspondence to the regional Crown, the CPS Constable did not bother to ask either Jeannette Antoine or the CAS for the names and addresses of others residents at the Second Street group home.

The executive director of the CAS, as mentioned, was very interested in finding out how the Antoine case was progressing. Mr. O'Brien made several calls to Constable Malloy and he also contacted Deputy Chief St. Denis to find out the status of the police investigation. He knew that Ms Antoine was concerned that Bryan Keough remained on staff at the CAS. Ms Antoine had told Mr. O'Brien on August 23, 1989, about the abuse at the Second Street group home, which included harsh corporal punishment and sexual assault. Mr. O'Brien's notes of February 7, 1990, state:

The Executive Director has made several calls to Det. Malloy and one to the Deputy Chief to learn the present status of this case. Today Kevin Malloy advised me by telephone that they have not sufficient evidence on which the police could proceed, and that by telephone the Crown

Attorney had agreed with the police decision. Det. Malloy has advised Jeannette that she might be able to proceed with a civil action but she did not indicate whether or not she would do so. Her main concern seems to be that the Agency has kept Bryan on staff even after everyone agreed that the harsh corporal punishment had been meted out.

Det. Malloy is to meet with the Crown Attorney to go over the evidence in the case and expects to be advised in writing of the Crown's agreement that no further action is necessary. (Emphasis added)

Constable Malloy told CAS Executive Director Tom O'Brien that "there is nothing to proceed with but I'm waiting for an answer back from the Crown." Constable Malloy testified that he did not pursue the Antoine investigation because he had difficulty "extracting the story" from the complainant, he initially had trouble getting her to come to the police station to meet him, and he had "credibility issues" with the complainant. He also said that Ms Antoine did not appear interested in pursuing the allegations of sexual abuse at the CAS-operated group home.

Yet the Constable did not take measures to pursue these allegations of sexual molestation by interviewing other potential victims or witnesses or by creating a situation in which Ms Antoine would have been more at ease in providing further details on the alleged abuse. For example, suggesting that Ms Antoine recount the allegations of sexual molestation to a female officer might have enabled the complainant to provide the Cornwall police with important information. In his view, there were not reasonable and probable grounds to lay a criminal charge for the physical abuse. He considered it corporal punishment.

The CPS officer also asserted that if the corporal punishment had crossed the line into a common assault, there was a six-month limitation period to lay the charge for the summary conviction offence—a further obstacle. But Constable Malloy acknowledged at the hearings that if Jeannette Antoine had sustained bodily harm from these physical acts, he could have proceeded by way of indictment and the six-month limitation period would not have presented a problem for the prosecution. Ms Antoine told the CAS in August 1989 that Mr. Bryan Keough had beaten her and hurt her arm when she was at the Second Street group home. The limitation period may not, in fact, have been an obstacle with respect to laying criminal charges against CAS staff workers.

Constable Malloy decided to seek the advice of the local Crown attorney, Don Johnson. After discussions, Mr. Johnson decided to contact Mr. Norman Douglas, Regional Director of Crown Attorneys, Eastern Region.

Crown Correspondence

Cornwall Crown Attorney Don Johnson wrote a letter on April 4, 1990, to Norman Douglas, Regional Director of Crown Attorneys, Eastern Region, regarding the Jeannette Antoine case. This letter, copied to both Constable Malloy and Chief Shaver, said:

Although there appears to be some factual basis for a further investigation, I cannot find any indication of specific dates when the alleged incident occurred, or any names and addressed [sic] of any witness whom [sic] may substantiate the allegations.

Mr. Johnson explained to Mr. Douglas that he was sending this letter “because of the climate with respect to alleged child abuse cases from the past which seem to be on the upswing.” Crown Attorney Johnson stated that he had “not brought up the matter of laying charges with the Cornwall Police as names and dates are not available.”

Constable Malloy agreed in his evidence that if he had contacted the CAS to obtain information on the residents of the Second Street home mentioned in Jeannette Antoine’s statement, this may have advanced the CPS investigation. As Constable Malloy conceded, it was “[o]ne of the things I could have done.” And, he acknowledged, perhaps it would have resulted in the laying of criminal charges in 1989 or 1990.

The regional Crown responded to Mr. Johnson’s correspondence a few days later, on April 10, 1990. Mr. Douglas agreed that the police should be cautious with such allegations of child abuse and should investigate this case. Mr. Douglas suggested that Constable Malloy probe deeper and obtain more details on the Jeannette Antoine allegations:

RE: Children’s Aid Society—Cornwall Allegations of Abuse

Thank you for your letter of April 4, 1990.

You are quite correct that we ought to be very careful on these matters, and have the police investigate every allegation of abuse. I would like you to make sure the police begin an investigation if they already have not done so. Perhaps Cst. Malloy can dig a little deeper to secure specifics. (Emphasis added)

Thank you for keeping me advised.

Yours very truly,

Norman S. Douglas, Q.C.
Director of Crown Attorneys
Eastern Region

Constable Malloy claimed that he was unaware of this correspondence from the regional Crown, and that Don Johnson did not show him the April 10, 1990, letter or share this information with him. Constable Malloy stated that it was only during the internal investigation of the Antoine matter by Staff Sergeant Derochie in 1994 that he learned about the April 10, 1990, letter from Mr. Douglas to Mr. Johnson. Constable Malloy claimed that had he been alerted to this correspondence at that time, he would have pursued the Antoine investigation. Mr. Johnson testified that he had no recollection of seeing this letter. The Antoine matter is discussed further in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

No Further Activity on the Antoine File

The Cornwall Police Service did not pursue the Jeannette Antoine allegations of abuse. After the April 1990 correspondence, Constable Malloy did not spend any time on the Antoine investigation. As Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote in his report, “[T]here was no activity on this case after April 10th, 1990 by the Crown’s Office or by the Police Service.” Constable Malloy’s explanation was that he was waiting for contact from the Crown, which, he said, did not occur. He reiterated that he “had credibility issues” and “believed” only “parts” of Ms Antoine’s statement. Constable Malloy said he “believed in the corporal punishment and that was going on ... but nothing that could lead me to lay a charge.” The officer maintained that he did not know the CAS had closed the Second Street home nor that all the staff involved with the home, with the exception of Bryan Keough, had tendered their resignations because they refused to employ alternative forms of disciplining the children in that residence. The Antoine file remained in abeyance.

Jeannette Antoine had become exasperated with the lack of attention given to her case. She contacted the CAS in October 1991 and told Richard Abell that no one believed her, that the police had discouraged her from pursuing the matter, and that she planned to “go public” with her story. Mr. Abell encouraged Ms Antoine, in a letter dated October 29, 1991, to discuss her concerns with the Cornwall police. As Staff Sergeant Derochie stated in his report, “[T]he case again fell into a state of dormancy.”

Suzanne Lapointe, Antoine's Sister, Discloses to Constable Malloy Abuse When She Was a Ward of the CAS

In the summer of 1992, Suzanne Lapointe, Jeannette Antoine's sister, spoke to Constable Malloy about alleged sexual abuse by her foster father when she was a ward of the Children's Aid Society. At the time of this disclosure, Ms Lapointe lived in Winnipeg. Constable Malloy asked Ms Lapointe to send a written statement detailing her allegations. On February 19, 1993, Suzanne Lapointe wrote a letter to the Constable in which she identified the ages at which she had been sexually abused and the years when the abuse had occurred. She described some of the sexual acts committed by her foster father. She asked the police officer if the Cornwall Police could investigate the case:

I was sexually molested while in foster care. My foster father's name was/is Mr. Matt. The events took place between 1962–1964. I was a ward of the Children's Aid Society in Cornwall. (I was age 7(–9) years old.)

The foster father would take me to a farmhouse he owned, disrobe me, pose me, then masturbate in front of me. (other sexual details will be given upon request).

...

Is it possible to do some sort of investigation into the Children's Aid ... to see if complaints were registered? I know there is not a lot of things that can be done now after so many years ... but I am hoping you will do what ever is in your power.

I doubt if this man is still alive let alone looking after children ... who knows? I feel I need to pursue this ... to see if other adults have come forward to register complaints over the years ... I would like to add my name to theirs.

This is not a vindictive thing I am doing ... [O]ver the years I have dealt with the abuse ... [T]his is just another step in my healing.

I am anxiously awaiting your reply. (Emphasis added)

It is clear in this letter that Ms Lapointe was anxious to deal with the sexual abuse to help her heal from this childhood trauma.

Again, no report was filed by Constable Malloy and the letter was not entered on OMPPAC. As Staff Sergeant Derochie commented, “[T]he letter simply slip[ped] through the cracks.”

Constable Heidi Sebalj’s Contact With Jeannette Antoine

In an investigation on an unrelated matter, Constable Heidi Sebalj came into contact with Jeannette Antoine in July 1992.²⁶ At that time, Ms Antoine told Constable Sebalj about abuse by staff at the CAS-operated Second Street group home. Because Constable Malloy was responsible for this file, Constable Sebalj did not pursue this matter.

But over a year later, in November 1993, Constable Sebalj renewed discussions with Ms Antoine on the alleged abuse at the CAS group home. Constable Sebalj in 1993 had been involved with David Silmser’s allegations of historical sexual abuse against Father Charles MacDonald and probation officer Ken Seguin. On her own initiative, Constable Sebalj asked Ms Antoine to come to the police station for an interview. As I discuss further in Chapter 9, on the Children’s Aid Society, a CAS caseworker, Geraldine Fitzpatrick, who was present at this interview, seemed dissatisfied with the lack of attention to Ms Antoine’s allegations. Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote the following in his report:

Constable Sebalj’s interest in Antoine’s story resurfaces in November of 1993. On her own, Cst. Sebalj called Antoine into the police station and interviewed her. Also present in an unofficial capacity, and without the knowledge of the C.A.S., was Geraldine Fitzpatrick. Fitzpatrick is a C.A.S. Caseworker. Also playing a role in this matter was Carleen Cummings, a contract C.A.S. Worker, who was assisting Antoine in an official capacity. Cummings is believed to be sympathetic to Antoine’s cause and may not be happy with the way C.A.S. had dealt with this matter.

Constable Sebalj was not authorized by her superiors to conduct an investigation of the Antoine case. Moreover, Constable Sebalj failed to keep proper records and notes of her contacts with Ms Antoine. Staff Sergeant Brunet was surprised to learn that Constable Sebalj had conducted this interview with Ms Antoine; he would have expected the Constable to consult him and discuss the matter with him. Similarly, Staff Sergeant Derochie testified that he did not consider it appropriate in the circumstances for Constable Sebalj to investigate this matter. The Constable failed to record on OMPPAC in a timely manner her contacts and investigation of the Antoine allegations. This occurred only after the matter became public. As discussed in this Report, inadequate record keeping and poor documentation are some of the problems that characterized this and other CPS investigations on historical sexual abuse.

26. Note that Constable Heidi Sebalj did not testify at the Inquiry due to medical reasons.

Antoine Allegations in the Media: Deputy Chief Asks Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie to Review Investigation

In January 1994, Charlie Greenwell, a reporter, interviewed Ms Antoine for CJOH-TV, the local CTV station, on her allegations of historical abuse at the group home operated by the CAS. There was a broadcast on television.

Constable Malloy was not working at the Cornwall Police Service at this time due to medical reasons. He had been on leave since March 1993 as a result of back surgery.

At this time, Staff Sergeant Derochie had completed his review of the CPS investigation of the Silmsier matter and Perry Dunlop and the release of information to the CAS. On January 11, 1994, Deputy Chief St. Denis asked Staff Sergeant Derochie to conduct an internal investigation of the Antoine case. The Deputy Chief told Staff Sergeant Derochie in the briefing that this was another case of poor case management and inadequate documentation. Staff Sergeant Derochie's notes of the meeting also state:

... briefed by the D/C; Jeannette ANTOINE is alleging being abused while a ward of CAS. The allegations were reported to the authorities in 1989. Police investigated but nothing was done. She suspects that CAS and police investigator, who was sitting as a board member of CAS at the time, may have covered up the abuse.

Ms Antoine was alleging through the media that there was a cover-up of her complaint of physical and sexual abuse at a CAS group home because Constable Malloy was a member of the Board of Directors of the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry at the time of the CPS investigation.

Staff Sergeant Derochie, rather than Staff Sergeant Brunet, was selected to conduct this review as Staff Sergeant Brunet was also a member of the CAS Board. Staff Sergeant Derochie was instructed to:

1. have Ms. Antoine's allegations of assault thoroughly investigated, and if the evidence will support the laying of charges ... to resolve this matter in the Courts.

2. review the Cornwall Police Service's handling of Ms. Antoine's 1989 complaint and to make recommendations as to discipline and/or procedural changes to correct deficiencies in the manner in which we investigate historical sexual assaults.

He was asked to submit his report to Acting Chief Carl Johnston.

Staff Sergeant Derochie met with Constable Heidi Sebalj, Constable Kevin Malloy, and Jeannette Antoine in January 1994. Ms Antoine wanted the police to investigate the physical and sexual abuse she had suffered at the CAS group home on Second Street, the sexual abuse by her natural father, and the sexual abuse of her sister Suzanne Lapointe when she lived in a foster home. Ms Antoine asked whether Constable Heidi Sebalj could investigate these matters, as she felt comfortable with this officer. Constable Sebalj made it clear to Staff Sergeant Derochie that she was interested in this case.

Nevertheless, Staff Sergeant Derochie "didn't think it was appropriate" for Constable Sebalj to investigate the Antoine matter. He was "concerned about what was driving Constable Sebalj's motivations." He decided that Constable Shawn White, whom Staff Sergeant Derochie considered experienced, should investigate the case. In contrast to Constable Sebalj, Constable White did not have frequent dealings with CAS workers and, in the opinion of the Staff Sergeant, would bring the necessary objectivity to this case.

Ms Antoine seemed to be fearful of men and was comfortable with Constable Sebalj. A compromise was reached. Constable Sebalj would be present when Ms Antoine met with Constable White. Staff Sergeant Derochie assured Ms Antoine that this investigation would be given high priority and that Constable White would work on this case exclusively until it was completed. Constable White's investigation was to focus on both the physical and the sexual abuse allegations at the Second Street group home in Cornwall. The other two matters—the alleged abuse by her natural father at the time she lived at a group home in Minden and the alleged abuse of her sister Suzanne Lapointe in a foster home—were not the subject of the CPS investigation, stated Staff Sergeant Derochie, as they fell within OPP jurisdiction. The allegations made by Jeannette Antoine are further discussed in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society.

The Involvement of Constable White in the Antoine Case

Constable White, as mentioned, was asked to investigate the allegations of abuse that occurred at the Second Street group home. It was his initial understanding that the complaint was confined to physical abuse. He was aware that Constable Malloy had previously investigated this matter.

As discussed earlier, because Jeannette Antoine was uneasy discussing the abuse with males, Constable Heidi Sebalj was present at some of the interviews, including the first meeting on January 26, 1994. When Jeannette Antoine was interviewed in early February 1994 and her statement was taken, she disclosed only physical abuse at the Second Street group home.

Three people interviewed by Constable White had stated that Mr. John Primeau, a worker at the Second Street group home, had sexually assaulted former residents. In other words, in addition to Jeannette Antoine, other female residents at the group home stated that they had been sexually abused.

Constable White had a meeting with the regional Crown, Peter Griffiths, to examine these allegations on June 14, 1994. He discussed with Mr. Griffiths three incidents of sexual abuse. Constable White also told the Crown that he had received information regarding sexual abuse allegedly committed in other foster homes. He mentioned that there “may be problem in how compl[aints] of sexual abuse against employees of CAS and foster parent” were managed, and suggested that perhaps a protocol should be developed.

Constable White testified that he never had any discussions with Constable Sebalj about her previous involvement in the Jeannette Antoine matter. He did not discuss with Constable Sebalj the lengthy interview she and CAS employee Geraldine Fitzpatrick had with Ms Antoine in November 1993.

Ms Antoine had given multiple statements to the Cornwall police about her abuse when she was a ward of the Children’s Aid Society. She had given a statement to Constable Malloy in the earlier CPS investigation in 1989–1990, she had been interviewed by Constable Sebalj and Geraldine Fitzpatrick in November 1993, and Constable White had also taken a statement from Ms Antoine in 1994 in the CPS re-investigation of her allegations of abuse when she was a resident of the CAS-operated Second Street group home.

When Constable White met with Ian MacLean of the CAS in June 1994, the CAS official described Mr. Primeau as a “bad worker.” Mr. MacLean told the CPS Constable that Mr. Primeau would take the girls from the Second Street home alone to various locations, in spite of the fact that he had been instructed not to do so.

During the course of Constable White’s investigation, there were also complaints regarding a man named Derry Tenger concerning the treatment of children at the Second Street group home. Mr. Tenger was a former director of the Second Street group home. There were also allegations by a male who lived in Vancouver that he had been sexually abused by a farm worker at a farm-based foster home.²⁷ Allegations of sexual abuse at approximately six different

27. This is discussed in the chapter on the institutional response of the Children’s Aid Society.

CAS-operated homes²⁸ for children were made during the course of Constable White's investigation.

Constable White prepared a Crown brief, which he sent in September 1994 to the regional Crown, Peter Griffiths. He subsequently met with Mr. Griffiths and Mr. Murray MacDonald to discuss the Antoine file. An important document missing from the Crown brief was the statement from Jeannette Antoine to Constable Kevin Malloy. There were references to sexual abuse at the Second Street group home in that statement. When Ms Antoine provided her statement to Constable Malloy, she alleged that Bryan Keough had rubbed her breasts in the bedroom and that Mr. Keough had "talked dirty" to C-85, one of the girls who also lived in the group home. Constable White agreed that it is important to provide all relevant information to the Crown. This information should have been given to the Crown lawyers in their evaluation of whether reasonable and probable grounds existed in this case to lay a criminal charge against the alleged perpetrators of the abuse.

Constable White noticed that there were discrepancies between Jeannette Antoine's statement to Constable Malloy and the statement she provided in February 1994. Constable White did not use Jeannette Antoine's prior statement to refresh her memory when he took her statement in 1994. It is also important to note that a prior statement is significant in terms of challenging the credibility of a complainant and ought to have been included in the material sent to the Crown. Yet Constable White did not include the earlier statement in the Crown brief.

Constable White agreed that his supervisors, Inspector Trew and Staff Sergeant Derochie, had made it clear that all information gathered in the Antoine investigation was to be documented. The Constable was told that the information would be shared with the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), which would be examining allegations of sexual abuse in public institutions.

By October 1994, Constable White had completed the investigation. He met with Mr. Angelo Towndale, a CAS manager of human resources, and reviewed the historical allegations of sexual abuse in CAS foster homes. Constable White told Mr. Towndale that when CAS wards had alleged they had been sexually abused by their caregivers, these cases had not been reported to the police by the CAS. Mr. Towndale acknowledged that although this was the case in the 1970s and 1980s, the CAS had since made changes to its policies. Constable White also raised the issue of the process of selecting foster parents and individuals to work at CAS-operated group homes. Mr. Towndale stated that although the CAS did not in the past have policies for oversight of or appropriate discipline in group homes, the agency had since developed protocols and policies. He assured the CPS officer that there was currently much more oversight by the CAS.

28. For example, the Second Street, Laurencrest, Cumberland, and Skafte homes.

Constable White did not share with Mr. Towndale the information he had amassed on allegations against certain individuals at CAS-operated homes. The CPS Constable explained at the hearings that he was “guarded about not giving all the information of [his] investigation with Children’s Aid”:

At that particular point in October ’94 ... this whole idea about institutional sexual abuse was very much just starting to get investigated and ... the OPP were going to be initiating, probably, a bigger investigation so I was led to believe, at that particular time, dealing with institutional response to sexual abuse allegations.

However, some children in the Cornwall community may have been at risk of abuse by these alleged perpetrators. There is a duty to report reasonable suspicion of abuse to the Children’s Aid Society.

As mentioned, during the course of his investigation, Constable White spoke with former residents of the Second Street group home. These individuals, who were now adults, not only corroborated some of the information conveyed by Ms Antoine but moreover, provided details on abuse they themselves had suffered at this CAS-operated group home. For example, C-83 disclosed that she had been fondled and touched sexually by “John” when she was a resident of the Second Street group home. Constable White concluded that this individual was John Primeau. Constable White considered this woman to be credible and thought her statements about sexual abuse had veracity. It was evident to the CPS officer that this woman had been psychologically damaged by the abuse. C-83 also disclosed to Constable White that she had been sexually assaulted in another CAS foster home. She alleged that while she was living at the Skafté foster home in St. Andrews, the son of the foster parents had fondled her. Inscribed in Constable White’s notes is, “Still not sure if she wants to have the police pursue any of these things. She will consider the matter carefully before making any decision.” Constable White did not make contact with John Primeau. Mr. Primeau was never interviewed by the CPS officer.

Constable White spoke to C-84, who had been a resident with Ms Antoine at the Second Street group home. C-84 also alleged that he had been sexually abused at a group home in Iroquois and at a foster home in Cornwall. C-84 discussed sexual behaviour in the Cumberland Street home and also said that Mike Keough, Bryan Keough’s brother, had pushed him through a wall in the Second Street home.

C-85, another former resident of the Second Street group home, told Constable White in a telephone interview in early 1994 that she had been physically and sexually abused. The CPS officer considered her statement to be credible.

As will be discussed in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society, Lorraine, another of Ms Antoine's sisters, alleged that she had been sexually abused by her foster father. Constable White offered to put Lorraine in contact with the OPP.

Constable White also received serious allegations of abuse from C-86 regarding a worker at the Laurencrest home. C-86 told Constable White that when he was a CAS ward, a worker at Laurencrest had engaged in oral and anal intercourse with him. Constable White did not pursue these allegations with C-86.

It is clear that Constable White, in his investigation of the Jeannette Antoine matter at the Second Street group home, encountered other individuals who also alleged abuse at different homes operated by the CAS. He began to believe that the allegations were systemic, which concerned him.

No Criminal Charges Laid

Constable Shawn White had been asked by his supervisor, Staff Sergeant Brunet, to reinvestigate the complaint made in the late 1980s to the CPS by Jeannette Antoine. Constable White conducted this investigation, which began in January 1994, under the supervision of Staff Sergeant Derochie. During this re-investigation, which spanned January to October 1994, Constable White was able to identify all but one of the children who had lived in the Second Street home in the mid-1970s, who Ms Antoine said could corroborate the abuse at the home. Constable White prepared a brief and sought the legal opinion of the Crown.

In September 1994, Constable White sent regional Crown Peter Griffiths his investigation brief on the allegations of Jeannette Antoine. Mr. Griffiths was asked to give his opinion as to whether reasonable and probable grounds existed to lay criminal charges. Mr. Griffiths met with Constable White and Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald on October 19, 1994, to discuss his conclusions. In his letter of October 24, 1994, which I discuss in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General, Mr. Griffiths concluded that there were no reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges on any of the allegations. With respect to the physical abuse allegation, Mr. Griffiths stated that "[t]here was no outlasting physical injury as a result of any of these beatings beyond bruising" and that the limitation period was six months for the summary conviction offence of common assault. Regarding Ms Antoine's allegation of sexual abuse, Mr. Griffiths concluded:

Given the nature of this allegation, the age of the complaint and the lack of confirmatory evidence, it is my opinion that you do not have reasonable and probable grounds for the laying of any charges arising out of this complaint.

Moreover, the allegations of sexual misconduct of other residents of the Second Street home were, according to Mr. Griffiths, subject to the following “impediments”: (1) none of the victims wanted to make a formal complaint; and (2) the memories of the victims were “severely impaired.” Therefore, Mr. Griffiths concluded that there were no reasonable and probable grounds to warrant the laying of criminal charges with respect to any of the allegations and if, in fact, charges were laid, “there would be no reasonable prospect of conviction.”

Staff Sergeant Derochie sent a memo to Acting Chief Carl Johnston after reviewing Mr. Griffiths’ letter. He assured the Acting Chief that Constable White had conducted a thorough investigation and that both he and Constable White agreed that “it would be very difficult to successfully prosecute anyone in this matter.” In Staff Sergeant Derochie’s view, “Mr. Griffiths letter puts this matter to rest.” The Staff Sergeant informed the Acting Chief that Ms Antoine was instituting a civil action against the Children’s Aid Society and was also pursuing criminal charges with the OPP against her natural father.

No criminal charges were laid against staff at the Second Street group home for the allegations of physical and sexual abuse made by Jeannette Antoine.

Systemic Problems, Poor Case Management, Delays, Inadequate Record Keeping, and Poor Supervision

Staff Sergeant Derochie’s review of the Antoine investigation was completed and his report finalized in April 1995. Entitled “Report to Acting Chief Carl Johnston on the Media Allegations of Misconduct by the Cornwall Police Service in the 1989–90 Investigation of the Jeannette Antoine Complaint Against the Cornwall Children’s Aid Society,” the Report concluded that there was a systemic failure by the Cornwall police in the Antoine case. Staff Sergeant Derochie’s criticism was directed not only at the investigating officer, Constable Malloy, but also at the supervising officers, the Deputy Chief, and the Chief of Police.

The first and “most significant mistake,” stated Staff Sergeant Derochie, was “not creating an OMPPAC incident”:

It was clearly Cst. Malloy’s responsibility to record the complaint and thus generate an OMPPAC incident number. Had that been done, the OMPPAC system would have reminded Cst. Malloy and his supervisors that this investigation required attention. (Emphasis added)

In other words, the inaction on the Antoine complaint would have been identified by checks and balances built into the OMPPAC system.

He was also very critical of Constable Malloy's inadequate note taking:

The second mistake, and one that is inexcusable, is Cst. Malloy's failure to keep accurate notes of his involvement with this incident ... [N]ote keeping, particularly for C.I.B. investigators, is critical and can not be overstated. Cst. Malloy was, during this time in question, experienced enough to know that note keeping was very important. (Emphasis added)

Staff Sergeant Derochie also expressed general concern about the loose-leaf binders used by CPS officers to record notes. Pages from such notebooks could be lost or removed, he said, and these notebooks could be "challenged or be subject to suspicion." He stated that officers should be recording notes in bound notebooks. As I discuss in the context of other CPS investigations, this was a pervasive problem in this police force. Constable Malloy was informally counselled by Staff Sergeant Derochie for his failure to keep proper notes.

Staff Sergeant Derochie was also critical of Constable Malloy's supervisors, who ought to have ensured that the Antoine investigation was progressing: "They ought to have noticed that an incident had not been created and that reports were not being submitted." There should have been closer supervision of an officer's caseload and periodic inspections of notebooks. Constable Malloy had a considerable caseload at the time of the 1989–1990 Antoine complaint and in the Staff Sergeant's opinion, should not have been assigned other cases until he dealt with Ms Antoine's complaint. Constable Malloy's supervisors should have known that "this was an investigation of some consequence and had to be dealt with in a timely manner," concluded Staff Sergeant Derochie.

Another serious problem regarding supervision was that both Inspector Trew and Staff Sergeant Wells were absent from the CIB for significant periods beginning in October 1989 and into 1990. To exacerbate the matter, when Staff Inspector Stuart McDonald became the Officer in Charge of the CIB on January 1, 1990, he was not briefed on the Antoine complaint and had no knowledge that such an investigation was in fact being conducted. Staff Sergeant Derochie concluded that there was a lack of continuity of supervisors in the CIB as well as in other areas of the organization.

Criticism was also directed to the Chief and Deputy Chief of the Cornwall Police Service. Both the Chief and Deputy Chief had knowledge of the Antoine complaint but seemed to have "lost track of the complaint the minute it was turned over to Cst. Malloy." In Staff Sergeant Derochie's view, the Chief and

Deputy Chief “should have been kept informed on the progress of this investigation,” they “should have recognized the seriousness of the allegations,” and they should have “ensured that the investigation was proceeding expeditiously.” Clearly, the chain of command failed to monitor the progress of the investigation and, as Staff Sergeant Derochie acknowledged, the Antoine case fell through the cracks. Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote:

No one appeared to have recognized the sensitivity of the subject matter involved in these allegations, nor the potential consequences that an improper investigation might mean to the agencies involved.

Staff Sergeant Derochie questioned why the local Crown, Mr. Johnson, who believed the Antoine case had merit, sought the advice of the regional Crown as to whether charges should be laid. The problem became more serious, as the local Crown claimed he did not receive the April 10, 1990, response from the regional Crown. Neither the regional Crown nor the local Crown followed up on the Antoine case, wrote Staff Sergeant Derochie in his report.

In Staff Sergeant Derochie’s opinion, there was no cover-up in the CPS investigation. As he wrote in his report to Acting Chief Johnston, “Mistakes were made, case management and supervision was non-existing and there may even have been a degree of incompetence involved, but not a cover-up.”

He suggested amendments to directives of the Cornwall Police Service to address weaknesses in procedures identified in the Antoine case as well as in other cases. Staff Sergeant Derochie had similar concerns about case management, supervision, record keeping and delay in the Silmser investigation. He thought that the Antoine, Silmser, and Earl Landry Jr. investigations suffered from similar deficiencies, indicating that a systemic problem existed in the Cornwall Police Service. I agree.

Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote that in the Antoine case it appeared:

... that virtually everyone who came into contact with this investigation, both from within our Service and other agencies from outside, failed in some manner to deal decisively with Ms Antoine’s complaint.

Following the review of the Antoine investigation, a directive regarding OMPPAC was ordered by Acting Police Chief Johnston on May 8, 1995. Staff Sergeant Derochie had also found that officers in the Cornwall Police Service had not appropriately used OMPPAC in the Silmser case. This was “more than an isolated incident”; it was a serious problem that needed to be addressed. The Cornwall Police Directive stated:

Investigations undertaken by Cornwall Police Service personnel shall be recorded and reported on by way of OMPPAC incident number, either in regular production or in the “Projects” feature. OMPPAC incidents will be created immediately for all demand calls for service. Personnel who uncover information or evidence of criminal activity during the course of unrelated investigations, will immediately cause an OMPPAC incident number to be created, even if investigations into those matters are not going to be immediate.

It is evident that the investigation of the Antoine allegations of sexual abuse at the Second Street group home, as well as the complaints of Jeannette’s sister Suzanne Lapointe of sexual abuse at a foster home, suffered from many deficiencies at various levels of the Cornwall Police Service.

The officer assigned responsibility to the Antoine matter, Constable Kevin Malloy, failed to conduct a thorough and timely investigation. There was inactivity on the file for months, and he failed to follow up with other victims and witnesses. Very importantly, he did not register the complaint on OMPPAC and no incident report was created. Although Constable Malloy understood the importance of documentation, he failed to keep proper notes and records with respect to the investigation of both Jeannette Antoine and Suzanne Lapointe.

It is clear that Constable Malloy and the Cornwall Police Service failed to conduct a thorough and timely investigation into the Antoine allegations of historical sexual abuse. As mentioned, Constable Malloy failed to keep proper notes and records of the investigation. Moreover, Staff Sergeant Brunet, Staff Sergeant Wells, and Inspector Trew failed to properly supervise Constable Malloy during the investigation of the Antoine allegations.

Chief Shaver should have ensured that procedures were in place such that investigators were properly supervised in the context of investigations of sexual abuse of young people. He should have ensured that such investigations were assigned high priority and conducted in a timely manner. And Deputy Chief St. Denis should have properly supervised the head of the CIB to ensure that each investigation was conducted in a thorough manner.

Constable Malloy’s supervisors should have ensured that his notes on the investigation were properly reported and stored and that they were retrievable. They also should have offered support to the complainant to enable her to provide details on her allegations of abuse. It is evident that the Cornwall police failed to train members of the force on the conduct of investigations into allegations of historical sexual abuse.

Another failing is that the allegations of Suzanne Lapointe were not pursued by the Cornwall Police Service.

I also find that Constable Sebalj interviewed Jeannette Antoine without authorization, failed to keep proper notes of her contacts with Jeannette Antoine, and failed to update OMPPAC in a timely manner with respect to her contacts with Ms Antoine.

It is my conclusion that the Cornwall Police Service unreasonably delayed the investigation and did not properly investigate the allegations of abuse by Jeannette Antoine in 1989. This equally applied to the allegations of abuse by Suzanne Lapointe.

Allegations by David Silmsers of Sexual Abuse by a Priest and Probation Officer

David Silmsers Contacts the Cornwall Police

Sergeant Steve Nakic received a call at the Cornwall police station from David Silmsers on December 9, 1992. Mr. Silmsers told the CPS officer that in the past he had been sexually assaulted by a Cornwall priest and a probation officer. Mr. Silmsers disclosed that when he was an altar boy at St. Columban's Church twenty years before, Father Charles MacDonald had sexually assaulted him. He also said that Cornwall probation officer Ken Seguin, a friend of the priest, had sexually abused him. Mr. Silmsers told Sergeant Nakic that he thought Father MacDonald now lived in Williamstown, a village about twenty minutes northeast of Cornwall.

Sergeant Nakic decided to speak that day to Staff Inspector Stuart McDonald, head of the Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB), about the allegations of sexual abuse by Mr. Silmsers. The Staff Inspector thought this case "needed a very experienced investigator." This was clearly going to be a "high-profile case," involving allegations of sexual offences against young people by prominent members of the community. As Staff Inspector McDonald said in his testimony:

... I felt that this case had insurmountable or a mountain of possibilities, none of which would be good.

...

We all heard about cases such as the youth home in Alfred, the Mount Cashel, Newfoundland problems, the residential schools.

...

... I had no idea where this thing would lead, let alone this far, but I just felt that we had to put the best resources we had on—available on the case because I know that these cases are very, very sensitive in the community ...

Staff Inspector McDonald thought about the resources and the officers available to investigate this case. Constable Kevin Malloy and Sergeant Ron Lefebvre²⁹ were involved in a difficult murder case at the time. Constable Heidi Sebalj³⁰ was in the Youth Bureau, but Staff Inspector McDonald dismissed her as the appropriate officer to assume responsibility for the Silmsers case as he “really didn’t think that she had enough experience to be able to handle a case of this possible magnitude.” Constable Sebalj was the only officer in the Youth Bureau at that time but she had a relatively heavy caseload, was “fairly new in the Branch,” and in Staff Inspector McDonald’s view did not have the experience for a case of this complexity and high profile.

Staff Inspector McDonald concluded that Sergeant Claude Lortie, an experienced investigator, was “probably the best person at that time to do the investigation” of the sexual abuse allegations by David Silmsers. Sergeant Lortie was under the direct command of Chief Claude Shaver.³¹

Staff Inspector McDonald met with Chief Shaver on December 9, 1992, the same day that Mr. Silmsers called the Cornwall Police Service (CPS), to discuss the assignment of this case. Staff Inspector McDonald explained that officers in the CIB had a heavy caseload and could not devote the necessary attention to this file. Chief Shaver agreed that Sergeant Lortie should be assigned responsibility for this investigation.

On Staff Inspector McDonald’s instructions, Sergeant Nakic called David Silmsers and informed him that a police officer would come to Bourget, where he resided, within a week. Bourget is approximately a forty-five- to fifty-minute drive from Cornwall. Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet explained at the hearings that because Mr. Silmsers did not live in the City of Cornwall and because he was not considered to be in imminent danger, a police officer was not dispatched when the call was received.

It is important to note that no Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) incident report was created when the complaint was received from Mr. Silmsers. This deviated from the practice of CPS officers. Sergeant Nakic did not create an incident number on OMPPAC when he received the December 9, 1992, complaint, and nor did Sergeant Lortie, who was assigned the file the following day. Staff Sergeant Brunet agreed that

29. Sergeant Ron Lefebvre did not testify at the Inquiry due to medical reasons.

30. Constable Heidi Sebalj did not testify at the Inquiry due to medical reasons.

31. Sergeant Lortie explained it was often the practice in smaller police forces for the Intelligence Officer to report directly to the Chief of Police.

an incident number ought to have been created on OMPPAC when the complaint by David Silmsers was received. The reason is that if the December 9, 1992, correspondence from Sergeant Nakic to Staff Inspector McDonald had been misplaced or lost, this incident could have been tracked. As Chief Shaver said:

... [T]he file should have been opened by Slavko [Steve] Nakic originally. There should have been an OMPPAC file opened immediately.

...

And if that didn't happen, then Staff Inspector McDonald should have opened an OMPPAC file or ensured that it was opened. Lortie should have opened it. I should have ensured—I failed—I should have ensured to make sure that Lortie had the file open, and I didn't check to see if the file was open ...

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie agreed that the CPS officers:

ought to have started an OMPPAC incident from the very start ... Sergeant Nakic should have had it. Failing that, Staff Inspector [McDonald] should have required it. Failing that, Claude Lortie, who was going to be the investigator, would certainly need an incident created in order to report on it, so, you know, he should have opened one as well.

The day after the Silmsers call, Chief Shaver instructed Sergeant Lortie to investigate the allegations made by David Silmsers of sexual assault by Father Charles MacDonald and Ken Seguin. The Chief handed him the record of the call prepared by Sergeant Nakic. It was evident to Sergeant Lortie that this was a high-priority file.

The assignment of the Silmsers complaint to Sergeant Lortie directly by Chief Shaver was not the way that criminal investigations were generally assigned, testified Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis. This was confirmed by Staff Sergeant Derochie. The deputy police chief should be in the chain of command for every investigation, stated Deputy Chief St. Denis. This was a sexual assault file, and in my view, there should have been a discussion with the Deputy Chief regarding the person to whom Sergeant Lortie was to report in the investigation of the Silmsers complaint.

Sergeant Lortie knew Ken Seguin, who worked with his wife, Carole Cardinal, also a probation officer at the Cornwall Probation Office. Claude Lortie had also attended a Christmas dinner at which Mr. Seguin was present. There was no discussion between Chief Shaver and Sergeant Lortie at this time about the fact that Mr. Seguin was a colleague of his wife and that he knew Ken Seguin.

Sergeant Lortie had surgery scheduled for January 4, 1993, and was expected to be absent from work for two weeks. This was not mentioned at the meeting with Chief Shaver either.

There was inconsistent testimony as to whether Chief Shaver had instructed Sergeant Lortie at this time to create a project file for the investigation. As discussed, only designated police officers have access to information in project files. In such a case, other officers at the CPS or at other police forces such as the OPP would not have known that there had been a complaint of sexual abuse perpetrated by Father MacDonald or probation officer Ken Seguin, people in positions of trust and authority who continued to have contact with young persons. It is noteworthy that Chief Shaver testified that this was the first and only file he assigned as a project file during his tenure as Chief of the Cornwall Police Service.

Chief Shaver testified that he had instructed Sergeant Lortie to create a project file on OMPPAC for this investigation. Sergeant Lortie, by contrast, denied that he had been instructed by the Chief to create a project file for the Silmsen case at that time. Chief Shaver explained at the hearings that he had wanted to keep this investigation of Father MacDonald confidential, in essence to preserve the reputation of other priests in the Cornwall community:

... [W]e have a priest that's being accused here and we have to look at the presumption of innocence for the priest also because if it gets out in the community, it becomes every priest, and that's pretty much what happened down the road.

It came out of this community that it wasn't just Father MacDonald; it was every priest, and all of a sudden everyone who wore a white collar was a suspect. And I—we saw this. I mean, anybody who lived in this community saw this every day, where a lot of innocent people were being dragged into this thing because of an alleged assault by a priest.

...

... I wanted to keep it as well under wraps as I could until it was investigated and we could start looking at reasonable and probable grounds, and then after that it would go wherever we had to have it go.

...

If the word got out, sir, and the word gets out—well, it got out. It got out of our offices anyway, but if the word got out, I was worried that once it does ... officers take this home. They talk to their wives, if their wives talk to somebody else or somebody else or whatever. That kind of thing does happen, unfortunately.

And if it did get out, what I didn't want to have happen was this sort of wide-open season on priests when we didn't know. You know, we're still investigating one complainant and one complaint against a priest. (Emphasis added)

Chief Shaver was intent on keeping confidential this investigation of allegations of sexual assault by Father MacDonald. He was worried that all priests in the Cornwall community would be suspect. And he was concerned that publicity about the case would cause other victims to come forward, some of whom might falsely allege that a priest had sexually abused them:

... [L]ooking down the road I thought, you know, that this could have large ramifications for us if we started to get, you know, a tremendous amount of victims coming in, that type of thing.

The Chief of Police was worried about a potential flood of victims.

I find the reasoning of Chief Shaver unpersuasive. Chief Shaver acknowledged that he was aware at that time of investigations and convictions of clergy for sexual assault of young persons in different parts of Ontario, Newfoundland, and other regions in Canada, as well as in the United States. He also knew that if this investigation was not placed in a project file, it was possible that other victims would come forward and report that they, too, had been sexually abused by these perpetrators. And importantly, publicity about this investigation could have had the effect of protecting other children who came into contact with these alleged abusers. Yet the Chief of the Cornwall Police Service seemed worried about the reputation of the alleged perpetrator, Father Charles MacDonald, rather than about vulnerable children and youth with whom this authority figure could come into contact. He was also concerned about a flood of other victims who would allege that they had been abused by these perpetrators. In my view, the Chief did not adequately focus his attention on the protection of children at possible risk of abuse by Father MacDonald, who continued to have contact with young persons in the community.

Silmser File Reassigned to Constable Heidi Sebalj

Sergeant Lortie did some initial work on the investigation for a few weeks before it was reassigned to Constable Heidi Sebalj.

On December 14, 1992, Sergeant Lortie conducted a Canadian Police Information Centre (CPIC) check on the complainant, David Silmsers. He testified that he wanted to know whether Mr. Silmsers had a criminal record, in order to help him understand the type of person he would be “working with.” However, it is noteworthy that Sergeant Lortie did not conduct a CPIC check of either of the alleged perpetrators, Father Charles MacDonald or Ken Seguin.

Sergeant Lortie then called David Silmsers to arrange a meeting. Mr. Silmsers told the CPS officer that he did not want to meet before Christmas as he did not want to “ruin anybody’s holidays.” Sergeant Lortie explained that he had surgery scheduled for January 4, 1993, and would not be at work for two weeks. As a result, a meeting was scheduled for January 18, 1993.

Although Sergeant Nakic had told Mr. Silmsers on December 9, 1992, that a CPS officer would come within the week to his home in Bourget, the meeting with Sergeant Lortie was scheduled one month later. Sergeant Lortie testified that it was his intention to take a statement from Mr. Silmsers on January 18, 1993, then meet with the alleged perpetrators, Ken Seguin and Father MacDonald, after which he planned to contact the institutions at which the alleged perpetrators worked.

Mr. Silmsers told Sergeant Lortie in this call that he had contacted the Bishop, but the Sergeant did not ask Mr. Silmsers for any details. Nor did Sergeant Lortie make any entries in OMPPAC during the time he was responsible for the Silmsers file. As Staff Sergeant Derochie said, other officers at CPS would not have had access to information on the Silmsers complaint as no record of these allegations was placed on the OMPPAC system. As I discuss in this section, there was inadequate and inaccurate³² record keeping throughout the investigation of the Silmsers case. Although Sergeant Lortie reported directly to Claude Shaver, the Chief of Police did not ask him about the progress of the file or whether any of the information had been entered on OMPPAC.

The January 18, 1993, meeting between Sergeant Lortie and Mr. Silmsers never took place. Deputy Chief St. Denis told Sergeant Lortie before his surgical procedure that the file would be reassigned, as the scheduled date to meet the complainant was too long a period to wait for the interview.

32. For example, David Silmsers was described as a “female” complainant.

The Deputy Chief decided to transfer the file to the Officer in Charge of the CIB. Staff Sergeant Brunet had recently succeeded Staff Inspector McDonald as the Officer in Charge of the CIB, on January 11, 1993. The transmittal slip of the file sent by Deputy Chief St. Denis states:

I realize the heavy workload in CIB but this could possibly turn into an Alfred type situation. Therefore please assign ASAP. The new investigator should see and discuss this with Sgt. Lortie.
(Emphasis added)

Deputy Chief St. Denis was very concerned about the delays in this investigation. He had lived near Alfred and was “concerned that ... maybe we had the same thing in our own back door.” There was a reform school in Alfred at which members of the clergy were alleged to have abused boys. Staff Sergeant Brunet thought that if the Silmsers case was possibly similar to the Alfred situation, there could be multiple victims and multiple perpetrators.

As Chief Shaver testified, the concern was that this could be the “tip of the iceberg.” The strategy, he explained, was to start the investigation as quickly as possible and to determine if reasonable and probable grounds existed to lay a charge against the alleged perpetrators.

One month had lapsed since the December 9, 1992, Silmsers call to the Cornwall police and the complainant still had not yet been interviewed by the police. At the bottom of the transmittal slip dated January 8, 1993, Deputy Chief St. Denis noted, “[O]ne month already went by on this.”

Staff Sergeant Brunet received the transmittal slip on January 12, 1993. He immediately went to speak with Sergeant Lortie to discuss the Silmsers file. Ironically, Sergeant Lortie had returned to work and was at the CPS on January 12. He explained to Staff Sergeant Brunet that an interview with David Silmsers had been arranged for January 18, 1993. Although Sergeant Lortie was available to continue with the investigation, Staff Sergeant Brunet understood that the Deputy Chief wanted the CIB to assume responsibility for the file. Luc Brunet considered Sergeant Lortie a very experienced investigator. Deputy Chief St. Denis testified at the Inquiry that “in hindsight ... if I’d have known Lortie was going to be back sooner ... I wouldn’t have changed that. I would have left that investigation to Lortie.”

On January 13, 1993, Staff Sergeant Brunet decided to assign the Silmsers file to Constable Heidi Sebalj who had only one year of experience in the Criminal Investigation Bureau. She was the most junior officer in the CIB.

Staff Sergeant Brunet had serious resource problems when he became the Officer in Charge of the CIB in January 1993. He thought about the officers available in the CIB. Sergeant Ron Lefebvre and Constable Kevin Malloy, senior officers, were more experienced in sexual assault investigations than was Constable Sebalj. Sergeant Lefebvre had investigated the Father Deslauriers case in the 1980s. These officers were occupied at that time preparing for a preliminary inquiry of a homicide of a young girl, which in Staff Sergeant Brunet's view "was taking a toll on them." Staff Sergeant Brunet determined that these officers would not be able to work on the Silmser file in a timely fashion. At that time, Constable Sebalj had about twenty-five to thirty files, and Sergeant Lefebvre had about sixty to seventy files. Constable Sebalj, although less experienced, was keen on improving her skills in sexual assault investigations. Staff Sergeant Brunet thought that with the guidance of Sergeant Lefebvre, Constable Malloy, and himself, Constable Sebalj had the ability to investigate the allegations of sexual abuse against Father MacDonald and probation officer Ken Seguin. She could begin work on the file immediately. Staff Sergeant Brunet met with Constable Sebalj, showed her the relevant documents, and informed her that Sergeant Lefebvre and Constable Malloy were available to assist and provide guidance on the Silmser file. He instructed the Constable to enter the incident on OMPPAC for this investigation, which she did.

As Staff Sergeant Derochie stressed in his evidence, Sergeant Lortie returned to work after his surgery on January 12 and Constable Sebalj was assigned the Silmser file on January 13, 1993. In his review of the investigation, Staff Sergeant Derochie inscribed in his notes, "[W]hat was gained from pulling Lortie from the case"? He was critical of the fact that the Silmser file, a potentially complicated and high-profile case that required an experienced officer, had been removed from Sergeant Lortie's responsibility and assigned to Constable Heidi Sebalj: "I wasn't pleased with ... that whole matter, that nothing was gained ... by taking it from Lortie and giving it to Sebalj. We didn't save any time here at all."

The importance of this became even more apparent when the complainant requested a male police officer. David Silmser was uncomfortable discussing with a female police officer the details of the sexual abuse by the priest and probation officer. Staff Sergeant Derochie could not understand why Sergeant Lortie did not resume the investigation when he returned from his surgery on January 12, 1993. As Staff Sergeant Derochie stressed in his testimony, Sergeant Lortie had sixteen years of experience as an investigator and the victim had asked for a male officer. Mr. Silmser's requests for a male police officer is further discussed in the following section.

David Silmser Requests a Male Officer

On January 13, 1993, the day she was assigned the investigation of the Silmser allegations of sexual abuse by Father MacDonald and Ken Seguin, Constable Sebalj telephoned David Silmser. It was clear from the very first contact with the complainant that Mr. Silmsers was uncomfortable discussing the allegations of sexual abuse in the presence of a female police officer. Constable Sebalj's notes state: "t/c [telephone call] to victim—reluctant to speak w/ female." Constable Sebalj assured Mr. Silmsers at the interview scheduled for January 18 that a male police officer, Constable Malloy, would also be present. David Silmsers also made it clear in this call with Constable Sebalj that he had spoken with the Bishop in Ottawa and that he "wanted only an apology."

It is important to note that despite the Deputy Chief's concern about scheduling an interview with the alleged victim promptly and Staff Sergeant Brunet's discussion with Constable Sebalj about arranging to meet with David Silmsers before January 18, the interview date remained the same. Moreover, the interview was scheduled to take place in Cornwall, not Bourget, as promised by Sergeant Nakic to David Silmsers in the December 9, 1992, call.

The January 18, 1993, interview with Mr. Silmsers did not take place as he had car problems. It was rescheduled for January 26, 1993, but Mr. Silmsers did not appear. When Constable Sebalj called his home, Mr. Silmsers said he'd forgotten about the appointment. He told the CPS Constable that he was not pleased with how things were going and that he had asked for a male officer. Inscribed in Constable Sebalj's notes is the following:

T/c to victim's residence ... said "as long as I've got you, may as well tell you, I'm not happy with the way this is going" ... stated for 1 thing I asked to talk to a man. (Emphasis added)

Mr. Silmsers told Constable Sebalj that he "would take it up with the Chief."

David Silmsers Contacts the Cornwall Police Chief, Repeats Request for a Male Officer

On January 26, 1993, when David Silmsers called, Chief Claude Shaver said he was unaware that on two previous occasions the complainant had expressed his concern about being interviewed by a female officer about the sexual abuse. Mr. Silmsers, who was highly agitated, made it clear to Chief Shaver that he did not want to be interviewed by a female police officer. He raised his voice and made denigrating comments about females and Constable Sebalj. The Chief tried to calm him, but the complainant continued to raise his voice. He told Mr. Silmsers that the CPS would investigate the matter as quickly as possible and that he would consider Mr. Silmsers's request for a male officer.

Mr. Silmsers testified that although he liked Constable Sebalj and thought she was a nice person, he was simply uncomfortable discussing the sexual abuse with a woman:

I just didn't feel comfortable. It was not because of her as a person. Actually, later on, I got along with Heidi very well. I thought Heidi was a super lady. But as a young man, trying to talk about something like this, and you are still ashamed of it, it is very hard to talk to a woman, I found.

No policy existed at the Cornwall Police Service regarding the assignment of same-sex officers when requested by a complainant or victim in a sexual assault case. Nor was there a practice in the police force of accommodating the gender preference of male victims of abuse when interviewed by the police. This was confirmed by Chief Shaver. In my view, a policy should be developed to ensure that in cases of sexual assault, the complainants and other alleged victims be permitted to select the gender of the officer who will interview them. This will not only ensure that the trauma of the complainant and alleged victims is reduced but will also foster a more complete and accurate account of the alleged sexual abuse, which will enhance the success of a prosecution that may ensue.

The following morning, Chief Shaver met with Constable Sebalj and Sergeant Lefebvre to discuss the call from David Silmsr. Chief Shaver had no recollection of Constable Sebalj mentioning that Mr. Silmsr, on two previous occasions, had asked to be interviewed by a male police officer. The Constable told the Chief Shaver that the complainant was volatile and would often raise his voice and become agitated and angry. Chief Shaver acknowledged at the hearings that it is important to accommodate alleged victims of abuse and ensure that they are as comfortable as possible so that they will disclose the abuse in a detailed and comprehensive manner. The former Cornwall police chief conceded that he did not think about it in this way at that time. In this discussion, it was decided that Constable Kevin Malloy and Sergeant Ron Lefebvre would, with Constable Sebalj, attend the interview of Mr. Silmsr to obtain his initial statement. But the Chief decided that Constable Sebalj would nevertheless remain responsible for the investigation.

When Claude Shaver was asked at the hearings if he thought it was important for the Cornwall Police Service to accommodate the gender preference of a complainant in such cases, he replied: "[I]n light of what—of everything that's gone on and the reason for the Inquiry and everything, sure, I think that's a very good point. It's a very, very good point." In my view, Chief Shaver should have taken measures to ensure that David Silmsr, an alleged victim of sexual abuse in his youth by a priest and a probation officer, was interviewed by male police officers without the presence of a female officer.

After the meeting with the Chief, Sergeant Lefebvre telephoned David Silmsr to schedule an interview for the following day, January 28, 1993.

At the Silmsers interview, at which Sergeant Lefebvre, Constable Malloy, and Constable Sebalj were present, Mr. Silmsers again reiterated that he was not comfortable describing the details of the sexual abuse with a female officer. Yet Constable Sebalj told Mr. Silmsers that it was important and necessary for her to be at the interview, to which he replied, “I’ll try, it was hard for me even to tell my wife.”

It was obvious that David Silmsers was very uncomfortable and distressed about disclosing to a woman details of the sexual acts committed by a priest and probation officer during his youth. In my view, the Cornwall Police Service should have accommodated his request for at least two important reasons. First, it would have lessened Mr. Silmsers’s anxiety, and second, it would have enhanced the ability of the complainant to provide intimate and personal details of the sexual assaults allegedly perpetrated on him by Father MacDonald and Ken Seguin if he had been comfortable with the officers in the interview room. This would have fostered the ability of the CPS to obtain the necessary information for their investigation.

Another matter that demonstrated poor judgment on the part of the Cornwall Police Service was that all three officers at the Silmsers interview took notes. The officers should have been aware that three sets of notes were likely to contain some differences in the comments attributed to the complainant in the interview. Staff Sergeant Brunet testified that the common practice at police interviews at that time was generally “one note taker and one interviewer.” When asked about three officers taking notes at the Silmsers interview, Staff Sergeant Brunet’s response was, “[P]ersonally, I don’t recommend it.” Staff Sergeant Derochie agreed that this was not an ideal way to conduct an interview.

Constable Malloy acknowledged at the hearings that it was possible that he and Sergeant Lefebvre had recorded Mr. Silmsers’s statements slightly differently.³³ In a criminal prosecution against the alleged perpetrator, the complainant’s credibility could be attacked by defence counsel if the three sets of police notes contained some disparities. Constable Malloy agreed that if the interview had been taped or officially transcribed, this would have ensured that Mr. Silmsers’s statements were accurately recorded.

In my view, it is very important that CPS officers receive appropriate training on note taking and that a protocol be developed on recording information by videotape or audiotape from witnesses in police interviews. It is important that the technology—video and audio—used by officers is of high quality to ensure that the words, gestures, and body language of the person interviewed is accurately and fully recorded.

33. This also led to some disclosure problems, as Sergeant Lefebvre’s notes were misplaced for several years.

In the over three-hour interview, Mr. Silmser discussed the sexual abuse perpetrated by Ken Seguin, who had formerly been his probation officer. Mr. Silmser explained that he had been living on the street at the time without shelter or food and that Mr. Seguin offered him food and a room in exchange for sexual favours. Mr. Silmser described Mr. Seguin's home and car at the time that he was sexually abused. As Constable Malloy commented, it was serious that a probation officer, someone working in the justice system, had allegedly participated in these sexual acts with a former probationer.

Mr. Silmser also described the alleged acts of sexual assault engaged in by Father Charles MacDonald. Mr. Silmser told the three police officers that he had spoken with Monsignor Donald McDougald and stressed that "all he wanted was a letter of apology from him for what had happened in the past."³⁴ As Constable Malloy said in his testimony, it seemed that Mr. Silmser in this interview was seeking an apology from the clergy at this time rather than a civil settlement. David Silmser reported that on the morning of the police interview, Father Charles MacDonald's lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, had called him. It was apparent to the officers that Mr. Silmser was talking to representatives of the Church regarding the sexual abuse by Father Charles MacDonald. Constable Malloy agreed that it probably would have been a "good idea" to caution and explain to Mr. Silmser the dangers of making disclosures to third parties, such as the Church. For example, inconsistent statements could be used by defence counsel to impugn the credibility of the complainant. This could hinder the success of a criminal prosecution of the priest.

It was also clear from this January 1993 interview that David Silmser was prepared to pursue criminal charges against the alleged perpetrators. Inscribed in Constable Malloy's notes is, "Willing to go to court, will support a prosecution '100 per cent.'" This statement was made after Mr. Silmser had described the sexual acts committed by Father MacDonald and Ken Seguin. Mr. Silmser did not make any distinction between the two alleged perpetrators at the time he made the statement to the three officers.

At about 12:30 p.m., Mr. Silmser was asked by the officers if he would like to take a break for lunch. The complainant replied that he needed to pick up his wife later that day. Although there still appeared to be time for Mr. Silmser to complete the formal statement, the three officers decided to hand Mr. Silmser a

34. As I discuss in the chapter on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, David Silmser spoke with Monsignor Schonenbach about the sexual abuse in December 1992. Monsignor Schonenbach wrote a letter to Monsignor McDougald that stated, "He told me he was raising the matter at this time because he wanted to lose the label of being a bad person, he said: 'for starters, I would like a letter from Father MacDonald acknowledging what he did so that I could show this to my mother.'" blank form and ask him to fill it out and return it to the Cornwall police. Constable Malloy conceded that it would have been preferable to have David Silmsers complete the statement on the day of his interview. It was the CPS practice at that time for a statement to be taken directly by the officers. As Staff Sergeant Derochie made clear at the hearings, he did not endorse the practice of instructing victims in assault cases to write their own statements. Constable Malloy also agreed that by having the victim prepare his statement without any guidance from the police, it increased the possibility of discrepancies between that statement and the previous statement he made to the police in the interview; again, this could impair the credibility of the victim in a subsequent prosecution.

In my opinion, this also was not an exercise of good judgment by the CPS officers. Moreover, the officers should have understood that it may be very difficult for child victims of historical sexual abuse to provide written statements to the police. OPP Detective Inspector Tim Smith testified that he also disagreed with this practice. As I discussed earlier, in the chapter on the impact of child sexual abuse, these victims of historical child abuse may not have the literacy skills or emotional strength to complete such a document. Mr. Silmsers stated that he was not given guidance by the CPS on how to write the statement, and he described the difficulty he had in reliving the painful experiences and committing them to paper:

It was a very difficult task. It took approximately two or three weeks, I forget how long it took me to actually sit down; I dreaded to sit down and write it because I had to relive everything and to relive it again brought pain at that time, a lot of pain.

Constable Kevin Malloy did not distribute his notes of this interview with Mr. Silmsers to other CPS officers involved in the Silmsers case. These notes remained on his desk, and this written record of the Silmsers interview was not provided to others involved in the investigation of Mr. Silmsers's allegations of child sexual abuse by a priest and a probation officer.³⁵

Call From Father Charles MacDonald's Lawyer

A few days after the interview, David Silmsers called Constable Malloy. In the February 1, 1993, call, Mr. Silmsers said that he had been contacted by Monsignor McDougald, who had asked David Silmsers to attend a meeting with him, three priests, and some other people. Constable Malloy considered it "suspicious that they wanted to meet with him.” The CPS officer cautioned Mr. Silmsner against attending this meeting of clergy and others affiliated with the Diocese. Mr. Silmsner willingly accepted this advice and indicated that he would not attend this meeting.

35. As of March 8, 1993, Constable Malloy was off on sick leave. He was gone until May 1996.

Malcolm MacDonald, the lawyer representing Father Charles MacDonald, contacted the CPS. Constable Malloy, surprised to receive this call from the defence lawyer, spoke to Malcolm MacDonald on February 1, 1993. Mr. MacDonald indicated that David Silmsner had talked to Monsignor McDougald and Ken Seguin on the day Mr. Silmsner was interviewed by the police. He said that Mr. Silmsner seemed at that time to be in an intoxicated state. Malcolm MacDonald proceeded to malign Mr. Silmsner; he told the CPS officer that Mr. Silmsner was a “smooth talker,” that he had been involved in an embezzlement in Ottawa, and that he had stolen a car. Inscribed in Constable Malloy’s notes was “non-validated info at this time.” Constable Malloy told Mr. MacDonald that Constable Sebalj was responsible for the investigation and that he would convey this information to her. Constable Malloy considered this call from the defence lawyer “unusual ... kind of out of the ordinary.”

Constable Sebalj told Staff Sergeant Brunet that David Silmsner was meeting with the Diocese and that there were discussions about a civil settlement. The Constable expressed concerns about Mr. Silmsner’s motives. Staff Sergeant Brunet instructed Constable Sebalj not to discuss with or advise the complainant on any prospective civil settlement with the Church:

... I felt it was very dangerous territory for the police to give any instructions whatsoever in reference to civil settlements.

I didn’t feel that it was our position to give them advice that “you should/you shouldn’t” see them, you shouldn’t meet with them or—I really didn’t feel that it was proper for us to advise.

So what I told Heidi at the time is advise him that whatever he does civilly is totally his business. However, you have to concentrate on the criminal allegations and you have to continue the investigation that way, so don’t get involved in the civil settlement or any civil negotiations or anything like that and don’t advise them on that.

Contact Between David Silmsner, Constable Sebalj, and Father MacDonald’s Lawyer: Proposal of a Civil Settlement by the Diocese

In a call on February 3, 1993, Mr. Silmsner told Constable Sebalj that the Diocese had scheduled a meeting with him for February 9, 1993. Mr. Silmsner expressed reservations about the meeting and was uncertain whether he would attend this meeting with Church officials. Constable Sebalj simply asked David Silmsers to bring his statement to the police before meeting with the Diocese and to contact the school board to obtain his school records. Constable Sebalj did not caution the complainant about meetings with Church officials to discuss the allegations of sexual abuse.

When Constable Sebalj met with Mr. Silmsers on February 9, 1993, he discussed his meeting with the Diocese and the lawyer representing the Church. Mr. Silmsers said he thought the Church officials “believed” him, and he mentioned that the Diocese had offered him “psychological help.” He also told Constable Sebalj that he might proceed civilly after the criminal process was completed. Mr. Silmsers also told her that he had not yet completed his written statement.

The following day, David Silmsers telephoned Constable Sebalj to advise her that he had contacted Ken Seguin, who was “running scared”; he had told the probation officer that criminal charges would be laid against Father MacDonald. Constable Sebalj’s notes of the February 10, 1993, telephone call state: “T/C from V[ictim] advises he called Seguin who is ‘running scared’ advised him he’s laying charges on McDonald—stated he’s getting very mad.”

As Staff Sergeant Derochie stated in his evidence, there does not appear to have been any follow-up by the officer with regard to this statement: no CPIC check and no interview of Ken Seguin by Constable Sebalj. In fact, Mr. Seguin was never investigated by the Cornwall police with regard to the Silmsers allegations of sexual assault. I discuss this further in the following section.

On February 16, 1993, David Silmsers provided his written statement to Constable Sebalj. In the eight-page handwritten statement, Mr. Silmsers stated that he became an altar boy at St. Columban’s Church when he was twelve years old and came into contact with Father Charles MacDonald. He described the grooming, sexual advances, and details of the sexual acts. He also discussed the repeated sexual molestation by Father MacDonald’s close friend, Ken Seguin. In the statement, David Silmsers described the devastating impact of this sexual abuse on his life, which included the following: “My youth at this time was finished. I hated everything, authority, school, my parents, everything.”

He told Constable Sebalj that Monsignor McDougald had called him the previous day but that he had not discussed a settlement with the Church official. It is noteworthy that from February 22, 1993, until September 1993, there is no mention of a civil settlement by David Silmsers. On February 18, 1993, Mr. Silmsers told Constable Sebalj that he had contacted the Church to obtain a record of altar boys who served at St. Columban’s Church at the same time he did but related that he had not been successful.

Mr. Silmsen came to the Cornwall police station on February 24 for an arranged meeting and asked Constable Sebalj when criminal charges would be laid. She told him that the investigation was only “just beginning.” Two and a half months had passed since he had made his initial complaint to CPS Sergeant Nakic on December 9, 1992. Constable Sebalj had been responsible for the file since January 13, 1993, yet she had not interviewed any other possible victims, witnesses, or the suspects.

Father MacDonald's Lawyer Indicates His Client Is Prepared to Take a Lie Detector Test

On February 25, 1993, Malcolm MacDonald, the lawyer representing Father Charles MacDonald, informed Constable Sebalj that his client was prepared to take a lie detector test. Constable Sebalj discussed the prospect of a polygraph test with her supervisor, Staff Sergeant Brunet. It was his opinion that it was premature to have the suspect undergo a polygraph test at this time. Constable Sebalj had not yet interviewed other possible victims or witnesses. Staff Sergeant Brunet thought that Constable Sebalj should interview other altar boys at the Church and other boys who had been on Church retreats before the priest took a polygraph test. Constable Sebalj was just beginning the investigation. All the Cornwall Police Service had at that point, he explained, were the allegations of the complainant against the alleged perpetrators. In his view, the optimal time for a lie detector test is after the completion of the investigation, as the police then have information with which to pose direct questions to the alleged perpetrator. At that time, Staff Sergeant Brunet explained, the police can assess via the test if the suspect is being truthful. Staff Sergeant Brunet agreed that it might also be useful to conduct polygraph testing at the conclusion of an investigation if the police do not have reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge. But none of this happened.

Despite the offer by defence counsel in February 1993, Father Charles MacDonald was never asked by the CPS to take a polygraph test. Not only did Father MacDonald not undergo a lie detector test but he was never even interviewed by the Cornwall police. Nor was the other alleged perpetrator of sexual abuse, Ken Seguin, interviewed by the Cornwall Police Service.

Malcolm MacDonald spoke to Constable Sebalj several times. Staff Sergeant Derochie testified that it was unusual for the investigating officer to have several contacts with a defence lawyer before criminal charges were laid. The risk for police officers, he said, is that the officer could be called as a witness by defence counsel.

Other Victims of Father MacDonald, CPS Decides Not to Pursue the Investigation of Ken Seguin

In March and April 1993, Constable Sebalj interviewed individuals who disclosed that they, too, had been sexually assaulted by Father Charles MacDonald in their youth.

About two weeks before she interviewed C-3 on March 12, 1993, Constable Sebalj had a discussion with Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald about the case. The Crown attorney expressed concern about reasonable and probable grounds to lay criminal charges. He suggested that Constable Sebalj meet again with David Silmser, and he asked her to keep him up to date on this investigation.³⁶

David Silmser spoke to Constable Sebalj in early March and again asked the officer if she had sufficient evidence to lay criminal charges. According to Constable Sebalj, she told the complainant that she did not. He told the CPS Constable that he was no longer in a rush and that “if it takes 3, 6, 8 months,” that was fine with him.

On March 4, 1993, Constable Sebalj asked Constable Brian Snyder to conduct an analysis of Mr. Silmser’s statement. After reviewing the statement, Constable Snyder concluded that there was veracity regarding the allegations of historical sexual assault made by David Silmser. He suggested that Constable Sebalj obtain more details from the complainant on specific portions of the statement. Constable Snyder did not submit a report to Constable Sebalj, nor did he have notes of his assessment when he spoke to Constable Sebalj about the truthfulness of the Silmser statement. He testified that he conducted the statement analysis “on my own time.” Moreover, Constable Sebalj had gone to Constable Snyder’s home to request that he conduct this statement analysis.

When Constable Sebalj and Sergeant Lefebvre met with David Silmser on March 10, 1993, for approximately three hours to discuss further details of his statement, the complainant said he did not feel he could focus on both Father MacDonald and Ken Seguin at the same time. Inscribed in Constable Sebalj’s notes is: “I don’t think I can deal w/ that too right now. Re Seguin.” As Staff Sergeant Brunet explained, it was not that David Silmser did not want to pursue a criminal investigation of Mr. Seguin; rather it was just that he did not want to pursue both investigations at the same time. The complainant wanted to deal with the Father MacDonald investigation first. Staff Sergeant Brunet discussed this with Sergeant Lefebvre; it was decided that it was important to “build some rapport” with Mr. Silmser and to “try and make him feel comfortable,” and “if he was ready to deal with Father Charlie, we would start with that investigation and ... take it one step at a time.” The following day, David Silmsers told Constable Sebalj he was willing to take a polygraph test.

36. Murray MacDonald’s involvement in the Silmser case is also discussed in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

The allegations of sexual abuse against Ken Seguin were not pursued or investigated by the Cornwall Police Service. Other possible victims of the probation officer were not interviewed, nor was the suspect, Mr. Seguin. In addition, a decision was made not to contact Mr. Seguin’s employer, the Ministry of Correctional Services. Staff Sergeant Brunet and Sergeant Lefebvre decided that because the complainant did not want to proceed with the Seguin investigation at that time, the CPS did not have the authority to contact the Ministry to alert government officials to allegations by a former probationer that he had been sexually abused repeatedly by his probation officer, Ken Seguin. Staff Sergeant Brunet said the following in his testimony:

... We had a lengthy discussions [sic] of the pros and cons; if we had the authority to do it and at the end, we both agreed that with the allegations being made, but no investigation and him not being ready ... to deal with an investigation at this point; we didn’t feel that we had the authority to advise his employer and tell him that we got a complaint but ... we’re not doing an investigation; the complainant’s not ready to proceed with an investigation. We felt that we didn’t have the authority ...

On March 12, 1993, a former altar boy, C-3, disclosed to Constable Sebalj that Father MacDonald had sexually molested him. In subsequent discussions, C-3 made it clear that he did not want to provide a statement to the police or become involved in a prosecution, as this could have a serious adverse impact on his adult life. Constable Sebalj provided C-3 with a blank statement in early April and told him that it would be very helpful to the police investigation of Father MacDonald if he could provide a written statement. Again, an alleged victim of child sexual abuse by a priest was simply given a blank statement and told to describe the allegations. C-3 asked Constable Sebalj to “keep in touch” and to let him know if she “located any further victims.” Constable Sebalj never obtained a statement from C-3. This was the last contact between Constable Sebalj and C-3.

Constable Sebalj spoke by telephone with Father MacDonald’s lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, on March 17, 1993. She made inquiries about the dates that the priest was at St. Columban’s Church, the period when David Silmsers served as an altar boy, and the dates of retreats in St. Andrews. In my view, the CPS Constable should not have relied on the defence lawyer to provide information that she could have obtained on her own in the investigation of Mr. Silmsers’s allegations of sexual abuse.

Another disclosure by a former altar boy of sexual molestation was made to Constable Sebalj on April 3, 1993. C-56 told her that Father MacDonald had touched him in private areas when they were driving back from Apple Hill. He was eighteen years old at the time of the abuse. This victim was prepared to provide a formal statement and testify as a witness but did not want to initiate a criminal complaint for the sexual acts committed on him by the priest. C-56 said at the interview that he had “no problem doing whatever is needed.” Staff Sergeant Brunet acknowledged that the interviews of C-3 and C-56 lent credibility to the allegations of David Silmser. Constable Sebalj also made contact with two other altar boys. She learned from these discussions that Father MacDonald kept pornographic magazines under his bed. Unfortunately, however, after April 1993, no further investigative steps were taken by Constable Sebalj for four months. No other interviews were conducted with other potential victims or witnesses. The investigation remained dormant until the end of August 1993.

Constable Sebalj was away on a course toward the end of May and for three weeks in June 1993. During that time, Staff Sergeant Brunet was preoccupied with managing a homicide case.

It was not until June 29, 1993, that Staff Sergeant Brunet met with Constable Sebalj to discuss the Silmser and other files. He noticed that there had not been much progress on Constable Sebalj’s files and that many of her cases were overdue. They discussed the Silmser file at the June meeting. Constable Sebalj claimed that she was waiting for witnesses to get back to her. She said that she felt very burdened. Staff Sergeant Brunet testified that he was not aware at this June 1993 meeting that Constable Sebalj had not done any work on the Silmser case since April. He did not review her notebook. There were no notes on OMPPAC.

In late July or early August 1993, at a morning meeting of CPS management, Chief Shaver made it clear that he was dissatisfied with the slow progress on the Silmser file. He instructed Staff Sergeant Brunet to take measures to ensure that the investigation was given immediate attention and quickly completed. Staff Sergeant Brunet had a serious conversation with Constable Sebalj, who explained that she was waiting to meet with a Crown from outside the jurisdiction to ask his opinion on whether reasonable and probable grounds existed to lay a charge against Father Charles MacDonald. Despite discussion about a possible meeting with Crown Attorney Bob Pelletier from L’Orignal, this never took place.

At that time, Staff Sergeant Brunet looked for notes on the Silmser investigation on OMPPAC, but Constable Sebalj still had not recorded her investigation on the system as required. As Staff Sergeant Derochie stressed at the hearings, the Constable was required to insert information on the investigation as it proceeded. Staff Sergeant Brunet should have taken measures to ensure that Constable Sebalj was recording information on the Silmser file on OMPPAC and that she completed the investigation in an expeditious manner.

Constable Sebalj Receives a Call From Father MacDonald's Lawyer: Client Prefers to Be Escorted Rather Than Handcuffed When Arrested

Constable Sebalj received a telephone call from Father MacDonald's lawyer in the third week of August. She had not worked on the Silmsers file for four months. In the August 23, 1993, call, Malcolm MacDonald asked Constable Sebalj for an update on the status of the Father MacDonald investigation. She told defence counsel that she intended to meet with the Crown. Malcolm MacDonald then asked if his client could be "escorted as opposed to being hand-cuffed" when he was arrested. In my view, Malcolm MacDonald was monitoring the police investigation. In August 1993, he was trying to persuade the Diocese to enter a financial settlement with Mr. Silmsers. As I discuss in detail in the following chapters of the Report, Malcolm MacDonald at that time was involved in arranging an illegal financial settlement between the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, Father MacDonald, and the alleged victim, David Silmsers, which would have the effect of ending the criminal investigation. Malcolm MacDonald subsequently pleaded guilty on September 12, 1995, to attempt to obstruct justice in a criminal prosecution.

On August 24, 1993, Constable Sebalj received a call from David Silmsers, who asked for a progress report on the Father MacDonald investigation. According to Constable Sebalj's notes, she told Mr. Silmsers that she was waiting for a meeting with a Crown outside Cornwall to review the file and he replied that he was "not in any hurry." Constable Sebalj asked Mr. Silmsers if he was receiving counselling, to which he replied that the "Church won't help" and he had "no $." The Constable asked Mr. Silmsers in that call to obtain his school records. In my view, Constable Sebalj should have had Mr. Silmsers sign a release so that the CPS could obtain this information months earlier. As I recommend in my Phase 2 Report, a victim liaison person should be appointed for every sexual assault case. Had that been the situation in 1993, Constable Sebalj and the victim liaison would have identified the need for counselling and could have directed the complainant to appropriate services.

Constable Sebalj's Supervisors Unaware No Work Done on the Silmsers File

Staff Sergeant Brunet testified that he met with Constable Sebalj on August 24, 1993. At that time he was unaware that Constable Sebalj had not worked on the Silmsers file since the end of April 1993. When he asked for an update on the investigation, Constable Sebalj again said that she was waiting for the Crown's Office to get back to her.

Staff Sergeant Brunet was anxious for her to meet with the Crown as soon as possible. There had been disclosures by two former altar boys, C-3 and C-56, of sexual abuse by Father Charles MacDonald. The Staff Sergeant was hopeful that the Crown would help Constable Sebalj to develop the reasonable and probable grounds to lay a criminal charge against Father MacDonald.

David Silmsner Enters a Civil Settlement With Father MacDonald and the Church

It was on September 3, 1993, that Sean Adams, Mr. Silmsner's lawyer, called the Cornwall police and spoke to Staff Sergeant Brunet. The CPS Staff Sergeant testified that Mr. Adams relayed that Mr. Silmsner no longer wished to pursue the criminal investigation of Father Charles MacDonald. Staff Sergeant Brunet made it clear to Mr. Adams that he was not accepting this direction. He told Mr. Silmsner's lawyer that he would be instructing the investigating officer to meet with Mr. Silmsner to discuss the reason he wanted to withdraw his complaint of sexual assault to the Cornwall police.

That morning, Staff Sergeant Brunet also received a call from Father MacDonald's lawyer. This was followed up with a letter that day from Malcolm MacDonald:

This will confirm our telephone conversation of this morning. I am enclosing a Statement prepared by Sean Adams, Solicitor for David Silmsner and signed by David Silmsner.

I understand that Mr. Adams was advised by you that David Silmsner should speak to Cst. Sebalj personally and I understand that the Constable will not be back until some time next week. David Silmsner indicated to Mr. Adams that he would be available any time she wants to see him.

Staff Sergeant Brunet was concerned that Mr. Silmsner was not continuing with the criminal investigation because of the civil settlement with Father MacDonald and the Diocese. The CPS officer was unaware that one of the conditions of the settlement was the withdrawal by Mr. Silmsner of the criminal complaint. Staff Sergeant Brunet neither reviewed nor instructed Constable Sebalj to examine the settlement documents.³⁷ In my view, he should have instructed her to obtain the settlement documents.

37. This is discussed in detail in the chapter on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Staff Sergeant Brunet decided to contact Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald. He had two main issues he wished to discuss: (1) the legality of the settlement—the complainant’s withdrawal from the criminal investigation as a result of the fact that Mr. Silmsers had reached a civil settlement with the alleged perpetrator and the Diocese; and (2) whether the criminal prosecution could proceed with an unwilling complainant. Staff Sergeant Brunet claimed that when he made the September 8, 1993, call, it did not occur to him that Murray MacDonald had previously indicated that he had a conflict of interest on this file because of his own involvement with the Catholic Church. In this call, Murray MacDonald advised Staff Sergeant Brunet that a prosecution could not proceed without the full cooperation of the victim.³⁸

Staff Sergeant Brunet testified that after briefing Chief Shaver and Deputy Chief St. Denis, he was instructed to obtain the Crown’s opinion in writing. In a letter dated September 9, 1993, to Mr. Murray MacDonald, Staff Sergeant Brunet wrote:

Re: SEXUAL ASSAULT
Suspect: Charles MacDonald
Victim: David Silmsers

This will confirm our telephone conversation of September 8th, 1993.

Please be advised that on September 3rd, 1993, I received a letter from Mr. Angus Malcolm MacDonald (Barrister & Solicitor). Attached to his letter was a statement from Mr. David Silmsers stating that he received a civil settlement to his satisfaction and received independent legal advice before accepting it. He advised that he no longer wished to proceed further with criminal charges. He requested we close our file and stop further proceedings as far as he is concerned. This statement was signed by himself and witnessed by Mr. Sean Adams.

It is my understanding after our conversation that your office does not prosecute without the full cooperation of the victim. I am anxiously awaiting your direction. Please find attached, a copy of the letter and statement.

38. Murray MacDonald’s involvement in the Silmsers complaint is discussed in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Murray MacDonald responded with a letter dated September 14, 1993. The views he expressed and actions he took are discussed in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General. His letter reads:

It is our policy not to compel victims of sexual crimes to proceed against their wishes. Also, the officer was tentative on the issue of R. and P.G. before this so-called “settlement.” Grounds are now even further obfuscated by the fact that he has evidently used this threat of criminal prosecution as a means of furthering his efforts to gain monetary settlement.

It is evident that Mr. Silmsen’s allegations suggest a very serious breach of trust by the alleged perpetrator. These concerns can, of course, be put to the suspect’s principals if you deem it appropriate. However, this case is fraught with (due to his own conduct) a very non-credible complainant, saddled with an evident ulterior motive for making these allegations.

It is, as you are aware, exceptionally difficult to put supportive victims through the sexual offence trial process. It is for policy reasons, not in the public interest to put a reluctant witness through the same process. This is especially so when that reluctant witness will be “crucified” in cross-examination.

Staff Sergeant Brunet instructed Constable Sebalj to follow up with Mr. Silmsen to determine if he had been coerced into withdrawing from the criminal investigation of Father Charles MacDonald. Constable Sebalj had received a call on September 9, 1993, from David Silmsen’s sister, Donna Jodoin, who told the Constable that her brother had received a $32,000 settlement. She thanked Constable Sebalj on behalf of her brother, her mother, and herself for the work done on the case.

Constable Sebalj met with Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald on September 13, 1993. She continued to meet with Mr. MacDonald despite the fact that he had told her he had a conflict of interest on this file. Murray MacDonald had told the CPS Constable in the past that an outside Crown should be contacted for a final review and decision on the Father Charles MacDonald case. Yet Constable Sebalj never consulted an outside Crown. At this September meeting, Murray MacDonald told Constable Sebalj that she should satisfy herself that “Silmsen acted of his own free will.” Constable Sebalj arranged a meeting for September 13 with David Silmsen, but he did not appear.

CPS Investigation of Father MacDonald Ends: Sergeant Claude Lortie Expresses Dissatisfaction at September 1993 Morning Management Meeting

After receiving the Crown's letter, Staff Sergeant Brunet concluded that the Silmser complaint could no longer proceed and that criminal charges would not be laid against Father MacDonald. Chief Shaver was very upset when he learned about the civil settlement and Mr. Silmser's decision to withdraw from the criminal case. After the September 14, 1993, Crown letter was received, Chief Shaver decided to meet with Murray MacDonald: "I was concerned ... that we had our hands tied ... [M]y concern was I didn't know ... where I could go as a police force."

Murray MacDonald told the Cornwall Chief of Police that it was not illegal for a complainant to pursue a civil settlement at the same time as a criminal investigation. But what was not known at that time by the Crown was that the document that Mr. Silmser had signed required him to discontinue any civil or criminal proceedings against the alleged perpetrator. And that was illegal. This is discussed further in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

It was on September 28, 1993, shortly before the CPS morning management meeting, that Sergeant Lortie learned a decision had been made to terminate the Silmser police investigation. Sergeant Ron Lefebvre mentioned to Sergeant Lortie early that morning that Constable Sebalj was responsible for the Silmser investigation, which as discussed had originally been assigned to Sergeant Lortie. Sergeant Lortie had been under the mistaken impression that Sergeant Lefebvre was responsible for the file.

At the time of this discussion between Sergeant Lefebvre and Sergeant Lortie, Constable Perry Dunlop was working at a desk about fifteen to twenty feet away. According to Sergeant Lortie, Constable Dunlop became attentive when he heard Father Charles MacDonald mentioned. He asked his colleagues what had happened with this priest. Sergeant Lefebvre explained that he and Constable Sebalj had taken a statement from complainant David Silmser concerning allegations of sexual abuse by Father MacDonald. And as Sergeant Lortie said at the hearings, "[O]ut the door Perry goes. So I know he's headed—he wants to see the statement obviously."

Sergeant Lortie told Sergeant Lefebvre that he planned to raise the Silmser file at the 8:30 a.m. management meeting, which was beginning shortly. Before the meeting, Sergeant Lortie checked OMPPAC, which had very little information on the investigation, and saw that the Silmser investigation had been terminated.

At the management meeting on September 28, 1993, Sergeant Lortie asked Chief Shaver about the status of the Father Charles MacDonald investigation.

Chief Shaver deferred to Staff Sergeant Brunet, who appeared to Sergeant Lortie to be uncertain. It was Sergeant Lortie's impression that "nobody in the room ... [knew] what's going on with this thing." As Sergeant Lortie explained, "[T]hat's why I had that reaction ... [T]hat's why I responded the way I did."

Sergeant Lortie became visibly upset. He told Chief Shaver, Deputy Chief St. Denis, Staff Sergeant Brunet, and others at the meeting that he had learned the investigation of Father MacDonald was now closed and that no further action was being taken against the priest for the allegations of sexual abuse by David Silmser. Staff Sergeant Brunet told Sergeant Lortie that the Crown's advice had been sought and that, as a result, no criminal charges had been laid. Sergeant Lortie was not restrained in expressing his concern. He was critical of the police investigation and concerned about the responsibility of the Cornwall Police Service for not pursuing the allegations of childhood sexual abuse. Inscribed in his notes is: "[A]dvised the meeting that should other victims come up in the future ... that occurred since this investigation that our force would be responsible and that this whole investigation is a complete shame." At that time, Sergeant Lortie was unaware of the monetary settlement by the Diocese to David Silmser.

There was inconsistency in the testimony regarding comments made at this meeting. According to Staff Sergeant Brunet and Deputy Chief St. Denis, Sergeant Lortie asserted that the settlement was a "cover-up" by the Church. Sergeant Lortie made it clear that the investigation should proceed regardless of whether the victim was willing to participate in the prosecution. Staff Sergeant Brunet explained that after speaking to the Crown and being advised that the victim would not be compelled to testify in court, there was no prospect of conviction, and hence the investigation against Father MacDonald had come to an end. Staff Sergeant Brunet was upset, as Sergeant Lortie was "insinuating that the investigation wasn't done properly." Sergeant Lortie testified that he did not use the words "cover-up" at the September 28 morning management meeting. Chief Shaver similarly testified that although Sergeant Lortie was upset and critical of the investigation, Chief Shaver did not recall any statement regarding a "cover-up." Claude Lortie's comments clearly embarrassed Staff Sergeant Brunet, who was responsible for the Silmser file. Chief Shaver ended the meeting.

Staff Sergeant Brunet discussed Sergeant Lortie's remarks with the Deputy Chief after the morning meeting. He was upset with the criticism of the investigation. The Deputy Chief made it clear that he "had full trust in Brunet's judgment."

Chief Shaver, as mentioned, was concerned that the complainant had suddenly become unwilling to pursue the criminal investigation because the Diocese had offered a monetary payment. After the management meeting, he made arrangements to meet with Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald.

On September 29, 1993, David Silmsers arrived at the Cornwall police station to provide written notice that he wanted to end the investigation of the sexual abuse allegations against Father MacDonald. Staff Sergeant Brunet had instructed Constable Sebalj to meet with the complainant to ensure that he truly wished to withdraw from the criminal investigation.

As Constable Sebalj walked to the front counter of the police station to meet Mr. Silmsers, she saw Sergeant Lortie in the hallway and told him that David Silmsers had arrived to sign her notebook. Sergeant Lortie made it clear to Constable Sebalj that he did not agree “with what [she was] doing.” Constable Sebalj continued to walk to the front counter. Mr. Silmsers signed her police notebook, indicating that he had received a settlement with the Diocese to his satisfaction and that he wished the case closed against Father Charles MacDonald:

Sept. 29/93

I, David Silmsers, received a settlement to my satisfaction from the Cornwall Catholic Diocese. I wish that this matter against Charles MacDonald be closed. My lawyer Sean Adams will handle any further questions or inquiries about this matter.

David Silmsers

Mr. Silmsers apologized to Constable Sebalj for the work done on the investigation. Constable Sebalj inscribed in her notes that Mr. Silmsers had “weighed the options & chose the ‘sure thing.’” Mr. Silmsers told Constable Sebalj that Perry Dunlop’s wife had called him, which upset him.

CPS Officers Learn of Perry Dunlop’s Involvement in the Silmsers File

Constable Sebalj met with Staff Sergeant Brunet on September 29, 1993, to confirm that David Silmsers had retained a lawyer, that he was satisfied with the legal advice he had received, that he no longer wished to continue the criminal investigation of Father MacDonald, and that he had confirmed this in writing. Constable Sebalj also discussed Mr. Silmsers’s agitation about receiving a call from Helen Dunlop. It was at that time that she realized the reason Ms Dunlop was contacting the complainant. Constable Sebalj told Staff Sergeant Brunet that Constable Dunlop had asked her if he could read David Silmsers’s statement, which she willingly gave to him. It became apparent to the officers that Constable Dunlop had shared this statement with individuals outside the Cornwall Police Service.

After discussions with the Deputy Chief, Staff Sergeant Brunet asked Constable Dunlop to meet with him. Perry Dunlop said he was concerned that the allegations made by David Silmser had not been properly investigated. He had family in the St. Andrews area and was worried that his nephews and nieces were vulnerable to sexual abuse as described by David Silmser in this statement. Constable Dunlop also expressed concern about probation officer Ken Seguin. He mentioned the Varley incident, in which a probationer had apparently been drinking at Mr. Seguin's home hours before the homicide of one of his friends. This is discussed in fuller detail in Chapter 5, on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services.

Staff Sergeant Brunet advised Constable Dunlop that he was compromising his oath of secrecy as a police officer by sharing information with his wife about a case. He was breaching the Police Services Act. Staff Sergeant Brunet alluded to an incident in the mid-1980s involving damage to Constable Dunlop's police cruiser in which the Constable had been charged with neglect of duty and deceit under the Police Services Act.³⁹ He reminded Constable Dunlop that he had a family and cautioned him that if his wife did not stop this behaviour, this would escalate into a serious matter. Staff Sergeant Brunet cautioned the officer not to compromise his career. Constable Dunlop agreed to ask his wife not to make further contact with any of the alleged victims.

Staff Sergeant Brunet asked Constable Dunlop if he had a copy of the Silmser statement and other documents related to the case and, if so, to provide them

39. This is discussed in greater detail in this Report. Constable Perry Dunlop was found guilty of a major offence and two minor offences under the Police Services Act relating to events of September 1985. The major offence charge arose when Constable Dunlop reported that his cruiser was damaged in a hit and run by an unknown driver while parked in a hospital parking lot. An investigation determined that the damage had occurred when Constable Dunlop was driving the vehicle and hit a concrete post. It was the investigating officer's opinion that the Constable knew how the damage occurred and made a false report in order to avoid any liability. Constable Dunlop was charged with neglect of duty and deceit. During the investigation of these charges, Inspector Trew and Staff Sergeant Kirkey opened Constable Dunlop's locker to retrieve his notebook. In his locker they found two pieces of identification in civilian names. Apparently Dunlop had been instructed in May 1985 to locate the owners of the identification and had thus far failed to do so. He was charged with two counts of neglect of duty as a result. Dunlop pleaded guilty to one of the minor offences of neglect of duty relating to one of the pieces of identification and was sentenced for four hours forfeiture of leave. Constable Dunlop had a full Police Services Act hearing on the second count of the minor offence of neglect of duty, was found guilty, and was sentenced to eight hours forfeiture of leave. The major offence was adjourned while Constable Dunlop brought a Charter application requesting that the previous convictions be quashed and the charge relating to the major offence be stayed. The application was dismissed. Just prior to the new trial date, Constable Dunlop agreed to plead guilty and was sentenced to five days forfeiture of leave.

to him immediately. Constable Dunlop did not acknowledge or deny that he had such documents. No documentation was subsequently given to Staff Sergeant Brunet.

Constable Dunlop suggested to Staff Sergeant Brunet that the CPS make contact with the Bishop and Father MacDonald to ensure that the priest was removed from his parish.

Perry Dunlop asked Constable Quinn to come to his home. Michael Quinn was a friend and a colleague, as well as the representative of the Police Association. Constable Dunlop told Constable Quinn that he had given a copy of the David Silmsers statement to the Children's Aid Society. Constable Dunlop stated that if there was truth to the allegations made by David Silmsers, the perpetrators, who remained in the community, could victimize other children. Although Constable Dunlop had concerns that the CPS investigation had not been done properly, his prime concern was the risk of abuse to children in the Cornwall area. As Constable Quinn said, "his biggest concern" was:

... not so much what had taken place but what could be prevented from taking place. And his concern, at that time, was somebody has got to tell the CAS because these people are in contact through CAS, the— knowing that and that was his concern.

Constable Dunlop told Constable Quinn repeatedly:

"What would you feel like if somebody comes to you in five years or 10 years from now and says, 'My child was assaulted by that person and you people knew about it 10 years ago and did nothing'"; that was his concern.

Perry Dunlop was worried about both Father Charles MacDonald and Ken Seguin. Constable Dunlop also thought that the CPS investigation was sub-standard. He also told Constable Quinn that in his view it was immaterial to a criminal police investigation that the matter had been settled civilly with Mr. Silmsers. Constable Quinn agreed:

... [W]hether or not the person agreed to say, "Okay, it never happened anymore because I got paid some money," that does not negate the fact that there's a criminal offence had taken place and something should be done.

Perry Dunlop was concerned about the ramifications of his behaviour with respect to management at the Cornwall Police Service. Constable Dunlop told Constable Quinn that Staff Sergeant Brunet had criticized him for his behaviour, had reminded him that he had an incident in the 1980s in which he had also acted inappropriately and that he had a family, and had cautioned him to be prudent in the future.

Constable Dunlop, according to Constable Quinn, was of the firm conviction that he should not be disciplined in any way, including informal counselling. Constable Quinn had advised Constable Dunlop that if he believed his conduct had been appropriate, he should not accept counselling. As explained by Michael Quinn at the hearings, it was necessary for Constable Dunlop to agree to counselling. This never occurred.

Chief Claude Shaver Meets With Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald

After the September 28 morning meeting, in which Sergeant Lortie was critical that the Silmsers' allegations were not being pursued by the police force, and after learning about the monetary settlement by the Diocese with David Silmsers, Chief Shaver arranged a meeting with Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald. He wanted to know whether in these circumstances, a criminal investigation by the CPS, could continue.

Chief Shaver testified that Murray MacDonald told him at the September 30, 1993, meeting that he had met with Constable Heidi Sebalj about the Silmsers' file on several occasions but that she did not believe there were reasonable and probable grounds to lay a criminal charge against Father Charles MacDonald. They discussed Mr. Silmsers' reluctance to participate further in the case. Chief Shaver raised the issue of protection of children in the community. According to Claude Shaver, Mr. MacDonald expressed the view that he did not think anything could be done about the Church or Mr. Silmsers' withdrawal from the criminal investigation. The Crown attorney encouraged the Chief to think about other ways in which children at risk could be protected. The Chief decided that he would contact Richard Abell, executive director of the Children's Aid Society.

Nine and a half months had passed since Mr. Silmsers had disclosed to the Cornwall police that he had been sexually molested by Father Charles MacDonald and probation officer Ken Seguin. Mr. Silmsers had contacted the police on December 9, 1992, and it took until September 30, 1993, for the Cornwall police to contact the Children's Aid Society to alert the agency that other children might be at risk of sexual abuse. Richard Abell was also trying to reach Chief Shaver on September 30.

Neither the Chief nor any of his officers made contact with the Ministry of Correctional Services despite the fact that Mr. Seguin continued to supervise youths and young people at the Cornwall Probation Office. Mr. Seguin was never interviewed or investigated by the Cornwall Police Service.

Father Charles MacDonald was also never interviewed by the CPS. Chief Shaver agreed that interviewing a suspect can change one's view as to whether reasonable and probable grounds exist to lay a criminal charge.

Cornwall Police Chief Learns That Perry Dunlop Gave David Silmser's Statement to the CAS

On October 1, 1993, Chief Shaver met with Richard Abell, the executive director of the CAS, and Angelo Towndale. Claude Shaver knew both these men. He had been on various committees with them, such as the CAS Bike-a-Thon. He had also been to Mr. Towndale's home for dinner on several occasions. Mr. Towndale was a member of the Cornwall Police Services Board.

At this meeting in early October Chief Shaver learned that Constable Dunlop had taken David Silmser's statement from the Cornwall Police Service to the Children's Aid Society without the knowledge or permission of his supervisors. Chief Shaver was very surprised and concerned. Inscribed in Mr. Abell's notes of the meeting is: "[H]e's got a big issue to deal with re Perry Dunlop going outside channels."

Mr. Abell told the Chief of Police that he considered David Silmser's allegations in the statement to be highly credible. As I discuss in the chapter on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society, the focus and mandate of the CAS is on the protection of children at risk. Mr. Abell said that the CAS planned to proceed with an investigation of these issues. Claude Shaver explained that he had spoken to the Crown, who had indicated that there was no basis to pursue a criminal charge and to do so could result in malicious prosecution. Inscribed in Mr. Abell's notes is: "Chief says his dept. 'screwed up big time' on this—investigation not done—put on 'back burner'—Heidi Black⁴⁰ facing discipline."

Chief Shaver denied that he told the CAS executive director that the Cornwall Police Service "screwed up big time" in the investigation. He claimed that this comment related to the Silmser statement leaving the police department and being given to the Children's Aid Society. Chief Shaver also asserted that the comment about disciplining Constable Heidi Sebalj was in reference to the release of the information, not to the Silmser investigation. The Chief testified that it was not his "style" to inform an outside agency that he intended to discipline his officer. He acknowledged, however, that he may have told Mr. Abell the investigation had been "put on the back burner." Mr. Abell's notes of October 1, 1993, also state:

40. He is referring to Constable Heidi Sebalj.

Luc Brunet did not supervise adequately—she is inexperienced & needed close supervision. He doesn't have a file (no record on OM? [OMPPAC])—the police computer filing/record system. The file is being put together now ...

It seems from this notation that Chief Shaver was conveying to Mr. Abell that Constable Sebalj was inexperienced and that she did not receive adequate supervision from Staff Sergeant Brunet. I do not find the former police chief's denial convincing. Having heard the evidence of Chief Shaver and Mr. Abell and having reviewed Mr. Abell's copious notes, it is my view that Chief Shaver was acknowledging to the CAS executive director that his police service had "screwed up big time" in the investigation of the Silmsers complaint of sexual abuse.

Chief Shaver claimed that at the time of this meeting with the CAS, he was not aware that the Silmsers file had not been recorded on OMPPAC, as required. He testified that it was only when he returned to the police station and spoke to Staff Sergeant Brunet that he learned that information on the Silmsers investigation was not on OMPPAC.

Chief Shaver told Mr. Abell that he planned to review the Silmsers file with Deputy Chief St. Denis and Staff Sergeant Brunet and to "make some decisions." Chief Shaver also told Mr. Abell that he "planned to go over [the] Bishop's head" to contact senior Church officials and show them the Silmsers statement.

Chief Shaver told Mr. Abell that David Silmsers was of "questionable character & motive." The CAS executive director explained that if Mr. Silmsers was difficult and had problems as an adult, it conformed to the profile of a victim of abuse. The Chief also said that he "feels his force was used by Silmsers to get $." Chief Shaver made this comment despite the fact that he knew that Mr. Silmsers, when he made the disclosure of historical sexual abuse, had stated that he had simply been seeking an apology from the Church.

Mr. Abell made it clear to the Chief of Police that he considered the Silmsers statement to be very credible; it "can't be dismissed." Mr. Abell was "seized with the information" and planned to proceed with an investigation. The Chief questioned whether the CAS could use the Silmsers statement that had been given to the agency by Constable Dunlop. As Mr. Abell wrote, "He questioned my ability to proceed on basis of 'out of channel information.'" Mr. Abell replied that there was a current risk of abuse of children as a result of the Silmsers allegations. Mr. Abell believed this matter fell within the provisions of the Child and Family Services Act and that the CAS had authority to investigate the matter. There was also a discussion about a possible investigation of Mr. Seguin and the need to alert his employer, the Ministry of Correctional Services.

Chief Shaver was distressed that Constable Dunlop had given the Silmsers statement to the Children's Aid Society. Perry Dunlop had not been assigned this investigation, nor was he involved in the Silmsers file. In the Chief's view, although Constable Dunlop was concerned about the protection of children, he had no authority to give this information to Richard Abell.

On that afternoon, which was a Friday, Chief Shaver met with Deputy Chief St. Denis and Staff Sergeant Brunet to discuss his concerns about the Silmsers file. The Chief made it clear that he wanted the notes and reports on OMPPAC immediately, and moreover, that the documents pertaining to the investigation were to be placed in a project file by the following Monday morning. As Staff Sergeant Brunet acknowledged, the file had been open for nine months, yet nothing had been inserted on OMPPAC. Staff Sergeant Brunet agreed with the decision to create a project file as there had been a "leak" of information to third parties and it was important to protect the identity of people who had been interviewed. The Chief of Police cancelled Constable Sebalj's leave, which had been scheduled for this period, as he wanted her to work on the Silmsers file. Chief Shaver also instructed Staff Sergeant Brunet to obtain written correspondence from lawyer Sean Adams about Mr. Silmsers's intentions regarding the other alleged perpetrator of sexual abuse, probation officer Ken Seguin. Chief Shaver testified that he did not know at that time that Sean Adams' retainer was restricted to providing independent legal advice to David Silmsers regarding the civil settlement by the Church.

Another matter discussed by Chief Shaver at the meeting was his intention to visit a senior official in the Roman Catholic Church, the Pope's representative in Ottawa. Staff Sergeant Brunet had previously discussed with Deputy Chief St. Denis Constable Dunlop's suggestion that the Cornwall police meet with the Church, which Staff Sergeant Brunet endorsed. As he said, "[W]e were not pursuing the criminal investigation at this point or it didn't appear that Heidi [Sebalj] was meeting with Mr. Silmsers at this time ... [W]e appeared to have some pretty serious roadblocks into our criminal investigation." Chief Shaver believed the conduct of the Diocese in this matter had greatly hindered the criminal investigation. He planned to visit the Papal Nuncio in Ottawa, the Bishop's "boss," to register his complaint. He did not intend to discuss the Silmsers case with Bishop Eugène LaRocque, who in the past had not been cooperative in the Deslauriers investigation.⁴¹ Moreover, Chief Shaver was disturbed that the Bishop had agreed to the civil settlement:

41. This is discussed in the chapter on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

I wanted to go past the Bishop to whoever the Bishop's boss was ... I wanted to register my displeasure in the fact that this had happened ... I felt this was like the Deslauriers investigation, that somewhere along the line the Church was hindering us from doing our job. I wanted that registered at the highest level I could possibly register it at.
(Emphasis added)

Staff Sergeant Brunet confirmed that the purpose of the meeting with the Pope's representative was "to voice our concern about the approach that the Diocese had taken with this sexual assault complaint." As Staff Sergeant Brunet explained, the Cornwall Police Service decided to meet with the Archbishop in Ottawa rather than with Bishop LaRocque because the Chief and other officers thought that in the Father Deslauriers investigation in 1986, the Bishop had been "less than helpful."

A further matter raised by Chief Shaver at the meeting was the need for an investigation of Constable Perry Dunlop's conduct in the Silmser matter. Chief Shaver decided to assign Staff Sergeant Derochie responsibility for this internal investigation.

It is noteworthy that at this October 1, 1993, meeting, no discussion took place between the Chief, Deputy Chief, or Staff Sergeant Brunet regarding the importance of contacting Mr. Seguin's employer, the Ministry of Correctional Services. Staff Sergeant Brunet testified that if an investigation of Mr. Seguin had been initiated by the CPS after Mr. Silmser's complaint of sexual abuse, the Ministry of Correctional Services was likely to have been contacted, as the investigating officer would have required documents and information. The Ministry would then have become aware of the allegations against their employee, Mr. Seguin. Neither Staff Sergeant Brunet nor other officers contacted the Cornwall Probation Office or other officials at the Ministry of Correctional Services after the Silmser disclosure to the police in late 1992, nor nine months later in September 1993 when Constable Dunlop gave the Silmser statement to the Children's Aid Society. Moreover, there was no contact by the CPS with the Cornwall Probation Office or other Ministry of Correctional Services officials prior to late November 1993, when Mr. Seguin committed suicide.

It was clear from the testimony of Staff Sergeant Brunet and other CPS officers that members of the police force continue to remain uncertain of the circumstances under which they are required to report allegations of sexual abuse to employers of suspects and people under investigation by the police. Staff Sergeant Brunet stressed the need for guidance on this important issue. As he said at the hearings, “I would really appreciate some direction for the police officers to come.”

It was at the October 1, 1993, meeting that Staff Sergeant Brunet learned that the Silmser statement had been disclosed to the CAS. It is essential to understand that Constable Sebalj did not communicate with the Children’s Aid Society during her investigation of the Silmser file to alert the agency that children may be at risk of sexual abuse. Nor did Staff Sergeant Brunet discuss with Constable Sebalj the need to contact the CAS about the allegations concerning either Father Charles MacDonald or Ken Seguin. It was only after the Silmser statement had been provided to the CAS that Staff Sergeant Brunet and other members of the CPS began to question whether a duty to report to the CAS existed for historical sexual abuse cases.

Anthony Repa became Chief of the Cornwall Police Service on August 1, 1995, and remained in this position for eight and a half years until 2003. Although Chief Repa did not have any experience with historical sexual assault cases such as the Silmser file, he testified that if an adult alleged that he or she had been sexually abused as a child, he would notify the Children’s Aid Society if the alleged perpetrator was still alive because “he is out there still and there are still children out there, the CAS should at least know.” When he became the Chief of Police, no CPS protocol existed that addressed reporting to the Children’s Aid Society in such circumstances.

Chief Repa made it clear to officers in his police force, including Staff Sergeant Brunet, who was head of the CIB, that the CAS was to be notified in all cases in which an alleged perpetrator was alive and therefore had access to children. Chief Repa had a discussion with Staff Sergeant Brunet about this issue in the Silmser case. In Chief Repa’s view, the CAS should have this information on historical sexual assault cases to determine what actions, if any, the agency would take. As he said in his evidence:

... [W]hen I was there I made it very clear I wanted everything sent to the CAS, let them sort it out; very simple.

...

... [I]f the person that is alleged to have done this 40 years ago is still alive then he—well he or she—he is out there still and there are still children out there, the CAS should at least know.

...

I mean it’s a simple phone call; let them decide.

...

... They have a copy of it and even if they don't act on it three years from now something might come up and they'll join it together. It's like our ViCLAS system or our linkage system, how can you not have enough information on sexual abuse; you can never go overboard on it.

In 1995, two years later, Chief Repa asked Staff Sergeant Brunet to prepare a memo on his understanding at the time of the Silmsers disclosures of the duty to report allegations of sexual abuse to the Children's Aid Society. It is clear that Staff Sergeant Brunet had an erroneous understanding of the statutory duty to report allegations of child abuse to the child protection agency. He mistakenly thought that only intra-familial cases were required to be reported. It was also the understanding of Staff Sergeant Brunet and other CPS officers that if an historical child abuse case was reported to the police by a complainant who was now an adult, it was not necessary to report the allegation to the CAS. Staff Sergeant Brunet and other Cornwall police officers did not think about the risk of continued sexual abuse by the same perpetrator to other children in the community:

... [M]y interpretation of an historical—if we were dealing with an adult, I didn't believe there was a duty to report. If an adult made a complaint about something that involved an abuse case, 10, 15, 20 years ago, I didn't think that there was a necessity to call the Children's Aid ... I was thinking of the victim. Is he at risk and like that's—like that was my interpretation at the time. (Emphasis added)

In his memo to Chief Repa in 1995, Staff Sergeant Brunet wrote, "It was my belief, at the time, that being the case was historical and there were no grounds to believe any recent incident had occurred, that the Children's Aid Society would not have interest in this case." Staff Sergeant Derochie also testified that when he was reviewing the Silmsers matter in October 1993, he did not think there was a duty to report historical sexual abuse cases.

On the afternoon of October 1, 1993, Staff Sergeant Brunet contacted Sean Adams, Mr. Silmsers lawyer, to ask whether his client wished to proceed criminally against Mr. Seguin. The CPS received a response one month later. In early November, Mr. Silmsers spoke directly with Constable Sebalj and told her that he did not want to pursue the allegations of abuse by the Cornwall probation officer. Inscribed in the supplementary occurrence report dated November 4, 1993, Constable Sebalj wrote: "Silmsers once again reiterated ... that he did not want to talk to anyone about this ... Silmsers suggested that if other victims come forward that he would gladly assist—as a witness." At this point, Staff Sergeant Brunet considered the Seguin file closed; it had become clear that Mr. Silmsers did not want to pursue the allegations of abuse by his former probation officer. The Staff Sergeant did not ask for a copy of the settlement documents and therefore did not know that Mr. Silmser may have been refusing to participate in a CPS investigation because he believed that if he did, he would lose his settlement money from the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Constable Sebalj spent the weekend organizing her documents and preparing the OMPPAC report pursuant to the instructions of Chief Shaver. She brought the Silmser file to Staff Sergeant Brunet's house on Sunday afternoon for him to review. Chief Shaver was given the documents by Staff Sergeant Brunet as requested on Monday, October 4, 1993. The Chief asked for additional material. He wanted a synopsis of the information of each person interviewed by Constable Sebalj, as well as other individuals who had been contacted but had claimed they had no knowledge of the substance of the Silmser allegations. Chief Shaver wanted to know whether this case "did slip through the cracks" and "how did we get to this stage where we don't have it on OMPPAC" and "where we were with this file?" The Chief wanted to carefully review the Silmser file to make a decision as to what direction the Cornwall Police Service should take with regard to this matter. His evidence was somewhat inconsistent because after his meeting with the Crown, Chief Shaver was of the view that there was nothing he could do to reinvestigate this matter.

Sergeant Lortie testified that he was instructed by Staff Sergeant Brunet to create a project file for the Silmser case, which he did in early October 1993. Chief Shaver, Staff Sergeant Brunet, and Constable Sebalj were given access to the file. Sergeant Lortie did not agree with the decision to place the Silmser case in a project file. He thought that officers at the CPS and other police forces should be able to search OMPPAC and find Father MacDonald's name in the event that there were allegations by other victims of sexual abuse by the priest.

Chief Shaver and Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet Meet With the Papal Nuncio and the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall

On October 7, 1993, Chief Shaver and Staff Sergeant Brunet travelled to Ottawa to meet with the Papal Nuncio, the Pope's representative in Canada, Archbishop Carlo Curis. The purpose of the meeting, as mentioned, was to raise concerns about the civil settlement entered into by the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall with Mr. Silmser during the Cornwall police criminal investigation. The CPS officers thought that the criminal investigation had been constrained by the actions of the Diocese. They wanted to convey to the Papal Nuncio that the civil settlement was not in the public interest and that it did not address concerns for the safety of young people in the Cornwall community. The Father Charles

MacDonald criminal investigation had been terminated by the police, and the CPS wanted to make it clear to Church officials that the settlement “tied” the hands of the police. Staff Sergeant Brunet explained:

The objective of the trip was to voice our concern about the settlement while there’s a criminal investigation going on ... (a) we felt that it really tied us up; (b) we felt that it was not a right way to deal with issues ... and it compromised community safety.

At the meeting with Archbishop Curis, Chief Shaver gave an overview of the Silmsers case. He also told the Papal Nuncio that two other individuals had disclosed to the police that they also had been sexually molested by Father Charles MacDonald. The Papal Nuncio recommended that the Chief meet with Bishop LaRocque. Chief Shaver replied that he had reservations about discussing this matter with the Bishop because of his past conduct on similar matters. Chief Shaver stressed that the Church’s conduct in the Silmsers matter had “tied our hands,” he “didn’t believe it was right,” and there was a “need to protect the children in the community.” Archbishop Curis reassured Chief Shaver that he would exercise his authority if the Bishop was not cooperative.

Chief Shaver contacted Bishop LaRocque’s office and both he and Staff Sergeant Brunet met with the Bishop that day. The Bishop, who was already conversant with the allegations against Father Charles MacDonald, assured Chief Shaver and Staff Sergeant Brunet that he would cooperate with the CPS. Bishop LaRocque said that Monsignor McDougald was responsible for matters of this kind in the Diocese. He said that Monsignor McDougald had confronted Father Charles MacDonald with the Silmsers allegations; the priest had denied them, and both Bishop LaRocque and Monsignor McDougald believed Father MacDonald.

Chief Shaver testified that Bishop LaRocque confirmed that David Silmsers had originally sought an apology from the Diocese. He also testified that Bishop LaRocque explained there had been a subsequent $32,000 settlement; $10,000 was paid by the Diocese and $10,000 by Father Charles MacDonald, but the Bishop did not disclose the source of the remaining $12,000 payment. The Chief of Police asked the Bishop to explain why the Diocese had given money to Mr. Silmsers if Church officials in fact believed that Father MacDonald was innocent of the allegations. The Bishop simply replied that Mr. Silmsers needed money for counselling. Chief Shaver discussed the impropriety of the monetary settlement.

Bishop LaRocque stated that Jacques Leduc was the lawyer representing the Diocese in the Silmsers matter. Chief Shaver testified that he may have known at the time of this meeting that Malcolm MacDonald was counsel for Father Charles MacDonald. Bishop LaRocque explained that the lawyers had advised the Bishop to enter into the settlement with Mr. Silmsner. The Bishop stated that Father MacDonald had paid the money because he did not want his reputation soiled in the community. At this point, the Chief responded, “[T]his is going to come back and bite us both right in the butt.”

Chief Shaver did not ask the Bishop to identify the source of the $12,000 payment. At the time, it did not seem important. It “never dawned” on Chief Shaver that Ken Seguin could be involved in the settlement with Mr. Silmsner. The Chief’s primary concern was that the Diocese had tied his hands by entering into the monetary settlement.

Chief Shaver did not ask Bishop LaRocque whether there were confidentiality provisions in the settlement, nor did he ask the Bishop for a copy of the settlement documents. Claude Shaver believed the settlement was responsible for the termination of the criminal investigation. He agreed that in retrospect, the CPS should have examined the settlement documents prepared by the Diocese and signed by David Silmsner. When asked by Commission counsel whether it had dawned on Chief Shaver that the monetary settlement could be illegal, he replied “I had not thought about it at the time.” Staff Sergeant Derochie testified that if the purpose of the settlement was a payment of money to Mr. Silmsner to either avoid or terminate a criminal investigation, this would raise serious concerns for him. The Staff Sergeant testified that he would have wanted to confer with someone to determine the propriety of the settlement.

When Bishop LaRocque learned there were two other possible victims, he became visibly upset. Staff Sergeant Brunet told the Bishop, without revealing names, that two people (C-3 and C-56) had disclosed that they also had been sexually molested by Father MacDonald when they were teenagers. Bishop LaRocque told the CPS officials that he had been concerned when he was initially approached with the prospect of a civil settlement with Mr. Silmsner. He said that he had been led to believe by the lawyers involved in the negotiations that the police had not found other evidence to corroborate the allegations of abuse by David Silmsner. Bishop LaRocque said he would meet with Father MacDonald that evening.

At the conclusion of the meeting with the Bishop, Chief Shaver discussed the need for the Diocese to develop a protocol on sexual abuse. Bishop LaRocque had recently returned from a conference on sexual abuse. The development of a protocol on clergy abuse is discussed in Chapter 8, on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Bishop LaRocque called Chief Shaver later that evening. He said he felt betrayed. According to Claude Shaver, Bishop LaRocque said that Father Charles

MacDonald had admitted the assault, but then abruptly said it wasn't an assault but rather an isolated homosexual relationship. The Bishop told Chief Shaver that Father MacDonald would be removed from the parish and sent to a treatment centre for priests for an assessment. The Bishop apologized to the Cornwall Chief of Police. Inscribed in Chief Shaver's notes of the call is: "Charlie admits—will go treatment special place—study 1 week—would rec.—leaves Saturday—no further contact—Bishop sorry."

Chief Shaver testified that it was his understanding of this conversation with the Bishop that Father MacDonald had not admitted to sexually assaulting David Silmser. Had that been the case, he said, the CPS would have reopened the investigation against the priest. The isolated homosexual incident discussed by the Bishop in the telephone call was unrelated to the allegations of sexual abuse by David Silmser, said Claude Shaver at the hearings. Staff Sergeant Brunet testified that Chief Shaver discussed the telephone call he had received from the Bishop the previous evening and relayed that Father MacDonald had admitted he was a homosexual and that he would be undergoing treatment. Chief Shaver subsequently retained a lawyer, Colin McKinnon, to represent him in a lawsuit initiated by Mr. Silmser. In a statement prepared in early 1994 by the Chief for his lawyer, entitled "D.S. Alleged Sexual Assault," Claude Shaver wrote: "The Bishop contacted me later and advised that the Priest had admitted the assault and that it was an isolated incident and he was prepared to leave for the treatement [sic] / assessment Center immediately." There are clearly inconsistencies between Chief Shaver's written notes from 1993 and 1994, what he told Staff Sergeant Brunet and OPP Detective Inspector Smith, and what he said in his testimony at the Inquiry as to whether Father Charles MacDonald had admitted to Bishop LaRocque that he had sexually assaulted David Silmser.

It was apparent to Deputy Chief St. Denis on October 7, 1993, that Chief Shaver was "by-passing the chain of command" and that the Deputy Chief was not being included in discussions about the Silmser matter with the Criminal Investigation Bureau and Youth Bureau. As Deputy Chief St. Denis wrote:

... [M]y diary book has an entry on October 7, 1993, indicating the Chief and Staff Sergeant Brunet were going to Ottawa re; Silmser file.

At this point, it was obvious to me that Chief Shaver was by-passing the chain-of-command, as I had little or no input or was not involved in most discussions between the Chief's Office and CIB/Youth Bureau.

There was clearly tension and a poor working relationship between Chief Shaver and Deputy Chief St. Denis. This is discussed in further detail in this chapter.

The day after the meeting with the Papal Nuncio and Bishop LaRocque, Chief Shaver and Staff Sergeant Brunet met with the executive director of the CAS, Richard Abell, and Angelo Towndale. Angelo Towndale was on the Cornwall Police Services Board in 1993, and Staff Sergeant Brunet was on the Board of the Children's Aid Society. Chief Shaver discussed his meetings with the Papal Nuncio and Bishop LaRocque. Inscribed in Mr. Abell's notes of the October 8, 1993, meeting is the following:

Bishop says he is against the payoff but took the advice of his lawyers, (Leduc, Malcolm MacDonald).

Acknowledged he had a mess on his hands—the decision to pay off will come back to “haunt him.”

Chief/Luc tell him we are informed—to expect to hear from us.

Some discussion on need for a protocol to handle these matters.

Richard Abell said he planned to meet with Bishop LaRocque and, in addition, would inform the Ministry of Correctional Services about the allegations against Mr. Ken Seguin. It does not appear that the CAS contacted the Ministry of Correctional Services.

In October 1993, Chief Shaver did not instruct any of his officers to obtain the settlement papers between the Diocese and David Silmser. The CPS Chief clearly understood that a criminal prosecution could be pursued even if there had been a civil settlement. The Chief also did not ask the Bishop for a list of altar boys to assess whether other young people had been sexually molested by Father MacDonald. Chief Shaver did not pursue the investigation against the priest or Ken Seguin. As will be discussed, it was during this time that the Cornwall Police Services Board were negotiating an early retirement package with Chief Shaver.⁴²

The Derochie Investigation

Deputy Chief St. Denis sent a confidential note to Staff Sergeant Derochie on October 7, 1993, requesting him to conduct an internal investigation of Constable

42. As I discuss in this chapter, Chief Shaver entered discussions and negotiations with Mayor Martelle regarding his retirement from the Cornwall Police Service and severance package in about February or March 1993. Members of the Cornwall Police Services Board were not aware of these discussions at that time.

Perry Dunlop's behaviour in the Silmsers matter. Staff Sergeant Derochie, until this time, had no knowledge of the allegations made by the complainant, David Silmsers.

Staff Sergeant Derochie met with Staff Sergeant Brunet on October 12, 1993. Staff Sergeant Brunet explained that Constable Dunlop, who had no involvement in the Silmsers file, had approached Constable Sebalj and asked to read Mr. Silmsers's statement. Constable Sebalj willingly gave the statement to her colleague Perry Dunlop, who in turn shared the information with his wife, Helen. Ms Dunlop subsequently made contact with Mr. Silmsers, the complainant, and questioned him on the reasons he had decided to withdraw his complaint against Father MacDonald. As Staff Sergeant Derochie stressed in his testimony, it was "totally improper" for a police officer's spouse to contact an alleged victim. Staff Sergeant Brunet told Staff Sergeant Derochie that Perry Dunlop had provided a copy of the Silmsers statement to the Children's Aid Society, which Staff Sergeant Derochie also thought was inappropriate.

Staff Sergeant Derochie met with Constable Sebalj that day, and she confirmed the information conveyed by Staff Sergeant Brunet. Not surprisingly, Constable Sebalj felt betrayed by Constable Dunlop's actions; she had given the Silmsers statement to Constable Dunlop for what she believed was an innocent purpose and he had shared the information with his wife and an outside agency. Constable Sebalj was visibly shaken by these events and was concerned that she had disclosed the confidential statement to Constable Dunlop.

Staff Sergeant Derochie also met with Constable Dunlop on October 12, 1993, to explain that he had been asked to conduct an investigation, pursuant to the Police Services Act, of Constable Dunlop's behaviour in the Silmsers matter. Perry Dunlop became extremely upset.

After reading the relevant documents on the Silmsers investigation and meeting with these officers, Staff Sergeant Derochie began to realize that "there were far larger issues at stake here than that involving Cst. Dunlop." In his notes of October 12, 1993, Garry Derochie wrote, "I was beginning to form the opinion that although wrong Dunlop might be able to justify his actions, i.e. the case had been mishandled, and he was acting in good faith ... for the good of the community."

Staff Sergeant Derochie met with the executive director of the CAS a few days later. At the October 14, 1993, meeting, Mr. Abell made it clear that he was a friend of Constable Dunlop. Mr. Abell had been at a gathering at a local restaurant to listen to music played by Perry Dunlop, whom he considered a gifted musician. Mr. Abell explained that it was in the parking lot of Quinn's Inn in St. Andrews that Perry had approached him with the dilemma with which he was struggling regarding the Silmsers matter. Mr. Abell explained that he subsequently went to the Dunlop home to read the Silmser statement. He had asked for a copy of the statement, which Perry Dunlop provided to him. Perry Dunlop, he said, felt so strongly about the principles involved in this matter that the CPS Constable was prepared to place his job at risk.

Mr. Abell informed Staff Sergeant Derochie that the CAS was initiating a formal investigation into the Silmser allegations of sexual abuse. His agency intended to investigate the allegations involving Father Charles MacDonald and he planned to contact the Ministry of Correctional Services regarding the allegations involving probation officer Ken Seguin.

It was clear to Staff Sergeant Derochie that the CAS executive director had serious concerns about the CPS investigation of the Silmser case. Mr. Abell stressed that the Children's Aid Society is responsible for the protection of children and that his agency should have been involved at an earlier time in the Silmser matter. This "caught" Staff Sergeant Derochie "off-guard." The CPS officer did not think the CAS had the mandate to investigate allegations of historical sexual assault. He, like some of his colleagues on the Cornwall police force, also thought the CAS mandate was restricted to intra-familial and not extra-familial cases of sexual abuse:

... [I]t was my understanding that a CAS mandate would—we'd have to identify a child at risk now in the community as opposed to a child that would have been at risk 20 years ago, you know, as an historical thing. Was there evidence—was there evidence that a—as a—of a child being at risk in the community; our understanding was they weren't—they weren't mandate to investigation sexual—or historical sexual—or allegations of historical sexual assault.

...

[M]y understanding was it was familial situations as opposed to outside of the family unit, as it were, situation and I—I didn't pursue that because it—it—it caused me to pause and think of my understanding of the whole duty to report with CAS may be wrong and I wanted, you know, I wasn't going to argue openly with him there or discuss openly because I didn't know. He caused me enough confusion that I wanted to go back and evaluate my understanding of our duty to report.

It is clear that the Chief of the Cornwall Police Service and his officers did not clearly understand their duty to report suspected child sexual abuse under the statutory provisions in the Child and Family Services Act. They had the mistaken view that the duty to report to the CAS did not extend to extra-familial cases, that is, to cases in which the alleged perpetrator was not a family member. Also, contrary to the view of Mr. Abell, members of the Cornwall Police Service did not believe they had a duty to report abuse of historical cases, even if children were currently at risk of abuse by the perpetrator. Mr. Abell mentioned to Staff Sergeant Derochie that in his meeting with Claude Shaver, the Chief had acknowledged that the Cornwall Police Service had poorly managed the investigation of the Silmsers complaint. Mr. Abell also discussed the declared conflict of interest by the local Crown, Murray MacDonald, who had nevertheless provided advice to Constable Sebalj on the Silmsers file as to whether criminal charges should be laid.

After the meeting with Mr. Abell, Staff Sergeant Derochie returned to the office to consult with his superiors, Chief Shaver and Deputy Chief St. Denis. Staff Sergeant Derochie had “serious concerns” and “saw the apparent mismanagement of the investigation overshadowing Dunlop’s involvement.” He was prepared to conclude at that point that charges under the Police Services Act should not be laid against Constable Dunlop. As Staff Sergeant Derochie testified, “I was willing to give Perry Dunlop the benefit of the doubt very early in the game that he was acting in good faith in making this disclosure to the CAS.”

Chief Shaver and Deputy Chief St. Denis “acknowledged that the case had fallen between the cracks and that there may have been some mismanagement.” They were concerned about the length of the investigation—the file had been inactive for many months—and the circumstances under which the investigation of the Silmsers complaint had been terminated. Nevertheless, Chief Shaver made it clear that he wanted Staff Sergeant Derochie to focus on his mandate, which was Constable Dunlop’s disclosure of the contents of the Silmsers file to his wife, Helen, and his provision of a copy of the Silmsers statement to the Children’s Aid Society. Chief Shaver indicated that he planned to initiate a second investigation into the management of the criminal investigation by officers at the Cornwall Police Service.

Helen Dunlop Arrives at Chief Shaver’s Home, Registers Complaint About the Treatment of Her Husband by the CPS

On the evening of October 14, 1993, Helen Dunlop arrived at Chief Shaver’s home and knocked on his front door. Ms Dunlop had not informed her husband that she planned to visit the Chief at his home. When he came to the door, Ms Dunlop asked Claude Shaver if he recognized her. The Chief replied that he had been at her wedding and identified her as Perry Dunlop’s wife. The Chief invited Ms Dunlop into his living room and asked her if she would like to sit down.

Ms Dunlop was very upset. She was clearly concerned about her husband’s job. As she said at the hearings:

... I was trying to defend my husband; trying to protect him; because I felt what was happening to him was unfair and that he had little to no support from his colleagues and I wanted to know for myself and hear from Mr. Shaver himself what was going on.

Ms Dunlop questioned the Chief about why Perry was being subjected to an investigation as he had done something honourable—he had reported allegations of child abuse to the Children’s Aid Society. According to the evidence of Helen Dunlop, the Chief became agitated and banged his fist on the coffee table. He yelled at her to leave his home, to which she responded, “I know you intimidate a lot of guys at the police station, but you don’t intimidate me and I’m not going to let you do this to my husband.” She said that the Chief showed her to the door, slammed it, and turned off the lights. Claude Shaver denied that he yelled at Ms Dunlop or that he banged his fist on the coffee table.

Chief Shaver did not understand why Ms Dunlop thought her husband’s job was in jeopardy. As mentioned, the Chief had had a meeting earlier that day with Deputy Chief St. Denis and Staff Sergeant Derochie at which it had been agreed that the Police Services Act charges against Constable Dunlop “did not appear called for” and that the primary concern was problems with the criminal investigation of the Silmsers’ allegations, not Constable Dunlop’s behaviour.

Chief Shaver contacted Staff Sergeant Derochie at his home that evening after Ms Dunlop had left. He met with the Staff Sergeant and Deputy Chief St. Denis the following day. According to Staff Sergeant Derochie, the Chief was “still shaken from Ms Dunlop’s visit of the night before.” The Chief explained that Perry Dunlop’s wife Helen had arrived at his home, unannounced. He said that she had been very aggressive and had accused the Chief of placing Perry Dunlop’s job at risk. Chief Shaver was perplexed at Ms Dunlop’s reaction as he thought that the force’s approach had been reasonable and “rather mild.” Staff Sergeant Derochie told the Chief he had assured Constable Dunlop that the consequences for providing the CAS with the Silmsers’ statement and discussing it with his wife, Helen, would not be serious. Staff Sergeant Derochie had also conveyed this information to Constable Dan O’Reilly, who in turn asked Constable Quinn to provide this reassurance to Perry Dunlop.

Chief Shaver made it clear that Constable Dunlop was merely to be counselled “for going outside of channels,” that is, informally disciplined. In fact, the Chief of Police had drafted a document to that effect on the evening of October 14, 1993. He told Staff Sergeant Derochie to counsel Constable Dunlop as soon as possible. As Staff Sergeant Derochie explained at the Inquiry, counselling is a very low level of discipline. A notation is placed in the officer’s personnel file to the effect that the matter at issue was discussed and that the officer was counselled.

At the October 15 meeting, Staff Sergeant Derochie was instructed to provide a factual overview of the Silmser investigation—to furnish a chronology of events from the time Mr. Silmser made the complaint to the CPS in December 1992. In other words, Staff Sergeant Derochie's mandate had been expanded from a review of Constable Dunlop's conduct to a review of the Silmser investigation by officers at the Cornwall Police Service.

Constable Dunlop Is Not "Counselled" for His Transgression

Staff Sergeant Derochie decided to discuss Constable Dunlop's involvement in the Silmser matter with Staff Sergeant D'Arcy Dupuis. The meeting took place on October 15, 1993, in the early afternoon at the home of Staff Sergeant Dupuis. Constable Dunlop had shared his concerns and anxiety with Staff Sergeant Dupuis after meeting with Staff Sergeant Derochie on October 12, 1993. Perry Dunlop, Staff Sergeant Derochie learned, had been "distraught" and "in tears over this issue."

In accordance with Chief Shaver's instructions on October 15, 1993, to counsel Constable Dunlop as soon as possible, it was Staff Sergeant Derochie's intention to carry out the Chief's orders that day. But unfortunately, Constable Dunlop went on sick leave on October 15 and did not arrive at work for his shift. As Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote in his notes, "On reporting for duty on the night shift, I was informed, through the grapevine, that Dunlop was off on sick leave and would be off until this investigation was completed." It was apparent to Garry Derochie that Constable Dunlop was evading criticism of his conduct in the Silmser matter. In his notes, Staff Sergeant Derochie added, "Cst. Dunlop was not prepared to take any criticism for his actions in this incident. He sees himself as a white knight fighting the good fight."

In Staff Sergeant Derochie's view, Cornwall police management was not "being heavy-handed" in the consequences it was imposing on Constable Dunlop for (1) giving the Silmser statement to the CAS, and (2) disclosing the confidential contents of Mr. Silmser's allegations to his wife. But the counselling session with Constable Dunlop never took place. Staff Sergeant Derochie stated that when Constable Dunlop returned to work, there was not an appropriate time to counsel him. The Staff Sergeant testified that he attempted through Constable Quinn to encourage Perry Dunlop to meet with him to resolve the matter but was told that Constable Dunlop would not make himself available for counselling.

In discussions with Richard Abell on November 4, 1993, Staff Sergeant Derochie learned that Bill Carriere at the CAS was responsible for the investigation of the Silmser file at the agency. The CAS had met with Mr. Silmser the previous week, and officials at the agency believed that he fit the profile of a victim of multiple abuse over a several years. Mr. Abell commented to Staff Sergeant

Derochie that in situations in which the Church is involved with allegations of sexual abuse, there are occasionally “cover-ups.” The CAS executive director thought that perhaps Mr. Silmsers had been paid money by the Church “to keep things quiet.” Inscribed in Staff Sergeant Derochie’s notes of the November 4, 1993, meeting is:

As in the case when members of the Church are involved, cover ups are sometime [sic] involved. He believed that this might be the case in this incident. Silmsers had been paid off to keeps [sic] things quiet.

At this meeting, both Staff Sergeant Derochie and Mr. Abell “agreed that it was important that the suspects in this case (Father MacDonald and Mr. Seguin) be identified to the community and that they answer for their actions.”

After this meeting with the CAS, Staff Sergeant Derochie returned to the station to meet with Staff Sergeant Brunet and Constable Sebalj. Constable Sebalj reported that Mr. Silmsers had called her and was very upset. He wanted to know how the CAS knew about the allegations of sexual abuse that he had disclosed to the Cornwall police. Mr. Silmsers also told Constable Sebalj that a “crazy woman” had been phoning him and had travelled to Bourget to his home. Mr. Silmsers provided Constable Sebalj with a piece of paper that contained a telephone number and the name, “Helen.” Mr. Silmsers did not know that Helen Dunlop was the spouse of a CPS officer.

It was in November 1993 that Staff Sergeant Derochie began his expanded mandate, namely an examination of how the CPS investigated the Silmsers complaint.

In discussions with Staff Sergeant Brunet and Constable Sebalj on November 4, 1993, Staff Sergeant Derochie learned that David Silmsers had made a decision during the police investigation not to pursue the complaint against Ken Seguin. These officers told Staff Sergeant Derochie that Mr. Silmsers had been in contact with Mr. Seguin and had assured his former probation officer that the criminal allegations against him were not proceeding at that time. Staff Sergeant Derochie understood that a payment of $32,000 had been offered to Mr. Silmsers from three sources: the Church, Father MacDonald, and an unknown source. The Staff Sergeant thought that perhaps this “mystery money” was from Mr. Ken Seguin. His notes of November 4, 1993, state:

This may explain where the mystery money came from. (Silmsers’s cash settlement included a portion from the Church, a portion from Fr. MacDonald and a third portion ($10,000.00 or $12,000.00) from an unknown source.

Staff Sergeant Derochie understood that Malcolm MacDonald was acting on behalf of both Father Charles MacDonald and Ken Seguin. He thought that either Mr. Seguin or Malcolm MacDonald, on behalf of Mr. Seguin, had provided the “mystery money” to David Silmser. Staff Sergeant Derochie did not do any follow-up regarding this cash offer to Mr. Silmser; nor, to his knowledge, did any of his fellow officers at the Cornwall Police Service.

Staff Sergeant Derochie testified that in hindsight, he thought that before the matter became public in January 1994, the CPS should have asked for the settlement documents in order to assess whether Mr. Silmser’s decision not to proceed with the criminal investigation was voluntary.

Staff Sergeant Derochie also learned on November 4, 1993, that Father MacDonald’s lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, was “rumoured to have a sexual preference for little boys.” He was told that Malcolm MacDonald, Father MacDonald, and Ken Seguin were “close friends” who moved “within the same circles.” Staff Sergeant Derochie did not follow up on the connection between these three men. CPS officers should have realized that Malcolm MacDonald may have had a motive to ensure that a financial settlement was reached between the Diocese, Father MacDonald, and David Silmser, which had the effect of preventing Mr. Silmser from pursuing the criminal complaint. Staff Sergeant Derochie was also told at that time that the father of Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald, Milton MacDonald, had been convicted of sexually assaulting a young boy several years earlier in Lancaster.

Staff Sergeant Derochie briefed Chief Shaver and Deputy Chief St. Denis on the progress of his inquiries and of the meetings with Richard Abell, Staff Sergeant Brunet, and Constable Sebalj. They discussed Constable Dunlop’s conduct in the Silmser matter. Staff Sergeant Derochie told his superiors that “Dunlop had either exercised incredibly bad judgment or that his actions had been more calculated and sinister than originally thought.” It was Staff Sergeant Derochie’s opinion that Perry Dunlop could have resolved his concerns regarding the Silmser allegations through the chain of command.

During the course of this discussion, Staff Sergeant Derochie told the Chief and Deputy Chief that he thought criminal charges should be laid, if possible, against both Father MacDonald and Ken Seguin. He also mentioned that the CAS executive director, Richard Abell, wanted criminal charges to be pursued. As Staff Sergeant Derochie inscribed in his notes of November 4, 1993:

If there is a chance to continue and undue [sic] some of the damage which was done by not dealing (apparently at this time) with the complaint in a more timely manner ... then we would all do what we had to in order to fix this investigation.

Staff Sergeant Derochie suggested to the Chief and Deputy Chief that he meet with the Crown prosecutor from L'Original, Mr. Pelletier. But this did not take place because according to "protocol," a meeting would have to be arranged through the local Crown, Murray MacDonald. And according to Staff Sergeant Derochie, Murray MacDonald would only do so if the victim, David Silmser, was prepared to cooperate and go forward with the criminal investigation.

Despite the views of Staff Sergeant Derochie (as well as Richard Abell), the Cornwall Police Service decided not to re-investigate the Silmser matter with a view to possibly laying charges against the priest and probation officer. The CPS decided that it would simply cooperate with the Children's Aid Society in its investigation. But when the CAS the following day asked the Cornwall police for the names of the two other men who alleged that Father MacDonald had sexually assaulted them when they were young, the CPS was not willing to share this information. Greg Bell, a CAS worker assigned to the Silmser investigation, asked Staff Sergeant Derochie for the names of these two victims. Chief Shaver instructed Staff Sergeant Derochie not to disclose this information to the CAS as these two victims did not want to be identified. But the CPS did not follow up with these two men in November 1993 to determine if they would be willing to disclose their identities. Staff Sergeant Derochie acknowledged that, in retrospect, the Cornwall Police Service should have contacted these two individuals in November 1993 to assess whether they would be willing to cooperate with the investigation: "[I]n hindsight, I'm saying we should have done it." I agree. The Cornwall Police Service should have contacted these two men, who had alleged that they had also been sexually abused by Father Charles MacDonald.

Ken Seguin Found Dead

On the day before Ken Seguin's death, David Silmser contacted the Cornwall Police Service. In the November 24, 1993, call, received by Staff Sergeant Dupuis, Mr. Silmser told the officer that he was expecting to settle a civil suit involving sexual abuse within the next forty-eight hours. Mr. Silmser asked the police officer to file a report indicating that if anything happened to him, both Ken Seguin and Father MacDonald should be considered suspects. Staff Sergeant Dupuis filed a supplementary report after this telephone call from Mr. Silmser.

Staff Sergeant Brunet read the report of this call the following day. He showed it to Deputy Chief St. Denis, who instructed him to call the Chief. Claude Shaver was no longer working at the police station.⁴³ Staff Sergeant Brunet met the 43. Chief Shaver's retirement was announced in early November 1993.

Chief at his home to discuss the Silmser call of the previous day. Chief Shaver instructed Staff Sergeant Brunet to contact David Silmser to confirm that it was, in fact, he who made this call. Staff Sergeant Brunet was unable to reach Mr. Silmser that day.

That evening, November 25, 1993, Staff Sergeant Dupuis called Staff Sergeant Brunet's home to advise him that Ken Seguin had been found dead. Staff Sergeant Brunet contacted the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) the following day and was told that Detective Constables Randy Millar and Chris McDonell were investigating the Seguin death. Staff Sergeant Brunet wanted to inform the OPP about the Silmser call the previous night and David Silmser's allegations of sexual abuse by Ken Seguin. Staff Sergeant Derochie inscribed in his notes the day after Ken Seguin's suicide: "It was obvious to all of us that Silmser's wanting more money and his threatening to expose Seguin was, most likely, the reason he took his own life."

Ken Seguin was never interviewed by the Cornwall Police Service. Nor was the probation officer investigated for the allegations by David Silmser of sexual assault. Mr. Silmser was one of many males in the Cornwall community who alleged that they were sexually assaulted by Ken Seguin, a probation officer at the Ministry of Correctional Services for over twenty-five years.

On November 26, 1993, Staff Sergeants Derochie and Brunet met with OPP Detective Constables McDonell and Millar. They offered the OPP information and documents in relation to the Silmser allegations of sexual abuse by Mr. Seguin.

In mid-December 1993, Mr. Silmser called Staff Sergeant Derochie. He criticized the Cornwall police for the lack of attention to the investigation and for the long periods in which the file had remained dormant: "ten months and nothing has been done by the Cornwall Police."

In early January 1994, Acting Chief Carl Johnston, who had succeeded Chief Shaver, asked Staff Sergeant Derochie to submit his report of the CPS investigation of Constable Dunlop. The report was submitted January 8, 1994.

That month Acting Chief Johnston decided to ask an external police force to review the Silmser investigation by the Cornwall Police Service. In particular, he wanted to determine whether an efficient investigation had been conducted and whether any officer of the Cornwall police had concealed or downplayed the Silmser allegations of sexual abuse by Father Charles MacDonald and probation officer Ken Seguin. Acting Chief Johnston contacted the Ottawa Police Service and Superintendent Brian Skinner and Staff Sergeant William (Bill) Blake arrived in Cornwall on January 10, 1994. This is discussed in fuller detail in the following section.

In March 1994, Staff Sergeant Derochie instructed Constable Quinn to counsel Perry Dunlop. As mentioned, this had been decided in the fall of 1993, when Claude Shaver was the police chief, but counselling did not take place as Constable

Dunlop went on sick leave. Staff Sergeant Derochie “wanted to get this done.” In March 1994, Perry Dunlop was still on sick leave. Constable Quinn reported to Staff Sergeant Derochie that Perry Dunlop had no intention of coming to the police station to be counselled for his behaviour in the Silmsier case. As Staff Sergeant Derochie stated, Constable Dunlop “felt strongly that he wasn’t subject to being counselled” and “didn’t want to accept any criticism ... for what he had done.”

Staff Sergeant Derochie stated that Constable Dunlop’s decision was unfortunate as counselling would have put an end to this issue. The matter would not have been pursued under the Police Services Act. Instead, a formal complaint was made to the Board of Inquiry for breach of confidence and discreditable conduct. The Board stayed the proceedings, ruling in Constable Dunlop’s favour. There was an appeal by the Police Complaints Commission, the matter then went before the Ontario Divisional Court and was not resolved until December 1995. The Divisional Court dismissed the appeal of the Police Complaints Commissioner on December 7, 1995. The Cornwall Police Service did not consider issuing an order to Constable Dunlop either in the fall of 1993 or in early 1994 to the effect that he was obliged to report for counselling. “In retrospect,” Staff Sergeant Derochie thought that this “may have been a wiser course of action.”

On December 12, 1995, a Fifth Estate episode on Perry Dunlop was broadcast on CBC television. Chief Repa was upset that a sworn police officer was discussing on television confidential issues, in violation of the police oath. As Chief Repa said, this constituted further negative publicity about the Cornwall Police Service.

Constable Dunlop initiated a lawsuit against the Cornwall Police Service in 1996. He was on long-term disability leave at the time. I discuss Constable Dunlop’s activities and interviews with alleged victims of historical sexual abuse while he was on leave from the Cornwall Police Service later in this Report.

Conclusions of Staff Sergeant Derochie on His Review of the CPS Investigation of the Silmsier Complaint

Staff Sergeant Derochie came to several conclusions in his review of the CPS investigation of the Silmsier complaint. There was clearly a lack of proper documentation in this case. No reports were added to OMPPAC during the investigation. As the Staff Sergeant said, senior officers and management “lost track” of this “high profile investigation.” His concern was that if the Chief or Deputy Chief had wanted to monitor this case, “there was only an incident created, no reports filed, no people appended to the system.” This was not “proper” practice. There was no documentation for a significant period.

Constable Sebalj's supervisors did not realize that "she was not filing reports ... [T]he Deputy Chief and the Chief, who were both aware that it was a high profile investigation, to my ... knowledge, never did make any ... inquiries about it, they just moved onto other things. It appears that this thing ... slips between the cracks."

Staff Sergeant Derochie stated that this was a problem with other sexual abuse investigations conducted by the Cornwall Police Service. His concerns about case management, supervision, record keeping, and delay in the Silmsers investigation were also problems that he noted in the Jeannette Antoine case and the Earl Landry Jr. investigation.

The complainant had clearly requested a male officer. David Silmsers did not feel comfortable discussing the details of his sexual abuse with Constable Heidi Sebalj. In Staff Sergeant Derochie's view, the investigation could have been reassigned to Sergeant Lortie, an experienced senior police officer who was male.

Staff Sergeant Derochie also thought that the allegations of abuse by Ken Seguin should have been investigated. As he said in his testimony, it greatly concerned him that the CPS did not investigate David Silmsers' allegations of sexual abuse by his former probation officer, Ken Seguin.

After his review of the Silmsers case, it was obvious to Staff Sergeant Derochie that historical sexual assault investigations at the CPS were characterized by delay and did not receive the attention given by officers to other criminal investigations.

After carefully reviewing the evidence of the police investigation of the David Silmsers complaint, it is my conclusion that the Cornwall Police Service failed to have in place and enforce existing practices and procedures that would have ensured that the investigation into the allegations of historical sexual abuse by Mr. Silmsers was conducted in a timely manner and was assigned high priority. In my view, the Cornwall Police Service unreasonably delayed the investigation and failed to ensure that there were appropriate resources for the investigation of the allegations of historical sexual abuse. It is also evident that the Cornwall Police Service failed to enforce practices and procedures that would have ensured that notes and records were properly kept and stored, and that they were retrievable. It also failed to properly supervise investigators such as Constable Heidi Sebalj during the investigation into the allegations by Mr. Silmsers of sexual abuse by Father MacDonald and Ken Seguin. The Cornwall Police Service also failed to ensure that the complainant was offered support and kept apprised of the status of the investigation. Moreover, it failed to institute proper practices and develop protocols to ensure that there was effective cooperation with other public institutions such as the Children's Aid Society.

It is also my view that Staff Sergeant Brunet failed to properly supervise Constable Heidi Sebalj during the investigation of the Silmsers' allegations of sexual abuse against Father Charles MacDonald and Ken Seguin. As supervisor, he ought to have ensured that allegations of historical sexual abuse were assigned high priority and were conducted in a timely manner. He also failed to assign an experienced male investigator to the case, as had been requested by the complainant, Mr. Silmsers. Nor did Staff Sergeant Brunet take adequate measures to ensure that an investigation was conducted into allegations against Cornwall probation and parole officer Ken Seguin. He also failed to cause an investigation to be conducted into the legality of the purported settlement between David Silmsers and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in the fall of 1993. Moreover, Staff Sergeant Brunet ought to have taken measures to ensure that notes and records were properly kept and stored, and that they were retrievable. He also failed to ensure that complainants making allegations of historical sexual abuse were dealt with appropriately, offered support, and kept apprised of the status of the investigation into their complaints.

It is also clear from the review of the evidence that Constable Heidi Sebalj failed to conduct a thorough, adequate, and timely investigation into allegations of sexual abuse made against Father Charles MacDonald and Ken Seguin by David Silmsers. She failed to keep proper notes and records of her investigation. Constable Sebalj failed to update OMPPAC in a timely manner with respect to her investigation and contact with David Silmsers. Constable Sebalj did not report to the Children's Aid Society that there might be children in need of protection as a result of the allegations made against Father Charles MacDonald and Ken Seguin by David Silmsers. She also did not properly brief her supervisors on the progress of the investigation. Moreover, Constable Sebalj failed to conduct a thorough, adequate, and timely investigation into the legality of the purported settlement between David Silmsers and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in the fall of the 1993. In addition, she did not take appropriate steps to ensure that Mr. Silmsers' refusal to proceed with his complaints were made free from coercion, duress, or inducement. And very importantly, Constable Sebalj failed to offer the victim support and to keep Mr. Silmsers informed about the investigation.

Cornwall Chief of Police Claude Shaver and Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis did not take measures to ensure that policies, practices, and procedures were in place and/or enforced to ensure that the investigation into allegations of historical sexual abuse by Mr. Silmsers were assigned priority and conducted in a timely manner. They failed to ensure that a comprehensive investigation was conducted into allegations of historical sexual abuse made by David Silmsers in December 1992 against Cornwall probation and parole officer Ken Seguin and Father Charles MacDonald. In addition, Chief Shaver failed to have in place and enforce policies, practices, and procedures that would have ensured that investigators and other members of the Cornwall Police Service were properly supervised in the conduct of their investigations of sexual abuse of young people. Chief Shaver also failed to institute proper practices or develop protocols to ensure that there was effective cooperation with other public institutions, such as the Children's Aid Society. I also find that Chief Shaver, by not instructing his officers to obtain and examine the settlement documents, failed to investigate or cause an investigation to be conducted into the legality of the purported settlement between David Silmsers, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, and Father Charles MacDonald in fall 1993.

With respect to Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis, he failed to ensure that investigators and other members of the police force were properly trained in the conduct of investigations into allegations of historical sexual abuse. Moreover, he did not enforce practices and procedures that would have ensured that notes and records were properly kept and stored, and that they were retrievable. Deputy Chief St. Denis also failed to develop policies or enforce practices that would have ensured that complainants making allegations of historical sexual abuse were dealt with appropriately, offered support, and kept apprised of the status of the investigation. He also failed to develop practices and/or protocols to ensure there was effective cooperation with other public institutions such as the Children's Aid Society. Furthermore, Deputy Chief St. Denis did not take measures to ensure that the Officer in Charge of the Criminal Investigation Bureau assigned an experienced male investigator, as requested by the complainant, to the David Silmsers case. He also failed to supervise the Officer in Charge of the Criminal Investigation Bureau with respect to the allegations of historical sexual abuse made by David Silmsers in December 1992.

On January 6, 1994, David Silmsers's statement to the Cornwall Police Service regarding his allegations of child sexual abuse appeared in the media. The story was aired on CJOH-TV by Charlie Greenwell, and newspaper reports appeared in the Standard-Freeholder, the Ottawa Citizen, and the Ottawa Sun. This is discussed further in the following sections.

Ottawa Police Service Asked to Investigate Allegations of Cover-up by the Cornwall Police Service in the Silmsers Matter

In January 1994, Acting Chief Carl Johnston contacted the Ottawa Police Service and spoke to Deputy Chief Donald Lyon about the prospect of having an outside police force review an investigation conducted by the Cornwall Police Service (CPS). Acting Chief Johnston asked the Ottawa Police Service:

1. to conduct a review of the investigation carried out by members of the Cornwall Police Service into allegations of sexual assault made by David Silmsner and to determine if the investigation was efficient; and
2. to assess whether members of the Cornwall Police Service downplayed or concealed the allegations.

The Deputy Chief of the Ottawa Police Service asked Superintendent Brian Skinner to conduct this review of the Silmsner investigation. It was decided that Staff Sergeant William (Bill) Blake, who was in the Criminal Intelligence Section of the Ottawa Police Service, would work with Superintendent Skinner on the review of the CPS investigation.

The two officers travelled to Cornwall on January 10, 1994. Acting Chief Johnston asked the Ottawa police officers if they would also investigate the means by which a Cornwall radio station had come into possession of David Silmsner's statement to the police. Superintendent Skinner replied that he would not conduct a separate investigation but would convey any relevant information that came to his attention on this issue. Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake met with Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis and Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet and were given case notes and documents pertaining to the Silmsner investigation.

Superintendent Skinner made it clear that it was not within his mandate to reinvestigate the Silmsner case. Neither David Silmsner nor other potential witnesses would be interviewed by the Ottawa officers.

Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake were in Cornwall for eight days, from January 10 to January 18, 1994. It was decided that Staff Sergeant Blake would be responsible for recording the notes of the meetings and interviews. Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie helped the officers arrange interviews with various members of the Cornwall Police Service.

The Ottawa police officers met with several members of the Cornwall Police Service, including Constable Heidi Sebalj, Staff Sergeant Brunet, Staff Inspector Stuart McDonald, Sergeant Claude Lortie, and Deputy Chief St. Denis. They also interviewed Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald and Richard Abell, the executive director of the Children's Aid Society.

No Investigative Activity for Over One Month, Lack of Documentation and Inadequate Reporting Process

A number of problems emerged from the beginning of their review of the investigation. The officers learned from their interviews that Sergeant Steve Nakic had received Mr. Silmsner's complaint on December 9, 1992. As I discussed earlier, Chief Claude Shaver had initially assigned Sergeant Lortie as the investigator in the Silmser matter, but the officer needed to take time off from work for a surgical procedure. Chief Shaver then instructed Constable Sebalj on January 13, 1993, to assume responsibility for the investigation. But no investigative activity took place until January 28, 1993, more than one and a half months after the complaint was received from Mr. Silmser. As Superintendent Skinner testified:

No interview with him was conducted until well into January, probably a month and a half or five weeks anyway, after the receipt of the initial complaint. So somebody wasn't supervising somewhere.

... [A]n investigation of that potential complexity and importance should have got off, in my opinion, to a much quicker start than that.

(Emphasis added)

Another serious problem was that the only documented record of the complaint was Sergeant Nakic's internal correspondence: "No report of any kind had been generated, no formal record of the investigative resources assigned to the complaint existed." As Superintendent Skinner states in his Report, "There are no records to enable anyone, within or without the Cornwall Police Service, to follow the progress of the investigation through its early stages." A further problem was that Sergeant Lortie, the original investigator, reported to the Chief of Police for the Silmser matter. This was a "questionable" decision as it "effectively removed Staff Sergeant BRUNET, the officer in charge of CIB, and Deputy Chief ST. DENIS, the officer having overall responsibility for CIB, from the management structure" for this investigation.

Constable Sebalj Remains Responsible for Silmser Investigation Despite Her Inexperience and the Complainant's Request for a Male Officer

It was clear from the inception of this investigation that the complainant was uncomfortable speaking with a female police officer about the sexual acts. As Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake wrote in the Report, when Constable Sebalj made her first contact with David Silmser on January 13, 1993, "SILMSER immediately pointed out that he was uncomfortable speaking with a female investigator and asked that a male officer be assigned." Mr. Silmser agreed to an interview with the CPS on January 18, 1993, with the proviso that a male officer be assigned to the investigation. He subsequently cancelled the appointment. In a further telephone call with Constable Sebalj on January 26, Mr. Silmser again expressed his discomfort speaking with a female police officer about the subject of his complaint. This was discussed with Chief Shaver and Sergeant

Ron Lefebvre the following day, but the Chief decided nonetheless to have Constable Sebalj remain in charge of the investigation. Superintendent Skinner stated that in these types of investigations, the general practice is to appoint a police investigator of the same gender:

Typically ... when it's an investigation of a complaint of that nature, a very personal situation, you try to appoint an investigator of the same gender as the complainant. It just makes things much easier, much more comfortable.

The Ottawa Police Superintendent also emphasized the importance of establishing a good rapport with the complainant and creating an atmosphere in which the victim feels comfortable disclosing as much information as possible:

... [I]t's critical early in an investigation that the investigator establish a good relationship and rapport with the victim in order to elicit whatever information you're looking for in order to pursue the investigation.

Another serious problem identified by the Ottawa police officers was that Constable Sebalj lacked experience in sexual assaults:

... In spite of her lack of experience and the fact that the victim was at first unwilling, later reluctant to cooperate with her, Chief SHAVER left her in charge of the investigation. He should have assigned a more experienced male investigator.

Superintendent Skinner elaborated in his testimony:

... [I]t's my belief that she was far too junior and inexperienced at that time to be given responsibility for such a potentially complex and even explosive investigation.

... I think—and again, I can only put myself in the position of someone in charge of the Criminal Investigation Division of a ... much larger force, I would have found an investigator who was ... much more experienced specifically in that type of investigation and who had a little bit more time involved in those types of investigations.

The Ottawa officers conceded that Constable Sebalj was manipulated by the complainant during the course of the investigation. David Silmsen changed appointments, failed to appear at arranged times, and was “generally difficult.” In their view, “A more experienced investigator may not have had the same problems,” and “there may not have been this resistance and obstruction” from the complainant. As mentioned, Sergeant Lortie returned to work after a minor surgical procedure on January 11, 1993, two days before Constable Sebalj was assigned the file. Given Constable Sebalj’s inexperience and the complainant’s request for a male officer, an important question that arises is why Sergeant Lortie was not reassigned the Silmsers investigation in mid-January 1993.

Failure to Recognize Urgency of Investigation

On January 13, 1993, the Cornwall police officers knew that David Silmsers had approached the Church with allegations of sexual abuse. This was confirmed on February 16, 1993, when Mr. Silmsers informed Constable Sebalj that Monsignor McDougald had called him and had discussed a civil settlement. Constable Sebalj was also aware from David Silmsers that he had told Mr. Ken Seguin that he was laying charges solely against the priest and that he did not want to proceed at this time with the investigation of the probation officer despite repeated sexual assaults by him. This information, according to Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake, “should have added a certain urgency to the investigation.” But “apparently,” it “did not,” wrote the Ottawa officers in their Report. As Superintendent Skinner said, because there was the “possibility at least that two people who were committing these types of offences were within the community ... the situation should be looked at as quickly as possible.”

Moreover, Father Charles MacDonald’s lawyer contacted Constable Sebalj on February 25, 1993, and indicated that his client was willing to undergo a polygraph examination. The Cornwall police did not follow up on this, despite the fact that the police force had an experienced polygraph examiner, Constable Brian Snyder. Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake thought the polygraph “should have been pursued.”

Failure to Meet With a Potential Witness

Constable Sebalj obtained statements from altar boys and members of church musical groups, two of whom clearly “recalled incidents of homosexual behaviour” by the priest. According to the Constable’s notes, she had a telephone call with a man who had been an altar boy in his youth. This man indicated to Constable Sebalj that the investigation was “scary stuff and very close to home,” and that he was not comfortable discussing it on the phone but wanted to meet the Cornwall officer in person. When Constable Sebalj told this potential witness she was unable to meet with him, his response was that nothing untoward had occurred. Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake stated in their Report that Constable Sebalj “should have arranged to see him in person.” She should have travelled to Ottawa to interview him. Constable Sebalj should have understood that it is often very difficult for a victim to disclose sexual abuse and that if the officer is not accommodating, the victim may not be able or willing to discuss the abuse or provide other details important to an investigation. As Superintendent Skinner testified:

... In every case where there was a reasonable expectation of furthering the investigation by meeting with a witness or a potential victim, then I think she should have met with them.

And there was one glaring example of that where she was contacted by a probable victim ... who was resident in Ottawa, who told her that he had things that he wanted to tell her but he was never interviewed.

... [H]e made it clear he didn’t want to discuss it on the telephone, he wanted to do it by way of a personal interview but that didn’t happen.

Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald’s Conflict of Interest

Constable Sebalj, as mentioned, met with Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald and spoke with him about some of the witnesses whom she had interviewed. At this March 2, 1993, meeting, the Constable had not yet spoken to the two witnesses who had disclosed sexual improprieties by the priest. Murray MacDonald expressed some doubts about the grounds for the prosecution.

Mr. MacDonald had revealed to Constable Sebalj during the CPS investigation that he could be in a perceived conflict of interest. The Crown attorney indicated that if it was likely criminal charges would be laid, he would refer the matter to another Crown. When Staff Sergeant Blake and Superintendent Skinner met with Murray MacDonald, they asked him to elaborate on the conflict of interest. Mr. MacDonald stated that in past years he had represented his church in Ecclesia 2000 and had assisted with the formulation of policies for the Catholic Church for cases of sexual misconduct by members of the clergy.⁴⁴ Because of this involvement, Mr. MacDonald thought this could place him in a perceived conflict with regard to conducting prosecutions against members of the clergy.

44. Murray MacDonald testified that he was a member of a Diocesan committee that addressed the issue of civil settlements regarding victims of abuse. It was recommended by the committee that the Church cooperate with the police from the outset and allow the police to investigate these types of allegations. The committee was advocating transparency and Mr. MacDonald testified that he “felt very strongly” and was the “main mover” with regard to this recommendation. When Mr. MacDonald learned that the recommendation had not been placed on the ballot, he walked out of the session. Mr. MacDonald stated in his evidence that he was opposed to confidentiality clauses or gag orders in these types of civil settlements with victims of abuse.

As discussed, the CPS received a document dated September 3, 1993, signed by David Silmser and his lawyer, Sean Adams, indicating that the police investigation should be terminated as Mr. Silmser had received a civil settlement. About eleven days later, Murray MacDonald wrote a letter to the Cornwall police in which he confirmed the Ministry policy of not compelling reluctant victims of sexual crimes to testify. He also discussed in this letter of September 14, 1993, the uncertainty of Constable Sebalj with respect to the existence of reasonable and probable grounds in the Silmser case. In this “very strongly worded” letter, said Superintendent Skinner, Murray MacDonald expressed difficulties in proceeding with the case:

... [T]his case is fraught with (due to his own conduct) a very non-credible complainant, saddled with an evident ulterior motive for making these allegations.

... This is especially so when that reluctant witness will be “crucified” in cross-examination.

In his interview with the Ottawa officers, Murray MacDonald also stated that he had reservations about Constable Sebalj’s experience and ability in conducting an investigation of this complexity.

Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake were critical of Murray MacDonald’s conduct in the Silmser investigation. In their Report, they stated that the Crown attorney had been “less than effective in his support of the Cornwall Police Service” in this investigation. In their opinion, Mr. MacDonald, after declaring his conflict of interest, should have “referred all aspects of the investigation and all inquiries by the investigator to another Crown Attorney.” And, they stressed, “Above all, he should not have placed himself in the position of writing a letter confirming that it was not advisable to charge a person against whom he would not conduct a prosecution.” The Ottawa officers also stated that Murray MacDonald “had a responsibility to voice his concern” about Constable Sebalj’s inexperience in this investigation to either the Chief of Police or the Deputy Chief. Crown Murray MacDonald’s involvement in the Silmser matter is discussed further in chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Leak of Victim’s Statement to the Public

Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake obtained little additional information with regard to the means by which a Cornwall radio station and

Charlie Greenwell of CJOH television came into possession of David Silmsers's statement. Chief Shaver told the Ottawa police officers that Mr. Greenwell had stated during a broadcast that he had received the statement from John Parisien, President of the Cornwall Police Association. In their Report, Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake discuss Constable Perry Dunlop's breach of trust, which resulted in the document becoming public:

It is already established that Cst. Perry DUNLOP was responsible for the original breach of trust which resulted in the document becoming public and he should bear all of the consequences for his actions.

It is important to note that evidence was not adduced at the Inquiry regarding the identity of the person who conveyed David Silmsers's statement to the media. It is also essential to note that the Divisional Court dismissed the case against Perry Dunlop under the Police Services Act for releasing a copy of the Silmsers statement to the CAS and divulging a matter required to be kept confidential. This is discussed in further detail in this Report.

“Inept and Ineffective” Investigation of the Cornwall Police Service

In the January 24, 1994, Report submitted by Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake to Acting Chief Johnston, the officers conclude that the investigation by the Cornwall Police Service of the Silmsers allegations was “inept and ineffective”:

The investigation into the allegations made to the Cornwall Police Service by David SILMSER was inept and ineffective. The responsibility for this rests with the Cornwall Police Service. The problems are systemic and, during the time of my review, still existed.
(Emphasis added)

Several problems were highlighted in the conclusion of the Report. First, CPS officers with inadequate experience and training were involved in the Silmsers investigation. In particular, Constable Sebalj did not have the qualifications to assume responsibility for such a complex file. As stated in the Skinner Report, Constable Sebalj was:

... not sufficiently qualified to undertake such a complex and potentially contentious investigation, was left to her own devices and failed to see the urgency of the situation. She was not adequately supported and, given the early objections to her assignment to the investigation by David SILMSER and his constantly difficult and obstructive behaviour, should never have been left in charge.

Second, there was a serious problem in the CPS with respect to record keeping in the Silmsers investigation. The documentation of this investigation was extremely deficient. As Superintendent Skinner said, there was “nothing to track the progress of the investigation” and if Constable Sebalj had become the victim of a tragedy, no officer of the Cornwall Police Service would have had access to information to this case:

... [T]here was a very serious lack of anything concrete to enable—had Constable Sebalj been the victim of an unfortunate accident or something like that, and wasn’t able to provide the information that she did through her notes and her verbal briefings, there would have been nothing to track.

...

... The concern was that there wasn’t a documented written flow of events dealing with the investigation and the progress of the investigation that could be monitored and could be assessed by supervisory and management personnel and which would also serve to be a living record of the investigation and its progress should anything happen to the investigator.

When the Cornwall Police Service had its first formal interview with David Silmsers on January 28, 1993, no written report was generated. There should have been a written record of the progress of the investigation on the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) or by other means so that other members of the police force could review the file. The interview lasted three hours. As mentioned, three CPS officers—Constable Sebalj, Sergeant Lefebvre, and Constable Kevin Malloy—each took notes, which the Ottawa officers also considered a problem as discrepancies could arise. Superintendent Skinner agreed that the first interview with Mr. Silmsers was a “very important” stage of the investigative process. If the matter went to trial, this was not the ideal way to start.

Constable Sebalj was away from the office for a few weeks in May and June 1993 to attend two courses at the Ontario Police College. During that time, no arrangements seemed to be made for another officer at the CPS to continue this investigation. The Ottawa Superintendent thought the Cornwall Police Service should have postponed Constable Sebalj’s courses at the Police College. Superintendent Skinner explained:

... [S]he was deeply involved in—I was going to say up to her neck, she was deeply involved in a potentially very complex investigation and she was effectively going away for three weeks of courses and during that time no arrangements were made, that I could see, for the investigation to be continued ... [T]hat's just no way to conduct an investigation, in my opinion.

Constable Sebalj had no notes of this investigation from April 29 until August 23, 1993, at which time she received a call from Father MacDonald's lawyer. As mentioned, on August 24, 1993, David Silmsen contacted Constable Sebalj to find out about the progress of the investigation. She told Mr. Silmsen that she was awaiting a meeting with a Crown attorney from out of town to discuss the case. When Staff Sergeant Brunet asked her for a progress report on August 24, Constable Sebalj made the same comment about arranging a meeting with an outside Crown attorney. Staff Sergeant Brunet instructed Constable Sebalj to conclude this investigation as soon as possible.

Superintendent Skinner testified that although “inept” and “ineffective” are “strong words,” they appropriately describe the investigation of the Silmsen complaint by the CPS. Superintendent Skinner summed up the Silmsen investigation as a “systemic breakdown of the Cornwall Police Service.” He referred to the delays after the complaint was received, the lack of attention and sense of urgency, the failure to interview possibly important witnesses, the lack of follow-up regarding the polygraph test, poor documentation of the investigation, and inadequate supervision. “It just has too many holes in it to be an effective investigation,” said Superintendent Skinner:

The complaint was received; nothing was done for five weeks. Then fairly early in the complaint the Service became aware that Mr. Silmsen was in contact with the Church and was seeking settlement and that still didn't seem to add any urgency to the investigation.

... [W]itnesses weren't interviewed that should have been. A suspect who volunteered for a polygraph test didn't have it followed up.

...

... [T]here was no management system in place that I could see to shepherd the investigation along, to supervise its progress. There was just nothing there. There wasn't even anything on paper to track the progress of the investigation. (Emphasis added)

There was clearly inadequate supervision of Constable Sebalj. Superintendent Skinner was critical of the commissioned police officers in the Cornwall Police Service: “I could see no clear direction or supervision or management skills from any of them”:

People who lacked the proper background and training were placed in positions for which they were ill-suited and unqualified and no management systems existed which would enable supervisors to track the progress of investigations. The mechanics are in place, but they are not effectively utilized.

...

In fact, no-one monitored the progress of the investigation and, even if someone had chosen to do so, their only recourse would have been to ask Cst. SEBALJ since no formal record of the complaint and the resulting investigation existed until October 1st, 1993, when Chief SHAVER ordered Staff Sergeant BRUNET to enter a full report on OMPACC [sic].

The Report, as mentioned, was critical not only of the officers involved in the investigation but also of senior members of the Cornwall Police Service. Problems clearly existed between Chief Shaver and Deputy St. Denis during the course of the investigation. There was inadequate communication, and Deputy St. Denis stated that the Chief had failed to keep him informed of the Silmsers investigation. As Superintendent Skinner wrote:

There are strong indications that communication between Chief SHAVER and Deputy Chief ST. DENIS was very poor. During my interviews with them, each blamed the other for communication breakdowns and a lack of direction. Chief SHAVER indicated that any information he received concerning the SILMSER case came from Deputy Chief ST. DENIS, and that he in fact directed him to write the January 8th memo to Staff Sergeant BRUNET pointing out its urgency. The Deputy Chief claimed that the Chief assumed overall control of the investigation and did not keep him informed.

Superintendent Skinner stressed that it is “critical that there is ongoing and constant exchange of information between” the Chief and the Deputy Chief: “[T]hey’re running the force.” They are responsible for ensuring that proper resources are appropriated and that good communications exist on the force. In Superintendent Skinner's view, there "appeared to be a real lack of communication within the Cornwall Police Service." Superintendent Skinner also stated that middle management did not supervise the investigation: "Staff Sergeant Brunet, as I understand it, was the head of the Criminal Investigation Bureau and should have been as involved in the investigation as Constable Sebalj in a supervisory position, of course."

No Cover-Up and Recommendations That an Outside Police Agency Conduct a Thorough Investigation of the Silmser Complaint

Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake concluded that there was no cover-up of the matter by the Cornwall Police Service. Rather, the Silmser investigation was characterized by a lack of adequate resources and "a lack of managerial direction and systemic support." As the 1994 Report states:

... [T]here was no attempt by any member of the Cornwall Police Service to "cover up" the situation. It was simply a case of inadequate resources being applied to an investigation, the potential complexity of which was not properly identified.

The Skinner Report also states that although there was no legislated duty to report the Silmser allegations of abuse to the Children's Aid Society, it could be argued that "it would have been prudent to inform the Childrens [sic] Aid Society." I discuss in greater detail the obligation to report complaints of child sexual abuse in the chapter on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society.

The Skinner Report recommended that "an outside police agency be asked to conduct a complete investigation into the events and allegations which resulted from this particular complaint." Superintendent Skinner later learned that the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) became involved in this matter. The following chapter discusses Project Truth and the involvement of the OPP in the investigation of cases of historical sexual abuse of children and young persons in the Cornwall area.

In my view, Superintendent Brian Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake of the Ottawa Police Service conducted a good review of the Cornwall Police Service investigation of the Silmser allegations of sexual assault. As is evident in earlier sections of this chapter, I agree with many of their conclusions regarding the problems involved in the Cornwall Police Service investigation of David Silmser's allegations that he was sexually abused by a priest and a probation officer when he was a young person.

News Releases by Cornwall Police Services Board Regarding Skinner Report: Transparency?

January 11, 1994 Press Release: Courville Undertakes That Board Will Be Forthcoming With Ottawa Police Review of Silmsers Investigation

After David Silmsers statement was leaked to the press on January 6, 1994, the Cornwall Police Services Board decided to issue a news release. Mr. Leo Courville, Chair of the Board, who signed and is identified as the “originator” of the January 11, 1994, release, stated that “the impetus behind the press release” was damage control.

The news release states:

In view of extensive media coverage over the past week concerning the investigation of an alleged sexual assault, and the possibility of a cover-up or other inappropriate action on the part of the Cornwall Police Service, the Police Services Board wishes to make the following facts known.

A chronology is provided of the Silmsers matter from December 9, 1992, when a “male complainant” informed the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) that he had been sexually assaulted by a member of the local clergy and a local probation officer about twenty years ago, until the first week of January 1994, when a Cornwall radio station received “what was purported” to be a “complete copy of the complaint filed by the complainant” with the Cornwall police. Mr. Courville states in the news release that the complainant told the police there was “no need to rush the investigation,” that he decided not to pursue any criminal action against the probation officer, and that because of a civil settlement with Church officials, the complainant also ultimately decided that he did not want to proceed with a criminal prosecution against the member of the local clergy.

Ottawa Police Superintendent Brian Skinner questioned the statements in the January 11, 1994, press release that suggested delays in the Silmsers investigation were not a problem because the complainant had told the CPS to take the time necessary to complete the investigation. The press release states:

On March 2, 1993, the complainant contacted the investigating officer and informed the officer that there was no need to rush the investigation and to feel free to take whatever time was necessary to complete the investigation. Specifically, the complainant stated, “three months, six months, or eight months.” Again, on August 24, 1993, the complainant for a second time, stated that there was no problem with the timing of the matter.

Superintendent Skinner stressed that the fact that the complainant did not express concern about long delays in the investigation was no justification for the length of time it took for the Cornwall police to address the Silmsers complaint. Not only did this reasoning not make sense to Superintendent Skinner, but he would in fact “be suspicious of getting information like that from the complainant.”

In the January 1994 press release, Mr. Courville undertook as Chair of the Cornwall Police Services Board, “to fully inform the public what has actually happened to date.” That is, he assured the public that the Board would be transparent with respect to the alleged sexual assault by a local priest and a probation officer. He informed the public that senior management of the Cornwall Police Service had asked the Ottawa Police Service to conduct a review of the sexual assault investigation. Mr. Courville also stated in the press release that the Board “gives its assurance that any and all future steps necessary to resolve all outstanding issues and questions, will be taken.” Mr. Courville wanted to assure members of the public that there had been “no attempt” by the CPS at a “cover-up.”

Mr. Courville testified that the purpose of the media releases and the press conference in early 1994 was “to be as open and transparent as possible ... [T]he whole objective was to ensure the public that we were doing as much as possible to have an open approach to this.”

In the press release, the Cornwall Police Services Board invited the complainant to pursue his concerns with the Cornwall police or another appropriate police agency and/or to initiate a police complaint under the Police Services Act. The Board also assured other aggrieved parties in this matter that it would cooperate in any other investigation necessary to resolve outstanding issues.

Mr. Courville and Acting Chief Carl Johnston held a press conference on January 11, 1994, at which time the news release was issued. An article published in the Standard-Freeholder the following day, entitled “City Police Under Investigation: Ottawa Force Probes Handling of Sexual Assault Complaint,” states that Mr. Courville plans to be forthcoming and transparent with the public regarding the CPS investigation of the (Silmsers) allegations of sexual assault by a priest and a probation officer:

Courville suggested at the press conference that police would release the findings to the public.

“We want to make the factors known. We will try to be as forthcoming as we can be.”

...

“From everything we’ve seen all of the information was acted on thoroughly. We hope that by bringing out all of the facts that there can be no doubt that police handled this appropriately.”

Mr. Courville reiterated in his testimony that he and the Police Services Board “wanted to make everything as forthright as we could” and “as transparent as possible.” He agreed that members of the public who read this newspaper article in the Standard-Freeholder expected the Cornwall Police Service and Board to be truthful about the findings in the Ottawa Police Service review of the Silmser investigation.

February 2, 1994, Press Release and News Conference

Mr. Courville stated that the February 2, 1994, press release was also designed to provide the public with a transparent and thorough understanding of the CPS investigation of the Silmser allegations of sexual assault. The Chair of the Police Services Board agreed that when Acting Chief Johnston approached the Ottawa police to conduct the review, he made it clear that he wanted the Ottawa police to determine whether the CPS investigation had been effective and whether Cornwall police officers had concealed, downplayed, or covered up information. Mr. Courville expected the information he conveyed in the February press release and at the press conference regarding the findings in the Skinner Report to be reflected in the media.

But it is clear that Leo Courville, who was responsible for the February 2, 1994, news release, failed to include many of the essential findings in the Skinner Report. The conclusion of Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant Blake was that the Silmser investigation was “inept and ineffective.” Lead investigator Constable Heidi Sebalj was found to be inexperienced and, in their opinion, should not have been assigned the responsibility for this case. Moreover, the Ottawa officers thought that the Crown attorney should have removed himself from the file because of his declared conflict of interest. None of this information, acknowledged Mr. Courville, is reflected in the press release. The press release states:

The members of the investigative team have indicated in their report to the A/Chief of Police, that they are satisfied that there was no attempt by any member of the Cornwall Police Service to “cover-up” the situation. In addition, the report makes it clear that although the investigative team saw substantial evidence of excellent police work being done by accomplished police officers, there was a noticeable lack of Senior Management direction and systemic support throughout the course of the investigation. The report noted that this criticism was not intended as an indictment of the Police Service and its members.

Mr. Courville conceded that the press release “doesn’t cover a number of the problems that Mr. Skinner has identified in the investigation” and that “there were negative aspects in the report that do not find themselves on the pages of this press release.”

Superintendent Skinner testified that in his view, some statements in the press release were out of context and very little of the substance of his Report to the Cornwall Police Service could be found in the press release signed by Mr. Courville.

As a result of this press release, journalists, the public, and other members of the media did not have an accurate understanding of the findings in the Skinner Report with respect to the Cornwall police investigation of the Silmser matter. An article published in the Ottawa Citizen the day after the press release, entitled “Police to Begin New Probe of Priest,” stated that:

... an Ottawa police review has found that Cornwall investigators did “excellent police work.” The review found no evidence Cornwall police had quashed the investigation to protect clergy members.

Clearly, the Skinner Report did not conclude that the Cornwall police investigation did “excellent police work” in the Silmser matter—quite the contrary. Superintendent Skinner found the Cornwall investigation “inept and ineffective.” Mr. Courville agreed “there seems to be a misinterpretation in that regard.” But he denied that he did not want the media to know the conclusion of the Skinner Report. In the Ottawa Citizen article, the Cornwall Chief of Police is also quoted:

In spite of this, Cornwall Chief Carl Johnston asked the criminal investigations branch of the OPP to begin a new investigation.

“We believe we have done this (investigation) and done this completely,” Johnston said Wednesday. “But it’s a matter of public perception that it’s being reopened by the OPP.”

The article also appears to state that the Cornwall Police Service, despite its “excellent police work,” decided to ask the Ontario Provincial police to review the Silmser matter. It really does not convey to the public that Superintendent Skinner explicitly recommended in his Report that “an outside police agency be asked to conduct a complete investigation into the events and allegations which resulted from this particular complaint.” Yet Mr. Courville maintained that “there was never any attempt to suggest that the Cornwall Police Service did an exemplary job in this investigation.” He reiterated that the intent was to be as transparent as possible. And he denied that the Board was trying to put “a spin on things to cast the Police Service in a way that was more favourable than it might have been otherwise.”

Despite Mr. Courville’s view that the press releases ought to be “as accurate as possible” and that the Cornwall Police Services Board and Cornwall Police Service were trying to be “as transparent as possible,” he failed to provide accurate and appropriate information to the community through the media. This, in my opinion, only served to fuel the growing distrust and discord in the City of Cornwall. The press release should have stated that the Ottawa police had concluded that although there was no cover-up, the CPS investigation was ineffective and incompetent, and that they recommended that another force re-investigate.

The problem that arose was that as a result of the press report and media articles, people such as former judge and MPP Garry Guzzo and members of the public believed that the Skinner Report did not find any problems with the CPS investigation of the Silmser complaint. This misinformation fuelled one of many conspiracy theories in this city. Mr. Courville was aware that people in the Cornwall community and individuals such as Mr. Guzzo had come to believe that there were serious problems in the Cornwall Police Service that were not being revealed to the public. Despite Mr. Courville’s contention that he was trying to be transparent, this did not occur in the news releases that he was responsible for as Chair of the Cornwall Police Services Board. This had serious repercussions in the Cornwall community for many years and this misinformation continues to greatly affect this southeastern area of Ontario. Unfortunately, neither Mr. Courville nor members of the Cornwall Police Services Board took measures to rectify this misinformation in the press releases regarding the content of the Skinner Report. Mr. Courville said at the hearings that “in hindsight, we could have been perhaps a little bit more clear, more specific. That didn’t happen.” The Chair of the Cornwall Police Services Board further stated:

With regard to the press releases that were formulated ... to the degree that the evidence shows that they may have been deficient or may not have covered all of the points put forward in the—particularly in the Skinner Report, I accept that.

It is my view, based on a careful review of the evidence, that Leo Courville failed to provide appropriate and accurate information through the media regarding the historical sexual assault investigation conducted by the Cornwall Police Service. Moreover, Mr. Courville failed to take measures to correct the misinformation to ensure that the people of Cornwall received accurate information on the findings in the Skinner Report.

Problems With Morale at the CPS: Internal Dissension

It was evident from the testimony and documents filed at the Inquiry that there were problems with morale at the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) for many years. As early as 1978, the Ontario Police Commission, in its audit of the CPS, noted a morale problem among younger officers “largely connected with the promotional system—or lack of it.” The investigators also found “a number of weaknesses in the operation and administration of the Force.” In addition, they noted a very low clearance rate for criminal offences in comparison with other Ontario police forces.

In an inspection of the CPS a few years later, in 1982, inspectors again observed that morale was “lower than it should be.” Junior officers stated that one of the main reasons for poor morale was the “tyrannical” behaviour exhibited by the Staff Inspector responsible for Field Operations. Officers interviewed by the inspectors stated that Chief Earl Landry Sr. did not seem to be in control of the force.

When Claude Shaver became the Deputy Chief of Police in April 1983, he was asked by Chief Earl Landry Sr. to address issues raised in the 1978 and the 1982 inspection reports. Claude Shaver noted that the force appeared to be split into two groups, the uniform patrol and police officers involved in criminal investigations. This was also noted by auditors in 1989.

Although morale in the Cornwall Police Service improved in the mid-1980s, the problems resurfaced in the late 1980s. In an inspection of the CPS conducted in April 1989, inspectors again commented that “morale was found to be low.” The Ontario Police Commission Report stated that “[a] major cause of this problem is due to the lack of communication throughout the entire organization.” Claude Shaver was then the Chief of Police, and his Deputy Chief was Joseph St. Denis. In his testimony at the Inquiry, Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie agreed that there were serious communication problems between the police chief, senior police officers, and lower rank officers at that time. Similarly, Deputy Chief St. Denis did not disagree with the observations of the inspectors in 1989 that there was a lack of consultation between the heads of departments and the office of the Chief of Police. Chief Claude Shaver took issue with some of the observations on morale and communication problems between the police chief, senior officers, and those in the lower ranks in the Ontario Police Commission Report. But he did state that the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) had been introduced at that time and that it had been badly received. Claude Shaver attributed a lot of the tension during this period to the problems that existed in the City of Cornwall, including the large number of residents who were on social assistance.

Deputy Chief St. Denis testified that when he joined the CPS in 1987, he had discerned tension in the police force. He noticed that several members of the force were off on stress leave. He also noticed that there was not very much change in the force between 1987 and 1989, and that problems previously identified had not been addressed or rectified. At the time the 1989 Inspection Report was completed, he knew that morale on the police force was low.

In 1990, the Morale Report was released. It was commissioned by the Cornwall Police Association and was authored by Constable Shawn White. The Report stated that “there currently exists a tremendous morale problem within the Cornwall Police Department.” It further said:

The situation has become so critical that it is being experienced by all personnel and in all departments. The performance of the worker has suffered greatly ...

The stated objective of the Morale Report was a “collective attempt by police brothers and police sisters to identify the factors that are responsible for this disarray” and to rectify the situation. Staff Sergeant Derochie explained that the Report had come from officers in the rank and file. The Morale Report stated that many officers “feel betrayed and abandoned” and “feel that their concerns have been ignored or forgotten.” The Report stressed that there was discontent with management in the organization such as the Chief of Police and the Deputy Chief. The following excerpt from the Report reflects the sentiment that existed among members of the Cornwall Police Service:

Many have become disenchanted with the leaders of the police administration ... Where there was once respect and loyalty, we now have animosity and despair. The result is resentment, distrust and dissatisfaction with those empowered to lead, namely the Chief and the Deputy Chief.

The frustration that now exists has also eroded the harmony between co-workers ... There lacks common purpose. Everyone seems to be focused upon his or her personal goals, and distrusts the goals of his or her fellow worker. Many members feel that they have had to become callous to avoid being stabbed in the back. Many now feel that they must alienate themselves from others in different branches within the police force. The spirit of co-operation and communication is missing and is fragmenting the union necessary for this institution to be effective.

Inspector Richard Trew testified that policing in Cornwall in the 1980s and 1990s was difficult for a number of reasons, which included smuggling issues in the community, the introduction of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Askov decision,⁴⁵ and human resource problems in the police force. Problems identified in the Morale Report included lack of leadership, poor deployment of manpower and resources, and lack of communication. There was reference to supervisors whose behaviour was “tyrannical.” It also stated that there was an overabundance of sergeants. The Report further noted that although the Cornwall Police Service had a good training officer, he was restrained by “red tape and command chains.”

The Report stated that it was paramount that morale be the force’s “utmost priority.” It said that there was a lack of direction at the Cornwall Police Service as it entered the 1990s, and it stressed that “wholesale change is needed.” Issue was taken with respect to officers who were given transfers not necessarily based on merit. The Report concluded that the “Chief and Deputy Chief must accept responsibility for the current situation” because “[a]s the head of the Police Force, they are ultimately responsible for the morale of the department. Mistakes that they have made in the past have directly contributed to the current dilemma.” The Morale Report ended with these words:

... [A]ll of us, who make up the Cornwall Police Force must focus deep within ourselves and evaluate how our thoughts, our words, our actions, have affected morale. Some of us have abandoned our commitment to serve and protect the members of this community. We all too easily blame others for the problems we experience and have given up trying to be the best that we can be. We must always remember that the moment that we stop trying, is the moment that we become part of the problem. Now is the time to put pride back into P.R.I.D.E.

45. The Supreme Court decision R. v. Askov, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199 dealt with the right of the accused to a trial within a reasonable time pursuant to section 11(b) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. After this decision was rendered, many criminal cases were dismissed.

Constable Brian Payment testified that the most significant morale issue that the Cornwall Police Association addressed with management at CPS when he was on the executive was the lack of manpower and equipment. Discussions between the Police Association and management on these issues, he said, were not fruitful. During Constable Payment's tenure on the board between 1986 and 1990, Claude Shaver was the Chief of Police. The Constable stated that there was mistrust between the Police Association executive and the management of the police force.

Chief Claude Shaver agreed in his evidence that he and the Deputy Chief were responsible for the situation, and in particular the morale of the police force.

Chief Shaver addressed a number of issues raised in the Morale Report in a memo to the members of the Cornwall Police Association on April 26, 1990. He stated that OMPPAC had caused a great deal of concern at the force, but maintained that this technology was the "future." Chief Shaver wrote "both I and the Deputy Chief do accept responsibility for the current morale situation and are taking steps to solve the problem."

At about the same time that the Morale Report was released, staff sergeants in the Cornwall Police Service presented a report of their concerns to management on March 26, 1990. In their view, the CPS was "seriously mismanaged," for which the Chief of Police was responsible. In the opinion of the staff sergeants, the "Chief's actions have resulted in the Office of the Chief of Police losing all credibility with the men and women of the Force, the Police Commission, and the community." The decision making of the police chief was impulsive and occurred without consultation. They also stated that Claude Shaver had an "alarming lack of knowledge concerning the day to day operation" of the force and that he sought every opportunity to be absent from his office, particularly during critical times.

The staff sergeants took the position that they could "no longer function as effective managers because of the irresponsible decisions and actions of the Chief of Police." They further stated that their "authority and credibility are continuously being undermined." They noted that although they had met with the Chief of Police to express their concerns, he had made little effort to modify his attitude or change his conduct. The staff sergeants recommended that the Chief of Police tender his resignation, or alternatively, that the Cornwall Police Commission ask the Ontario Policing Services Division of the Ministry of the Solicitor General to conduct an inquiry into the management of the CPS. Claude Shaver testified that this report from the staff sergeants came as a surprise to him.

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie agreed that there were some unusual problems at the Cornwall Police Service in April 1990. There was a lack of direction or a strategic plan at that time. His concern was that the organization did not have a road map and he was of the conviction that morale would be improved if a strategic plan were developed. Others came to share that opinion, and action was taken to initiate the preparation of such a plan.

In a memo on April 4, 1990, senior officers acknowledged receipt of the staff sergeants' 1990 report. The senior officers, Staff Inspector Stuart McDonald, Inspector Richard Trew, and Inspector J. Burke, agreed with the concerns of the staff sergeants: "After lengthy deliberations, it is in an atmosphere of sadness that we concur with their concerns." The senior officers recommended that the matter remain within the confines of the organization and that the Board conduct its own inquiry. When he testified, Staff Inspector McDonald could not recall who drafted this memo but stated that it might have been him. He was the highest ranking of the three inspectors.

In a memo to the staff sergeants and senior officers, Chief Shaver made it very clear that he had "no intention of being pressured into resigning from the Cornwall Police Force." He stated that he had forwarded the reports of the senior officers and staff sergeants to the Board and would await its decision.

In a memo on April 6, 1990, the executive staff informed Chief Shaver that it had reviewed the staff sergeants' report and had concluded that the Chief should not resign. In its view, the problems were complex and one person could not be held responsible: "We recognize that there are difficulties, however, this cannot be blamed on one person but must be borne by all." They were receptive to an in-house inquiry conducted by the Board.

The Chair of the Board of Commissioners of Police responded to the reports of the staff sergeants and senior officers, as well as to the Morale Report, on April 12, 1990. The Board confirmed that it fully supported the Chief of Police and disagreed that the force was seriously mismanaged. It took the position that all senior officers should assume responsibility for the management and morale of the force. The Board stated that Chief Shaver would participate in an executive development course at the Canadian Police College "in order to broaden his management base as well as his administrative skills." The Board supported a strategic plan workshop to develop the direction of the police force for the next five years. Suzanne McGlashan was hired as a consultant to deal with these issues. She prepared a report in June 1990.

Ms McGlashan's report was the culmination of a strategic planning session undertaken with the senior management team of the Cornwall Police Service on May 11–12, 1990. It was apparent to Ms McGlashan that there were "very strong signs of discontent with the current operations and management of the Cornwall Police Service." Staff Sergeant Derochie agreed.

Prior to the strategic planning session, members of the senior management team were asked to respond to a questionnaire on problems, strengths, and weaknesses as well as expectations for the force. It was clear from the responses that senior officers were divided on “philosophies and strategies.”

The strategic planning process ultimately broke down. The Chair of the Board, Ron Adams, had been supportive of the strategic plan, but he passed away. According to Chief Shaver, after the death of the Chair, the Board decided not to allocate funds in the budget for the development of a strategic plan. Deputy Chief St. Denis stated that the breakdown of the strategic planning process had a profoundly negative impact on the Cornwall Police Service. This is further discussed in the following section, on the Cornwall Police Services Board.

Problems with morale continued. In November 1990, an inspection was conducted by the Ontario Police Forces Inspection Program. The inspectors noted that the promotional process did not have the confidence of the rank and file, which was a “contributory factor to the low level of morale within the Service.” The inspectors observed that “dissension” was present at “virtually every level of the Cornwall Police Service” from the rank of constable to the Cornwall Police Services Board. They discerned friction internally within the organization as well as externally with the Police Services Board.

Officers of the Cornwall Police Service who were interviewed stated that Chief Shaver was absent too frequently. They were critical of his “impulsive management style,” and they were not confident that he had adequate knowledge of municipal policing. Although Claude Shaver took issue with the comment that he was an absentee chief, he agreed that there were some communication problems between him and various members of the police force at the time.

After this inspection report, Chief Shaver conducted a three-day strategic planning meeting attended by staff sergeants and senior officers. On December 12, 1990, Chief Shaver and the group appeared before the Board to report on the results of their meetings. The Board Chair, Ron Adams, reported “that the enthusiastic group that greeted Board members expressed confidence in the Strategic Plan, and were visibly buoyed by the progress that evolved during the meetings. They also demonstrated a renewed confidence in Chief Shaver.”

After the strategic planning sessions, Sergeant Rick Carter was assigned as Strategic Planning Officer. His role was to implement the strategic plan. Chief Shaver authored a draft strategic plan after Ms McGlashan left. He stated that he had tried to present it to the Board in March 1993 but that it had not been considered. The purpose of the draft plan was to ensure that the CPS could implement the five-year plan. The Board rejected it. This is further discussed in the section on the Cornwall Police Services Board.

In the summer of 1993, an inspection was conducted by the Ontario Policing Services Division of the Ministry of the Solicitor General. This inspection had been requested by the Chair of the Cornwall Police Services Board, who had “serious concerns about management, the relationship among stakeholders, and morale.” Mr. Leo Courville testified that he had requested this inspection in order to put the CPS in a position whereby its direction could be identified and its progress could be monitored. Angelo Towndale, another member of the Board, testified that the inspection was prompted by concerns of the Cornwall Police Association regarding Chief Shaver’s fluctuating priorities and absenteeism. The 1993 Inspection Report begins with a community profile of Cornwall: its geographic location, demographics, and the economic position of the residents. After describing the city’s location in relation to Montreal, Ottawa, and Kingston, the Report states:

The Seaway International Bridge provides direct access to New York State. A portion of the boundary of the First Nations territory of Akwesasne extends into the city, as well as spanning jurisdictional boundaries in Quebec and New York State. Approximately 50% of the city’s area is urbanized, with the remainder classified as rural, vacant or undeveloped.

It further stated that the average wage rates in Cornwall were below the national average and that Cornwall had “some of the lowest priced housing in Ontario and in all of Canada.” It reported that the largest population sector was in the twenty-five to thirty-four age category and that the fastest growing sector was the sixty-six and over age group.

In this 1993 inspection, it was found that some recommendations from the previous inspections of 1990 and 1991 had not been implemented. Despite a recommendation that Ms Suzanne McGlashan be retained on an ongoing basis, this in fact had not occurred. The inspectors stated that internally, the CPS “organization is rife with conflicts within and among most ranks and management.” Officers interviewed stated that they had little confidence in the capacity of the Chief of Police and Deputy Chief to lead the organization. The inspectors further concluded that the “breakdown of the strategic planning process has had a profoundly negative impact throughout the police service.” It was recommended in the Report that a facilitator be retained by the Board.

Chief Shaver wrote to the inspectors who prepared the 1993 Report. He stated that the Cornwall Police Service had “a cancerous rot in which the service eats itself from the inside.” He stated that there were “repeated internal attempts of coups” and said that prior attacks had been made on other senior members of the police force that were “personal, brutal, and most times, without solid foundation.” He discussed problems with the Board as well as the Mayor’s behaviour and referred to problems within the Cornwall community. He stated that “morale in this entire community is poor, and to single out the Police is a most unfair focus.” Chief Shaver further wrote that the “Cornwall Police Association Executive attempts to control or dictate by threats, rumour or over actions, must be challenged and exposed.”

Staff Sergeant Derochie agreed that in 1993, tension existed between senior management and the Cornwall Police Association and that levels of discontent had reached a critical point.

Deputy Chief St. Denis responded to the 1993 Inspection Report. He described the auditors as “adversaries” and stated that the inspection did not take a constructive approach:

The inspection is intended to serve the organization’s accountability relationships. Accordingly, while comprehensive audits point to important improvements that can be made, they should not criticize individuals or their specific decisions. If audits were perceived as witch hunts, they would fail to achieve the positive change that is at the core of the comprehensive audit concept.

In this memo to Acting Chief Carl Johnston⁴⁶ in January 1994, Deputy Chief St. Denis wrote that his “decisions and leadership abilities were seriously controlled, curtailed, by-passed, over-ruled or ignored by both the Chief and some Board members. He stated that his role was to keep a “lid on the mutiny” against Chief Shaver. Deputy Chief St. Denis referred to a “serious blow-up” with the Chief at Claude Shaver’s home in September 1991, which he believed had “put the muzzle” on him. Deputy Chief St. Denis said that the police chief by-passed his office from time to time, which caused him concern.

As mentioned, members of the Ottawa Police Service, Brian Skinner and William Blake, conducted a review of the Cornwall Police Service investigation of David Silmsers’ allegations of historical sexual abuse. Deputy Chief St. Denis was interviewed in January 1994. At that time, the Deputy Chief described the atmosphere at the Cornwall Police Service as a “hornet’s nest.” Deputy Chief St. Denis discussed with Superintendent Skinner the desire of senior officers and staff sergeants at the CPS that the police chief resign. Superintendent Skinner thought tension existed between Deputy Chief St. Denis and Chief Shaver. The Deputy Chief believed he had been kept out of the loop in the 1992–1993 Silmsers investigation and that Chief Shaver had not shared information with him on this investigation.

46. Chief Claude Shaver officially retired in early January 1994. The retirement was announced in late 1993.

Deputy Chief St. Denis testified that there had been a big spike in sick leave among officers from 1992 to 1995. He could recall as many as twelve officers on leave at one time from the Cornwall Police Service. He was of the view that low morale can lead to more sick leaves among officers, and in turn sick leave contributes to low morale. Inspector Trew also observed that in the early 1990s, a significant number of CPS officers had become discouraged and the number of officers on sick leave increased.

Anthony Repa became the Chief of Police in August 1995. The following month he commissioned a staffing review report. Chief Repa had concerns about the high number of officers on sick or disability leave.

Further discussion of these problems in the police force follows in the section on the Cornwall Police Services Board.

The Cornwall Police Services Board

Tensions on the Cornwall Police Services Board had an impact on its functioning. Strained relationships existed not only between members of the Board but also between the Chief of Police and Board members. This had an adverse effect on the ability of the Board to discharge its responsibilities as well as on the morale of the police force.

The section begins with an overview of the responsibilities of the Cornwall Police Services Board. It then describes some of the internal problems of the Board. This is followed by a discussion of the lack of policies, training, and protocols on historical sexual assault as well as conflicts of interest, real and perceived, demonstrating that historical sexual assault cases were not given adequate attention or importance by the Cornwall Police Services Board.

The Mandate of the Board

The Cornwall Police Services Board has important responsibilities to discharge pursuant to the Police Services Act. Section 31(1) of the Act states that the municipal police board “is responsible for the provision of adequate and effective police services in the municipality.”⁴⁷ The duties of the Police Services Board include appointing members of the police force,⁴⁸ determining objectives and priorities of police services in the municipality in consultation with the Chief of Police, and establishing policies for the effective management of the police force. The Board is also responsible for recruiting and appointing the Chief and

47. R.S.O. 1990, c. P.15.

48. Police Services Act, 31(1)(a).

Deputy Chief of Police, as well as directing the Chief of Police and monitoring his or her performance.⁴⁹

The Police Services Act required that a Police Services Board be composed of the head of the municipal council, one member appointed by resolution of the municipal council, and three members appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.⁵⁰ In 1997, the Police Services Act was amended such that three members were appointed by the municipality and two by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.⁵¹

The Police Services Act makes it clear that the “board shall not direct the chief of police with respect to specific operational decisions or with respect to the day-to-day operation of the police force.”⁵² Moreover, the statute states that the Board is not permitted to give orders to members of the police force other than the Chief of Police.⁵³ The interface of Board members with the police service takes place through the Chief of Police.

As Mayor of Cornwall, Ron Martelle was a member of the Cornwall Police Services Board from 1992 to January 1994. He became a member of the Board again in January 1995. Leo Courville, a criminal and civil lawyer, joined the Board in 1992 and became its Chair in 1993. Angelo Towndale of the Children’s Aid Society was also a member of the Board, from 1991 to 1995. He rejoined the Board in 1998. In the late 1980s, members of the Board included Ron Adams, who was Chair, as well as Mayor Phil Poirier. Members of the Board in 1986 included Mayor Brian Lynch, and the Chair was Bryson Comrie.

A responsibility of the Police Services Board is to prepare the budget for the police service. The budget has a direct effect on the operational aspects of policing. It has an impact on issues such as the number of police officers on staff, the training available for officers, and the quality and quantity of equipment available to the police service. Leo Courville explained that when he was Chair of the Cornwall Police Services Board from 1993 to 1996, the Chief of Police would present him with a “wish list” and then the two of them would review the list and make changes to ensure the proposed budget “accommodate[d] the financial needs of the municipality.” The budget was then presented to the municipal council for approval. The following section discusses the concern expressed by witnesses that there was an inadequate number of Cornwall police officers, which had an effect on the attention given to sexual assault investigations generally and to historical sexual assault cases in particular.

49. Police Services Act, s. 31(1).

50. See s. 27(5).

51. S. 27(5), 1997, c. 8, s. 19(1).

52. S. 31(4).

53. S. 31(3).

Adequacy of Staffing at the CPS

Understaffing was a recurring theme in the testimony of members of the Cornwall Police Service.

Ontario Police Commission inspection reports in the 1980s noted some issues of understaffing. The 1984 Inspection Report, for example, mentioned that the force required four additional constables, according to the Chief of Police. The Report further stated that a “re-assessment of civilians is contemplated” and that an “adequacy [s]tudy has been recommended to the Board of Commissioners of Police.” Problems of understaffing were raised in the 1989 Ontario Police Commission Inspection Report, and it was recommended that the Board request an Ontario Police Commission workload study. The 1991 Inspection Report indicated that two phases of the workload study had been completed and that the results would be discussed with the Chief of Police and the Police Services Board. However, a notation in a 1993 Human Resources Management Inspection Report by the Ministry of the Solicitor General, Ontario Policing Services Division, said that the “workload study needs further review.” Leo Courville, who chaired the Board from 1993 to 1996, had no recollection of seeing or reviewing the completed workload study.

The results of the recommended workload study may have shed some light on a conundrum facing the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and the Board in the early 1990s. While statistics presented to the Board during this period indicated that the authorized staffing levels of the CPS compared favourably with police services of other communities of comparable size, Cornwall police officers throughout the force believed that the service was understaffed.

A possible explanation for the apparent disconnect between the statistics and the CPS officers’ sense that the service was understaffed is that the statistics provided to the Board did not reflect the high number of Cornwall police officers on sick or disability leave during the 1990s. A 1995 Staffing Review Report commissioned by Chief Anthony Repa found that there were three sergeants on long-term disability/worker compensation/sick leave, six constables on permanent disability, one constable on sick leave, and one constable assigned to a regional task force. That is, eleven out of about fifty sergeants and field constables, over 20 percent, were not available for deployment. Chief Repa indicated that in his opinion this number was unusually high. He further stated that there were officers who were at work but due to injuries or health issues were unable to perform their functions as police officers. Leo Courville thought that the number of individuals on sick and disability leave created a burden on the officers working at the Cornwall Police Service.

Reorganizing the staff and their respective duties could have increased efficiency at the CPS. As early as 1978, an Ontario Police Commission Inspection Report stated that:

police officers are being used as radio dispatchers. If it is accepted the services of a police officer, who is a highly paid specialist, should not be used in a function that does not require his knowledge or experience, then these officers could be replaced by civilians.

It is also noteworthy that the 1990 Morale Report commented that dispatch and communications duties tied up the time of too many police officers. The Morale Report pointed out areas in which there was job duplication and made suggestions regarding positions and tasks that could be modified in order to avoid such redundancy. Three years later, the 1993 Human Resources Management Inspection Report recommended that the “organizational structure of the Cornwall Police Service should be revised, to reduce duplication.” Yet Chief Repa testified that when he became the Chief of Police in 1995, police officers were “still being deployed in the radio room and as court security and escort officers, rather than doing police work.”

Failure to Prioritize the Investigation of Sexual Assaults

Information conveyed in the CPS corporate presentations indicated that the rate of sexual assaults in Cornwall was above the national and provincial averages through much of the 1990s. However, during this period, the number of officers working in the Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB) fell from eighteen in 1990 to twelve in 1993, and increased only to thirteen officers in 1995. Moreover, the Youth Bureau, the sub-unit of the CIB that took over responsibility for the investigation of sexual assaults in the mid-1990s, consisted at times of only two officers in the 1990s. Because of this low staffing level, leaves of absence, and the prioritization of the investigation of other offences over the investigation of sexual assault, at times there was only one officer responsible for the investigation of sexual assaults. When the Youth Bureau officially became the Sexual Assault and Child Abuse Unit (SACA) in 2000, the number of officers was increased to five. As mentioned, this increase was attributed to the rise in the number of complaints received by the Cornwall Police Service as a result of Project Truth, the OPP investigation into allegations of sexual abuse of young males by a group of influential citizens in Cornwall.

The lack of a sufficient number of officers in the CIB in the 1990s had a particularly negative impact on sexual assault investigations. Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet testified that when he became the Officer in Charge of the CIB in 1993, the high number of occurrences and lack of human resources made it impossible to investigate all occurrences in a timely manner. As a result, choices had to be made to prioritize particular offences. He stated that homicides were given top priority and that other crimes were sometimes given priority over sexual assault investigations.

For several months in 1993, Constable Heidi Sebalj, a fairly new and relatively inexperienced police officer who lacked training in sexual assault investigations, was the sole officer in the Youth Bureau. Constable Kevin Malloy, who had been in the Youth Bureau, was on leave as he was injured. Sergeant Ron Lefebvre had been transferred to the Youth Bureau to work on sexual crimes in May 1993, but two weeks after his transfer he was reassigned to act as a secondary officer in a homicide investigation. He was to be transferred back to the Youth Bureau, but this did not occur for a number of reasons. He assumed Staff Sergeant Brunet's responsibilities when the officer was on annual leave. Sergeant Lefebvre then went on his own annual leave, attended a two-week training course, and in the fall was assigned to work on a variety of major crimes, including an aggravated assault, a bombing, and a bank robbery. As Staff Sergeant Brunet testified, the Youth Bureau had a backlog of sexual assault investigations and Constable Sebalj could not keep up.

Although Staff Sergeant Brunet reassigned some of the sexual assault files to general investigators, the backlog remained. In November 1993, Staff Sergeant Brunet wrote a memorandum to Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis, recommending that an additional officer be assigned immediately to the Youth Bureau to assist with the backlog. The 1995 CPS Staffing Review Report revealed that nearly two years later, a significant backlog of sexual assault investigations remained. The Report stated that there were two constables in the Youth Bureau at the time, Constables Heidi Sebalj and David Bough, and it discussed the backlog of cases: "Very limited proactive work being done. Sexual assaults (approximately 57 cases behind)."

At about the same time as this Report was released, Staff Sergeant Brunet made another request for assistance to clear up the backlog of sexual assault cases. Constables Scott Hanton and René Desrosiers were assigned to the Youth Bureau for approximately four months to assist with the backlog. As discussed earlier, Constable Hanton was assigned the investigation of the historical sexual assault allegations against Earl Landry Jr. Although Constable Hanton was a fifteen-year veteran of the force, his experience was in uniform patrol; he had no experience in the investigation of historical sexual assault. Similarly, Constable Desrosiers at the time of his assignment in 1995 had no such training.

As mentioned, the Board is responsible pursuant to the Police Services Act for setting the priorities for the police force. Deputy Chief Danny Aikman stated that to his knowledge, the investigation of sexual offences has never been one of the priorities set by the Cornwall Police Services Board. Other officers, such as Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie, also observed that historical sexual abuse cases were not allocated the same importance as other crimes. The detailed description of such investigations in the preceding sections also confirms that historical sexual assault cases were not given adequate resources and were not conducted in a timely manner.

In my view, the Cornwall Police Services Board failed to establish policies or give direction to the Chief of the Cornwall Police Service that would have ensured that investigations into allegations of historical sexual abuse were assigned high priority and were conducted in a timely manner. It is clear that the investigation of other offences was prioritized over historical sexual assault cases. The Youth Bureau required additional staff and there was a backlog of sexual assault investigations.

It is my recommendation that the Cornwall Police Services Board take measures to ensure that such offences are given priority. Moreover, the Cornwall Police Services Board should ensure that the force has the necessary resources, such as the requisite number of officers to conduct such investigations of sexual assault, and in particular historical sexual assault cases, in a timely manner.

Lack of Protocols on Sexual Assault

The Board's failure to make the investigation of sexual assault a priority is reflected in the late adoption of a CPS internal procedure regarding the investigation of such cases. Charts contained in the CPS corporate presentation indicate that there was an overall upward trend in the number of reported sexual assaults from the early 1980s to the mid-1990s and that sexual assaults constituted a significant portion, ranging from 6 to 21 percent, of the violent crimes reported in Cornwall each year in the 1980s and 1990s. In twelve of those years, the figures were in the double digits. The Board should have been aware of the prevalence of reported sexual assaults either through briefings by the Chief of Police or through annual reports.

The Board should have also been cognizant of the special requirements surrounding victims of child sexual assault. Deputy Chief Aikman testified that the CPS and Children's Aid Society (CAS) were involved in conducting joint interviews of child victims of sexual abuse as early as the 1980s. The child sexual abuse protocol, a multi-agency protocol dedicated to child sexual abuse for the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, was signed in 1992. However, Directive 114, the first Cornwall Police Service directive dealing with the investigation of sexual assault, including child sexual assault, did not come into force until 1998. Directive 114 mentioned historical sexual assault, but it did not set out any particular procedure to be followed with regard to complaints of historical sexual abuse.

As discussed earlier in this chapter, Staff Sergeant Derochie prepared a report in December 1999 for Chief Repa on the Earl Landry Jr. investigation, delineating the reasons for lengthy delays in historical sexual assault cases. In this report, Staff Sergeant Derochie wrote that "historical sexual assaults were/are not pursued with the same type of urgency which recently occurring assaults were/are given."

He stated that shortcomings similar to the ones that existed in the Landry Jr. case had also been identified in other historical sexual assault investigations conducted by the CPS.

In response, Chief Repa issued Standing Order 003-99 that year, which stated that historical sexual assaults were to be given the same consideration as those incidents that have recently occurred. However, this order was in effect for only one year before it was superseded in December 2000 by General Order FOB-037, which did not mention historical sexual assault investigations. In 2005, General Order FOB-096 again stated that historical sexual assaults should be given the “same consideration as these incidents which have just recently occurred.”

Deputy Chief Aikman acknowledged in his testimony that there were still no CPS documents that specifically set out the manner in which historical child sexual abuse investigations should be conducted. In my view, a detailed protocol should be developed on historical sexual assault investigations, to guide officers who are involved in these cases.

The lack of guidance regarding the manner in which to conduct historical sexual assault investigations has left many officers uncertain as to the steps that they ought to take in such cases. For example, a number of Cornwall police officers testified that they did not know the circumstances under which they are required to report allegations of historical child sexual abuse to the CAS. This is a significant problem. Police officers investigating child sexual abuse cases should have had a clear understanding of the statutory obligation to report a reasonable suspicion of child abuse⁵⁴ to the CAS. It is necessary to ensure that children at risk of abuse are protected.

When Mr. Courville was asked whether the Board had been approached with respect to providing guidance or developing a policy to address the uncertainty regarding whether officers are required to disclose historical sexual abuse to the CAS, he responded that the Board had discussed the issue but that no procedure or policy had been developed.

Lack of Training in the Investigation of Sexual Assault

Through its mandate to determine objectives and priorities of the police service in the municipality and through the budget, the Cornwall Police Services Board has an impact on the training of officers.

The Cornwall Police Service for many years has relied mainly on the Ontario Police College (OPC) in Aylmer for its training. Training in sexual assault offences has been available at the OPC since 1984.

54. Child & Family Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. 11, s. 72.

Despite the availability of these courses, many Cornwall Police Service officers, even those who had worked on sexual assault investigations, had not received training in the investigation of sexual assault. The 1994 Skinner Report, for example, found that CPS officers involved in the David Silmsen case “lacked the proper background and training” and consequently, “were placed in positions for which they were ill-suited and unqualified.” The investigations examined in this chapter demonstrate that many police officers assigned to such investigations also lacked training on sexual assault and historical sexual assault.

Deputy Chief Aikman testified that the Cornwall Police Service sent about ten officers each year to the Ontario Police College to take courses above the level of basic constable training, and of these, one or two would take training in sexual assault or child abuse cases.

One reason put forth to explain lack of training was that reliance on the OPC meant that the Cornwall Police Service had no control over when and how often courses were offered and whether its officers were able to attend particular courses. All courses were taught at the Ontario Police College in Aylmer until the mid- to late 1990s, at which time satellite courses were offered, which increased the frequency with which particular courses could be offered. There were caps on how many officers could attend each course, and course allocations were based on the relative size of each police service. If the Cornwall Police Service was encountering a lack of availability of spots in courses on the investigation of sexual assault, this issue should have been examined by the Board to determine if there were alternative methods to ensure that the CPS officers received adequate training in this area.

Another reason put forth for the lack of training was budget restrictions. Former police chief Claude Shaver claimed that approximately 90 to 92 percent of the budget for the CPS was designated for salaries, which at the time were among the highest in the province. He said that only 8 to 10 percent of the budget remained for training and other needs of the service. Claude Shaver testified that he “always insisted that training should never be cut and in the end, we end up having to cut training to get to a number that the Board can accept to bring to City Council.” Mr. Courville confirmed that approximately 90 percent of the budget was allocated to salaries.

If attending training at the OPC was not serving the needs of the force at the time, the Board and Chief of Police should have found other ways to ensure that Cornwall Police Service officers were adequately trained. One possible alternative to sending officers to the OPC would have been to provide in-house training. In fact, the Cornwall Police Service had employed an in-house trainer from the mid- to late 1980s. However, he did not provide training on the investigation of sexual assault. After this individual left, there was very little in-house training for Cornwall officers. The 1990 Inspection Report and the 1990 Morale Report both recommended that in-house training be re-implemented. The Inspection Report stated:

While in-service training cannot replace training available through provincial and federal police colleges, it is the least expensive method of delivery and is critical if officers are to remain current with emerging issues. A comprehensive in-service training program is vital to both the ability of the Service to provide effective policing, as well as to the morale and motivation of officers. (Emphasis added)

Therefore, the availability of in-service training on the investigation of sexual assault could have offered a cost-effective method of ensuring that Cornwall officers received the necessary training in this area.

Another option would have been for the Cornwall Police Service to partner with other police forces to host courses in sexual assault investigations. Staff Sergeant Brunet testified that the CPS did this in 1997 in order to offer an interviewing seminar. He said that at that time financial restrictions made it difficult to send officers to the Ontario Police College. As a result, the Cornwall Police Service asked the OPC to send an instructor to provide training to CPS and OPP police officers in Cornwall.

Another training method is the joint training of police officers with staff from other agencies involved with sexual abuse such as the CAS. This method was implemented in the early 1990s. The Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse (IPCA), a non-profit charitable organization, was established in 1987. It offered joint child abuse training to police officers and CAS workers. The training offered by IPCA was highly regarded. However, IPCA's funding was cut in 1994, and by 1995 it was no longer in existence. Professor Nicholas Bala, who gave expert testimony at the Inquiry, stated that the closing of IPCA left a void in training that does not seem to have been filled since.

In 1996, the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies and the Ontario Police College developed a joint protocol for training and began to offer a course on investigating sexual offences against children. Classes were composed of an equal distribution of police officers and CAS workers. However, in 2003, the OPC and the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies decided to suspend this course. The OPC no longer operates joint training for police officers and CAS workers.

Experts in the field of child sexual abuse, police officers, individuals who work with the CAS, and the OPC staff discussed in their evidence the importance of joint training. In my view, it is of great importance that joint training of the police with the Children's Aid Society and other agencies involved in sexual abuse be reintroduced. Moreover, training for police investigation of child sexual assaults, including training on historical child abuse, should be mandatory for all police officers as part of their basic training. It is also my recommendation that officers involved in sexual abuse investigations be required to take refresher courses on an ongoing basis.

Tension Among Board Members

Another problem at the Cornwall Police Services Board that clearly had an impact on its operation was the internal dissension among Board members. Leo Courville testified that during the time he was the Vice-Chair and Chair of the Cornwall Police Services Board, it was "under a great deal of stress" and was "tension-filled." Mr. Courville stated that the presence of Mayor Ron Martelle on the Board was a major source of this strain. Leo Courville claimed that Mayor Martelle refused to adhere to Board policies. He said that Mayor Martelle referred to himself as the "chief magistrate" and took the position that he had the authority to be involved in the operational sphere of policing. Angelo Towndale, another Board member and an employee of the Children's Aid Society, said that Mayor Martelle believed the municipal appointees on the Board ought to hold the balance of power over the provincial appointees. This created tension between Mayor Martelle and the Board members. Mr. Towndale also mentioned that Mayor Martelle opposed employment equity. Chief Shaver said that Mayor Martelle "rejected everything," including the strategic planning process that he was trying to develop in the early 1990s. In a 1993 letter to the Policing Services Division of the Ministry of the Solicitor General, Chief Shaver wrote that the Board "never functioned with a high degree of effectiveness because of the severe personality conflicts and in-fighting, [which] left a tremendous void in the governing of the Service." The conflicts between Mr. Courville and Mayor Martelle were public knowledge, and were even the subject of media coverage.

These tensions on the Board were observed by inspectors in 1993. In that year, Mr. Courville asked the Policing Services Division to conduct an inspection of the Cornwall Police Service. As mentioned, Leo Courville said that he requested this inspection in order to put the Cornwall Police Service in a position where its direction could be identified and its progress monitored. Angelo Towndale testified that the inspection was prompted by the concerns of the Cornwall Police Association regarding Chief Shaver's fluctuating priorities and absenteeism.

In the 1993 Inspection Report, the following comments were made regarding Mayor Martelle's behaviour:

The Mayor's actions have included disregarding the authority of the Board to make decisions, confronting the Chair, threatening to cut off

Board funding, disrupting/walking out of meetings and issuing public statements which have not been sanctioned by the Board. In some instances, these statements appear to have violated the confidentiality of in camera sessions.

The Inspection Report further stated that interpersonal conflicts were damaging to the Board's credibility and effectiveness and that the "lack of cohesiveness that exists among board members is common knowledge and has contributed to morale problems within the police service." In other words, inspectors observed that the tension among Board members was having a negative effect not only on the functioning of the Board but also on members of the Cornwall Police Service. In fact, it was recommended in the Report that the "Mayor should be replaced by a municipal representative who has the ability to function on a team working for the betterment of local policing."

Mayor Martelle resigned briefly from the Cornwall Police Services Board in January 1994, but he rejoined one year later, in January 1995 following his re-election as mayor at the end of 1994. At this time, Acting Chief Carl Johnston and three members of the Board—Angelo Towndale, Leo Courville, and Delores Jensen—travelled to Toronto to express their concerns to the Solicitor General about the return of Mayor Martelle to the Cornwall Police Services Board. Solicitor General David Christopherson met with Leo Courville and Acting Chief Johnston.

The Solicitor General informed the Board members that under the Police Services Act, the Mayor, as head of the municipal council, was entitled to sit on the Board and could be removed only if after a hearing he was found guilty of misconduct or was found not to be performing or to be incapable of performing his duties in a satisfactory manner.

The Solicitor General, however, was concerned about the effect the continued tension on the Cornwall Police Services Board was having on the delivery of police services to the City of Cornwall. In April 1995, Mr. Christopherson wrote to the Chair of the Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services, Murray Chitra, to ask that his organization conduct an investigation of the Board to evaluate whether it was performing its proper governance function. The Solicitor General wrote:

Continuing public discussion indicates that there are serious problems with the Cornwall Police Services Board. As you are aware, there is a previous report resulting from an inspection conducted by Police Service Advisors, and the Board has been implementing the various recommendations made. Nonetheless, it appears that difficulties continue and that the relationships between board members may be so strained that the delivery of police services to the community may be compromised. (Emphasis added)

The Report of the Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services was released in July 1995. It stated that Mayor Martelle opposed employment equity, disagreed with the process by which Board members were selected, and stated that he did not recognize the jurisdiction of the Board. It mentioned that Mayor Martelle had threatened to cut off funding to the Board and had released letters exchanged between himself and Mr. Courville to the media, which provoked allegations of breach of confidentiality. The Report also stated that Mayor Martelle had made comments that he was planning to explore the possibility of having police services in Cornwall provided by the Ontario Provincial Police rather than the CPS and had issued statements regarding police services that were not sanctioned by the Board. While the investigators expressed concern respecting Mayor Martelle's "needlessly confrontational approach and the tension it has generated," they found that none of the behaviour described constituted "misconduct."

The Report was critical that disagreements among Board members had been communicated to the media:

It is evident that the Board has experienced periods of heated debate on a range of issues, largely going to matters of control. These have been fuelled by a series of public statements, interviews and press releases from individual members, which frankly appear to have served no constructive purpose. Certainly, they have done nothing to advance public confidence in the activities of the Board or highlight its accomplishments.

The investigators suggested that disagreements among Board members be confined to internal discussions. They stressed that the appropriate place for debate among Board members was in Board meetings, not in the media. They did state that despite the tensions that existed among Board members, they could find no evidence "to suggest that the delivery of police services to the community [was] compromised."

In his testimony, Mr. Courville agreed that to some extent media coverage of the conflicts between Mayor Martelle and himself had resulted in a bad public perception of the Cornwall Police Services Board. He stated that on one hand this was unfortunate, but on the other, he believed that the public ought to know that Mayor Martelle's actions made it difficult for the Board to discharge its proper governance function.

Tensions Between Chief Shaver and the Cornwall Police Services Board

During Claude Shaver's tenure as Chief of Police of the Cornwall Police Service, there was clearly tension between him and the Cornwall Police Services Board.

It was evident from the inspection reports as well as the testimony that the strained relationship between the police chief and the Board had an impact on the functioning of the CPS as well as the morale of the police officers.

As early as 1989, inspectors observed that Chief Shaver was not notifying the Board of his periods of absence from duty. In the inspection report of the following year, inspectors noticed that the relationship between Mayor Poirier and Claude Shaver was “particularly turbulent” and that the Mayor expressed a “complete lack of confidence in Chief Shaver.” Board members agreed that Chief Shaver was absent too frequently. Claude Shaver was well aware that communication problems existed between him and some members of the Cornwall Police Services Board.

As previously discussed, there was tension between the Board and Chief Shaver regarding the services of management consultant Suzanne McGlashan. The Inspection Report notes that the Cornwall Police Services Board convened a meeting to discuss the Morale Report in March 1990. Members of the Board were surprised when Chief Shaver announced at the meeting that he had engaged the services of management consultant Ms McGlashan to address the internal problems of the police service. She had been hired to develop a strategic plan for the force. Members of the Board, according to the Inspection Report, were in agreement with the concept of employing a management consultant to address these issues but were annoyed that they had not been previously consulted. When he testified, Claude Shaver claimed that he had engaged Ms McGlashan with the approval of the Chair of the Board. Nonetheless, Claude Shaver agreed that in hindsight, it would have been prudent to have the support of the full Board before engaging the services of Ms McGlashan.

According to the Inspection Report, on December 14, 1990, arrangements had been made for Ms McGlashan’s ongoing involvement in the strategic planning process. The inspectors wrote that “the engagement of a management consultant would have been the first recommendation in this report had it not been accomplished prior to the inspection.” Claude Shaver testified that the Cornwall Police Services Board decided not to allocate a budget for Ms McGlashan, a decision with which he totally disagreed.

As mentioned, Chief Shaver prepared a draft strategic plan with the assistance of Staff Sergeant Rick Carter after Ms McGlashan was no longer involved with the Cornwall Police Service. Chief Shaver stated that he had tried to present the plan to the Cornwall Police Services Board in March 1993. According to Chief Shaver, the Board rejected it. He said that Mayor Martelle objected to the plan because in his opinion it should have been prepared by the Board. Angelo Towndale recalled the strategic plan presented by Chief Shaver but stated that a discussion about it was delayed until the May 1993 meeting. At that time, concerns regarding Chief Shaver were raised. As a result, an inspection of the CPS was scheduled and the Board decided to delay its decision on the draft strategic plan.

The 1993 Inspection Report conducted by the Policing Services Division stated that the Chair of the Board had “serious concerns about management, the relationship among stakeholders and morale.” As stated earlier, Leo Courville testified that he had asked for this inspection in order to put the Cornwall Police Service in a position whereby its progress could be monitored. Angelo Towndale explained that the inspection was prompted by concerns of the Cornwall Police Association regarding Chief Shaver’s changing priorities and his periods of absence from the service. In a 1993 memo to the inspectors, Chief Shaver wrote that “the present Board is the most dysfunctional and ineffective I have dealt with.”

As previously mentioned, Claude Shaver decided to retire from his position as Cornwall’s police chief in 1993. His retirement was officially announced in late 1993. However, unbeknownst to members of the Cornwall Police Services Board, Mayor Martelle had been negotiating a severance package with Chief Shaver in the spring of 1993, in March or April. This did not come to the attention of Leo Courville and other Board members until June. In September 1993, the Board began negotiating an early retirement package with Chief Shaver. The agreement was signed in November 1993 by the Chief, Leo Courville on behalf of the Board, and Mayor Martelle for the City.

Lack of Policies on Conflicts of Interest

It is apparent from my review of the investigations of cases of allegations of historical sexual abuse that the Cornwall Police Services Board failed to establish policies and failed to give direction to the Chief of Police regarding conflicts of interest. It was incumbent on the Board to develop such policies to ensure that conflicts of interest were identified and appropriately managed within the context of these investigations. As discussed earlier, the issue arose in the context of investigations such as Earl Landry Jr., the son of former police chief Earl Landry Sr. Chief Shaver and officers working on the Landry Jr. investigation should have had a conflict of interest policy that delineated inappropriate conduct with regard to perceived and actual conflicts of interest. The policy should have also stipulated that police officers who were members of the Board of the Children’s Aid Society could not be involved in CPS investigations involving that agency.

It is also evident that outside police forces should have conducted reviews of CPS investigations of historical sexual assault in which there were allegations of improprieties or problems. This should also have been addressed in the conflict of interest policy. Moreover, Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie testified that the decision regarding when an investigation involving a Cornwall officer should be performed internally and when it should be assigned to an outside agency is made by the police chief and that no guidelines exist as to how this decision is to be made. Again, guidelines or a policy should exist on such issues. It is my recommendation that the Cornwall Police Services Board develop a conflict of interest policy in the context of investigations relating to allegations of sexual assault, including historical sexual abuse, to ensure that such conflicts are identified and appropriately managed.

Other potential conflicts of interest arose that involved members of the Cornwall Police Services Board. The fact that Mayor Ron Martelle was a member of the Board and his son was a police officer in the Cornwall Police Service gave rise to a potential conflict of interest. The *Municipal Conflict of Interest Act*⁵⁵ states that if a member of a board has a pecuniary interest in a matter that is the subject of consideration at a board meeting, the member shall disclose his or her interest in the matter and refrain from participating in discussion of the matter, voting on any question in relation to the matter, or attempting to influence the voting on any such question.⁵⁶ The Act also states that the pecuniary interest of any child of a member of a board is deemed to be the interest of the member.⁵⁷ This placed Mayor Martelle in a potential conflict of interest with regard to any matters having any bearing, direct or indirect, on his son's financial compensation.

The 1993 Human Resources Management Inspection Report recommended that Mayor Martelle be replaced on the Board. It stated that the inspectors had been provided with documents in which the City's lawyer advised the Mayor that a conflict of interest existed with regard to his son. Nevertheless, according to the Report, the Mayor insisted on remaining on the Board and participating in labour-management discussions and contract negotiations.

A January 1994 Standard Freeholder article reported that Mayor Martelle had announced that he was resigning from the Board, in part because the 1993 Report found that he was not a team player. The article further stated: "Mayor Ron Martelle and Ald. Tom Green resigned their seats on the troubled Cornwall Police Services Board Monday ... Martelle agreed that having new people representing the city on the board may create more harmony." Another article in the same newspaper on this date quoted Leo Courville: "I can say without commenting on the report that the mayor does have a conflict of interest (on some issues) because his son is a police officer." As discussed, although Mayor Martelle resigned from the Board in January 1994, he rejoined the Board the following year in January 1995.

55. R.S.O. 1990, c. M.50.

56. S. 5(1).

57. S. 3.

The issue of Mayor Martelle's potential conflict of interest was raised again in the 1995 Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services Report, on an investigation of the Cornwall Police Services Board. This Report stated that according to the provisions of the Municipal Conflict of Interest Act, Mayor Martelle was required to disclose his interest in and withdraw from any discussion or decision making relating to the financial compensation of his son. The Report further stated that the Mayor's potential conflict extended to all normal labour relations matters, including "the negotiation of collective agreements, changes to working conditions and certain promotional and disciplinary decisions."

The 1995 Report cited the Police Services Act, which states that if after a hearing, the Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services decides that "a member of a board is guilty of misconduct or is not performing or is incapable of performing the duties of his or her position in a satisfactory manner, it may remove or suspend the member."⁵⁸ The Report indicated that any member who failed to disclose a conflict of interest and participated in decision making contrary to the provisions of the Municipal Conflict of Interest Act could be considered guilty of misconduct. However, the Ontario Civilian Commission Report stated, "We have not identified any actions on the part of the Mayor to date which would merit sanctions." The Report stated that Mayor Martelle was precluded from participating in much of the collective bargaining between the Board and the CPS that was scheduled to occur in the near future, which would presumably "diminish his potential effectiveness as a municipal representative to the Board at an important time."

The issue of the Mayor's potential conflict of interest was reported in an October 1995 Standard Freeholder article. In this article, Cornwall Police Constable Dan O'Reilly, who was stepping down as President of the Cornwall Police Association, claimed that in a 1992 bargaining session between the Board and the Police Association, Mayor Martelle had said that as long as he was Mayor, no police officer would be laid off. Constable O'Reilly pointed out that at the time, Mayor Martelle's son was at or near the "bottom of the list in terms of seniority" on the police service. Constable O'Reilly was quoted as saying, "Since he refused to assure us that no personnel (including civilian office staff at the police station) would be laid off, it was clear to us that he was willing to lay off civilians in order to save his son's job." It is evident that the presence of Mayor Martelle on the Board also created tension between Cornwall police officers and the Police Services Board.

58. S. 25(5).

Leo Courville, Chair of the Board, also faced controversy regarding potential conflict of interest issues. Mr. Courville was a practising criminal lawyer. A conflict of interest situation could arise if Mr. Courville represented individuals arrested by the Cornwall Police Service while he served as a member of the Board.

In the same October 1995 Standard Freeholder article cited above, Constable O'Reilly stated that at a January 1995 meeting with the Police Association executive, Mayor Martelle had said that shortly after he was re-elected in 1994, he had spoken to a bureaucrat in Toronto who said that Mr. Courville was placing himself in a conflict of interest when he defended clients charged by the CPS and would be given an ultimatum "to either give up his law practice or resign from the board." Constable O'Reilly claimed that Mayor Martelle "bragged" that because Mr. Courville could not afford to give up his practice he would have to leave the Board, and with Mr. Courville gone, Mayor Martelle would be in control of the Board. Constable O'Reilly said it was clear that the Police Association was being asked to assist Mayor Martelle in removing Mr. Courville from the Board. Constable O'Reilly said that he told Mayor Martelle he would not make any statement regarding Mr. Courville's potential conflict of interest without mentioning the Mayor's possible conflict of interest and the comments he had made about no police officers being laid off in the 1992 meeting.

The 1995 Report found that if Leo Courville were to represent individuals arrested by the CPS while he was a member of the Board, this could place him in a potential conflict of interest. In March 1994, Mr. Courville agreed to complete any files that involved charges laid by the CPS and not to take on any new cases until his term with the Board ended. The 1995 Report stated this would "substantially diminish the potential for any future difficulty" and thus concluded that Mr. Courville was not incapable of performing his duties "in a satisfactory manner."

The 1995 Report stated that Mr. Courville's situation did not fall under the Municipal Conflict of Interest Act. However, it noted that until recently, criminal defence lawyers were not appointed to police services boards and that those lawyers who were appointed were subject to strict guidelines, which had been issued in 1978 by the Solicitor General, the Honourable Roy McMurtry. Mr. Courville testified that he was not aware when he was appointed to the Board in 1992 of any guidelines or directives concerning conflicts of interest of Board members. The 1978 guidelines essentially stated that a lawyer should discontinue his or her local criminal practice while serving as a member of a police services board. The 1995 Report recommended that any future appointments to the Board be made in accordance with these guidelines. It also recommended that all new Board members be advised of the provisions of the Municipal Conflict of Interest Act, conflict of interest issues generally, and their legal obligations in this regard.

The 1995 Ontario Civilian Commission Report of the investigation into the Cornwall Police Services Board also mentioned that although police officers were subject to a code of conduct, nothing similar existed for Board members. The Report recommended that the Ministry of the Solicitor General and the Ontario Association of Police Services Boards and all boards across Ontario consider as a high priority the development of such a code. Leo Courville agreed that this recommendation could suggest that it would be appropriate to develop guidelines regarding conflicts of interest for Board members. However, he did not recall the development or implementation of such policies by the Cornwall Police Services Board. It is noteworthy that in 1997, the Police Services Act was amended to include the following provision: “A judge, a justice of the peace, a police officer and a person who practises criminal law as a defence counsel may not be a member of a board.”⁵⁹

In my view, the Cornwall Police Services Board should have developed a conflict of interest policy that would have allowed them to address issues of perceived and actual conflict of interest by Board members.

It is also my conclusion from a review of the evidence that the Cornwall Police Services Board failed to secure and make available appropriate resources for the adequate provision of policing services in the investigation of cases of historical sexual assault. The Board also failed to ensure that recommendations made by the Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services and the Ministry of the Solicitor General in the 1980s and 1990s were implemented in a timely manner, or at all. Moreover, the Board failed to determine objectives and priorities with respect to police services in the municipality, and failed to pursue in a timely manner the strategic planning process recommended by the Ministry of the Solicitor General. Furthermore, the Board failed to establish policies and give directions to the Chief of Police to ensure that (1) investigations into allegations of historical sexual abuse were assigned high priority and were conducted in a timely manner; and (2) conflicts of interest were identified and appropriately managed within the context of investigations relating to allegations of historical sexual abuse.

The Investigations of Richard Hickerson and James Lewis

Like some other perpetrators and alleged perpetrators of child sexual abuse in Cornwall, Richard Hickerson had a career in the priesthood. After a religious education in the United States and Switzerland, Mr. Hickerson was ordained.

59. 1997, c. 8, s. 19(3).

He secured a position in St. Boniface, Manitoba, in 1961 as a chaplain of the Society of Mary. According to a statement made to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), Mr. Hickerson admitted to his Bishop in 1963 that he was a homosexual. He said the Bishop told him that although he could not stay in St. Boniface, he would help him to obtain a position as a priest in another diocese. In the police statement, Richard Hickerson acknowledged that in his subsequent position, he became sexually involved with a teenaged altar boy. Although the situation was never investigated, Mr. Hickerson decided to leave the priesthood after the Bishop of the Diocese became aware of his behaviour.

Mr. Hickerson came to the Cornwall area in 1968. He obtained a position with the federal government at Canada Manpower as an employment counsellor. Mr. Hickerson was frequently asked by probation officers in the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office to assist individuals on probation or parole in finding employment.

In Cornwall, Mr. Hickerson became a volunteer assistant with the orchestra at the Académie de Sainte-Croix, École Musica, in the Holy Cross Convent, which was part of the separate school system. C-11 played the violin in this orchestra. C-11 testified that he and other students came to Mr. Hickerson's home for extra music lessons and that Mr. Hickerson soon became his mentor. C-11 alleged that Mr. Hickerson sexually abused him repeatedly for a number of years, beginning when he was about twelve or thirteen years old.

Keith Ouellette was a probationer under the supervision of Cornwall probation officer Ken Seguin. Mr. Ouellette testified that Mr. Seguin required him to see Richard Hickerson at Canada Manpower to obtain a job. Mr. Ouellette stated that Mr. Hickerson sexually molested him over several years, starting when he was nineteen years old.

In a 1998 statement to the OPP, Robert Sheets said he met Mr. Hickerson when he was about fourteen years old. Mr. Hickerson was his older brother's employment counsellor. Mr. Sheets stated that when he was fifteen, he dropped out of school, left home, and was living on the streets. He said that government welfare officials instructed him to go to Canada Manpower to find a job, and as his brother had given him Richard Hickerson's card, he went to Mr. Hickerson's office. He said that Mr. Hickerson told him he was a "special needs person" and assured him that this meant he was a "very special person." Mr. Sheets said it was probably after the second time he went to see Mr. Hickerson at Canada Manpower that the employment counsellor asked him to go to a movie, and he agreed. After the movie, Mr. Hickerson invited Robert Sheets to his house for some food. Mr. Sheets alleged that Mr. Hickerson then sexually molested him. Mr. Sheets said there were about six to eight other acts of abuse, involving touching, masturbation, and attempted oral sex. He stated that all of the sexual abuse occurred at Mr. Hickerson's home. Mr. Sheets also said that Mr. Hickerson provided him with alcohol and showed him homosexual male pornography at his home. Mr. Hickerson told Robert Sheets that he had formerly been a priest.

As I discuss in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police, as part of Project Truth, the OPP in 1997 and 1998 investigated allegations of sexual abuse of young males by a group of influential citizens in Cornwall. OPP officers took statements from C-11, Keith Ouellette, and Robert Sheets regarding their allegations of sexual abuse by Richard Hickerson. On June 11, 1998, the OPP interviewed Mr. Hickerson regarding these allegations of abuse. Mr. Hickerson admitted that he had engaged in sexual improprieties with these three men.

Richard Hickerson committed suicide on June 19, 1998, eight days after he was questioned by the Ontario Provincial Police.

Jamie Marsolais, who also alleged that he had been sexually abused by Richard Hickerson, did not report the abuse until after Mr. Hickerson's death. Mr. Marsolais stated that Mr. Hickerson abused him repeatedly from the time he was about nine years old until he was eleven. Mr. Marsolais also alleged that he had been sexually abused several times by James Lewis, a man who lived at his grandparents' boarding home. He stated that the abuse also began when he was nine years old. Mr. Marsolais thought that Mr. Lewis was nineteen or twenty years old at the time but that he did not appear to have full mental capacity.

Richard Hickerson and James Lewis were friends. Mr. Hickerson would come to the boarding house of Mr. Marsolais' grandparents to find jobs for the boarders. Mr. Hickerson and Mr. Lewis became involved in a sexual relationship.

The Cornwall Police Service (CPS) became involved with the Richard Hickerson case on June 19, 1998, the date of his death. Constable Sherri Murphy arrived at Mr. Hickerson's home and spoke with James Lewis and Joseph Hall, who identified themselves as friends of Richard Hickerson. They explained that Mr. Hickerson was a former priest who had left the priesthood because of sexual abuse. They told the CPS officer that Mr. Hickerson discussed committing suicide after he learned that he was under investigation by the OPP.

Constable Jeff Carroll arrived on the scene. The officer was responsible for investigating the possible suicide of Mr. Hickerson. He contacted his supervisor, Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet, who was the Officer in Charge of the Criminal Investigation Bureau. Staff Sergeant Brunet travelled to the Hickerson home. James Lewis gave the officers access to the house as he had a spare key, and Staff Sergeant Brunet, Constable Murphy, and Constable Carroll entered Mr. Hickerson's residence. The police officers found Mr. Hickerson's body on his bedroom floor. He had a rifle in his arm, had obviously suffered trauma, and showed no signs of life. The coroner pronounced the cause of death a gunshot wound to the head and issued a search warrant for pertinent information on Mr. Hickerson, including computer information that might include a suicide note or next-of-kin information. Constable Carroll saw numerous pornographic, mainly homosexual, magazines, as well as videos in Mr. Hickerson's home. A video camera was set up near his bed.

Staff Sergeant Brunet was involved with the initial stages of the investigation. He took statements from James Lewis and Joseph Hall, while Constable Carroll recorded information about the body and the interior of Mr. Hickerson's home. James Lewis showed the officers a list that Mr. Hickerson had prepared for him regarding his bank account and belongings. The document stated that Mr. Lewis could do what he wished with Mr. Hickerson's photographs, videotapes, and computer disks. Mr. Lewis stated that Mr. Hickerson had told him that he had previously considered committing suicide when an alleged victim had contacted him demanding money. Constable Carroll did not follow up on this information with respect to this alleged victim.

Constables Murphy and Hart maintained scene security, and Sergeant Pierre Lalonde was the Forensic Identification Officer assigned to the case. Constable Carroll entered a report on the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) on June 20, 1998.

On June 20, 1998, Constable Carroll met James Lewis at the Cornwall police station. They went to the morgue, and Mr. Lewis identified Mr. Hickerson's body. They returned to the police station, where Constable Carroll interviewed Mr. Lewis. Mr. Lewis told the CPS officer that Mr. Hickerson had been depressed and was contemplating suicide after being contacted by OPP Project Truth, about a week earlier. He said Mr. Hickerson had provided him with a list of things to do after his death, which he had given to Staff Sergeant Brunet the previous day. The list mentioned photographs, videos, and computer disks. Mr. Lewis agreed to show these items to Constable Carroll.

On the same day, James Lewis permitted Constables Carroll and White to enter his home. He gave the officers three boxes of floppy disks and some loose diskettes, some of which contained child pornography. Mr. Lewis also gave the CPS officers a binder of papers containing Internet addresses that appeared to be "sexually related," according to Constable Carroll's notes, as well as about twenty magazines containing child pornography and books entitled Children Who Seduce Men and Pederasty: Sex Between Men and Boys. Mr. Lewis also gave the officers a photo album with Polaroid photographs. He showed the police officers that photos missing from the album were cut up and in his garbage can. Mr. Lewis stated that Mr. Hickerson gave him the photos about a week before he committed suicide. He explained that he cut up the photos because he did not want them to cause Mr. Hickerson to get into further trouble.

On June 22, 1998, Constable Carroll spoke with Inspector Richard Trew, Staff Sergeant Brunet, Sergeant Brian Snyder, and Sergeant Lalonde about the Hickerson investigation, and it was decided that the CPS Constable would retrieve Mr. Hickerson's computer from his home. Because Constable Blake Paquin was unable to hook up the computer at the Cornwall police station, Constables Carroll and Paquin received permission from Staff Sergeant Brunet to return to Mr. Hickerson's home and conduct the computer work at that site. The officers found a large quantity of homosexual pornographic material in Mr. Hickerson's home, including eighty-five videotapes, seven of which were homemade videos featuring Mr. Hickerson and Mr. Lewis engaging in sex. The balance consisted of commercially made homosexual pornographic videos. Constable Carroll also found some notes in the home that suggested Mr. Hickerson had been writing an essay entitled "When a Man of God Has Sex With a Boy."

Mr. Hickerson's computer contained his will, which named Mr. Lewis as the executor of his estate. The computer also contained files with titles such as "Erotic Child and Victorian Parents," "Dirty Sex," "Gay Creed," and various articles on puberty. Computer disks found in Mr. Hickerson's home contained images of child pornography and e-mail messages on the trading of these images and suggestions for other such websites. Constable Carroll testified that he does not think that Mr. Hickerson's e-mail contact list was examined. Constable Carroll's notes from June 22, 1998, indicate that Staff Sergeant Brunet and Inspector Trew were shown samples of the materials found in the residence.

On June 23, 1998, Constable Carroll met with Staff Sergeant Brunet to discuss the day's plans and it was decided that Constable Carroll and Sergeant Lalonde would seize the videos, computer disks, magazines, and photographs found at Mr. Hickerson's residence and bring them to the Cornwall police station for viewing. Sergeant Lalonde found a plastic grocery bag full of cut-up photographs hanging on the doorknob of Mr. Hickerson's bedroom door and informed Constable Carroll of this discovery. Constable Carroll's notes do not mention these additional cut-up photographs, and the CPS officer testified that while he recalled seeing the bag, he does not believe that he searched its contents at the time of discovery. Nor did he recall Sergeant Lalonde showing him the cut-up photographs, and he could not comment on whether they were cut up in the same style as the photographs found in Mr. Lewis' home. Moreover, Constable Carroll's list of items seized from Mr. Hickerson's home does not mention the cut-up photographs in the bag, and given the timing of events as recorded in Constable Carroll's notes and Sergeant Lalonde's supplementary occurrence report, it seems that these photographs were not among the cut-up photographs that were given to Constable Paquin for reassembly on the morning of June 23, 1998. It is unclear from the records what happened to the cut-up photographs found at Mr.

Hickerson's residence. Constable Carroll testified that he believed these photographs were brought to the Cornwall police station and put in the same pile as the ones found at Mr. Lewis' residence.

Constable Carroll's notes indicate that later on June 23, 1998, he attended Mr. Hickerson's residence with James Lewis and informed Mr. Lewis that he had Mr. Hickerson's computer and the material Mr. Lewis had turned over to him. He told Mr. Lewis that some of the material contained child pornography.

Constable Carroll testified that he was involved in viewing the seized videos and that Constable Paquin and OPP Detective Constable Ron Genier pieced together the cut-up photographs. Detective Constable Genier was the lead investigator in the OPP investigation of allegations of sexual abuse made against Richard Hickerson by C-11, Keith Ouellette, and Robert Sheets. It was he and Detective Constable Joe Dupuis who took a cautioned statement from Richard Hickerson on June 11, 1998, eight days before Mr. Hickerson committed suicide. This is discussed in further detail in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police. Constable Carroll testified that he did not know why OPP Detective Constable Genier was assisting in viewing and cataloguing the materials found in Mr. Hickerson's and Mr. Lewis' residences. The CPS Constable further stated that there was no information sharing between himself and the OPP Constable regarding their respective investigations and no discussion regarding how the seized materials could relate to the Project Truth investigation.

Constable Carroll testified that piecing together all of the photographs was "a two- or three-day-long jigsaw puzzle project" and that working with the photographs and viewing all of the seized material took "several days." The Constable's notes contain two entries regarding viewing material collected from Mr. Lewis' and Mr. Hickerson's homes. One entry indicated that Constable Carroll spent half an hour viewing material with Constable Paquin and OPP Detective Constable Don Genier on June 23, 1998, before much of the material, including the bag of cut-up photographs, had been seized from Mr. Hickerson's home. The second entry indicated that all material was viewed and catalogued on June 24, 1998, the day after all of the videos, magazines, computer disks, and cut-up photographs had been collected from Mr. Hickerson's home and the day after Constable Carroll's notes indicated that the photographs from Mr. Lewis' home had been given to Constable Paquin for reassembly. When he testified, Constable Carroll admitted that the cut-up photographs received from the two different locations were mixed together for no apparent reason. This no doubt made the officers' task more difficult as they had pieces of two puzzles rather than one.

The reassembled photographs depicted young boys in sexual positions. Constable Carroll estimated that the ages of the boys in the photographs ranged from seven to eighteen. The CPS officer considered some of the photographs to be child pornography.

On June 30, 1998, Constable Carroll met James Lewis and offered to return to him some of the material seized from Mr. Hickerson's residence, namely eighty-five male pornographic videos, twenty-three male pornographic magazines, and two notebooks containing addresses of pornographic Internet sites. He declined and signed a quit claim. Mr. Lewis was told that these materials would be destroyed.

On July 10, 1998, Constable Carroll met with James Lewis and told him he would be charged with possession of child pornography. After Mr. Lewis spoke to a lawyer by telephone, Constable Carroll interviewed Mr. Lewis. Constable Carroll showed Mr. Lewis the reassembled photographs. Mr. Lewis said Mr. Hickerson had given him these photos about a week before he died. He said the photos had been taken ten to fifteen years earlier, in Mr. Hickerson's home. Mr. Lewis identified his brother and another male in the photographs. However, Constable Carroll did not make any attempts to contact Mr. Lewis' brother.

When Mr. Lewis was asked why he had refrained from cutting up some of the photographs, he replied that he had kept them because he liked the bodies featured in them. When he was asked about a photograph featuring a boy of about eleven or twelve years old, Mr. Lewis said the boy was a willing participant who wanted Mr. Hickerson to take pictures of him.

Constable Carroll showed Mr. Lewis images of children, predominantly young girls, involved in sexual situations that included oral sex and vaginal and anal penetration, which were located in a file on a computer disk with Mr. Lewis' name on it. Mr. Lewis said these images were from the Internet and that Mr. Hickerson had given them to him. Constable Carroll's notes state:

He cannot understand what the problem is as all people in those images are consenting and willing participants. When asked how young children can consent to this he tells me that if I read the books that I seized as well I should know that children are sexual beings also. He tells me all children are sexual creature[s].

When Constable Carroll asked Mr. Lewis if he found the images sexually arousing, Mr. Lewis refused to answer.

At the end of the interview, Mr. Lewis became sullen and said that he understood why Mr. Hickerson had killed himself. When Constable Carroll asked him if he was considering committing suicide, Mr. Lewis would not answer. He said people like Constable Carroll did not understand people like him. The Constable became concerned for Mr. Lewis' well-being, so after Mr. Lewis was released on charges of possession of child pornography, with the condition that he not have contact with anyone under eighteen years old, he was apprehended under the provisions of the Mental Health Act. Mr. Lewis was taken to the Cornwall General Hospital for a psychiatric assessment, where he was admitted for precautionary purposes.

Constable Carroll met with Bill Carriere of the Children's Aid Society, and CAS workers were asked to view the photographs to determine if they could identify the individuals in the pictures. No identifications were made. Constable Carroll did not make any further attempts to identify the young persons in the photographs.

Although during their interview on July 10, 1998, Mr. Lewis mentioned to Constable Carroll that children are sexual beings and are capable of consenting to sexual acts, the officer did not ask Mr. Lewis if he was having sex with children. Constable Carroll did not take steps to investigate this possibility. Constable Carroll did not attempt to obtain a warrant in order to conduct a thorough search of Mr. Lewis' home, nor did he place Mr. Lewis under surveillance or have discussions with Mr. Lewis' neighbours, friends, or family.

Had the Cornwall Police Service taken further steps to investigate James Lewis in 1998, it would probably have learned that Mr. Lewis had sexually abused young people such as Jamie Marsolais. In fact, during his testimony at this Inquiry, Constable Carroll agreed that Mr. Lewis had been forthcoming with the police, and when counsel asked, "Is it possible that had you asked Lewis about his own activities, and about his own sexual activities in particular, that he may have just told you?" Constable Carroll replied, "Yes, he may have." Moreover, there should have been more information sharing between the investigators at the Cornwall Police Service and the Ontario Provincial Police concerning Mr. Hickerson and Mr. Lewis.

On August 13, 1998, the CPS destroyed sixty pounds of pornographic material seized from the homes of Mr. Lewis and Mr. Hickerson. It included pornographic tapes, magazines, and packaging. The only item retained was a personal video that showed the location of Mr. Hickerson's rifle in his bedroom.

James Lewis was acquitted of possession of child pornography. Constable Carroll testified that Mr. Lewis' statement was not admitted at trial.

In 2005, Mr. Lewis was charged by the CPS for abusing Jamie Marsolais. He subsequently pleaded guilty to indecent assault. In addition, Mr. Lewis was arrested in 2004 and pleaded guilty in 2005 to possession of child pornography. When the police searched his home, they found toys, children's music, and children's videos.

No consideration was given by the CPS to the possibility of transferring the Polaroid photographs to the OPP for the Project Truth investigation or to retaining them for future investigations to be conducted by either the Cornwall police or another police force. It is clear from the evidence that the Cornwall Police Service failed to cause an investigation to be conducted regarding the photographs of young boys found in the home of Richard Hickerson in 1998.

Staff Sergeant Brunet was Constable Carroll's supervisor. In his meetings and consultations with Jeff Carroll, Staff Sergeant Brunet should have ensured that an investigation was pursued with regard to the young children depicted in the photographs found in Richard Hickerson's home.

Investigation of Allegations by Marc Latour of Sexual Abuse by His Elementary School Teacher

On June 19, 2000, forty-one-year-old Marc Latour called the OPP Project Truth hotline. Mr. Latour reported that he had been assaulted when he was in grade 3 by Gilf Greggain, a teacher at St. Peter's Elementary School. He was eight or nine years old at the time. Mr. Latour testified that he had been encouraged by his cousin, Richard Nadeau, to contact the police. That day, Sergeant G. Lefebvre of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) received a letter from officers at Project Truth informing the Cornwall police of the allegations against Mr. Greggain. Sergeant Lefebvre forwarded the Latour matter to the Sexual Assault and Child Abuse Unit (SACA) for investigation by his police force. Sergeant Lefebvre assigned the case to Constable Jeff Carroll.⁶⁰

On June 23, 2000, Constable Carroll interviewed Marc Latour at the Cornwall police station. The interview was videotaped. Marc Latour stated that he had been abused in grade 3 by Mr. Greggain at St. Peter's Elementary School. He told Constable Carroll that the abuse began when he was placed in detention at the end of the school day. The abuse was initially physical and gradually progressed to sexual abuse. Marc Latour stated that the teacher led him to believe that his mother had given Mr. Greggain permission to perpetrate these acts:

I can remember at the beginning that he would say things that I wasn't doing my work right and you know, he was always blaming me for things. I'd get detentions at first, and then my mother would look into the situation and he'd say I was misbehaving and all sorts of other stuff. After a couple of weeks of that, detentions and everything, then he started beating me. ... [A]t first it would be slaps, and then just progressed and progressed. He used to tell me that: "Your mother gave me permission to discipline you because she can't discipline you and your father's not home" ... I can remember he used to pull down my pants, flip me over his knee and start spanking me. This was after school, of course. It happened right in the classroom. Many times he would degrade me. At the time I was only a kid and I didn't think too much about it, but over his knee there, I could feel something hard all the time. Now I know what it was, he was getting his kicks on this.

60. Jeff Carroll became Acting Sergeant in October 2000 and Sergeant in July 2001.

Mr. Latour alleged that his teacher touched the private parts of his body. He told Constable Carroll that Mr. Greggain "always had my pants down." Mr. Latour said that Mr. Greggain made threats, which included harming his father. Marc Latour's school grades began to drop.

One afternoon, Marc Latour's father saw his son crying outside the school. Marc told his father that Mr. Greggain had physically hurt him but did not disclose the sexual abuse. As he said to Constable Carroll in the interview, "I never told my dad that he was getting his kicks on me, molesting me, touching me." He stated that his father had confronted Mr. Greggain and that the abuse stopped. But Marc Latour never stopped "believing that [his] mother gave [Mr. Greggain] permission to do this to [him]." He told the officer that this permanently scarred his relationship with his mother, whom Marc Latour said he "hated" and whom over the years he had tried "to hurt"; he wanted to "pay her back" by constantly getting into trouble.

Mr. Latour told Constable Carroll that another teacher at the school, Mrs. Gosselin, came into the classroom during school and confronted Mr. Greggain about the physical abuse. Mr. Latour stated that Mrs. Gosselin had been his teacher in grade 2 and that he was an honours student in her class. Mrs. Gosselin was no longer alive at the time of the police interview. Mr. Latour also told the CPS officer that he had sent a letter to his siblings disclosing the physical abuse but did not mention the sexual acts perpetrated by his teacher.

Marc Latour told Constable Carroll that there were no eyewitnesses to the abusive acts. However, he informed the CPS officer that his friend Dennis Rochon was present when Marc Latour had a conversation with Jules Tyo, a janitor at a school at which Mr. Greggain was a teacher. Mr. Tyo was the brother-in-law of Mr. Rochon. Mr. Latour said that Mr. Tyo made comments suggesting that he knew Mr. Greggain had inappropriate relations with children. Mr. Tyo was unaware at that time that Marc Latour was a victim of Mr. Greggain. Marc Latour told the CPS officer at a later interview where Mr. Tyo lived. But the officer did not ask Marc Latour to help locate his friend Dennis Rochon.

In the June 2000 interview, Mr. Latour also told Constable Carroll that he had recently seen Mr. Greggain walking with handicapped children, accompanied by women. However, the Constable did not investigate whether Mr. Greggain was employed or involved with an agency or organization that worked with vulnerable people or children with disabilities. Nor did the CPS officer report this matter to the Children's Aid Society. At the hearings, the officer claimed he did not think that he had sufficient information. Constable Carroll told Mr. Latour at the interview that he believed him and arranged to meet him again in early July 2000.

On July 5, 2000, Marc Latour was interviewed again by Constable Carroll. Mr. Latour was not told why a second interview was necessary, nor why it was conducted under oath. Marc Latour again described the physical and sexual abuse committed by his teacher, Mr. Greggain. Constable Carroll encouraged Mr. Latour to provide more details of the sexual abuse, but Mr. Latour said he needed more time. The CPS officer suggested that Mr. Latour speak to a counsellor. Constable Carroll told Mr. Latour that he would not pursue the investigation of Mr. Greggain as he did not have the entire story.

Mr. Latour met with Constable Carroll the following month, on August 2, 2000, to advise him that he was not ready to proceed with the case. The officer told Mr. Latour that he would place the matter in abeyance until such time as Mr. Latour was prepared to pursue it.

In March 2001, Mr. Latour contacted the officer, now Acting Sergeant Carroll, to inform him that he was prepared to reopen the case and provide a full account of the abuse that he had suffered. During the interview, Marc Latour discussed aspects of the sexual abuse not previously disclosed to Sergeant Carroll, including that Mr. Greggain had sodomized him. He also told the police officer that he thought the principal of his elementary school had been aware of the physical abuse. Mr. Latour also mentioned that Mr. Greggain had tried to harm his sister, Joan.

Sergeant Carroll told Mr. Latour that he had received a call from Richard Nadeau two months earlier, requesting an update on the case. The CPS officer made it clear to Mr. Latour that this was his case, not Mr. Nadeau's case.

Sergeant Carroll discussed with Mr. Latour various options for obtaining his school records. The officer thought he needed reasonable grounds to believe an offence had been committed in order to obtain a search warrant for a class list or personnel file of the alleged perpetrator. He believed that he did not have reasonable grounds and that he needed corroborative evidence. He informed Mr. Latour that he would seek an opinion from the Crown regarding this case.

With the complainant's consent, Sergeant Carroll obtained Marc Latour's school records. He confirmed with the school board that Marc Latour had correctly identified the name of his elementary school, his teacher, and that he was in grade 3 when Mr. Greggain taught him. He also learned the name of the principal at that time, Mr. P. Beaudette. The information confirmed that Marc Latour was also in Mr. Greggain's class in grade 6, as Mr. Latour had previously related in an interview.

Sergeant Carroll did not contact the principal. He claimed that the Mr. Beaudette was not available. He testified that the principal may have been in a long-term care facility or have passed away. That was the extent of his recollection. He also stated that Mrs. Gosselin, the teacher from this elementary school, was no longer alive. But Sergeant Carroll did not try to make contact with other teachers who had worked at the school at the time of the alleged abuse.

On April 12, 2002, Sergeant Carroll interviewed Mr. Tyo, who, as mentioned, had been a custodian at the school when Mr. Greggain was a teacher. Mr. Tyo related an incident that he had observed with another custodian, Don Delorme, at St. Columban's West School, an English Catholic elementary school in Cornwall. Mr. Tyo claimed that they had seen Mr. Greggain fondling children at St. Columban's West School. Mr. Tyo further claimed that he had confronted Mr. Greggain in the stairwell about this incident. Mr. Tyo told the officer that in gymnastics class, Mr. Greggain's hands appeared to be on the private body parts of the children. But Sergeant Carroll did not make contact with the school to confirm whether the details conveyed by Mr. Tyo were accurate. Mr. Tyo had signed releases to enable Sergeant Carroll to obtain his employment records, but this also was not pursued by the Cornwall police officer. Sergeant Carroll testified that he had decided not to proceed further with these other allegations because they did not relate to Mr. Latour's complaint. In my view, Sergeant Carroll should have followed up on these matters.

Mr. Latour had previously asked Sergeant Carroll not to disclose his name to Jules Tyo. Yet Mr. Latour subsequently learned from Mr. Tyo that Sergeant Carroll had in fact mentioned Mr. Latour's name to Mr. Tyo. Marc Latour was upset. He confronted the officer about this, who responded that there was simply a communication problem. When Sergeant Carroll testified, he acknowledged that this was "something that I let out of the bag and I believe I eventually apologized to Mr. Latour in the subsequent meeting with him."

On April 15, 2002, Sergeant Carroll spoke with Don Delorme, the custodian at St. Columban's West School, who was also the union representative. Mr. Delorme could not recall witnessing with Mr. Tyo any incident involving Mr. Greggain and students several years earlier. Mr. Delorme questioned Mr. Tyo's credibility and told the CPS officer that Mr. Tyo was always in trouble. He said that Mr. Tyo would often instigate confrontations, that he was dismissed for taking school materials, and that he eventually tendered his resignation instead. Sergeant Carroll testified that after this interview with Mr. Delorme, he had concerns about Mr. Tyo's credibility. But Sergeant Carroll did not confront Mr. Tyo with the statements made by Mr. Delorme in the interview.

Sergeant Carroll interviewed Marc Latour's sister, Joan Latour Dingwall, on May 9, 2002. Joan Latour had also been a student in Mr. Greggain's class in grade 6. She told the CPS officer that Mr. Greggain would take students to hockey games, and she provided the name of one of the students to Sergeant Carroll. Yet the Sergeant did not attempt to locate that student. Joan Latour Dingwall provided the officer with a release to obtain her school records, but he did not pursue this either. Ms Latour Dingwall told the CPS officer that she had destroyed the letter that her brother Marc had sent her regarding the abuse he had suffered. Sergeant Carroll did not approach Marc Latour's other siblings to try to obtain a copy of the letter.

Sergeant Carroll also did not make efforts to locate other students in Marc Latour's class who might have been present when Mrs. Gosselin confronted Mr. Greggain after the beatings.

It was on or about August 8, 2002, that Sergeant Carroll spoke by telephone to the alleged perpetrator, Mr. Greggain, and advised him that serious allegations had been made against him by Marc Latour. An interview took place with Giff Greggain the following day. Mr. Greggain recalled both Marc Latour and his sister, Joan. He told Sergeant Carroll that Marc Latour was a "little devil guy" who had problems in school. Mr. Greggain confirmed that he had taken students to hockey games and that he had taught Marc Latour. Mr. Greggain did not deny that he might have spanked Marc Latour. Mr. Greggain confirmed that Mr. Tyo was a school custodian but denied having a confrontation with him. Sergeant Carroll asked Mr. Greggain if he would be willing to submit to a polygraph test. Mr. Greggain responded that he would speak to his lawyer about this request.

Sergeant Carroll met with Marc Latour on September 5, 2002, to give him an update on the investigation. He told Mr. Latour that Mr. Greggain had denied the allegations and that he was trying to have Mr. Greggain undergo a polygraph test. Sergeant Carroll told Marc Latour that "an admission may be the only thing that could help the case unless another victim came forward." Over three months later, on December 18, 2002, Sergeant Carroll received a call from Mr. Greggain's lawyer, Mr. Markell, who informed him that Mr. Greggain would not submit to a polygraph test. Sergeant Carroll testified that this was the last investigative step he took regarding this case.

Marc Latour again contacted Sergeant Carroll, on January 3, 2003, to obtain an update on the investigation. The CPS officer told him that Mr. Greggain had refused the polygraph test and that Sergeant Carroll believed Marc Latour's allegations of abuse committed by the teacher. Marc Latour told the CPS officer that he wanted Mr. Greggain to be criminally charged. Sergeant Carroll informed Mr. Latour that there were insufficient grounds to lay a charge but that he had prepared a brief for review by the Crown to obtain further advice. The CPS officer stated that he would give Mr. Latour a definitive answer regarding the laying of charges after he received the Crown's opinion. Sergeant Carroll had a discussion about the case with Crown Attorney Guy Simard that day, and on January 6, 2003, the brief was delivered to the Crown.

Sergeant Carroll recorded in a supplementary occurrence report on February 12, 2003, that he had had a conversation with Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald, who had reviewed the evidence and concluded that there was no reasonable prospect of conviction should charges be laid against Gilf Greggain. This is discussed in further detail in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Sergeant Carroll claimed that following this conversation, he advised both Marc Latour and Mr. Greggain of the Crown's opinion and informed them that the file would be closed. However, the officer did not record this in his notes, and when he testified, he could not provide an explanation as to why he did not make a written record of these calls to Marc Latour and Gilf Greggain. Moreover, Marc Latour testified that he never received a call from Sergeant Carroll advising him of the opinion of the Crown.

Sergeant Carroll acknowledged at the hearings that he was looking for corroboration of Mr. Latour's allegations of abuse. The Cornwall police officer thought that he had nothing more than the statement that Marc Latour was victimized. Sergeant Carroll testified that he wanted something more to confirm Mr. Latour's story: "There [were] more things that I could have done and, again, my focus was on trying to develop some sort of corroboration on what occurred between Mr. Greggain and Mr. Latour." But the CPS officer did not contact other potential witnesses who might have provided the corroboration he believed would strengthen the case. Sergeant Carroll acknowledged that he was preoccupied with several other investigations at the time of the Latour case.

Sergeant Carroll reiterated in his evidence that he found Marc Latour sincere. He also acknowledged that Marc Latour's account of events was consistent throughout the investigation.

Sergeant Carroll admitted that the biggest problem with the Latour investigation was delays. He maintained, however, that he did not think that he had reasonable and probable grounds to lay a criminal charge.

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie was also involved in the Marc Latour investigation. He received updates on a regular basis from Sergeant Carroll regarding the case. Staff Sergeant Derochie recalled that Sergeant Carroll's explanations for the delays in the Latour case related to the complexity of historical sexual abuse cases, difficulty in finding corroboration, and the fact that Marc Latour was emotional. Staff Sergeant Derochie acknowledged that when Marc Latour was asked to swear an affidavit at the time he gave his statement to the CPS, this was probably not a normal practice of the police force in a sexual assault investigation. Staff Sergeant Derochie had no recollection of being told by Sergeant Carroll that Marc Latour had seen Mr. Greggain with a group of handicapped children. He stated that Sergeant Carroll should have advised him of this because it suggested that there might be a current risk of abuse to children. It was Staff Sergeant Derochie's view that this historical sexual abuse case did not receive the same degree of urgency as current cases. Staff Sergeant Derochie acknowledged that there were long delays in this case and that Sergeant Carroll was preoccupied at that time with other criminal investigations. As Staff Sergeant Derochie testified:

... [C]ertainly everybody's complaint, whether it be historical or a fresh complaint, is important and they should be dealt with ideally in the same manner. The reality of the situation is it just doesn't happen that way.

...

It didn't happen here ... This was a long delay.

Sergeant Carroll could have assigned the Latour case to one of his investigators if he had been too busy to devote the necessary time to the case.

It is clear from the evidence that Staff Sergeant Derochie and the Cornwall Police Service could have done more to properly supervise Sergeant Carroll during the investigation into allegations of sexual abuse made by Marc Latour against Gilf Greggain. It is also evident that Sergeant Carroll and the Cornwall Police Service failed to conduct a thorough and timely investigation into allegations of historical sexual abuse made against Gilf Greggain by Marc Latour.

Potential witnesses were not interviewed, there were lengthy delays in the investigation, and the Cornwall police did not follow up on information obtained from people who were interviewed. As Staff Sergeant Derochie acknowledged, this case of historical sexual abuse did not receive the same attention as other types of criminal cases at the CPS. This was particularly serious as children in the Cornwall community may have been at risk of sexual abuse by this alleged perpetrator. Marc Latour had told the CPS that he saw Mr. Greggain accompanying children with disabilities. This was another investigation of historical child sexual abuse in which there were excessive delays, lack of follow-up with potential witnesses, and failure to give the case and the alleged victim of child sexual abuse the attention and support they warranted.

Allegations Against Father Charles MacDonald by Albert Lalonde

Albert Lalonde was born in September 1958. When Albert was in grade 5 at St. Columban's West School, he met Father Charles MacDonald and became an altar server at St. Columban's Parish. Albert Lalonde alleged that he had been abused by Father MacDonald. Albert Lalonde initially made these allegations to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in 1995. This is discussed in further detail in the chapters on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police and of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

In 2002, these allegations were brought to the attention of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS). On May 16, 2002, in a telephone call from Richard Nadeau, Sergeant Jeff Carroll became aware of the allegations of abuse made by Albert Lalonde against Father Charles MacDonald. A call had been made by Mr. Nadeau to the CPS the morning after proceedings against Father Charles MacDonald had been stayed by the court. The stay was ordered on May 13, 2002.⁶¹ This was a case involving the OPP in which multiple victims alleged abuse by Father Charles MacDonald.

Richard Nadeau, as mentioned, operated a website known as Project Truth. He alleged that he was himself a victim of abuse. He had contact with Albert Lalonde and other alleged victims of abuse. Mr. Lalonde had apparently sent Mr. Nadeau an e-mail detailing his alleged abuse by Father MacDonald.

Mr. Nadeau informed Sergeant Carroll that Albert Lalonde wanted to file a complaint against Father MacDonald. Sergeant Carroll advised Richard Nadeau that the CPS would investigate the matter if it fell within its jurisdiction. Mr. Nadeau responded that the alleged abuse by the priest occurred at St. Columban's Parish, which was within the jurisdiction of the Cornwall Police Service.

Sergeant Carroll met with Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie and the Deputy Chief regarding this matter on May 16, 2002. Staff Sergeant Derochie told Sergeant Carroll that the CPS would handle this case. As I discussed in detail earlier in this chapter, David Silmsen contacted the Cornwall police in December 1992 and alleged that he had been sexually abused in the past by both Father Charles MacDonald and Ken Seguin. Constable Heidi Sebalj was responsible for the investigation. As described earlier in this chapter, Mr. Silmsen refused to continue with his complaint against Father MacDonald in September 1993 as a result of the financial settlement between himself, the priest, and the Diocese. Criminal charges were not pursued by the CPS against Father MacDonald. Sergeant Carroll was not familiar with the David Silmsen investigation and his allegations of abuse against Father MacDonald.

61. This is discussed later in this Report.

Later that day, Sergeant Carroll received a telephone call from Albert Lalonde. Mr. Lalonde said that Richard Nadeau had advised him to call the CPS.

On May 17, 2002, Albert Lalonde again contacted Sergeant Carroll, to inform him that his brother Marc Lalonde also wanted to meet with the CPS. The two brothers, Albert and Marc, arrived at the Cornwall police station. On that day, Sergeant Carroll took a statement under oath from Albert Lalonde. Mr. Lalonde described three incidents of abuse, two of which fell within the jurisdiction of the Cornwall Police Service and one of which was within the jurisdiction of the Ontario Provincial Police. Mr. Lalonde told Sergeant Carroll that he had reported these allegations to the OPP several years earlier.

Albert Lalonde stated that he first met Father Charles MacDonald when he was in grade 5 at St. Columban's West School and became an altar boy at St. Columban's Parish. Mr. Lalonde described the three incidents of abuse. The first incident of sexual abuse allegedly occurred in the church in Cornwall, when Albert Lalonde was in grade 5, after he had served mass with Father MacDonald. He said that the second incident of sexual abuse took place following a mass during the summer. Father MacDonald drove Albert Lalonde to Centennial Park, located off Avonmore Road, which is where the alleged abuse took place. The third alleged incident of sexual abuse occurred after a wedding at St. Columban's Church in 1971 at which Albert Lalonde had served as an altar boy. Albert Lalonde told Sergeant Carroll that he had previously prepared a handwritten statement, dated April 9, 2002, which had been witnessed by Carson Chisholm on April 26, 2002.

Carson Chisholm is the brother of Helen Dunlop and the brother-in-law of Perry Dunlop. His involvement with the Dunlops and alleged victims of abuse in Cornwall is discussed further in this Report.

Albert Lalonde informed Sergeant Carroll that he had spoken about the incidents of abuse to two doctors, Dr. Ken Richter, a psychiatrist, and Dr. Luc Clement, a family physician. Albert Lalonde was prepared to provide medical releases to the CPS to enable the police to interview the doctors. Mr. Lalonde explained that he could not tell his family physician, Dr. Clement, earlier all the details of the abuse perpetrated by Father MacDonald because "I didn't know it." Albert Lalonde had disclosed to Dr. Clement abuse perpetrated by another man, Raymond St. Jean, a foster child raised by his grandmother.

Albert Lalonde explained to Sergeant Carroll that he had been at home watching television when there was a newscast about Father Charles MacDonald. At that time, he experienced a "flashback" and explained to his wife what had happened to him. He told Sergeant Carroll that he went to see Dr. Richter the following day and began therapy about his flashback.

Albert Lalonde told Sergeant Carroll that he had decided to contact the Long Sault OPP in 1995 to make complaints about both Raymond St. Jean and Father Charles MacDonald. He gave a statement to the OPP about both these alleged perpetrators. The case against Raymond St. Jean proceeded. Mr. Lalonde stated that he testified at the St. Jean trial. Albert Lalonde thought that the OPP had charged Father Charles MacDonald. The OPP told Albert Lalonde that he was the third victim to come forward. They said that David Silmsen was the first complainant and that he was followed by John MacDonald. Albert Lalonde seemed somewhat uncertain at the time of his interview with Sergeant Carroll as to the status of his case regarding the OPP and Father Charles MacDonald. Albert Lalonde advised Sergeant Carroll that he had spoken to Perry Dunlop, who had put him in contact with John MacDonald and David Silmsen.

Sergeant Carroll met with Staff Sergeant Derochie after he obtained the statement from Albert Lalonde.

A few days later, on May 21, 2002, Sergeant Carroll took a sworn videotaped statement from Richard Nadeau. Sergeant Carroll had some concerns regarding the influence that Mr. Nadeau might have had on Albert Lalonde. Sergeant Carroll asked Richard Nadeau not to release details on his website or deal with the media with respect to the Albert Lalonde allegations. Richard Nadeau informed Sergeant Carroll that he had a statement relevant to this case. Sergeant Carroll asked Mr. Nadeau for a copy of it. After speaking with Richard Nadeau, Sergeant Carroll concluded that he did not appear to have exerted any influence on Albert Lalonde.

In his statement, Richard Nadeau informed Sergeant Carroll about C-4. Mr. Nadeau stated that he did not think that C-4 or his brother would come forward. Sergeant Carroll did not contact C-4 or any of the altar boys mentioned by Albert Lalonde. Sergeant Carroll acknowledged at the hearings that these individuals might have strengthened the case involving Albert Lalonde as they might have corroborated his allegations.

Mr. Nadeau also referred to a hairdresser who might have been abused by Father Charles MacDonald. However, Sergeant Carroll had no recollection when he testified of making any efforts to locate this individual. Richard Nadeau also mentioned a boy who had been taken to the basement of the church by Father MacDonald and allegedly abused. Sergeant Carroll conceded that he did not pursue this lead either.

Sergeant Carroll did not discuss the Silmsen investigation with Constable Sebalj when he was investigating allegations made by Albert Lalonde. Nor did Sergeant Carroll interview Father Charles MacDonald.

On May 23, 2002, Sergeant Carroll met with Albert Lalonde. Mr. Lalonde executed releases to allow the Cornwall police to obtain information from his physicians. The CPS officer obtained releases for Drs. Richter and Clement but not for two other doctors whom Albert had mentioned, psychiatrists Dr. Ahmed and Dr. Nadler. At the hearings, Sergeant Carroll could not explain why he did not contact these two psychiatrists.

On the same day, Sergeant Carroll contacted Detective Constable Joe Dupuis to obtain information from the OPP on the case. Sergeant Carroll was aware that Raymond St. Jean had been criminally charged and convicted for sexually abusing Albert Lalonde and his brothers. The Sergeant sought information from the OPP on that case, as well as on the 1995 investigation of Father MacDonald regarding Albert Lalonde's complaint.

A meeting took place between the OPP and CPS on May 30, 2002. In attendance were Detective Inspector Pat Hall and Detective Constable Dupuis from the OPP, and Staff Sergeant Derochie and Sergeant Carroll from the CPS. The OPP provided the Cornwall police with Albert Lalonde's statements. These included the April 25, 1995, statement of Albert Lalonde to OPP Detective Constable Norman Hurtubise and the May 12, 1995, statement of Albert Lalonde to OPP Detective Constables Michael Fagan and William Zebruck. Detective Inspector Hall stated that these interview reports had been sent to Crown Attorney Curt Flanagan on August 16, 1995, for a legal opinion and had been disclosed to Father Charles MacDonald's lawyer. He confirmed that no criminal charges had been laid by the OPP with regard to Albert Lalonde's allegations against Father MacDonald.

The package of material from Detective Inspector Hall also included the December 16, 1996, interview of Albert Lalonde by OPP Detective Constable Don Genier regarding an investigation of sexual assault by Marcel Lalonde, as well as the April 25, 1995, interview of Albert Lalonde by Constable Carole Pirnat regarding sexual assault allegations against Raymond St. Jean. Detective Inspector Hall stated that Raymond St. Jean had been arrested on October 5, 1995, and charged with indecent assault and gross indecency by the Long Sault Detachment of the OPP. There were five alleged victims, including Albert Lalonde.

Detective Inspector Hall asked Sergeant Carroll in May 2002 for a copy of his interview with Albert Lalonde, as some of the allegations against Father MacDonald allegedly occurred in the Avonmore area and the OPP intended to investigate the matter.

As mentioned, the information given to the Cornwall police contained the April 1995 interview of Albert Lalonde by OPP Detective Constable Hurtubise. Albert Lalonde had told the OPP that four to six weeks before the interview, he had had flashbacks to an incident with Father Charles MacDonald that had occurred twenty-five years earlier, when he was an altar server. He explained to the OPP that when he heard the allegations against Father MacDonald on television, he had had a flashback of Father MacDonald assaulting him. Albert Lalonde listed a number of altar boys who served at the church at that time.

However, Sergeant Carroll did not ask Albert Lalonde for the names of those other altar boys or try to contact them.

In the statement to the OPP on May 12, 1995, Albert Lalonde described his recovered memory and mentioned that he had told Dr. Richter and Dr. Clement about the abuse. In this OPP statement, Albert Lalonde stated that a news story about the allegations against Father MacDonald and the lawsuit triggered his memory of the abuse. Albert Lalonde was distraught and he cried during the OPP interview.

It was agreed that Sergeant Carroll would interview Dr. Clement and that Detective Constable Dupuis from the OPP would interview Dr. Richter.

On June 25, 2002, Sergeant Carroll interviewed Dr. Clement, Albert's physician. Dr. Clement treated him for stress and depression. He stated that in 1993, Albert Lalonde had a recollection of being abused by a priest. No name was provided. Dr. Clement stated that he had referred Albert Lalonde to Dr. Nadler and Dr. Ahmed. Sergeant Carroll did not contact either of these doctors.

In this interview, Dr. Clement discussed with Sergeant Carroll reports from Drs. Ahmed and Nadler. Albert Lalonde had reported that both he and his brother were abused by Raymond St. Jean and another man, who was not identified. Dr. Clement stated that Dr. Richter had discharged Albert Lalonde as a patient in June 1997.

Sergeant Carroll testified that the fact that Albert Lalonde did not identify Father MacDonald as the alleged perpetrator to either Dr. Clement or Dr. Richter had an impact on his view as to whether there were reasonable grounds to believe that a criminal offence had been committed. Sergeant Carroll thought that the Crown should review the case. Sergeant Carroll also testified that the clinical notes of the physicians indicated that Albert Lalonde was struggling with whether his flashbacks were true. The only person Mr. Lalonde was able to identify was Raymond St. Jean, who had been convicted of abusing him. According to Sergeant Carroll, Dr. Clement did not think that Albert Lalonde was credible. Sergeant Carroll thought that Dr. Clement's opinion would have a serious impact on the success of the case. Nevertheless, Sergeant Carroll conceded that he did not ask Dr. Clement whether he was qualified to give an opinion on psychological matters. Sergeant Carroll knew that Dr. Clement had referred Albert Lalonde to psychiatrist Dr. Ken Richter.

Sergeant Carroll provided a copy of his June 25, 2002, interview with Dr. Clement to the OPP. Albert Lalonde had mentioned to Sergeant Carroll that he had seen four doctors. The only doctor whom Sergeant Carroll interviewed was Dr. Clement.

The notes of Dr. Richter stated that Albert Lalonde had vague recollections of a priest doing something to him. Dr. Richter recorded on April 12, 1995, that Albert Lalonde was upset by a sudden recollection of a sexual act committed by a priest. In subsequent appointments, Mr. Lalonde repeatedly mentioned that he had been abused by a priest. According to Dr. Richter's note on February 18, 1996, Albert Lalonde stated that he was angry with the priest but did not name him.

On June 18, 2002, Detective Constables Genier and Dupuis interviewed Albert Lalonde regarding his allegations of abuse by Father MacDonald at Centennial Park, off Avonmore Road. In June and July 2002, the two officers interviewed Albert Lalonde's brother Marc Lalonde as well as his ex-wife, Judy Lalonde, and their daughter, Laura.

Sergeant Carroll stated that he kept Staff Sergeant Derochie current on the case.

On July 9, 2002, Sergeant Carroll informed Albert Lalonde of his interview with Dr. Clement and stated that Dr. Richter needed to be interviewed. He also advised Mr. Lalonde that the Crown would be consulted to determine if there were grounds to charge Father MacDonald. On July 16, 2002, Sergeant Carroll spoke to Crown Attorney Lorne McConnery, who advised the Sergeant that he would be handling the case. Mr. McConnery asked Sergeant Carroll to forward the brief to him.

On the same day, OPP Detective Constable Genier interviewed Albert Lalonde's ex-wife, Judy, who stated that Albert had never discussed the abuse until he spoke with a person named John. Sergeant Carroll had previously learned in his interview with Mr. Lalonde that John MacDonald, another alleged victim of Father Charles MacDonald, had been in contact with Mr. Lalonde. Sergeant Carroll testified that he had not been aware of this evidence from Mr. Lalonde's former wife when he sent the brief to Crown Attorney Lorne McConnery.

On July 23, 2002, Sergeant Carroll had a meeting with OPP Detective Constable Dupuis and Staff Sergeant Derochie. The OPP officer provided the clinical notes and records obtained from Dr. Richter.

Sergeant Carroll sent a letter to Lorne McConnery on July 24, 2002, asking for his opinion as to whether or not there were reasonable and probable grounds to charge Father MacDonald. He enclosed the May 17, 2002, statement of Albert Lalonde, a summary of Sergeant Carroll's interview of Dr. Luc Clement, and Dr. Richter's notes. In his correspondence, Sergeant Carroll wrote: "I am seeking your advice on the reasonableness of charging at this time given the longstanding difficulties with respect to identification and offence specifics."

The following day, July 25, 2002, Sergeant Carroll contacted Albert Lalonde. Mr. Lalonde provided a photograph of the wedding at which Father MacDonald had presided and Albert Lalonde had been an altar server. On August 12, 2002, Sergeant Carroll informed Albert Lalonde that he was waiting for the Crown's opinion on this case. On September 6, 2002, the Sergeant made contact with Crown Attorney Lorne McConnery, who stated that he needed a few more weeks to fully review all the materials. Sergeant Carroll conveyed this information to Mr. Lalonde that day.

On November 15, 2002, more than two months later, Mr. McConnery informed Sergeant Carroll that reasonable and probable grounds were not present and that the likelihood of conviction was non-existent. This was inscribed in Sergeant Carroll's notes and in the supplementary occurrence report in 2002. The Crown's involvement in the Albert Lalonde matter is discussed further in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

On January 20, 2003, Staff Sergeant Derochie and Sergeant Carroll reviewed a letter from the Crown dated January 8, 2003, confirming his opinion on the Albert Lalonde complaint. Lorne McConnery wrote that he had reviewed the CPS file as well as the OPP file regarding the Albert Lalonde allegations against Father Charles MacDonald. He mentioned that Sergeant Carroll had expressed to him his concerns regarding whether the offence had been committed. Mr. McConnery wrote that in reviewing the briefs of the CPS and Project Truth, he had concluded that Sergeant Carroll's concerns were "well-founded."

Sergeant Carroll spoke to Albert Lalonde the following day. He informed Mr. Lalonde that there were insufficient grounds to lay a charge. He told Mr. Lalonde that the reasons for the decision included the fact that his identification of Father Charles MacDonald was not made until he saw the news story and that there had been no disclosure for some time while he was undergoing therapy. Staff Sergeant Derochie was advised of the call with Albert Lalonde. This ended Sergeant Carroll's involvement with this file. He informed Mr. Lalonde that he was closing the file.

Sergeant Carroll had concluded that there were no reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge. He was concerned about Albert Lalonde's credibility. Yet Sergeant Carroll did not consult either the Crown or experts regarding recovered memory syndrome. Sergeant Carroll acknowledged that he had no real evidence that Carson Chisholm had tainted Albert Lalonde's evidence. He also admitted that there was no evidence of tainting by Perry Dunlop.

Sergeant Carroll acknowledged that he did not conduct a full review of the CPS investigation of David Silmser's allegations against Father MacDonald, the same alleged perpetrator. He did not speak to Staff Sergeant Brunet or Constable Sebalj, the officers who were involved in the investigation of the Silmser matter, regarding any possible similarities in the Silmser and Lalonde cases or any other potential witnesses who could have been contacted. Nor did Sergeant Carroll interview Father MacDonald. Sergeant Carroll's investigation did not include a thorough review of all OPP Project Truth files related to Father Charles MacDonald.

It is clear from the evidence that the Cornwall Police Service failed to take proper investigative steps with regard to the allegations of historical child sexual abuse by Albert Lalonde. These would have included identifying further victims of the alleged perpetrator, conducting interviews with other potential witnesses, identifying corroborative evidence, interviewing Mr. Lalonde's psychiatrists, and interviewing the suspect.

The OPP investigation of the allegations of Albert Lalonde and other alleged victims of sexual assault against Father Charles MacDonald will be discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

Perry Dunlop

The mandate of this Inquiry is to examine the response of public institutions to allegations of the sexual abuse of young people in the Cornwall area. Its focus is on the past actions of institutions and on how these institutions could make improvements for the future.

In this context, Mr. Perry Dunlop has affected both institutional actions and responses. He was an employee of one institution, and reported to another regarding allegations that affected other institutions. His actions became relevant to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) investigation, Project Truth, and to related prosecutions. It is within this context of institutional response that I am considering Mr. Dunlop's part in the pattern of actions by and reactions to public institutions.

Mr. Dunlop was validly ordered by the Superior Court of Justice of Ontario to appear at this Inquiry. He refused to do so and served a period of incarceration for contempt of court. This matter is more fully discussed in the chapter on the process of this Inquiry and related appendices in this Report. I did have the opportunity to observe Perry Dunlop when he appeared before me during the examination to determine if he would testify. I have also had the opportunity to review the extensive record of evidence in documentary form and the oral testimony of those who were involved in various capacities with Mr. Dunlop. It clearly would have been preferable to receive Perry Dunlop's testimony before this Inquiry, both to better understand the outline of information provided in his lengthy will-state prepared at the direction of the Cornwall Police Service and in other documents and to ascertain Mr. Dunlop's state of mind at various times and his reasoning for various discussions and actions. In addition, oral testimony permits the testing of evidence through cross-examination, as well as presenting the opportunity to probe new areas of recollection or response to the testimony of other witnesses before this Inquiry.

In making findings in relation to this aspect of institutional response, I have exercised the cautions and disciplines set out in the chapter on the process of this Report related to the use of documentary evidence and evidence untested by cross-examination, applying them as I would to any other individual or institution.

Career History up to 1993

Perry Dunlop was born in Cornwall, Ontario, in 1961. He graduated from Cornwall Collegiate Vocational High School in 1980 and went on to receive an honours diploma from Algonquin College in law and security administration in 1983. He also took courses in criminology at Carleton University.

The Cornwall Police Service (CPS) hired Mr. Dunlop on August 19, 1983. Perry Dunlop attended the Ontario Police College in Aylmer for three months, and then he spent six months on uniformed patrol at the CPS. In early 1984, he attended the Ontario Police College for further training. He never completed any specialized courses on sexual assault or child abuse.

Following his initial training and experience on the job, Mr. Dunlop was appointed to the rank of constable first class effective August 19, 1986. He received additional training in the late 1980s and early 1990s, attending the advanced police training course at the Ontario Police College in 1989, a drug investigative techniques course at the Canadian Police College in 1991, and a course on undercover operations offered at the Ontario Police College in 1991.

Constable Dunlop's assignments in the late 1980s consisted of working as a uniformed patrol officer, which he described as mostly "one man cruiser patrols." In January 1990, Constable Dunlop was given a one-year assignment to the Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB) of the Cornwall Police Service.

During his new assignment at CIB, Constable Dunlop investigated one sexual assault case. The complainant had been taken to the hospital and Constable Dunlop was the first officer to arrive. Mr. Dunlop indicated that the victim appeared comfortable with him and requested him as the investigator.

In January 1991, Constable Dunlop joined the Drug Unit, a group that worked jointly with the RCMP and the OPP, each force providing members. The work of the Drug Unit took Constable Dunlop outside the City of Cornwall and often outside Ontario. The Drug Unit was disbanded in 1992 and Constable Dunlop returned to his work as a uniformed patrol officer. However, over the next two years or so, the Constable continued to carry responsibility for some drug files initiated while he was in the Drug Unit. Constable Dunlop was also recruited by Sergeant Claude Lortie of the CPS to work undercover at night while maintaining daytime police duties. Fellow officers were unaware of this assignment, which ultimately led to arrests and drug-related charges.

Because of Constable Dunlop's continued involvement in the Drug Unit cases and undercover work, he maintained an office in the CIB after he had formally returned to patrol duty.

Discipline and Evaluation History up to 1993

In September 1985, Constable Dunlop reported that his cruiser was damaged by an unknown driver while parked in a hospital parking lot. An investigation determined that the damage had occurred when the Constable was driving the vehicle and hit a concrete post. It was the investigating officer's opinion that Constable Dunlop knew how the damage occurred and made a false report in order to avoid liability. He was then charged with neglect of duty and deceit, which is considered a major charge under the Police Act.⁶²

During their investigation of this charge, Inspector Trew and Staff Sergeant Kirkey of the CPS opened Constable Dunlop's locker to retrieve his notebook. In his locker, they found two pieces of identification with civilian names. Apparently, Constable Dunlop had been instructed in May 1985 to locate the owners of the identification and had not done so by the fall of 1985. As a result, he was also charged with two counts of neglect of duty under the Police Act.

Constable Dunlop pleaded guilty to one of the minor offences of neglect of duty relating to one of the pieces of identification and was sentenced to four hours forfeiture of leave. He pleaded not guilty to the other minor count but was found guilty after a full hearing and sentenced to four hours forfeiture of leave.

The major offence related to deceit with respect to the report of vehicle damage was adjourned while Perry Dunlop brought a Charter application requesting that the previous convictions be quashed and the charge relating to the major offence be stayed. This application was dismissed. After meeting with representatives from the Cornwall Police Association, who also met with relevant CPS authorities, Constable Dunlop pleaded guilty to a less serious offence of neglect of duty and was sentenced to five days forfeiture of leave. The hearings officer in this case was Staff Inspector Stuart McDonald, who later became Perry Dunlop's brother-in-law.

Constable Dunlop was the subject of a conduct report for unprofessional use of the police radio. He was counselled with respect to this incident in 1986, and evaluation reports recount that he accepted the report and constructive criticism in a positive manner.

Overall, Constable Dunlop received positive and above-average evaluations from his supervisors. He was particularly commended for his team work, community work, his pride and dedication to police work, his self-motivation and diligence, his keen surveillance and knowledge of his patrol area, and his sense of humour.

62. R.S.O. 1980, c. 381.

Areas that were identified as requiring further development included looking to experienced personnel for direction more often; not allowing “the short comings of the Justice system to effect [sic] his own morale”; and keeping up to date on paperwork, improving report writing, and developing a methodical and detailed approach to investigation, including related paperwork. The issue of morale was raised in 1987.

During his career in policing, Perry Dunlop was involved in a great number of community activities, including volunteering his time and talents as a musician to community and charitable events. He also entertained at local venues in the Cornwall area. In 1987 and again in 1991, Constable Dunlop was given the award of “Police Officer of the Year” by the Optimist Club.

Relevant Aspects of Perry Dunlop’s Personal Connections

As indicated, the focus of this Report is on institutional response. In the case of Mr. Dunlop, some aspects of his personal life and family connections are relevant to understanding what transpired.

Perry Dunlop married Helen Chisholm in 1989 at St. Andrew’s Church. Officiating at this wedding was Father Charles MacDonald. The Dunlops had three daughters, one of whom was baptized by Father MacDonald. The Dunlop family were members of the Roman Catholic faith. Mr. Dunlop was involved in activities in St. Andrew’s Parish, and he regularly attended this church, where Father MacDonald was a priest in residence.

Helen Dunlop testified before this Inquiry. She expressed herself forcefully and with firm convictions. As will be set out later in this chapter, Ms Dunlop became engaged in certain aspects of her husband’s work and also in his activities outside of work in relation to allegations of sexual abuse in the Cornwall area.

Carson Chisholm is the brother of Helen Dunlop, and also became involved in Perry Dunlop’s investigation activities outside of work. Mr. Chisholm also appeared before this Inquiry, speaking with colourful self-confidence and with a firm belief in his own convictions and actions. For example, when asked why he represented himself to people as a private investigator, Mr. Chisholm explained that he did not pass himself off “as a licensed investigator or any association with the police” and so “I’m private in that sense” and also said, “I don’t remember calling myself an investigator, but I in fact was an investigator.”

Helen Dunlop’s sister was married to Stuart McDonald, a police officer who was at various points Constable Dunlop’s superior officer at the Cornwall Police Service, both before and after his marriage to Helen Dunlop. Constable Dunlop’s interactions with this brother-in-law at work were limited, and the men did not discuss work at family gatherings. Stuart McDonald retired in 1995. Ultimately, Perry Dunlop made serious personal allegations against retired Staff Inspector Stuart McDonald, which will be discussed later in this section.

Constable Dunlop Becomes Aware of the Silmsers Complaint

In December 1992, David Silmsers made a complaint of historical sexual abuse. The alleged perpetrators were Father Charles MacDonald, a Roman Catholic priest, and Ken Seguin, a probation officer. The case was initially assigned to Sergeant Claude Lortie and then to Constable Heidi Sebalj. This investigation is detailed elsewhere in this chapter.

According to subsequent statements made by Perry Dunlop, in September 1993, he gained knowledge of the sexual assault complaint.

The evidence and the documents were unclear as to how Constable Dunlop's initial knowledge was obtained. The officer says in an August 1994 affidavit that on September 24, 1993, he already knew about the allegations of sexual assault from Sergeant Lortie. Sergeant Lortie did not confirm this in his testimony before me. Correspondence from Constable Sebalj indicates that she showed Constable Dunlop the Silmsers statement on September 24, 1993. Unbeknownst to her, he made a copy of this statement and took it home. There, he discussed it with his wife, Helen.⁶³

According to subsequent statements made by Perry Dunlop, he took several actions in the fall of 1993 in relation to the Silmsers complaint. He checked the police computer network through the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Co-Operative (OMPPAC) and found that the only information regarding the investigation of the Silmsers complaint was the location of the sexual assault, 40 Fourth Street West. This is the address of St. Columban's Parish in Cornwall. The last entry on the computer was dated January 18, 1993, with a notification that the initial complaint was overdue.

I note that there were also errors in the OMPPAC documents, including the information that the complainant, David Silmsers, was female.

Perry Dunlop swore an affidavit on August 30, 1994, that sets out the events in this period. It says that one morning while in the CIB office, Constable Dunlop overheard Sergeant Ron Lefebvre and Sergeant Lortie openly discussing the investigation of the Silmsers complaint. It was during that overheard discussion that Constable Dunlop first learned the investigation concerning Father MacDonald had recently been terminated because the Diocese and the priest had made a monetary settlement with the complainant. Constable Dunlop's affidavit also indicated that Sergeant Lortie had made it clear he strongly disagreed with the case being closed. The discussion is confirmed by Sergeant Lortie, who dates the conversation to September 28, 1993. I have heard other evidence that suggests it occurred on either September 23 or 24. He confirmed that he had been dissatisfied with the way the David Silmser case had been handled.

63. Helen Dunlop said that this conversation was on September 23 or 24, 1993.

Constable Dunlop had strong ties with St. Andrew's Church, where Charles MacDonald was then residing. He regularly attended there, as did some of his friends and family. He was actively involved in the educational and social activities of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. In his affidavit, Constable Dunlop wrote that given the allegations against Father MacDonald, he was concerned about the safety of the children involved in parish activities.

At this point it is clear that, based on Constable Dunlop's knowledge at the time, his concern for the safety of children was reasonable.

On September 25, 1993, in the parking lot of Quinn's Inn during a social outing, Constable Perry Dunlop spoke to Executive Director Richard Abell of the Children's Aid Society (CAS) about the David Silmser complaint. Perry Dunlop and Richard Abell were then personal friends and involved in Church work together. Details of Constable Dunlop's further actions regarding David Silmser's complaint and his CPS colleagues, the local Crown attorney, and the CAS are set out in the relevant chapters of this Report. What is pertinent for understanding the Constable's state of mind is that he spoke to Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet about his continuing concerns for the safety of children, discussed the duty to report with Richard Abell of the CAS, and also sought the advice and support of his wife, Helen Dunlop, and his brother-in-law, Carson Chisholm. He provided a copy of the Silmser statement to Mr. Abell on September 30, 1993.

What is also relevant to understanding the context for the deterioration of working relationships over this period is that it appears that Helen Dunlop was attempting to contact David Silmser directly, and that Mr. Silmser complained to Constable Sebalj, who in turn reported the complaint to Staff Sergeant Brunet. This in turn led Staff Sergeant Brunet to caution Constable Dunlop regarding a possible breach of internal confidentiality and police policy. Constable Dunlop subsequently indicated that he felt threatened and coerced as a result of this discussion. I had the opportunity to see Staff Sergeant Brunet testify and hear his evidence. I am satisfied that he did not intend to coerce Perry Dunlop but to explain to him the ramifications of his actions and those of his wife. Having said this, I can also understand that Constable Dunlop might reasonably interpret the conversation as critical or as increasing pressure on him.

Based on the evidence I have reviewed and heard, Constable Dunlop acted properly by bringing the matter and his concerns to the attention of senior officers and the CAS. After becoming aware of a suspicious and troubling situation, he sought the advice of the CAS and spoke to a superior officer, Staff Sergeant Brunet, regarding his concern that children were still at risk. He did not get any satisfactory explanations that suggested the perceived risk would be addressed. He then made the decision to formally report and provided the Silmser statement to the CAS, acting from both a moral and a legal perspective despite having to break ranks, so to speak, with the usual chain of command.

Some might argue that he should have tried to work this out within the chain of command in the police force. I do not agree. The law on the duty to report to the CAS cannot be “taken over” by anyone, be it an employer or even, in this case, a police service. The duty to report for professionals under the Child and Family Services Act arises if a professional has “reasonable grounds to suspect that a child is or may be suffering or have suffered abuse.” If this is the case, the professional is required to report the suspicion and information to the CAS.⁶⁴ A peace officer is specifically mentioned as a professional with a duty to report.⁶⁵

Discipline Related to Disclosure to CAS

On October 7, 1993, Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis requested that Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie investigate Perry Dunlop’s provision of a copy of the Silmser statement to the Children’s Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. Staff Sergeant Derochie discussed the issue with Chief Claude Shaver and Deputy Chief St. Denis in mid-October, and on October 15, 1993, Chief Shaver decided that Constable Perry Dunlop should not be charged with any breach of the Police Services Act but only counselled. This counselling session did not occur.

According to the testimony of Staff Sergeant Derochie, he did not complete his investigation into Constable Dunlop’s actions until January 4, 1994, after reviewing two related OPP investigations. He again recommended that no discipline be imposed.

During this same timeframe, the CAS was investigating the information Constable Dunlop had reported, in Project Blue, its own investigation. Project Blue is fully described in the chapter on the institutional response of the Children’s Aid Society, but it is worth noting that the minutes of Project Blue meetings reveal efforts by CAS staff to schedule meetings with Constable Dunlop. Despite several efforts in late 1993 and 1994, the CAS staff found Constable Dunlop unresponsive to their requests, and in the end they ceased trying to contact him. Although these efforts coincided with a period in which the Constable had started to develop a stress-related illness, it is still troubling that he did not cooperate with an institution that was making a diligent effort to inquire into the issues he had brought to their attention.

64. Child and Family Services Act, RSO 1990, c. 11, s. 72(3).

65. S. 72(4)(c).

In January 1994, Constable Dunlop booked off work, taking short-term sick leave. He indicated that he felt ostracized at work and “very anxious, my mind was racing, wondering why I was made to feel like the bad guy.” This short-term sick leave turned into long-term disability leave as Constable Dunlop remained off work until May 1997. Obtaining disability coverage was not straightforward, and caused additional worry and stress. Payment was not made by Sunlife insurance company until August 1994, and accumulated leave had to be used. In June 1994, Perry Dunlop started to see a psychiatrist.

In February 1994, at home on sick leave, Perry Dunlop received notice that a complaint had been made by David Silmser regarding the showing of a page of his statement on television. A complaint of this breach of confidentiality was made against the Cornwall Police Service as well as Constables Dunlop and Sebalj. Perry Dunlop has consistently denied providing David Silmser’s statement to the media. It has never been determined how this statement found its way to the media.

In April 1994, the insurer for the Cornwall Police Service, Scottish & York, wrote indicating that Perry Dunlop should retain his own lawyer, as one of the issues was whether Constable Dunlop had breached police force policy. This shocked the Constable. At that time, he was not receiving any disability payments, and this concern about legal representation was an added worry for the family. It took several weeks to sort out the issue of representation.

Perry Dunlop was formally served in relation to a lawsuit filed by David Silmser on May 9, 1994. Sergeant Lortie had visited Perry Dunlop at home on May 3, 1994, to indicate that the Cornwall Police Association would fight for the officer to receive insurance coverage. At that time, the Staff Sergeant also related that Deputy Chief St. Denis had told him that no Police Services Act charges against Constable Dunlop were forthcoming.

On May 14, 1994, Constable Dunlop was served by Staff Sergeant Derochie with a notice of a Public Board of Inquiry related to Police Services Act charges, including the charge that he was guilty of discreditable conduct and breach of confidence by releasing a copy of the Silmser statement to the CAS and divulging a matter required to be kept confidential, and also showing a statement from a complainant to the CAS without proper authority. The background to these charges includes the January 1994 press release prepared by the CPS and the Cornwall Police Services Board, inviting the complainant to initiate a police complaint. This is fully discussed in this chapter.

The Board of Inquiry was convened in Ottawa in September 1994. The Board panel released its decision on January 31, 1995. The case was appealed and the Divisional Court heard the appeal in November 1995, dismissing it.

The Board of Inquiry found that Constable Dunlop had acquired knowledge of the Silmsr complaint in the course of his employment as a police officer, albeit in an informal manner since he was not the investigating officer. The Board considered that it appeared the complainant was truthful and Constable Dunlop thus had “reasonable grounds” to suspect a child had suffered abuse, and therefore that he had an obligation as a professional to report to the CAS. The Board pointed out that there was no allegation that Constable Dunlop had acted maliciously or without a basis for his belief that reasonable grounds existed. In other words, the Board declined to uphold the Police Services Act charges made against Constable Dunlop.

The Divisional Court, in its December 7, 1995, reasons, adopted the approach taken by the Board of Inquiry. Specifically, the Court said:⁶⁶

... Const. Dunlop was an active duty police officer who gained information in the course of his “professional or official duties”—it does not matter that he was not the officer assigned to the case—all police officers have a primary duty to prevent the commission of crime. Nor does it matter that the complainant D.S. was no longer a child as he was at the time of the alleged abuse.

Constable Dunlop in September 1993 had “reasonable grounds to suspect that a child—may have suffered abuse.” He had a duty, therefore, to “forthwith report the suspicion and information on which it is based to a society.”

In terms of whether Constable Dunlop was subject to the order of a senior officer regarding disclosure, the Court found that the duty to report prevailed over the obligation to follow an order of a senior officer not to disclose. The Court reasoned that to interpret otherwise would defeat the purpose of the provisions to require reports by professionals and to give them protection for such reports. I agree.

Back in the fall of 1994, it appeared there was a possibility that further Police Services Act charges against Constable Dunlop would be forthcoming. Possible charges were being considered in relation to comments made by the Constable about his Board of Inquiry hearing, that he was refusing to be a “fall guy.” As well, in November 1994, a written complaint was filed by Doug Seguin, brother of the deceased Ken Seguin, alleging misconduct by Constable Dunlop. In the end, neither issue resulted in further Police Services Act charges, but during the period of uncertainty over their disposition, there was additional stress and worry for Constable Dunlop and his family. In my view, it also increased his perception that his employer was deliberately trying to harm him or discredit him.

66. Police Commissioner v. Dunlop, 26 O.R. (3d), p. 586.

1996 Independent Investigations While on Leave

After the dismissal of the Police Services Act charges, Constable Dunlop did not return to work, and by this time he had been off work for almost one year. In December 1995, Ms Laurel Rupert threatened Perry Dunlop and made death threats against his daughter. Ms Rupert pleaded guilty in July 1996 to the charge of uttering death threats and failing to comply with conditions to stay away from the Dunlop residence. I accept that Perry Dunlop believed that his family was at risk due to the media exposure associated with him and his family, and the sometimes contentious coverage. An analysis of this coverage is provided in Phase 1 expert testimony, in chapter 4 of this volume.

In June 1996, Perry Dunlop commenced a civil action against his employer, the Cornwall Police Service, the Cornwall Police Services Board, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, the Police Complaints Commissioner, and named individuals. The named individuals were Claude Shaver, Carl Johnson, Joseph St. Denis, Luc Brunet, Brendon Wells, Doug Seguin, and Malcolm MacDonald. Through his lawyer at the time, Charles Bourgeois, Perry Dunlop alleged malicious prosecution, negligence, abuse of process, and defamation, and specified a demand for over $40 million in damages. Following a change in lawyers, the claim was later decreased to $1.25 million in a fresh amended statement of claim.

From 1994 to 1996, there had been media coverage of the sexual abuse allegations in the Cornwall area and also about Perry and Helen Dunlop and Carson Chisholm. For example, The Globe and Mail featured a report on Constable Dunlop’s disclosure and the subsequent Police Services Act charges. On December 12, 1995, CBC Television aired an episode of The Fifth Estate in which both Perry and Helen Dunlop were interviewed. Entitled The Man Who Made Waves, the program was re-aired in 1996 and 1997. Some, but not all, of this coverage occurred because Mr. or Ms Dunlop spoke to media representatives. In this respect, some of the media coverage was generated by Perry Dunlop. As well, Mr. Chisholm wrote letters to the editor and spoke to reporters of local newspapers.

Perry Dunlop indicated that partly because of media coverage, victims of sexual abuse began to contact him to tell their story in June 1996. Constable Dunlop indicated that he spoke first to C-8, in June 1996, and that C-8 had asked him to contact him during the previous winter. Perry Dunlop concluded, after several discussions with C-8, that it was important to contact Ron Leroux, a person identified by C-8, as he was “full of knowledge.” Perry Dunlop said the following in his April 7, 2000, will-state:

It became clear to me that Ron Leroux was the inside man. He was the operator who ran with these players. He was the U/C operator of the pedophile world. Although I had never met him as of this time I believe he was also a pedophile.

In June 1996, Perry Dunlop spoke to Carole Deschamps, Robert Renshaw’s sister, regarding her recollections of visitors to the home of Ken Seguin. He also spoke to the Ottawa lawyer of Albert Roy, Wendy Rogers, to obtain information on his civil suit.

He also spoke with Ann Bellefeuille, a local lawyer, regarding her observations of Ken Seguin and others in the company of young men. He spoke with the former spouse of Chief Shaver, Rachel Leduc. Perry Dunlop indicates that she expressed concern regarding the safety of his family. In September 1996, he met with David Silmser, John MacDonald, and C-19, and in October obtained a statement from C-19.

Perry Dunlop indicates that on September 11, 1996, he obtained contact information for Ron Leroux from C-8. After Constable Dunlop had made several calls to Ron Leroux, Mr. Leroux agreed to meet with him in Maine, where Ron Leroux was then residing. On October 7, 1996, Perry Dunlop had his first meeting with Ron Leroux. Constable Dunlop and his lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, had several further meetings with Ron Leroux that fall. The meetings took place in Maine and in Ontario. Ron Leroux talked to Perry Dunlop about his former neighbour and good friend, Ken Seguin, and the prominent men and teenagers he said had visited Ken Seguin at his home. He also talked about men and teenagers who had visited Malcolm MacDonald, Ken Seguin, and others at Mr. MacDonald’s cottage, a short distance from his home near Summerstown.

Also, during the fall of 1996, Perry Dunlop spoke with Travis Varley and became aware of the Varley shooting incident. This incident is discussed in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services. The significant factor for Perry Dunlop was that prior to the shooting of Andrew MacDonald, probationers and other underage individuals had consumed alcohol at the home of Ken Seguin.

On November 11, 1996, Perry Dunlop met with Ron Leroux again, this time in Aurora. Mr. Dunlop indicates that it was at this meeting that Mr. Leroux confirmed a series of conversations he claimed had occurred in November 1993, shortly before the death of Ken Seguin. According to Perry Dunlop's April 7, 2000, will-state, Ron Leroux had first mentioned these events at the Maine interview in October 1996 and had claimed that the conversations occurred at Ken Seguin's house. Mr. Leroux alleged that essentially, Father Charles MacDonald and Malcolm MacDonald had stated that Perry Dunlop and "his whole family" should be shot. Ken Seguin, according to Ron Leroux, had expressed private concerns to him about the safety of the Dunlops.

Perry Dunlop indicates that his knowledge of these three-year-old threats caused him to feel vulnerable. The fact that the OPP, after its investigation, told him it would not proceed with charges related to these alleged threats probably affected his attitude toward the OPP. However, Helen and Perry Dunlop were not told this by Detective Sergeant Pat Hall until January 6, 1999. The principal reason that the Detective Sergeant gave at that time appeared to relate to the comments made by Ron Leroux that the conversation was "ranting and ravings" rather than serious threats. Mr. Leroux repeated this belief in his testimony before me. He also said he did not say that someone wanted to kill Perry Dunlop, but rather that he had heard Father Charles MacDonald say, "I want the bastard dead," in reference to Perry Dunlop. He confirmed that he thought this was "just rants and ravings of an old man." He also said that his affidavits regarding the threats were exaggerated, that he had not written the statements he had signed, and that aspects of them were false.

I accept that Perry Dunlop did feel vulnerable in 1996 and 1997, although objectively it appears that the statements that concerned him were, at most, "rantings and ravings" and there was no serious threat.

Later in November 1996, Carson Chisholm, Helen and Perry Dunlop, and Charles Bourgeois went to the home of Helen Dunlop's brother-in-law and Perry Dunlop's former superior officer, Stuart McDonald. They confronted him regarding a possible relationship with Ron Leroux, Ken Seguin, and Malcolm MacDonald, based on information given to them by C-8 and Ron Leroux.

Stuart McDonald testified before this Inquiry, stating that he clearly recalled the meeting, as one might expect. He testified that he denied going to Ken Seguin's house or associating socially with Ken Seguin and Malcolm MacDonald. He also testified that he did not have the impression that Mr. Bourgeois or Mr. Dunlop believed his denials, and that he pointed out to the Dunlops that they had known him longer than "this Mr. Leroux." Mr. McDonald also testified that he offered to take a lie detector test but that Charles Bourgeois refused him. Mr. Leroux's statement also alleged that Stuart McDonald, Ken Seguin, Malcolm MacDonald, and Charles MacDonald were homosexual lovers. Stuart McDonald indicated in his testimony before me that the statement was false. Ron Leroux, in his testimony before me, indicated that he had not confirmed Stuart McDonald's attendance at a “VIP meeting” or at Ken Seguin’s house, although he was able to identify the former CPS officer’s picture. Mr. Leroux appeared confused as to how the allegations against Stuart McDonald arose.

In late 1996, Perry Dunlop continued to contact individuals he believed had been abused, including Gerald Renshaw, C-15, and Albert Roy. He took statements from some but not all of the men and women he contacted. Perry Dunlop identified the following as persons from whom he took statements in this period: Gerald Renshaw, David Silmsen, C-18, C-8, Ron Leroux, C-99, Carole Deschamps, and C-15. I note that he took multiple statements from both C-8 and Ron Leroux. It also appears that Carson Chisholm spoke with many individuals but can identify only one individual from whom he took a written statement: Albert Lalonde.

In December 1996, Perry Dunlop’s lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, contacted the office of London Chief of Police and on December 18, 1996, delivered “the entire package of affidavits gathered so far” by Perry Dunlop to Chief Julian Fantino’s office. London Chief of Police Fantino, as he then was, had recently completed an investigation into abuse of young people called Project Guardian, and this was one reason he was chosen to receive the material from Perry Dunlop. As well, since Perry Dunlop had instigated litigation against his own police force, he would not have provided it to the Cornwall Police Service. The London Police Service did not investigate the allegations but provided the materials to the Criminal Investigation Branch at the OPP office in Orillia. This incident and the handling of the material provided by Perry Dunlop is covered in greater detail in the chapters on the institutional responses of the Ontario Provincial Police and the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Meetings with various men who may have been sexually abused, including C-68, continued up to March 1997. Perry Dunlop obtained statements from Robert Renshaw and C-130. In addition, Carson Chisholm and Ron Leroux went to Fort Lauderdale in December 1996 to see if they could identify any Cornwall individuals participating in sexual activities with young boys. This visit did not identify any information to substantiate Mr. Leroux’s information about improper conduct of Cornwall-area men with minors. On April 30, 1997, OPP Detective Sergeant Pat Hall of Project Truth called Perry Dunlop to say that he would be looking at allegations related to sexual abuse in the Cornwall area.

Perry Dunlop Returns to Work at the CPS

On May 19, 1997, Perry Dunlop returned to work at the Cornwall Police Service. He initially returned on a part-time basis, under the advice of his doctor, and returned to full-time duties over a period of approximately six months.

Soon after his return, according to Perry Dunlop's will-state, Detective Inspector Tim Smith of the OPP indicated to Constable Dunlop that he was in possession of the material provided by the Constable to Chief Fantino and that it could take six months to investigate all allegations. Detective Inspector Smith confirmed this June 1997 meeting, which is described in more detail in the chapter on the OPP. Detective Inspector Smith requested that all possible victims be forwarded to him and said that a special project had been established that included experienced sexual assault investigators. Detective Inspector Smith also told Constable Dunlop to advise his brother-in-law, Carson Chisholm, to stop taking statements. There is no indication as to whether Perry Dunlop complied with this request.

It is also Constable Dunlop's recollection that Detective Inspector Smith indicated that if sexual assault victims came forward to Perry Dunlop and wanted his presence for the statement, there would be "no problem with that."

On September 26, 1997, in the presence of Inspector Trew and Acting Sergeant Aikman of the CPS, Constable Dunlop was given a letter ordering him to disclose to Inspector Tim Smith "all notes, tapes, statements, etc." related to sexual assaults by Friday, October 3, 1997. Mr. Dunlop recounts that a later meeting, held in July 1998 with Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall, revealed that the reason for this demand was the failure of the offices of the Attorney General and Solicitor General to provide the Project Truth investigation with all the materials Constable Dunlop had sent them. Constable Dunlop was asked to replicate the information and provide it by August 7, 1998. According to his will-state, Perry Dunlop provided some material in July–October 1998. The provision of material by Perry Dunlop was not timely, nor were efforts to obtain his material adequate. I note that throughout this period of obtaining information and material from Perry Dunlop, over several years, there was considerable confusion about what information was collected in the context of a criminal investigation and what was collected in support of the civil action that Constable Dunlop had instituted. As discussed in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police, there was never a systematic approach taken as to what, if anything, was subject to solicitor–client privilege and what should have been disclosed.

At the end of 1997, after Constable Dunlop had returned to full-time duties, there was a complaint by Ron Wilson, a member of the Cornwall Police Services Board, regarding Perry Dunlop. The allegation was that he had made comments over a public address system that referred to a deceased officer and a seriously ill colleague in a joking manner. In approximately the same period, there were some very minor issues raised regarding Perry Dunlop's uniform. I accept the evidence of Staff Sergeant Derochie that he decided not to proceed with formal discipline on the public address system matter although he thought the incident had occurred and was unsuccessful in his efforts to counsel Constable Dunlop informally.

In late 1998 and early 1999, Constable Dunlop received telephone calls from victims in Alberta and British Columbia alleging abuse in the Cornwall area. He also encountered individuals alleging abuse by Jean Luc Leblanc and Malcolm MacDonald and at the Cornwall Classical College. Constable Dunlop also indicated that he received calls from individuals whom he referred to Project Truth.

Contact with the media continued after Constable Dunlop's return to work. For example, in January 1999 Perry and Helen Dunlop were interviewed on CBC Radio Canada on a program called Whistleblowers, and on Pamela Wallin Live in February 1999.

Constable Dunlop met with Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Joe Dupuis of the OPP on January 18, 2000, in the course of their Project Truth investigation. Prior to this meeting, on January 10, 2000, Constable Dunlop had received an order from Staff Sergeant Derochie of the CPS. The Constable had been ordered to provide full disclosure to Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm with respect to the Marcel Lalonde investigation. He was also ordered to disclose to Project Truth investigators any evidence in his possession related to their investigation and not to communicate with any alleged victim or witness in relation to Project Truth or the Lalonde prosecution. Constable Dunlop was ordered not to communicate with the public or media regarding the subject matter of the order or his involvement in any criminal proceedings. The disclosures were to include a detailed will-state describing all meetings with complainants and witnesses and any other involvement in either the Lalonde prosecution or the investigations that were the subject of Project Truth.

At their meeting, Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Dupuis gave Constable Dunlop a list of forty-four questions. Perry Dunlop indicated that he was already preparing a will-state for the CPS that would in his view answer most of the questions. Constable Dunlop worked on his will-state through January, February, and March, and completed it on April 7, 2000. This constituted his full-time duties at work.

Perry Dunlop indicated that he felt hampered in his efforts by having a noisy office, no office telephone, and inadequate equipment and clerical support. His wife also refers to a "window-less, phone-less" office. Although Staff Sergeant Derochie agrees that there was no telephone, he said that the office had a window, had since been in use by a senior officer, and was not "a punishment" but typical of available offices at the Cornwall Police Service.

Perry Dunlop Leaves the CPS

In April 2000, Perry Dunlop resigned from the Cornwall Police Service effective the end of June 2000, and the family moved to British Columbia in July 2000. Ms

Dunlop referred to the resignation as being “under duress.” Factors she referred to include a lack of collegial support, not receiving a new position, and spending many months in an inadequate office without regular police work while drafting the requested will-state. A lawyer acting for Perry Dunlop sent a letter to the CPS, alleging constructive wrongful dismissal.

It is clear that following his return to full-time duties at the end of 1997, Constable Dunlop was not able to return to the career path he had prior to the disclosure of the Silmsker complaint. There were numerous “friction points” from the viewpoint of both Perry Dunlop and his employer. These included matters related to offices, assigned duties, use of the PA system, perceived denial of promotional opportunity, and so on. In addition, the issue of whether Constable Dunlop should be charged with offences related to testimony of C-8 in the Marcel Lalonde case arose in mid-1999, although it was concluded in July 2000 that no charges would be laid. In this period, it appears to me that Perry Dunlop was still preoccupied with issues touching upon his civil litigation, his sense of vulnerability related to past Police Services Act charges, and his concerns about family safety. Neither he nor his employer appeared able to move forward.

Shortly after leaving for British Columbia, Perry Dunlop wrote to the Honourable Jim Flaherty, then Attorney General for Ontario, enclosing the will-state he had composed while in the last months of work at the Cornwall police. Signing himself Constable Perry Dunlop, he concludes his letter by saying:

THE COMMUNITY NEEDS YOUR HELP.

AS I WRITE THIS LETTER FROM OUT OF PROVINCE I UNDERSTAND THAT MPP GARRY GUZZO HAS PRESENTED A BILL TO THE ONTARIO LEGISLATURE. I IMPORE YOU TO SUPPORT THIS BILL AND PUT JUSTICE BACK ON TRACK IN THE EASTERN END OF OUR PROVINCE.

A FULL PUBLIC INQUIRY IS NEEDED.

After Perry Dunlop's Departure

Although he was no longer employed as a police officer, Perry Dunlop continued to be relevant to some cases that proceeded through the courts.

With respect to the application for a stay in R. v. Jacques Leduc, defence counsel sought to have Mr. Dunlop return from British Columbia, but he did not appear on February 22, 2001, and the defence closed its case without evidence from him. A stay was ordered in the Leduc case related to non-disclosure of Dunlop-related documents. The Leduc matter is discussed in greater detail in Chapters 11 and 7, on the institutional responses of the Ministry of the Attorney General and the Ontario Provincial Police.

On September 4, 2001, Perry Dunlop testified at the trial of Paul Lapierre in regard to brief contacts that he and Helen Dunlop had had with Claude Marleau, the complainant. The case of R v. Lapierre is discussed in greater detail in Chapters 8 and 11. While in Cornwall, Mr. Dunlop spoke on a local radio show, Talk Back Radio. He reiterated his call for a public inquiry.

On May 1 and 2, 2002, Perry Dunlop gave testimony about disclosures with respect to a motion related to R. v. MacDonald. On May 13, 2002, Justice Chilcott concluded that the trial had been unreasonably delayed, attributing much of the delay to Mr. Dunlop.

From August 16 to August 19, 2004, Mr. Dunlop testified at the voir dire in R. v. Leduc, related to an application to stay charges based on delay. On the third day, he read a written statement regarding the process, indicating that he felt misled and poorly treated as a witness. Crown Attorney Lidia Narozniak said that she had contacted Perry Dunlop by telephone in British Columbia to outline the application and the issues and identify areas of concern. She testified that Mr. Dunlop had been reluctant to come in early for discussions and preparation and indeed arrived only the evening before the examination commenced. Perry Dunlop's appearance on this motion is discussed in greater detail in the chapter on the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Perry Dunlop as Part of Institutional Response

In examining Perry Dunlop's contribution, I have been invited to find him either a hero or a villain. I will not do so.

Constable Dunlop was correct in making disclosure to the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. It is regrettable that he was disciplined for this since it clearly led to an irretrievable breakdown in the employee–employer relationship. Neither Perry Dunlop nor the Cornwall Police Service was able to resume a normal relationship after this point. The stress related to this event and his family's sense of injustice stemming from it fundamentally changed the life of Perry Dunlop and his family.

During the critical 1996–1997 period, Perry Dunlop was in receipt of the legal services and advice of an inexperienced lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, and was relying on information given to him by Ron Leroux. Mr. Leroux testified before me, but cross-examination was curtailed for health reasons. I do not see this as an issue for this Inquiry. Ron Leroux is clearly a troubled soul. I cannot give reliance to his testimony, nor could I feel comfortable in relying on what he might have said in cross-examination. In our system of law, Mr. Leroux's evidence could not be found to be credible.

The reiterative nature of Ron Leroux's discussions with Perry Dunlop and Charles Bourgeois suggests a process to develop a narrative supportive of a desired theory. This is quite different from an investigation that builds on information received. It is troubling to me that a police officer like Perry Dunlop could not accept at some point that his informant, Ron Leroux, was not the definitive source he had hoped for when the Constable first heard of him from C-8. Many of Perry Dunlop's actions from late 1996 to early 1999 appear to be an effort to shore up Ron Leroux's information and find corroboration. These efforts were augmented by media contacts that were designed to sustain public support for Perry Dunlop. The results of a number of prosecutions point to the reality that his investigative efforts were not helpful to the complainants in cases of reported abuse. His disclosure failures meant that some cases were never tested on their merits. In the end, the investigations done by Perry Dunlop were also of no value in the civil action that he was pursuing.

Unfortunately, a pattern of mistrust between Perry Dunlop and institutions had become such a dominant mindset that it was impossible to re-establish trust, even when there were efforts to investigate and address cases of sexual abuse or to proceed with prosecutions. This distrust overwhelmed what I find was originally a genuine desire to be of help to children and young people. Even after calling repeatedly for the establishment of a public inquiry, Perry Dunlop could not engage with this Inquiry because of his entrenched distrust of institutions. In this, he followed a pattern that had already been set and that he had already followed many times.

Recommendations

Priority of Sexual Assault/Abuse Cases

1. The Cornwall Community Police Service (CCPS) must ensure that historical sexual assault/abuse⁶⁷ cases are accorded high priority and are treated with the same urgency as recent sexual assault/abuse cases. Appropriate measures must be taken to ensure that such investigations are conducted in an expeditious manner.

Training

2. Training on the investigation of sexual assault/abuse should be provided to all police officers as part of their basic training. This training should address child sexual assault/abuse, historical sexual assault/abuse and male-on-male sexual assault/abuse.
3. Regular refresher courses on sexual assault/abuse, including child sexual assault/abuse, historical sexual assault/abuse and male-on-male sexual assault/abuse, should be provided to all officers involved in investigating sexual assault/abuse cases. In addition, officers who are starting these types of investigations should receive or continue to receive in-service mentorship.
4. Criminal investigator training should include training on proper rapport building and interviewing techniques to be used with complainants of sexual assault/abuse, whether current or historical.
5. It is important that officers be trained in proper note taking and record keeping for sexual assault/abuse investigations. Such training should ensure that Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) and other electronic databases are fully utilized, loose-leaf notebooks are not used, notes are not destroyed (unless as specified in destruction or archival orders), and that blank lines are not left between notations or at the end of pages.
6. It is important that officers in the CCPS receive ongoing training regarding their statutory reporting duties to the Children's Aid Society (CAS) under the Child and Family Services Act to ensure that children at risk are protected.

67. The reference to sexual assault/abuse refers to the sexual abuse of children and young people, whether current or historical, unless defined otherwise.

Interviewing Sexual Assault/Abuse Complainants

7. All efforts should be made to ensure that interviews with complainants of sexual assault/abuse take place in a comfortable setting, for example, a neutral location rather than an interrogation room. Whenever possible, these interviews should be done in person, not by telephone.
8. Police officers should recognize that sexual assault/abuse complainants are often distrustful of persons in authority and should take the time necessary to build trust with complainants. Although this may require extra time and multiple visits, interviews about the details of the abuse should be as infrequent as possible.
9. The CCPS and the CAS should jointly conduct interviews with child complainants to minimize the number of interviews.
10. Police officers should realize that it might be difficult for complainants of historical child sexual assault/abuse to prepare their own written statements. They may not have the literacy skills or emotional strength to complete such a statement. Although written statements should be discouraged, if a complainant is asked to draft a written statement, an officer should be present to assist him or her. Any meetings convened with the complainant for the purpose of drafting his or her statement should be held in a comfortable setting.
11. When interviewing complainants of sexual assault/abuse, police officers should ask questions designed to ascertain whether there may be other potential victims of the same perpetrator or any other perpetrators.
12. It is important that the CCPS develop a protocol to ensure that complainants of sexual assault/abuse make their disclosures to and are interviewed by officers of the sex of their choice. This will ensure that the trauma of the complainant is reduced and enhance his or her ability to provide intimate and personal details of the sexual assault/abuse alleged.
13. Investigative protocols should require officers to help complainants to develop a plan to best recount their version of past events, including dates. Officers may suggest using certain techniques, such as collecting documents and photographs and/or creating a timeline. CCPS officers should be involved in obtaining these documents. In some circumstances, search warrants may be required.
14. Complainants should be offered the opportunity to be interviewed in the language of their choice. To ensure this choice is the complainant's, the interviewing officer should not state his or her preference. If the complainant has difficulty expressing him or herself in English or French, every effort should be made to provide accommodation by way of interpreters or otherwise.

Communication With Complainants

15. The CCPS should institute or augment measures to ensure that victims and alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse and, in the case of children who are sexual abuse victims or alleged victims, their parents and family members, are offered support and apprised of the investigation, the laying of charges, and the court proceedings. This could be done by the CCPS directly, through the Victim/Witness Assistance Program (VWAP) or a liaison person as described in the recommendations in Phase 2 of this Report.
16. It is important that CCPS officers ensure that victims and alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse are advised of the outcome of any proceedings against the perpetrator and the sentence imposed by the court. This could be done by the CCPS directly or through a liaison person as described in the recommendations in Phase 2 of this Report.

Counselling Support Services

17. CCPS officers should continue to augment their knowledge of counselling and support services available for victims and alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse, including child sexual assault/abuse, for male-on-male sexual assault/abuse, and for their families. Police officers should always attempt to make referrals to these services when they receive a complaint of sexual assault/abuse.

Supervision of Investigators Working on Sexual Assault/Abuse Cases

18. It is important to ensure that CCPS officers involved in sexual assault/abuse and historical sexual assault/abuse investigations are supervised by experienced senior officers.

Note Taking, Record Keeping, and Accessing Records

19. It is critical that CCPS officers record and insert their notes of investigations into OMPPAC and other electronic databases to ensure that other police officers have access to information uncovered about the alleged perpetrator(s) of sexual assault/abuse.

20. It is important that CCPS officers involved in sexual assault/abuse investigations regularly access OMPPAC and other electronic databases such as the Canadian Police Information Centre (CPIC) to determine whether other officers in their police force or other police forces have information on the alleged perpetrator(s).
21. In addition to instructing CCPS officers on correct note-taking techniques (see number 5 above), the CCPS should take appropriate measures to ensure that its policy on the retention of officers' notes is clearly defined, well understood, and strictly enforced. The policy should stipulate that the officers' notes are the property of the CCPS and that should an officer retire or go on extended leave, his or her notes need to be turned over to the force. Such a policy must also address an efficient way to store these records so they can be searched and accessed whenever necessary.
22. A protocol should be developed on recording information by videotape or audiotape from witnesses in police interviews. It is important that the technology—video and audio—used by officers is of sufficiently high quality to ensure that the words, gestures, and body language of the person interviewed is accurately and fully recorded.

Conflict of Interest

23. In order to avoid an actual or perceived conflict of interest, an external police force should investigate, among other things, allegations of sexual assault/abuse of children by members or former members of the CCPS, or their family members.

Informing Employers

24. An order or directive should be developed that requires police officers to inform public institutions, such as school boards, child welfare agencies, hospitals, local religious institutions, and Justice partners, that an allegation of sexual assault/abuse has been made against one of their employees if the employee under investigation comes into contact with children in the course of their work. This protocol should also apply to anyone on contract with a public institution or community sector organization, such as a bus driver or cleaning staff, and anyone who volunteers with a public institution if the individual under investigation comes into contact with children in the course of his or her duties. Notification should be made by a designated senior CCPS officer to a designated senior person in the public institution or community sector organization.

Recommendations for the Cornwall Community Police Services Board

Adequate Resources and Communications

25. The Cornwall Community Police Services Board (the Board) must ensure that the CCPS has the necessary resources, such as the requisite number of fully trained officers, to conduct investigations of sexual assault/abuse and, in particular, historical sexual assault/abuse cases, in a timely manner.
26. The Board must ensure that press releases should provide appropriate and accurate information to the public.

Recommendations for the Cornwall Community Police Service and Other Public Institutions

Child Protection Protocol, 2001

27. The CCPS is a partner in the Child Protection Protocol: A Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario (July 2001). Since this protocol has not been updated, the CCPS should meet as soon as practicable with other partners to review and update the protocol. For those partners actively involved in the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault/abuse cases, consistent roles for the participants should be set out as well as guidance on the sharing of information between investigating bodies. The process of reviewing and updating the protocol should continue triennially.

Joint Training

28. The government of Ontario and the responsible ministries should reinstitute training for CAS workers and police officers as soon as practicable. This joint training should include specific training on responding to historical allegations of abuse. For some aspects of training, consideration should be given to including other Justice partners, such as Crown counsel or those working in hospitals in specialized assault units. Joint training might also support more standardization or the development of “best practices” protocols between police and Children’s Aid Societies.

Disclosure in Joint Investigations

29. In joint investigations involving more than one police force, a protocol should be developed that stipulates that one officer should be responsible for all disclosure requests. This officer should have a contact on the other force or forces who assists with disclosure, but should personally oversee and track which items have been disclosed to the Crown on behalf of all police forces involved in the investigation.

Major Case Management

30. The Ministry of the Attorney General and Ontario police agencies should review and compare their major case management protocols to identify and rectify inconsistencies and gaps.

Institutional Response of the Ontario Provincial Police

Introduction

The vision of the Ontario Provincial Police is “Safe Communities ... A Secure Ontario.” This reflects the community policing philosophy mandated by the government of Ontario in 1990, a philosophy that stresses collaboration with other institutions and the community served in carrying out policing functions.¹

Headquartered in Orillia, the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) is responsible for policing services in 400 communities across Ontario, including those outside the City of Cornwall in the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. In 2005, there were approximately 5,500 uniformed officers and 1,800 civilian personnel providing policing services in six Ontario regions, including the Eastern Region, where the Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry are located.

In addition to direct policing in communities across Ontario, the OPP is responsible for provincial policing services that include policing on highways, waterways, provincial parks, and trail systems; providing emergency police response and resources for incidents or disasters beyond the ability of the police service of the jurisdiction involved; and providing investigative expertise and assistance to municipal forces. It leads many joint-force multi-jurisdictional task forces, and is responsible for province-wide systems such as the Ontario Sex Offender Registry and the Provincial Violent Crime Linkage Analysis System. The OPP also provides specialized services through various programs such as the canine and collision reconstruction programs.

1. Community policing involves a number of activities to engage the community served, including public consultation and education, protocols with community agencies and institutions, training to increase police sensitivity to the diverse population served, being representative of the community served, and respect for victims of crime and their needs.

This chapter will consider the investigations conducted by the OPP in 1994 at the request of the Cornwall Police Service and during Project Truth, a special project assigned to the OPP in 1997 in response to allegations of historical sexual abuse made in Cornwall and surrounding areas, as well as related investigations. Interactions between the OPP and other institutions, such as the Ministry of the Attorney General, will be examined.

History of the OPP

The Ontario Provincial Police was founded in 1909, with forty-five officers appointed by the government of Ontario.² By 1930, officers patrolling provincial highways had joined the OPP. By the 1940s, the OPP had developed a Criminal Investigation Branch (CIB) with specialized investigatory expertise.

In 1947, the first Police Act passed by the Ontario government came into effect.³ Among other things, this legislation permitted the OPP to provide full-time policing under contract to municipalities. It also formally recognized the role of the CIB in assisting municipal forces. By 1949, the OPP had 1,083 officers at 235 locations throughout the province. In the 1960s, the OPP experienced a major reorganization and went through rapid growth and technology change. By 1974, the OPP had hired its first female officers for active duty.

In 1972, the OPP began reporting to the Ministry of the Solicitor General, rather than the Ministry of the Attorney General, following a major government reorganization. The same Ministry continues to be responsible for the OPP, though it is now called the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services.

The OPP has always had both commissioned and non-commissioned officers. Full-time constable is the first rank among non-commissioned officers, followed by sergeant, staff sergeant, and sergeant major. The first level among commissioned officers is inspector, followed by superintendent, chief superintendent, and deputy commissioner.⁴ All investigative roles have “detective” added to their title (e.g., detective sergeant or detective inspector). The most senior officer of the OPP is the Commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police. Gwen Boniface held this position at the inception of this Inquiry. Julian Fantino, the current Commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police, succeeded her on October 30, 2006.

2. At that time, it was called the Ontario Provincial Police Force.

3. 1946, S.O. 1946, c. 72.

4. To be commissioned means to be appointed by Order-in-Council. As of 2006, there were fewer than 200 commissioned officers in the OPP.

OPP Reorganizations Since 1983

The organization of the OPP was unchanged from 1974 to early 1983. It had six divisions, each headed by an Assistant Commissioner, who in turn reported to one of two Deputy Commissioners, depending on whether the division provided Services or Operations. The Operations area was larger, comprising the Traffic Division, the Field Division, and the Special Services Division, which included the Criminal Investigation Branch. The Field Division administered seventeen district headquarters.

A major reorganization occurred in 1983. The two Deputy Commissioners and six Assistant Commissioners were replaced with three Deputy Commissioners. One Deputy Commissioner was responsible for Investigations, made up of the Investigation Division and the Investigation Support Division. The Deputy Commissioner responsible for Field Operations administered sixteen districts through the Chief Superintendent of the Field Operations Division.

In 1987, Field Operations was divided into three divisions, each led by a Chief Superintendent. The sixteen districts were divided among these three field divisions. The other areas of the OPP were not significantly changed in the 1987 reorganization.

There was another major reorganization of the OPP effective 1995. The three Field Divisions and sixteen districts were replaced with six regional offices reporting to the Deputy Commissioner of Provincial Command Operations. This Deputy Commissioner was also responsible for the Criminal Investigation Bureau. The reorganization also restructured detachments to establish a critical mass of officers under one Detachment Commander. This substantially increased the number of OPP locations providing twenty-four-hour “on duty” coverage.

In 2000, further changes increased the number of provincial commands headed by a Deputy Commissioner from two to three and added a civilian Provincial Commander. Responsibility for Traffic Services and Field Services was separated from investigative policing functions. The Investigation Bureau, formerly known as the Criminal Investigation Bureau, included a Criminal Investigations Branch, formerly called the Major Cases Section. Throughout the various reorganizations, there continued to be a criminal investigation branch that reported to OPP Headquarters, as opposed to any individual region or district.

Further changes have occurred since 2000: a Highway Safety Division was created in the Greater Toronto region and the Intelligence Bureau was made independent of the Investigation Support Bureau. The Field Services and Criminal Investigation areas were not part of this reorganization.

Organization charts set out in Schedule 1 to this chapter illustrate the changes over time.

Changing Legislative Parameters and Police Orders

Since 1947, the OPP has been subject to the provisions of the Police Services Act or its predecessors.⁵ The Police Services Act applies to municipal police forces as well as to the Ontario Provincial Police. Regulations under the Police Services Act detail minimum standards for police forces in Ontario. An example is the 2004 Major Case Management regulation that affects cases involving a coordinated investigative team and a multidisciplinary approach.⁶

The most fundamental legislative change in recent years has come from the passage of the 1999 Adequacy and Effectiveness of Police Services regulation⁷ that details the “core functions” of all police forces identified under section 4(2) of the Police Services Act. The regulation was filed on January 8, 1999, and provided that police services boards had to evaluate the adequacy and effectiveness of their services and be in compliance with the regulation by January 1, 2001. This regulation set out areas in which police forces were required to have specific policies and to meet minimum standards. An example of a minimum standard is that a police officer performing criminal investigations has to have the skills, knowledge, and ability to undertake such an investigation.

The Adequacy and Effectiveness of Police Services regulation requires all police forces to have procedures and processes for undertaking and managing general criminal investigations, and specifically to have procedures and processes for investigations into physical and sexual abuse of children and sexual assaults.⁸ However, the regulation does not specifically require procedures and processes for the investigation of historical allegations of abuse or assault. The Adequacy and Effectiveness of Police Services regulation also reiterates requirements for police services to have procedures for providing assistance to victims and setting out police responsibilities in assisting victims.⁹

Police Orders are the mechanism used by the OPP to give broad direction to officers and employees. Police Orders communicate policy, procedures, directions, and guidelines from the OPP Commissioner to all employees. Police Orders have been in place in some form since 1922. There was a major restructuring of Police Orders in response to the Adequacy and Effectiveness of Police Services regulation. This restructuring led to the creation of six sections for Police Orders, following the Adequacy and Effectiveness of Police Services

5. In 1947, the governing statute was the Police Act, 1946, S.O. 1946, c. 72.

6. O. Reg. 354/04.

7. O. Reg. 3/99.

8. Adequacy and Effectiveness of Police Services, O. Reg. 3/99, s. 12(1).

9. O. Reg. 3/99, s. 17.

regulation categories,¹⁰ and also provided a series of detailed manuals for the guidance of officers. Police Orders are internal documents—they are not available to the public.

Although Police Orders have existed for decades, they have never been “substitutes for sound judgment and discretion.” However, officers can be disciplined if they do not follow mandatory aspects of Police Orders, and even non-mandatory orders should be followed unless there is a cogent reason or circumstance. Guidelines issued by the government of Ontario or guidelines included in manuals as part of the Police Orders are not formal orders and are not mandatory.

The first Police Orders to deal specifically with abuse and neglect of children were introduced in 2005. They cover historical abuse, although there are no differences in investigative procedures for historical cases. Prior to 2005, the Police Orders dealt only with children in need of protection under the Child and Family Services Act. In 2006, a chapter on sexual assault investigations was added to the Police Orders. This chapter contained information covered by previous or existing policies. Police Orders related to victim assistance and services were revamped in 2001 in response to the Adequacy regulation but have existed since 1986. The 1995 Victims’ Bill of Rights mandated police forces to have consideration for the needs of victims of crime, including information needs. As a result, OPP policy in this area was developed before the Adequacy and Effectiveness of Police Services regulation.

Since 1947, members of the public and members of the OPP have had a statutory right to make a complaint about an officer that could result in an inquiry.¹¹ In 1980, it was clarified that there was a six-month limitation period for making a complaint, and that time period generally continues to apply.¹² The procedures for complaints by members of the public have changed several times—in 1990 and 1997. They changed again recently with the proclamation of the Independent Police Review Act.¹³ These changes in the legislative regime governing public complaints have related largely to the extent to which the mechanism for investigation or hearing of public complaints against police officers is independent of police authorities.

Changing Record Keeping

Up until the 1970s, any criminal complaint was noted in a written “occurrence book,” accompanied by a supplementary report if more serious. An occurrence

10. The six areas are (1) crime prevention, (2) law enforcement, (3) victim assistance, (4) public order maintenance, (5) emergency response services, and (6) administration and infrastructure.

11. Section 28(3) of the Police Act, 1946, S.O. 1946, c. 72, first established a statutory framework.

12. Public Authorities Protection Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.38.

13. S.O. 2007, c. 5. This bill received royal assent on May 17, 2007.

book could contain up to fifteen years of reportable incidents, and yet there was no retention policy for the books. In the 1970s, a “snap set” of reports was introduced to supplement occurrence book reporting, and a retention period of twenty years was established. Having to use one occurrence book created a bottleneck of officers at shift change. This ultimately led in the 1980s to the use of preprinted occurrence reports that could be completed at the scene of an incident or in officers’ vehicles. Supplementary report forms were available for major investigations. In the 1980s, the retention period was reduced to two years plus the current year, but Detachment Commanders had discretion to hold files in deferred status, as long as the deferred files were reviewed annually.

In the late 1980s and early 1990s, the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) system was introduced. It facilitated the preparation of all report types and information was stored in a central database at OPP General Headquarters. There was a policy on what could be shared with other organizations, such as other police forces. However, a Detachment Commander had discretion to restrict sharing of data. The synopses prepared for Crown briefs were not shared through OMPPAC. The file deferral system continued, but retention periods for crimes like sexual assault grew to seven years in OMPPAC.

In 2000, the Niche Records Management System (RMS) was introduced and is still in use. There have been some difficulties in converting the OMPPAC data to the Niche RMS. The extent of detail that can be recorded in Niche RMS is limitless, and photographs and fingerprints are often appended to reports. Detachment Commanders are responsible for monitoring quality and timeliness of reports and the status of required tasks.

There were officers who did not provide their police notes prior to testifying at the Inquiry, in particular Staff Sergeant Jim McWade and Chief Superintendent Carson Fougère. Staff Sergeant McWade advised that he had turned over his police notes to OPP Headquarters upon his retirement and that they could not be located for production at this Inquiry. Retired Chief Superintendent Fougère had his notes in his possession and brought them with him to the Inquiry.

When questioned about the difficulty in obtaining the notes of retired officers, Deputy Commissioner Chris Lewis testified that the OPP has long had a policy stating that officers are to turn over their notes to the OPP upon retirement. Unfortunately, at the time of the investigations discussed in this Report, he stated that the OPP had “dropped the ball” in communicating this policy to its employees. Moreover, Deputy Commissioner Lewis acknowledged that some officers were aware of the policy but ignored it. “In other cases,” he testified, “the people that were to receive the notebooks weren’t aware of the policy and said, ‘No we’re not taking them.’”

Deputy Commissioner Lewis testified that the OPP has “cleaned that up” and has now clearly defined who owns officers’ notebooks. They are the property of the OPP, not of the individual officers, and they are retained and stored by the OPP after retirement. That said, the Deputy Commissioner acknowledged that the policy on retention and access to notebooks still needs to be “tightened up a little bit.” I agree. I recommend that the OPP take appropriate measures to make certain that it has a clearly defined, well-understood, and strictly enforced policy on the retention of officers’ notes. Such a policy must also address an efficient way to store these records so they can be searched and accessed whenever necessary.

Major Case Management Procedures

Since 1993, certain offences were to be coded as “benchmark” cases and notice given to the supervisor to assess whether it should be assigned to a detective from the Criminal Investigation Branch or, if not, to ensure the case was assigned to a qualified investigator locally. All sexual occurrences and all crimes against children are benchmark cases. However, benchmarking did not mean all sexual assault cases were treated as major cases or assigned to the CIB, although some cases, such sexual offences at training schools, were automatically assigned to the CIB starting in 1997.

The OPP added major case management policies to Police Orders in 2002. The 1996 Report of Mr. Justice Archie Campbell in the Bernardo Investigation Review influenced both the 2002 Police Orders, which added the Major Case Management Manual, and the 2004 Major Case Management regulation. This regulation, made pursuant to the Police Services Act, required every police board to establish policies with respect to major cases, in accordance with the Ontario Major Case Management Manual provided by the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services.¹⁴ The regulation mandates a specific software (PowerCase) for the purpose of undertaking and managing investigations into major cases.¹⁵ The regulation defines all sexual assaults as “major” cases.

Major case occurrences are deemed to be either “threshold” or “non-threshold” offences. As explained by Detective Staff Sergeant Paul Yelle, some cases of sexual assault are threshold cases and others are non-threshold. According to case management definitions, a major case occurrence is not a threshold offence if the suspect is known and the case involves historical sexual offences (reported more than one year after having been committed). In the language of the manual, these offences do not pass the threshold for major case management unless they are

14. O. Reg. 354/04, s. 1(1).

15. O. Reg. 354/04, s. 1(3).

“predatory or serial.” As well, if the offence involves a child who is abused by a family member, the case does not pass the threshold for major case management.

If a case is found to pass the threshold for major case management, it will be managed according to the related prescribed manual. A qualified major case manager is assigned to take overall responsibility for the investigation. The manager either acts as the primary investigation coordinator or assigns a coordinator who reports to him or her. A file coordinator, search warrant coordinator, media liaison, and victim liaison are also designated, all with specific responsibilities. In multi-jurisdictional major cases, a joint management team is created, involving representatives of the involved police services and other disciplines. The multi-jurisdictional management team reports to the Major Case Management Executive Board, which includes representatives from the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, the Coroner’s Office, Criminal Intelligence Service Ontario, the Ministry of the Attorney General, the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police, the Chief of Police of Toronto, and the OPP Commissioner. Major cases have significant required structure and procedure, and greater access to resources and senior oversight.

Training and the OPP

The OPP provides training primarily through its internal OPP Academy and through the Ontario Police College in Aylmer. The OPP has had an internal training facility since the 1920s,¹⁶ and the Ontario Police Academy was established in the 1960s. The OPP does send its employees to courses and conferences offered by large municipal forces or the Canadian Police College, and to training facilities in the United States, but most OPP training is offered either through the OPP Academy or the Ontario Police College. Training is also offered on the job, particularly for new recruits, who are formally coached by senior field officers.

The OPP provides orientation training to its new recruits and training that may be unique to or of particular interest to the OPP, such as diversity and First Nations awareness training. The OPP also offers block training, which includes mandatory re-qualification courses such as advanced patrol training or first aid training. The Ontario Police College, however, is a primary source of training for the OPP, whether for new recruits, who undergo a twelve-week Basic 16. The OPP had a School of Instruction in 1920 that was replaced by an OPP Training School in 1929. This was replaced in 1935 by a joint school for municipal and OPP forces, and in 1944 an OPP-only Training School for new recruits was created. In 1974, an OPP Training and Development Centre was established in Brampton, and in 1998, the OPP Academy opened in Orillia.

Constable Training Program, or for experienced detectives, who may take specialized courses related to their work.

About 25 percent of the seats at any course at the Ontario Police College are allocated to the Ontario Provincial Police. Because demand for certain courses has exceeded the seats available at the College, the OPP, working with the College, has trained its own staff to deliver some Ontario Police College courses for which participants receive credit as if the course had been offered directly through the College in Aylmer. An example is the Sexual Assault Training Course, which has been delivered by both the Ontario Police College and the OPP Academy since 2002.

Following are the relevant investigative training courses that have been available from the Ontario Police College over time:

1964–1990	Criminal Investigation Training
1964–1990	Advanced Criminal Investigation, specialized training and completion of several modules
1990–	General Investigation Training Course, a prerequisite to other investigation courses; this course is required under the Adequacy and Effectiveness of Police Services regulation for anyone investigating a crime
Prior to 1985	Sexual Assault Investigation Course, included in Criminal Investigation Training
1985–1994	Advanced Criminal Investigation, with a five-day module on sexual offences, domestic violence, and child abuse; this module was updated in 1988 and redesigned in 1994
1994–	Sexual Assault Training; this course was updated in 1992 and 1999 to reflect the Adequacy and Effectiveness of Police Services regulation standards; the course does not include child abuse offences
1985–	Case Management Training, a five-day module in the Advanced Criminal Investigation course
1998–	Major Case Management Course, developed following release of the Campbell Report in 1996.

The Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse (IPCA) took the lead in delivering joint Children's Aid Society/police outreach training, and the Ontario Police College also participated in this training. The IPCA also developed more specialized courses, such as those involving the investigation and assessment of sexual abuse of very young children or case management of complex investigations. The joint training started in the early 1980s and continued until 1994. In 1995, the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies took over this training, and in 1996, there was a joint training protocol between the association and the Ontario Police College to deliver this program. In 2003, joint training was suspended and in 2005 the Ontario Police College started the delivery of a course to police officers: Investigating Offences Against Children.

Almost all observers, whether police, child welfare organizations, or experts, point to the end of joint training between child welfare agencies and police forces as a great loss. Since these organizations need to work in partnership to help children, the interaction afforded by training builds better day-to-day relationships and also allows organizations to understand and benefit from the perspectives and expertise offered by other organizations. The reinstitution of such training should proceed immediately and include specific training on responding to historical allegations of abuse. For some aspects of training, consideration should be given to including other justice partners, such as Crown counsel or those working in hospitals in specialized assault units. Joint training might also support more standardization or the development of “best practices” protocols between police and Children's Aid Societies, an outcome of interest to the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police.

The OPP in Eastern Ontario

The United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry are located in the Eastern Region of the Ontario Provincial Police, bordering both the Quebec and U.S. borders. Over time, the OPP personnel in the area have reported to regional or district headquarters in either Kingston (1987–1995) or Smiths Falls (since 1995). In 1995, reorganization within the three counties consolidated detachments and converted some detachments into satellite offices reporting to the “host detachment” of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry in Long Sault. The satellite detachments are located in Lancaster, Alexandria, Morrisburg, and Winchester.

In 2005, there were 108 uniformed officers and 50 civilian personnel serving Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, out of 990 officers and 288 civilian employees working in the Eastern Region.

Starting in 1988, there were Sexual Assault Coordinators who would offer resources to officers in the district. As of September 1994, there was a Regional Abuse Issues Coordinator in District 11, which includes Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, as well as Prescott-Russell and Ottawa-Carleton. In 2001, Police Orders formalized the positions and duties of Regional Abuse Issues Coordinator and Provincial Abuse Issues Coordinator.

There are a number of relevant protocols between the OPP and local organizations and institutions. These include:

1987	Draft—Child Abuse Protocol (Proposed Guidelines and Procedures for Response to Child Abuse in SD&G County Board of Education ¹⁷
1992	Child Sexual Abuse Protocol ¹⁸
1995	Police Shelter Protocol Dealing with Women Abuse in United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry ¹⁹
2001	Eastern Ontario Region Police and School Board Protocol ²⁰
2001	Child Protection Protocol; Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario ²¹
2002	Child Protection School Handbook—Eastern Ontario ²²
2002 (updated)	Police Shelter Protocol Dealing with Women Abuse in United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry ²³

17. Parties to this agreement were not specified. It was written by the Board of Education.

18. The protocol is among District 11—OPP, Cornwall Police Service, Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (SD&G) Roman Catholic School Board, SD&G County Board of Education, CAS of SD&G, Religious Hospitallers of St. Joseph Health Centre, and Ministry of the Attorney General—Cornwall Crown Attorney.

19. The protocol is among District 11—OPP, Cornwall Police Service, Alexandria Police Services, Maison Baldwin House, La Montée d'Elle, and Naomi's Family Resource Centre.

20. The signatories are not shown, but the protocol was developed by representatives of protocol partner agencies and services, namely the Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario, Upper Canada District School Board, Conseil Scolaire de District Catholique de Langue Française de L'Est Ontarien, Conseil des Écoles Publiques de l'Est Ontarien, the OPP, Cornwall Community Police Service, Brockville Police, Carleton Place Police, Perth Police Services, and Leeds-Grenville CAS.

21. The protocol was endorsed by Crown Attorney's Offices in Brockville, Cornwall, Smiths Falls/Perth and Plantagenet; the OPP in Eastern Ontario; police services in Cornwall, Brockville, Carleton Place/Perth, Gananoque, Prescott, and Smiths Falls; CAS in SD&G, Lanark County, Leeds-Grenville, and Prescott-Russell; all Eastern Ontario school boards; all hospitals in the area and the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario; and several local agencies.

22. There are no signatories, but the following were involved in development of the handbook: the OPP, Upper Canada District School Board, Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario, CAS of Leeds-Grenville and of SD&G, and Prescott-Russell Child and Family Services.

23. The signatory organizations are unchanged since 1995.

2002	Protocol for Investigation of Sudden and Unexpected Deaths of Children Under 2 Years of Age ²⁴
2002	Mental Health Protocol ²⁵
Date unknown but before 1994	Sexual Assault Response Team ²⁶
2005 (updated)	Service Agreement Between Cornwall Community Police Service, OPP, Partner Abuse Sexual Assault Care Team, Cornwall Hospital. ²⁷

One of the tasks of the Regional Abuse Issues Coordinator has been to compile a directory of services for victims. The most recent was produced in 2003. It strikes me that such directories should be more current; it is also the case that the provincial directory has not been updated since 2001.

Since 1994, there has been agreement between the OPP and the Cornwall Police Service for mutual support and cooperation and for the provision by the OPP of specialized services such as underwater searches or Breathalyzer technicians. This agreement was updated in 2006.

The OPP in Eastern Ontario does not have a court management protocol with the Crown Attorney's Office in Cornwall, but the OPP generally follows the OPP Court Case Management Manual and uses the Case Management and Criminal Court Protocol from Prescott-Russell Counties as an unofficial guide. The development of a court management protocol is overdue and should be developed and set out as soon as possible.

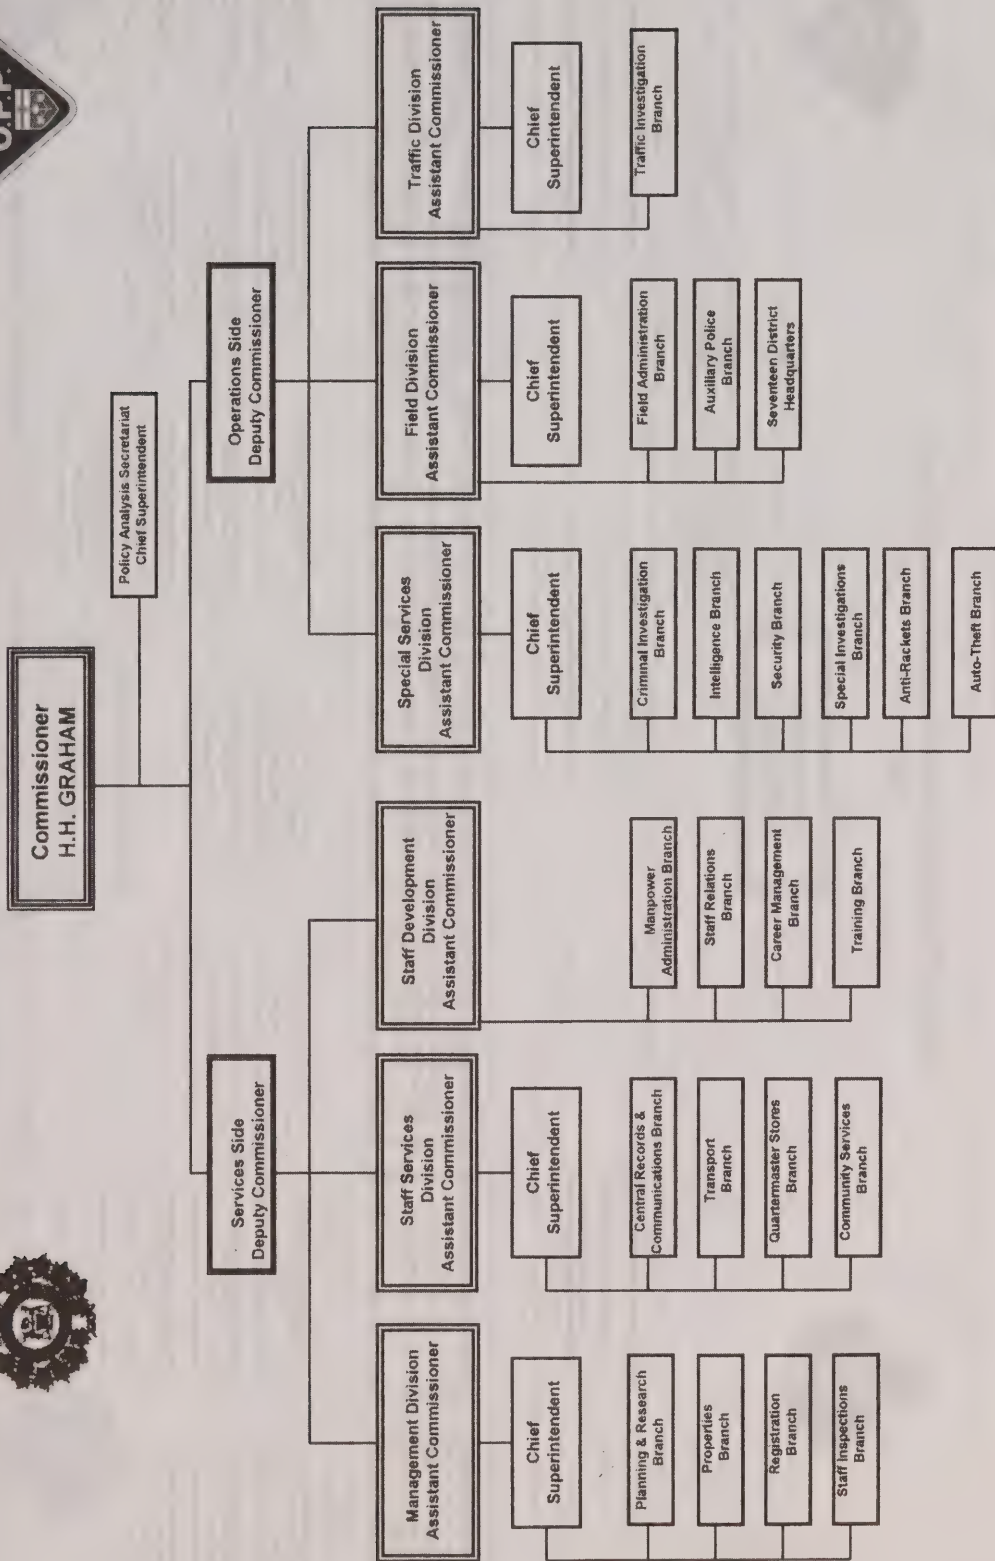

I would note that it is important to establish protocols and keep them current, reviewing them at least every three years. Even discussion of protocols is an opportunity to build relationships and identify emerging issues and therefore has value. John Liston of the Children's Aid Society of London and Middlesex, in expert evidence given before me regarding his experience in developing protocols with the police, explained that it was an opportunity to bring different but equally valuable work cultures together and to forge respectful partnerships. More important, having leaders from various organizations come forward and sign protocols related to abuse of children and sexual assault signals genuine commitment to staff and the public. In Mr. Liston's words, those leaders are standing behind the protocols and saying, "We believe this."

24. No signatories. This appears to be largely guidelines from the Coroner.

25. Signatories are the Cornwall Hospital Emergency Room and Mental Health Crisis Team, the OPP, Cornwall Community Police Service, and the Akwesasne Tribal Police.

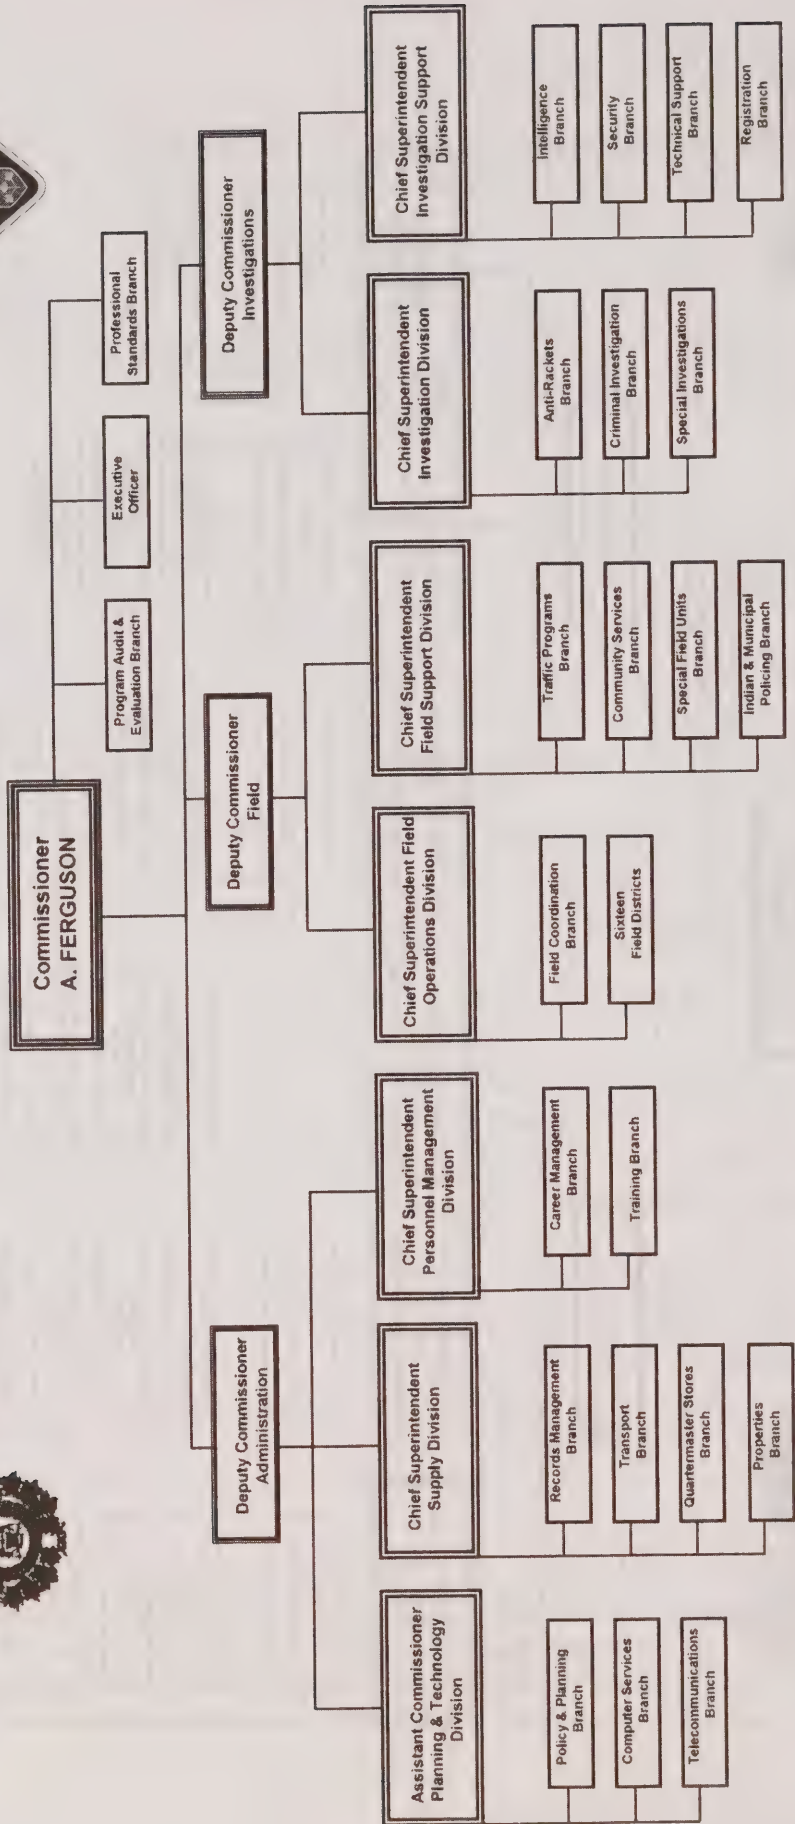

26. Signatories are the OPP, SD&G OPP, and the Sexual Assault Response Team.

27. Signatories are the OPP, Cornwall Community Police Service, and the Sexual Assault Team.

Source: This chart is based on information provided by the OPP's Erik Silk Library and was prepared by the OPP Strategic Analysis Unit, Intelligence Bureau.

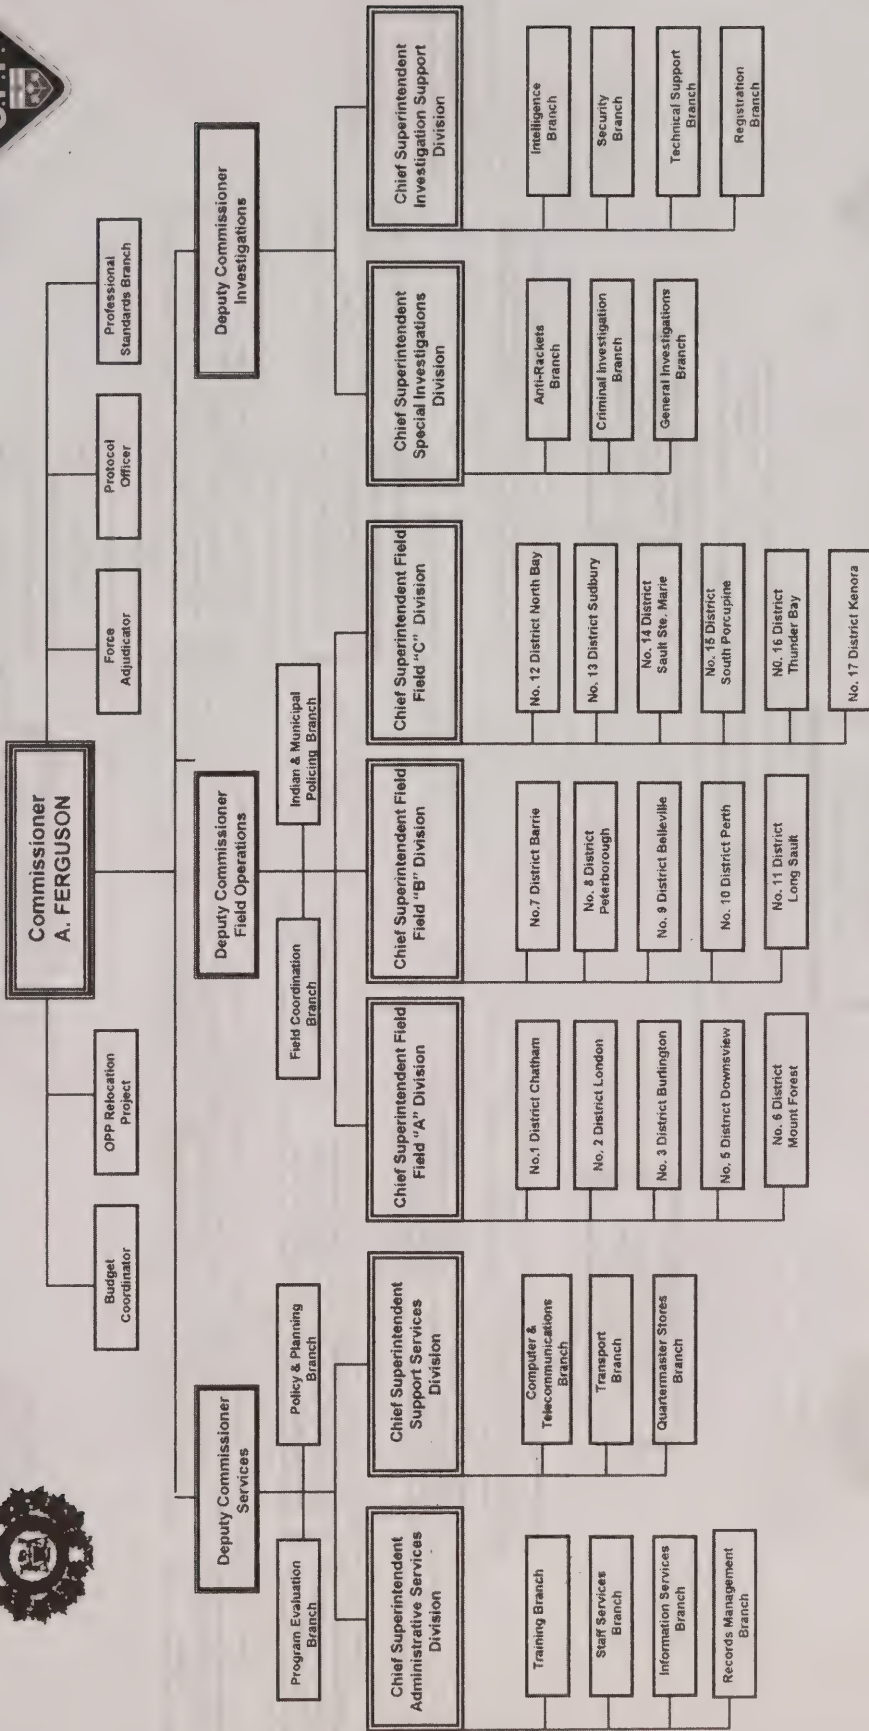

Ontario Provincial Police Organizational Chart 1983

Source: This chart is based on information provided by the OPP's Erik Silk Library and was prepared by the OPP Strategic Analysis Unit, Intelligence Bureau.

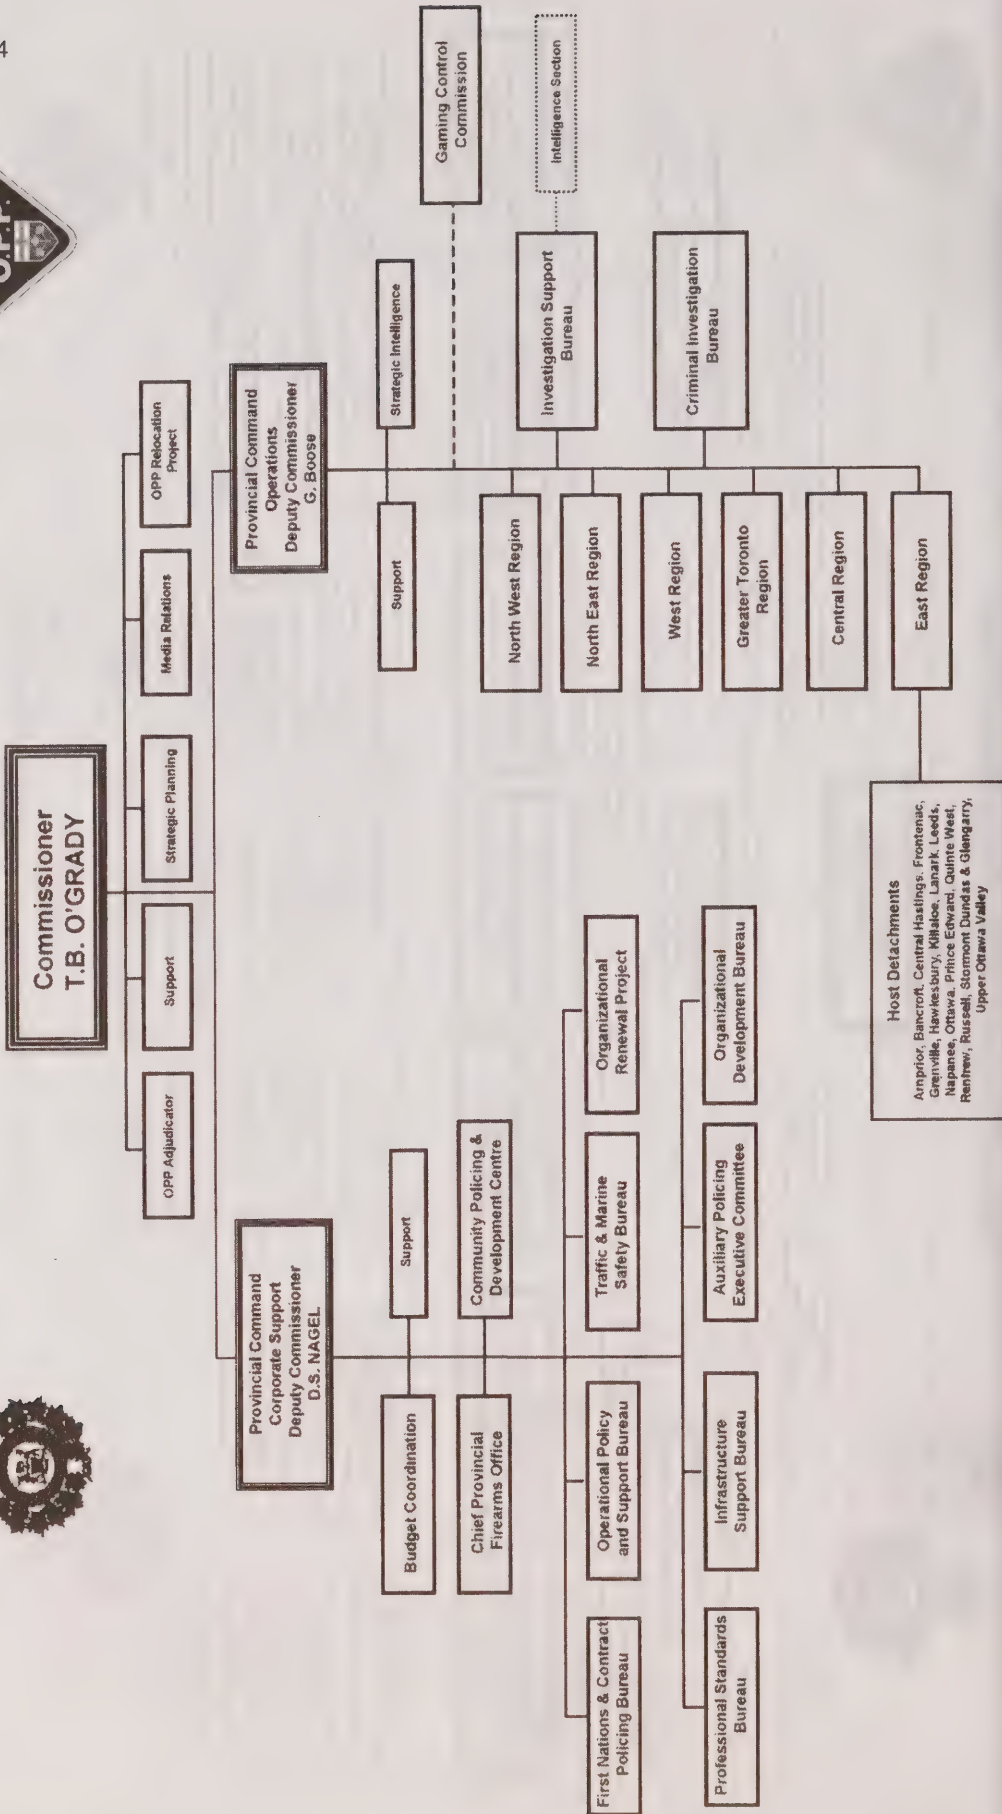

Ontario Provincial Police Organizational Chart

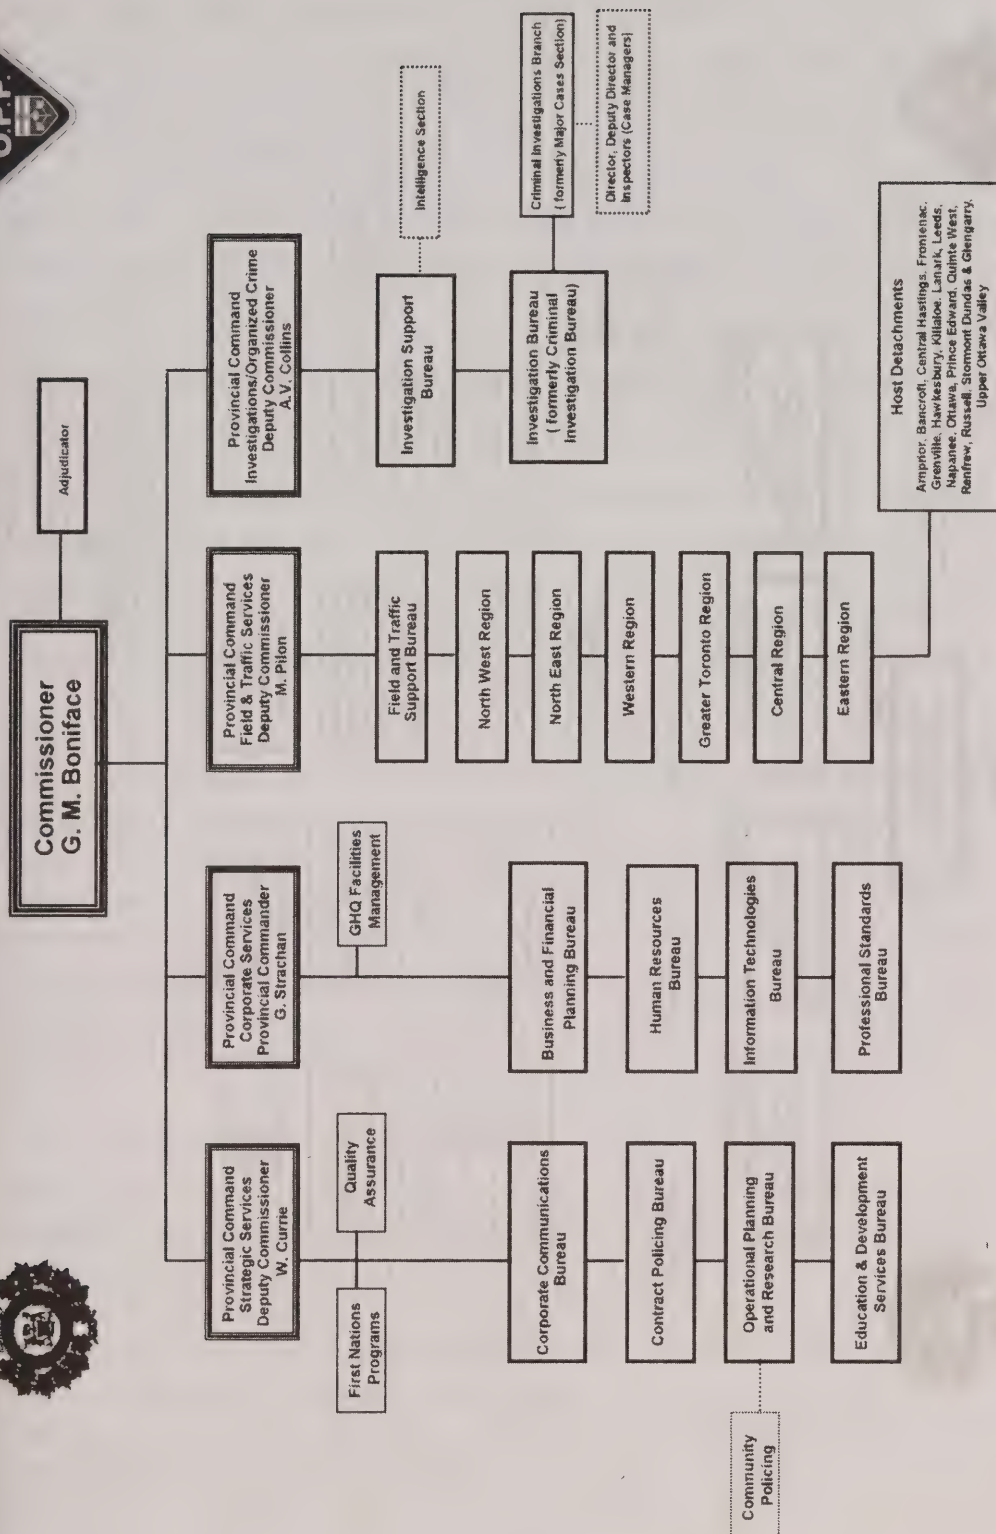

1987

Source: This chart is based on information provided by the OPP's Erik Silk Library and was prepared by the OPP Strategic Analysis Unit, Intelligence Bureau.

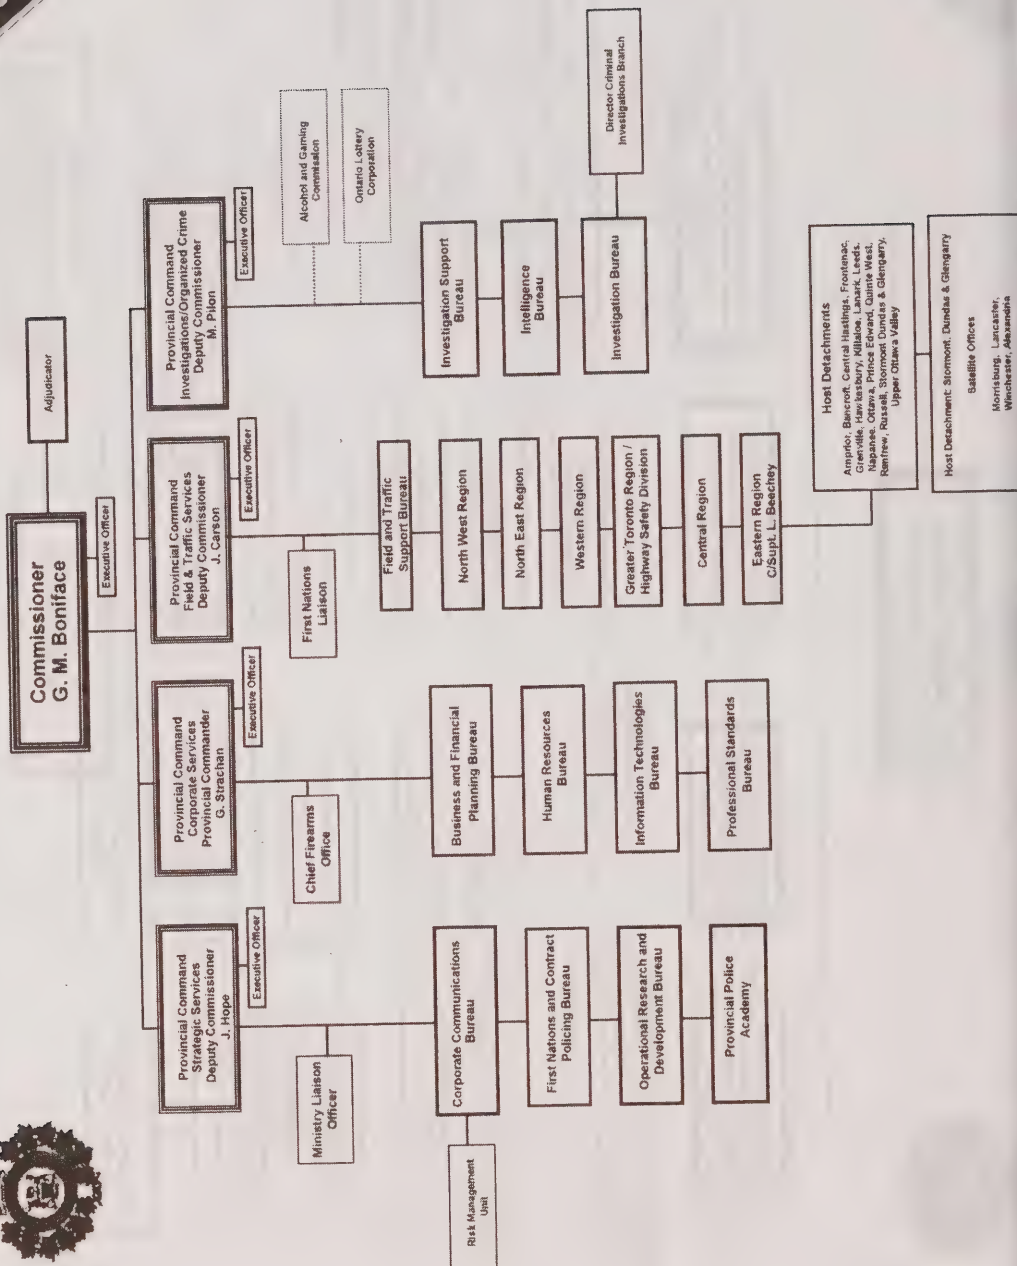

Ontario Provincial Police Organizational Chart 1995

Source: This chart is based on information provided by the OPP's Erik Silk Library and was prepared by the OPP Strategic Analysis Unit, Intelligence Bureau.

Ontario Provincial Police Organizational Chart 2005

Ken Seguin's Involvement in the Varley Investigation

In the early morning hours of January 9, 1992, Andrew MacDonald was fatally shot by his cousin, Travis Varley. On the evening of January 8, 1992, these two young men, accompanied by Bob Varley and Mark Woods, had visited Ken Seguin at his home in Summerstown. At the time, Mr. Woods was a Ministry of Correctional Services (MCS) client whom Mr. Seguin had previously supervised during a term of probation. In December 1991, Mr. Seguin had been assigned to prepare a pre-sentence report for him. Each of the four young men consumed a beer provided to him by Mr. Seguin while at his residence. Travis Varley took three additional bottles of beer from Mr. Seguin's fridge as they were leaving. Travis Varley shot Andrew MacDonald approximately seven hours after the young men had left Mr. Seguin's residence.

Early in the homicide investigation, the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) became aware of Ken Seguin's involvement in this incident. The OPP did not immediately provide Mr. Seguin's employer, the MCS, with this information. His involvement is discussed in detail in Chapter 5, "Institutional Response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services."

This investigation provided an early indication of Mr. Seguin's inappropriate conduct with probationers. In the years that followed this event, a number of former probationers came forward and alleged that Mr. Seguin had sexually abused them. Mr. Seguin was a central figure in the sexual abuse allegations that came to light during the OPP's Project Truth investigations. He also had close ties as a colleague or as a friend to others who were later investigated by the OPP for sexual abuse, such as Nelson Barque, Richard Hickerson, Father Charles MacDonald, Malcolm MacDonald, and Ron Leroux. However, the OPP missed an opportunity to uncover further inappropriate behaviour by Mr. Seguin in relation to his probationers and former probationers.

The Commencement of the Investigation

On January 9, 1992, Detective Inspector Tim Smith was assigned as the case manager in the Andrew MacDonald homicide investigation. At the time, Detective Inspector Smith was working from Ottawa on two major investigations into allegations of sexual abuse at the St. Joseph's and St. John's Training Schools.

Detective Constables Randy Millar and Chris McDonell were assigned as the case investigators. Due to their positions as detectives and experience in handling major crimes, these two officers were involved in a number of the investigations dealt with in this chapter.

Randy Millar had joined the OPP in 1982. He received his senior constable designation on May 12, 1992, and was promoted to detective constable at some point before October 13, 1993. Chris McDonell had joined the OPP in 1968 and became a detective constable in late 1991 or early 1992.

The Officers Take a Statement From Ken Seguin

Early in the investigation, through the questioning of two of the young men present, the officers learned of Ken Seguin's involvement on the night of the homicide. Detective Inspector Millar testified that he did not know Mr. Seguin before this incident and had never heard rumours about him before this incident. Detective Constable McDonell had known Mr. Seguin as a probation officer for twenty years. He stated that he had a good working relationship with him.

On January 15, 1992, Detective Constables Millar and McDonell took a statement from Mr. Seguin at the probation office. In the statement, Mr. Seguin described his professional relationship with Mark Woods and the circumstances of the visit to his home on the evening of January 8, 1992.

After the statement, there was an informal discussion between Mr. Seguin and the officers. Detective Inspector Millar testified that they discussed the fact that Mr. Seguin had provided alcohol to these young men and that it was not right. Detective Inspector Millar recalled that at some point, Mr. Seguin stated that he would notify his employer of the incident.

Detective Inspector Smith became aware that the four young men had visited Mr. Seguin's home the night of the homicide. At the time, Detective Inspector Smith was not familiar with Mr. Seguin or any of the local probation officers. Although Detective Inspector Smith testified that he thought Mr. Seguin's supervisor was aware of the incident even before Mr. Seguin was interviewed by officers, in light of the evidence of other OPP and MCS witnesses and their subsequent actions, it is clear to me that the Detective Inspector was mistaken: Mr. Seguin had not yet told Ministry personnel.

As discussed in Chapter 5, Mr. Seguin reported the incident to his supervisor, Area Manager Emile Robert, on January 16, 1992, the day after his interview by the OPP officers. However, Mr. Seguin failed to include any mention of alcohol in his incident report, and there was evidence to indicate that he did not advise Mr. Robert about the alcohol consumed by the young men in his home.

Decision to Wait Before Notifying Probation Office

It appears that the OPP took no formal or informal steps at this time to contact Ken Seguin's supervisor to report what they had learned of his conduct on the night in question. OPP contact with the Cornwall Probation Office at this time was limited to informal discussions of the incident between Detective Constable McDonell and Carole Cardinal, one of Seguin's fellow probation officers. Detective Constable Millar may also have informally discussed the case with Jos van Diepen, another probation officer.

According to Detective Inspector Smith, the involvement of Mr. Seguin was discussed between himself, Assistant Crown Attorney Guy Simard, and Detective Constable Millar following Travis Varley's conviction. He testified as follows:

We felt that although it may not have been the cause or the root cause of what I refer to as a foolish drunken accident, that it could be a contributing factor because I think, as I recall, they left there around nine o'clock, and this shooting didn't occur until some four or five hours later.

But the concerns we had was that here's a probation officer doing the pre-sentence report for somebody the next day. Why is he doing it in his residence and why is he offering them beer? And I feel it should be on the record.

As to why formal notification had not taken place earlier, Detective Inspector Smith testified that they did not know there would be a guilty plea and therefore anticipated that somewhere along the line, Mr. Seguin might have to be called as a witness. They were concerned about antagonizing him before he testified.

When the matter was resolved through a guilty plea, Detective Inspector Smith made sure that the information about the young men drinking alcohol at Mr. Seguin's home was included in the agreed statement of facts so that it would be a matter of public record. Detective Inspector Smith testified that while the Crown was in agreement with his concerns regarding Mr. Seguin, the Crown felt that any letter to the probation office should come from the police. On the day of the sentencing, August 26, 1992, Detective Inspector Smith instructed Detective Constable Millar to write a letter to notify the probation supervisor of Mr. Seguin's involvement.

On September 3, 1992, Detective Constable Millar sent a letter to Emile Robert summarizing the OPP's information relating to Mr. Seguin's involvement. In addition to some of the information contained in Mr. Seguin's statement of January 15, 1992, the letter made a number of other observations, including the following:

During the interview with Seguin, I felt Seguin was obviously embarrassed and he made it clear he did not make a habit of having clients at his residence.

...

Seguin stated he felt intimidated by their presence and did not argue with Travis Varley when he took three beer from his fridge. He just wanted them to leave.

Seguin stated that he would notify his superior of this incident and also that without doubt he will be more selective on who he allows into his house in the future.

As discussed in more detail in Chapter 5, Mr. Robert forwarded Detective Constable Millar's letter to the Regional Manager, Roy Hawkins. In the covering letter, Mr. Robert wrote:

Due to the fact that Mr. Seguin's involvement was very brief and that he was embarrassed and made it clear that he had not the habit of having clients at his residence, Constable Millar and I recommend that no further action be taken.

Detective Inspector Millar testified that Mr. Robert did not provide him with a copy of this covering letter. He did not agree with the comment Mr. Robert attributed to him.

Police Communication With Government Agencies

There is no doubt that the Varley incident was a serious matter. As has been explained in Chapter 5, Ken Seguin lied about the full extent of his involvement on the evening of the homicide and further follow-up by corrections officials might have uncovered other inappropriate activity by Mr. Seguin.

It is unfortunate that the OPP officers' initial efforts to bring this incident to the attention of MCS staff were minimal. Ms Cardinal gained information from Detective Constable McDonnell informally, but it was not until eight months later that the matter was finally raised formally and directly with MCS staff.

Given the serious nature of the incident involved, in hindsight it would have been more appropriate for the letter to be sent by Detective Inspector Tim Smith, the case manager, directly to Mr. Roy Hawkins, the Regional Manager for the Cornwall Probation Office. Had a senior official at MCS, such as Mr. Hawkins, been the point of first contact regarding the incident, the fact that Mr. Seguin provided a misleading version of events could have become readily apparent and led to a more robust response and investigation. This was a missed opportunity to uncover inappropriate behaviour.

As I have discussed in Chapter 5, even Mr. Seguin's played-down version of events should have raised significant warning flags and provoked a formal response from his employer. Similarly, notwithstanding the perhaps uncritical and apologetic nature of Detective Constable Millar's letter and its tardiness in being sent, it should have led to a more thorough investigation by the Ministry.

The letter appears to have been written at Detective Inspector Smith's insistence, and I credit him for his effort in bringing the matter to the attention of Ministry officials.

Should similar circumstances arise in which public servants or officials are engaged in inappropriate activity that comes to the attention of the police, whether criminal in nature or not, police forces should contact the Ministry or Crown agency to alert them of the conduct. Such correspondence should be addressed to a designated senior person in the Ministry or agency. This would increase the likelihood of a timely, objective, and appropriate response and would ensure that no one involved in the occurrence or in regular contact with the impugned employee would be involved in determining the proper response.

Videotapes Found in Ron Leroux's House by the OPP

In early 1993, officers from the Lancaster Detachment of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) seized a number of pornographic videotapes from Ron Leroux's residence in the course of conducting a search for firearms. These tapes, and their possible linkage to Ken Seguin and other alleged perpetrators of child sexual abuse, have been the source of significant commentary and controversy over the past fifteen years. The seizure and subsequent destruction of the tapes has been cited by several individuals, including Mr. Leroux, Constable Perry Dunlop, and Garry Guzzo, as proof of police incompetence or cover-up and conspiracy. They allege that the police went to Mr. Leroux's house and executed a firearms search warrant but that they were already aware of the existence of the tapes and were able to locate them immediately upon their arrival. It was also alleged that the tapes contained incriminating footage of prominent members of the Cornwall community with young boys and that the police therefore destroyed them.

C-8 Makes a Complaint Against Ron Leroux to the OPP

On December 18, 1992, Constable Steve McDougald of the OPP Lancaster Detachment received a telephone call from C-8 reporting a complaint against Ron Leroux. Constable McDougald had started his career with the OPP in November 1987 at the Marathon Detachment. In February 1992, at the rank of constable, he transferred to the Lancaster Detachment.

In the telephone call, C-8 alleged that Mr. Leroux was harassing him, his ex-girlfriend, and his current girlfriend and her family. C-8 also alleged that Mr. Leroux was perhaps suicidal and possessed a number of weapons. C-8 further advised that he was himself in possession of four of Mr. Leroux's weapons.

C-8 attended the Lancaster Detachment the same day, gave a statement to Constable McDougald, and turned over four handguns. C-8 explained that he had taken the guns from Mr. Leroux's home because he was worried that Mr. Leroux would hurt himself or someone else. C-8 also said that lawyer Malcolm MacDonald was handling a real estate transaction between himself and Mr. Leroux.

On December 20, 1992, Constables McDougald and Patrick Dussault of the OPP Lancaster Detachment attended at Mr. Leroux's residence, advised him of the complaint, and issued a warning. Mr. Leroux denied that he had engaged in any harassing behaviour and denied being suicidal. On January 10, 1993, Mr. Leroux told Constable McDougald that C-8 could have the guns that had been turned over.

The OPP Learn That Ron Leroux Had Two More Firearms Registered

Staff Sergeant Jim McWade was, at the time, the Detachment Commander in Lancaster. Staff Sergeant McWade had started with the OPP in 1969. He became a staff sergeant and was posted at the Lancaster Detachment in January 1990. He was the Detachment Commander there until he was transferred in November 1993 to Renfrew. He retired from the OPP in December 2001.

Having been made aware of the complaint and the weapons that were turned over by C-8, Staff Sergeant McWade testified that he called the firearms registration office to obtain information about all weapons registered in Ron Leroux's name and the location to which they were properly registered. On February 9, 1993, Staff Sergeant McWade advised Constable McDougald that two outstanding weapons were registered to Ron Leroux's name at a Cornwall address and that Mr. Leroux could be in possession of those weapons. It was decided to obtain a search warrant to search Mr. Leroux's property for these two firearms.

The OPP Execute a Search Warrant at Ron Leroux's Residence

On February 10, 1993, Constable McDougald swore an information to obtain a search warrant to search Ron Leroux's house, garage, and boathouse for the two outstanding firearms.

Once the search warrant had been obtained, Constable McDougald and Detective Constable Randy Millar attended Mr. Leroux's residence. Detective Constable

Millar joined Constable McDougald in the search because this was the first warrant that Constable McDougald had been involved with and he wanted someone with experience to assist. When the officers arrived, no one was there and the house was locked. The officers returned to the detachment.

Upon returning to the detachment, Constable McDougald contacted C-8, who said that he did not have a key to Mr. Leroux's residence and that the locks had been changed. Constable McDougald also called Malcolm MacDonald, who advised that Mr. Leroux had been in Florida for two weeks, that he did not know where a key to Mr. Leroux's house was, and that he would not be available to attend the house. C-8 then called Constable McDougald back and said that he had obtained a key to Mr. Leroux's house from his mother and that he was, in fact, calling from inside the house. He further told the officers that he had already located one of the handguns.

The officers returned to Mr. Leroux's house and were let in by C-8. C-8 gave them a handgun that he said he had found in the front closet. Constable McDougald testified that he was not pleased that C-8 had done some of the work for them already. However, there is no indication that this was expressed to C-8, and C-8 was not asked to leave the residence while the officers conducted their search. The officers commenced a search for other weapons. Detective Constable Millar went upstairs on his own while Constable McDougald was speaking to C-8.

Detective Constable Millar searched a closet in the upstairs bedroom. From inside the closet, he located a cubbyhole that led to a space underneath the tub in the adjacent bathroom. In that cubbyhole, he located a suitcase that had obviously been hidden and was locked with a small padlock. There were two loose videotapes on top of the suitcase.

Having removed the case, Detective Constable Millar removed the padlock, opened the case, and found it contained approximately twenty more videotapes. Constable McDougald testified that some appeared commercially made and some were store-bought blank tapes with labels on them.

C-8 testified that Detective Constable Millar found the tapes "way too fast," suggesting that the officer, once upstairs, went straight to the cupboard before looking anywhere else. I have reviewed the sketch of the residence and in my view this can be explained by the fact that the upstairs contained only one bedroom and an adjacent bathroom.

Detective Inspector Millar testified that he did not view any of the tapes. However, his suspicions were raised because the tapes had clearly been hidden. He tried to call Project P, a specialized OPP unit that deals mainly with child pornography, from the residence but was unable to reach them.

Like Detective Inspector Millar, C-8 also testified that he did not witness the videotapes being viewed at the residence. Constable McDougald, however, testified that one tape was placed in a video recorder at the residence and viewed.

It contained scenes of male homosexual acts. This testimony is consistent with Constable McDougald's contemporaneous notes. It is possible that he viewed the tape while neither Detective Constable Millar nor C-8 were present.

The tapes were seized, along with the suitcase, the gun turned over by C-8, and an old rusty handgun subsequently found in a closet. Detective Constable Millar had no further involvement in the matter after the search and seizure.

Return to Justice Form Does Not Identify Seized Materials

On February 16, 1993, Constable McDougald prepared a return to justice form that identified the two firearms seized. He also checked a box to indicate that items not identified on the search warrant were seized, but he did not specifically identify the videotapes or the suitcase, as required by law. The return to justice form had a blank portion of the page for that very purpose. Constable McDougald testified that he had made a mistake by not listing the videotapes and that he had no explanation as to how this mistake occurred. Having reviewed his evidence and others, I have no reason to doubt that his mistake, although unexplained, was innocent in nature.

Review of the Videotapes

After seizing the materials, Constable McDougald had a discussion with Staff Sergeant McWade about what should be done with them. Staff Sergeant McWade asked Constable McDougald to review the videotapes and advised that sometimes videotapes were doctored and material of a criminal nature was spliced partway into an existing tape. The videotapes were to be reviewed for the portrayal of any kind of criminal activity, such as child pornography, snuff films, bondage, or any violation of the Criminal Code.

Constable McDougald testified that he told Staff Sergeant McWade he was neither interested in nor comfortable reviewing the tapes. When Constable McDougald expressed his discomfort, Staff Sergeant McWade suggested that he go through the tapes by pressing play and fast forwarding through parts. These instructions did not require viewing the videotapes from beginning to end. Staff Sergeant McWade recalled giving instructions to view the videos by looking at the start, the finish, and randomly throughout.

In a statement given by Constable McDougald to Detective Sergeant Pat Hall on December 11, 1998, he stated: "It was determined by S/Sgt. McWade, that I view the videotapes randomly, to ascertain if there was any child pornography, or home videos of local people." In his testimony, Staff Sergeant McWade did not recall instructing the officer to look for "home videos of local people," and Constable McDougald testified that he did not receive such an instruction from Staff Sergeant McWade. Constable McDougald testified that he had made this comment in his notes but had used the wrong terminology—he did not mean that he was looking for local people. There was, in fact, no reference to “local people” in the notes of Constable McDougald that were put into evidence. The officer’s assertion that he had used the “wrong terminology” is a possible explanation of the conflict between his statement of December 11, 1998, and his evidence before me.

Constable McDougald has notes of reviewing the videotapes on February 17, 1993, for approximately two and one-half hours, from 9:10 p.m. to 11:50 p.m., and on February 18, 1993, from 2:00 a.m. to 2:30 a.m. He testified that the second review was conducted with Constable Dussault. Staff Sergeant McWade testified that he was in the room for a short time while the officers were reviewing the tapes and saw a bit of the contents of the videotapes himself. In a will-state, Constable McDougald wrote, “Each tape was plays [sic] for several seconds to determine what was on the tape and then fast forwarded to another section of the tape and viewed again.” This seems consistent with the time expended by the officers in the review. Constable McDougald testified that the officers did not keep a log of the tapes, their length, or what portion was reviewed. Based on their partial viewing, the OPP determined that nothing of a criminal nature was on the tapes and that they could be returned to Mr. Leroux.

Ron Leroux Signs the Quit Claim

On April 25, 1993, Constable McDougald met with Ron Leroux at the detachment regarding the firearms investigation. Mr. Leroux was charged with eleven firearms-related criminal offences and released. Malcolm MacDonald represented Mr. Leroux on these charges.

Constable McDougald testified that during this meeting, Mr. Leroux was advised that the OPP was prepared to return the videotapes to him. Mr. Leroux told Constable McDougald that he had found the tapes in a dumpster at a campground and had taken them because he didn’t want them to fall into the hands of children. According to Constable McDougald, Mr. Leroux was emphatic that he did not want the videotapes back. Constable McDougald explained to Mr. Leroux that if he signed a quit claim on the property report, the tapes would be destroyed.

Mr. Leroux testified that he found his residence in a mess when he returned home in the spring of 1993. He spoke to Ken Seguin, with whom he had left a key. Mr. Seguin told Mr. Leroux that he had gotten Mr. Leroux in a lot of trouble because he had hidden a brown suitcase full of tapes in Mr. Leroux’s house and the police had found them. Mr. Leroux testified that Ken Seguin was desperate to get the tapes back because they would “destroy ... reputations.”

Mr. Leroux went on to testify that he made up the story about finding the tapes in the dumpster and advised the officer that he wanted the tapes back. He said that the officer refused to return them. Mr. Leroux testified that he signed a document that he thought was a release to get the videos back but was then advised that the police were going to destroy the tapes.

This testimony, however, is inconsistent with some of Mr. Leroux's previous statements, in which he says he did not speak to Mr. Seguin about the tapes until after he had signed the quit claim. Accordingly, I am inclined to agree with Constable McDougald's version of the events leading up to the signing of the quit claim.

Mr. Leroux signed the quit claim on April 25, 1993. Unfortunately, the form does not specify who discussed the matter with Mr. Leroux and did not require a witness to his signature. Constable McDougald's notes do not refer to any discussion with Mr. Leroux regarding the tapes, and, as previously mentioned, Staff Sergeant McWade did not have his notes available to assist him.

Constable McDougald testified that the property report with the signed quit claim would have been put back in the filing system to be processed. He had no further involvement with the process.

Destruction of the Videotapes

In his will-state and in the statement he provided to Project Truth officers on December 11, 1998, Constable McDougald stated that he was advised by Staff Sergeant McWade on May 4, 1993, that the detachment caretaker had destroyed all the tapes and the suitcase by burning them in a forty-five-gallon drum on that same date. He testified at this Inquiry that he did not remember the specific conversation but did recall being advised by Staff Sergeant McWade that the suitcase and twenty-two videotapes had been destroyed locally.

The caretaker, Arthur Lalonde, testified that he could not recall ever being involved in burning videotapes in his entire career. He testified that he had been asked by officers from time to time to destroy property by fire. He testified that whenever that occurred there would be an officer present who would stay with him until the item was completely destroyed.

In his statement to the Project Truth officers on February 4, 1999, Staff Sergeant McWade did not specify, nor was he asked, who actually destroyed the tapes, simply stating, "Some time after that, they were destroyed by burning in a fire barrel behind the Lancaster Detachment." In his evidence at this Inquiry, Staff Sergeant McWade testified that he personally destroyed the videotapes: "I'm the one who put them in the fire and personally burned them. I did not leave until they were completely on fire." He had no specific recollection of whether the caretaker, Mr. Lalonde, was present. He could not recall whether he had started the fire himself or whether any accelerant had been used. He had no specific recollection of retrieving the items from the property room.

A note on the property report by Staff Sergeant McWade says that the materials were “destroyed by fire.” There is no further information to indicate the process of the destruction, the exact time and date, or who witnessed the destruction. Staff Sergeant McWade, in his testimony, stated that his signature indicated only that he gave the order for destruction, and does not provide any assistance as to who actually destroyed the materials.

Staff Sergeant McWade acknowledged in his testimony that it might be helpful to have a section on the property report to note who actually disposed of the property. I agree. I am troubled both by the lack of record keeping with respect to the destruction of property and by the inconsistency of the evidence regarding who destroyed the tapes and how this was accomplished. In particular, I have difficulty accepting that the Detachment Commander would personally attend to the destruction of property by fire.

Poor Record Keeping Fuels Rumours

As noted above, the seizure of these tapes has garnered significant attention. Some individuals have asserted that these videotapes contained proof of group pedophilic activity in the Cornwall area. I neither heard nor saw any evidence to suggest that the seized videotapes were of this nature (nor that a copy of the tapes continues to exist today).

All of the OPP officers involved in the search, seizure, and apparent destruction of the videotapes denied having any knowledge of rumours regarding wrongdoing on the part of Ken Seguin or any connection between him and Ron Leroux.

The viewing or partial viewing of the tapes by the OPP officers was insufficient to determine whether they contained evidence of criminal activity. I find that Staff Sergeant McWade failed in his managerial duties by not requiring the investigators under his supervision to view the seized tapes in their entirety.

Whether or not the seized tapes were anything more than homosexual pornography cannot be definitively confirmed given the likely destruction of these tapes in 1993. It is unfortunate that the OPP officers involved did not handle the videotapes in a more thoughtful and thorough manner. The relative lack of documentation, including the lack of a witness to the quit claim execution, the lack of a witness to the alleged destruction of the videotapes, and the omission on the return to justice form, along with the incomplete viewing of the tapes by a local officer who was reluctant to do so rather than by Project P staff, are all causes of concern.

Some of these issues can be addressed through the implementation of new policies and protocols. As such, and if not already in place, I recommend that quit claim forms require a witness signature; that at least two people be present for the complete destruction of property; that time, date, and method of destruction be recorded along with both witnesses' signatures; and that the viewing of tapes with suspected criminal activity be better itemized and then archived for future reference. As has been clearly demonstrated in this case, a lack of transparency and poor record keeping can fuel rumours and must be avoided.

Investigation of Ken Seguin's Sudden Death

Ken Seguin was found dead in his home on November 25, 1993. The facts surrounding the discovery of Ken Seguin's body, and those leading up to the discovery, are set out in detail in Chapter 5, "Institutional Response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services."

The death was investigated by Detective Constables Randy Millar and Chris McDonell of the Lancaster Detachment of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP). During this investigation, these officers learned that David Silmsers alleged that Mr. Seguin had sexually abused him.

As discussed in detail in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service, in December 1992 Mr. Silmsers came forward to the CPS and alleged that he had been abused by both his probation officer, Ken Seguin, and a priest, Father Charles MacDonald. The Cornwall Police Service (CPS) investigated the allegations against Father MacDonald but not Mr. Seguin. In September 1993, the investigation into Father MacDonald was closed after Mr. Silmsers signed an illegal $32,000 settlement with the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall that required him to drop his criminal complaint against the priest.

The circumstances surrounding Mr. Seguin's death became the subject of considerable rumour and innuendo during the 1990s. I focus here on the quality and scope of the investigation, including the treatment of the Seguin family by Detective Constables Millar and McDonell.

Discovery of Ken Seguin's Body

On November 25, 1993, OPP Constable Patrick Dussault attended at Ken Seguin's home at the request of Ken Seguin's supervisor at the Ministry of Correctional Services (MCS), Area Manager Emile Robert, who was concerned about Mr. Seguin. Mr. Robert and one of his colleagues were at the residence when Constable Dussault arrived. The three men looked through the windows but were unable to enter the home. It was decided that if Mr. Seguin was not at work the following morning, Mr. Robert would notify the OPP, which could take appropriate steps. Constable Dussault noted advising Staff Sergeant Jim McWade and Sergeant Andrew Vanderwoude.

Ken Seguin's neighbours, Ron and Cindy Leroux, discovered his body later that afternoon. Mr. Leroux arrived home shortly before 3:00 p.m. His wife told him that numerous cars had been coming and going from Mr. Seguin's residence. Ron and Cindy Leroux entered Mr. Seguin's home using a spare key and found his body in the bathroom. Ms Leroux called 911, but not until after Mr. Leroux had retrieved Mr. Seguin's personal phone book, called Father Charles MacDonald, and left him an angry message blaming him for Mr. Seguin's death. Mr. Leroux's actions, including his retention of the phone book, are described in more detail in Chapter 5.

The OPP Are Notified and Attend the Scene

The first OPP officers to attend the scene were Constable Dussault and Sergeant Vanderwoude. According to Constable Dussault's notes, they arrived at 3:30 p.m. Ron and Cindy Leroux were at Ken Seguin's home when the officers arrived, and Constable Dussault took a brief written statement from Ron Leroux describing his interactions with Mr. Seguin the previous day. While the Constable was taking Mr. Leroux's statement, C-8 arrived at the scene and left shortly thereafter.

Detective Constable Millar became involved when Staff Sergeant McWade advised him of a suspicious death. Detective Inspector Millar testified that he and Detective Constable McDonell were assigned to the investigation of the death because they were the only officers that did this type of work in the Lancaster Detachment. Detective Constable Millar was the lead investigator and had previously investigated suicides and sudden deaths.

Detective Constables Millar and McDonell arrived at the scene shortly after 4:00 p.m. The officers testified that any sudden death is treated as suspicious until it is ruled otherwise. As a result, the proper procedure was to treat the matter as a homicide until homicide was ruled out. Accordingly, Detective Constable Millar gave instructions for Constable Dussault to secure the scene. This meant ensuring that no one entered the house other than those with reason to be there, such as the Coroner.

The Coroner arrived at the scene at approximately 4:00 p.m. Detective Inspector Millar testified that typically when a Coroner arrives he or she declares death, orders an autopsy, and then gives the police the authority to search for items that would help explain what caused the death.

Seguin Family Members Attend the Scene

Doug Seguin, Ken's brother, learned of Ken Seguin's death when he received a telephone call from Cindy Leroux that afternoon. He called his wife, Nancy, and his brother, Keith. Doug and Nancy Seguin then proceeded to Ken Seguin's residence. The OPP officers at the scene offered their condolences and asked if he wanted to go up and see Ken Seguin. Keith Seguin arrived at the scene later, and the Seguins were asked to leave until the OPP had finished its investigation.

Detective Constable McDonell testified that he spoke with members of the Seguin family that day, including Doug, Keith, and their father. He did not, at that time, take statements from them. Detective Constable McDonell had known Ken Seguin for twenty years in Mr. Seguin's capacity as probation officer.

Early Determination That Death Was Self-Inflicted

Detective Inspector Millar testified that, formally, the determination of suicide came after the autopsy, but, informally, the examination of the scene by the officers suggested that Ken Seguin's death was self-inflicted. This is consistent with what the OPP told Mr. Seguin's employer.

Once advised by his officers of Ken Seguin's death, Staff Sergeant McWade called Emile Robert. Mr. Robert testified that he received the call from the OPP shortly after he returned to the office from checking Mr. Seguin's residence. Staff Sergeant McWade told Mr. Robert that Ken Seguin was deceased and that his death appeared to be suicide.

Detective Constable Randy Millar Takes Statement From Ron Leroux

On the afternoon that Ken Seguin's body was discovered, Detective Constable Millar interviewed Ron Leroux in his cruiser for about thirty-five minutes. The statement covered information about Mr. Seguin and Mr. Leroux's activities the night before and how Mr. Leroux came to discover Mr. Seguin's body. Detective Constable Millar also asked about Mr. Seguin's sexual tendencies and further asked, "Do you think maybe Ken was in love with you and was depressed because you got married and now you are going to Maine?" Mr. Leroux answered that Mr. Seguin had never made any advances toward him.

Significantly, Detective Constable Millar's notes of the interview indicate that Mr. Leroux did not advise him that David Silmsen had made allegations of sexual abuse against Mr. Seguin, that Mr. Silmsen was attempting to negotiate a civil settlement with Mr. Seguin through Malcolm MacDonald, nor that Mr. Silmsen had called Mr. Seguin about the civil settlement the night before his death. The interview notes also do not refer to Mr. Leroux's subsequent allegation that the videotapes seized from his home in February 1993 were placed there by Mr. Seguin. Mr. Leroux testified that he spoke to Detective Constable Millar for five to ten minutes in his car and offered little information because of his distrust of police officers.

According to Mr. Leroux, Detective Constable Millar said he didn't want Mr. Leroux's wife present for the interview. Mr. Leroux testified that Detective Constable Millar said, "It's going to go like this. You and Ken were lovers. You got married, and he killed himself." Mr. Leroux then kicked open the car door and Detective Constable Millar told him to get the hell out of the car and that he would deny the whole thing.

In relation to the different accounts of this interview, I prefer the evidence of the officer. That said, I believe that the suggestion made by Detective Constable Millar regarding Mr. Seguin's motive for suicide, as reported in the officer's notes, was inappropriate in the situation.

Detective Constable Randy Millar's Knowledge of Allegations Against Ken Seguin

Later that evening, Detective Constables Millar and McDonell picked up Emile Robert and went to Ken Seguin's office to search for a suicide note. The officers checked Mr. Seguin's office and desk but did not locate a note. Mr. Robert testified that during this time, he told the officers that there was a rumour that Mr. Seguin was being criminally investigated.

Detective Inspector Millar testified that, before the investigation involving Mr. Seguin's death, he was not aware of allegations of a sexual nature against Mr. Seguin by David Silmsen. He had heard through the grapevine of a $32,000 settlement involving Father Charles MacDonald and Mr. Silmsen but had not paid much attention to it.

Detective Constable Randy Millar's Contact With Constable Perry Dunlop

Detective Inspector Millar also testified that, around this time, he was starting to have concerns about CPS Constable Perry Dunlop. He knew the Constable from working with him on a joint forces operation in either 1991 or 1992. Constable Dunlop had spoken to Detective Constable Millar about the $32,000 settlement, a cover-up, and a ring of pedophiles. Detective Inspector Millar described Constable Dunlop as being "infatuated" with these ideas, which caused him concern.

There is some indication that Detective Constable Millar was in contact with Constable Dunlop during his investigation of Ken Seguin's death. In his will-state, Constable Dunlop recalls Detective Constable Millar approaching him during dinner at a restaurant on November 25, 1993, to tell him about Mr. Seguin's death and ask for a copy of Mr. Silmsen's statement to the CPS. Helen Dunlop also testified that this meeting took place. Detective Inspector Millar does not remember the meeting happening and testified that he could not see why it would have, since he was going to get the statement from the CPS.

On November 29, 1993, Constable Dunlop met with Greg Bell of the Children's Aid Society. According to Mr. Bell's notes from the meeting, Constable Dunlop had told Detective Constable Millar that Mr. Bell was investigating the Silmsers case. Constable Dunlop told Mr. Bell that Detective Constable Millar would probably want to speak with him regarding Mr. Seguin's death. I therefore conclude that Detective Constable Millar had contact with Constable Dunlop during his investigation.

Detective Constable Randy Millar Attends Cornwall Police Service

On the morning of November 26, 1993, Detective Constable Millar attended the CPS station and spoke to Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet and Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie while Detective Constable McDonnell went to the autopsy. Detective Constable McDonnell joined them a little later but did not have any recollection of the substance of the meeting. The officers discussed the CPS investigation relating to Mr. Seguin and Father MacDonald.

According to Detective Inspector Millar, the CPS officers told him "in a nutshell" about the allegations made by David Silmsers. He was advised that Mr. Silmsers wanted to proceed with an investigation of only Father MacDonald first because that was all he could handle at once. Detective Constable Millar obtained copies of statements and reports generated by the investigation. Staff Sergeant Derochie noted that the OPP officers were provided with copies of Constable Heidi Sebalj's case history, Mr. Silmsers's statement, and Sergeant Ron Lefebvre's rough notes.

As discussed in Chapter 6, Detective Inspector Millar recalled being advised that Mr. Silmsers's statement appeared truthful but that the Cornwall police felt corroboration was required on the statement due to Mr. Silmsers's lengthy criminal record, which included crimes of deceit.

Detective Constable Millar also learned of the November 24, 1993, call from Mr. Silmsers to Staff Sergeant D'Arcy Dupuis that I previously discussed in Chapter 6, wherein Mr. Silmsers said that in the event something happened to him, the police should investigate Mr. Seguin and Father MacDonald. In the course of the meeting, Constable Sebalj joined the officers and said that she had just received a call from Mr. Silmsers, who had heard about Mr. Seguin's suicide and was upset.

In Staff Sergeant Derochie's notes of the meeting, he wrote that it was obvious to all present that Mr. Silmsers's threats were most likely the reason Mr. Seguin took his own life.

Offence of Extortion Considered

After meeting with the CPS, Detective Constables Millar and McDonell met with David Silmsers at his residence in Bourget for about two hours. Detective Constable Millar took a statement from Mr. Silmsers in which he recounted the events of the past year. Mr. Silmsers told the officers that he was trying to negotiate a settlement from Ken Seguin through Malcolm MacDonald and that he was seeking $100,000 or he would sue the Ministry of Correctional Services.

Mr. Silmsers testified that during the interview he was told that he was being investigated for the possible offence of extortion. The officers do not recall mentioning extortion. However, it is clear that the possibility of extortion was contemplated, at least by Detective Constable Millar, in the course of the death investigation. In the occurrence report he prepared, he wrote:

Their [sic] is no doubt that David Silmsers was accusing Ken Seguin of sexually assaulting him in years previous. David Silmsers telephoned Ken Seguin the night prior to finding Seguin—deceased and threatened to sue him if he did not make settlement by Fri 26 Nov 93. After investigation and autopsy there is no foul play suspected in Seguin's death. Extortion does not exist against Silmsers as per 346(2) CCC.

Detective Inspector Millar testified that he stood by his findings to the present. It was his view that Mr. Silmsers had threatened to sue Mr. Seguin but that such a threat did not amount to extortion pursuant to the Criminal Code, which explicitly states that threatening to institute a civil action or liability does not amount to extortion.

Detective Inspector Millar testified that the occurrence report referred to above was completed on November 26, 1993, except for a final entry relating to communication with the Ministry of Transport dated November 29, 1993. This suggests that his findings with respect to possible extortion were made as of November 26, 1993. Detective Constable McDonell was also involved in the preparation of this report and believed the determination that there was no extortion and no foul play happened “down the road,” after November 26, 1993. In any case, the two officers agreed that a possible offence of extortion was ruled out by November 29, 1993.

Officers Meet With Seguin Family

On December 15, 1993, Detective Constables Millar and McDonell met with members of the Seguin family, who had requested an update on the investigation. This was the first contact Detective Inspector Millar recalled having with the Seguin family since the death. Detective Inspector Millar and Doug Seguin provide different accounts of the meeting.

Detective Inspector Millar did not have detailed notes on the meeting but testified that he recalled telling the family that Ken Seguin had committed suicide and that he had been told Mr. Seguin was homosexual. Detective Inspector Millar also testified that he told the family that he believed Ken Seguin had committed suicide because Mr. Silmsers wanted money and had threatened to sue Mr. Seguin for sexually assaulting him a number of years ago. Detective Inspector Millar said the family members were very upset and did not appear to know any of this information. He said he told them the truth and did not tone it down.

In notes prepared by Doug Seguin in 1997, he claimed that during this meeting, Detective Constable Millar “gave us an atrocious description of what they said my brother and others had been doing to young boys.” Detective Inspector Millar did not agree with this characterization of the meeting. He did not recall referring to young boys aside from his reference to Mr. Silmsers’s allegations.

Doug Seguin testified that during the meeting, Detective Constables Millar and McDonnell also told the family about allegations of sexual abuse made against Milton MacDonald and about finding videotapes at Ron Leroux’s that he said belonged to Ken Seguin.

It seems clear that these two topics would not have arisen during the December 15, 1993, meeting with the Seguin family. Detective Constable Millar did not learn of the recent allegations made against his father-in-law, Milton MacDonald, until February 1994. There is no indication that the OPP were aware of Mr. Leroux’s claim that Ken Seguin placed the tapes in his house until March 1994.

The End of the Investigation

Following Detective Constable Millar’s apparent determination by November 26, 1993, that extortion could not be established, he appears to have taken only two further investigative steps: a meeting with Emile Robert on December 17, 1993, and an interview of Malcolm MacDonald on December 21, 1993.

Detective Inspector Millar testified that, in his mind, by the time of his interview with Malcolm MacDonald, the extortion investigation was over. He thought that he and Detective Constable McDonnell must have been ordered to interview Mr. MacDonald but could not recall by whom.

Detective Constables Millar and McDonnell interviewed Mr. MacDonald on December 21, 1993. Mr. MacDonald provided his version of the events from the time of Mr. Silmsers’s complaint leading up to the suicide. He reported that Mr. Silmsers had referred to bringing a complaint to the Ministry, as opposed to a civil action. He also said he had been encouraging Ken Seguin to take action against Mr. Silmsers for extortion. Mr. MacDonald provided the officers with notes apparently prepared by Mr. Seguin at Mr. MacDonald's request, regarding his dealings with Mr. Silmsier. Detective Inspector Millar could not recall what he did with those statements. Detective Constable McDonell had no recollection of receiving the statements prepared by Ken Seguin and said that he saw them only in preparation for this Inquiry.

According to CPS Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet, on January 7, 1994, Detective Constable McDonell advised him that the OPP had a statement in Ken Seguin's own handwriting and he would try to make it available to the CPS. Staff Sergeant Brunet recalled reading the statement. The Staff Sergeant noted that Detective Constable Millar delivered a package to him on January 12, 1994.

Detective Constable Chris McDonell was eventually assigned to assist Inspector Fred Hamelink in the subsequent extortion investigation, which will be addressed in the next section of this chapter.

While the sudden-death investigation is not one of sexual abuse involving young people, it did involve Ken Seguin and is therefore relevant to my mandate. Based on the evidence I have reviewed, I find nothing untoward or unusual about the officers' conclusions.

Investigation of David Silmsier for Extortion

Ken Seguin died on November 25, 1993, and the investigation of his death is described in a previous section of this chapter. On January 28, 1994, Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) Superintendent Carson Fougère met with Doug, Nancy and Keith Seguin, at their request, to discuss their concerns about that investigation. Following the meeting, an investigation was launched into the possible extortion of Ken Seguin by David Silmsier. In the course of this investigation, the officers involved obtained information relevant to Detective Inspector Tim Smith's concurrent investigations of sexual abuse by Father Charles MacDonald, conspiracy, and obstruction of justice, which are the subject of the next three sections of this chapter.

Meeting Between Superintendent Carson Fougère and the Seguin Family

Doug Seguin requested the meeting with Superintendent Fougère due to concerns he had after meeting with Detective Constables Chris McDonell and Randy Millar on December 15, 1993, regarding the investigation of his brother's death. The family expressed concerns about statements made by Detective Constables McDonell and Millar about Ken Seguin that may have "coloured" their investigation. Superintendent Fougère did not consider those expressions of concern to amount to complaints of misconduct on the part of the officers and as a result did not notify the Professional Standards Bureau.

While it appears Doug Seguin was of the view that he was making a complaint against the officers, he testified that he did not feel the need to follow up on it once an investigation into Mr. Silmsers was initiated.

According to Chief Superintendent Fougère, the family came to request charges of attempted extortion against Mr. Silmsers and a copy of the Lancaster OPP report on the death of their brother. Doug Seguin testified that he learned from Superintendent Fougère that Mr. Silmsers was going to be investigated for extortion.

Chief Superintendent Fougère's recollection was that following the meeting, he called the Criminal Investigation Branch (CIB) and asked Detective Superintendent Wayne Frechette to assign a Detective Inspector to conclude or take over the investigation. He testified that the investigation he requested was a re-investigation of the sudden death of Ken Seguin.

It is clear on the evidence that the investigation that was actually commenced as a result of Superintendent Fougère's call to Detective Superintendent Frechette was an investigation into David Silmsers for allegedly attempting to extort Ken Seguin. This is consistent with the instructions given to Detective Inspector Hamelink, the case manager, upon his assignment as well as with the letter written by Acting Inspector N.J. Duhamel to Detective Superintendent Frechette on February 2, 1994.

Assignment of Detective Inspector Fred Hamelink and the Investigating Officers

On February 1, 1994, Detective Inspector Fred Hamelink was dispatched by Detective Superintendent Frechette to Long Sault concerning allegations of extortion. Detective Inspector Hamelink had joined the OPP in 1969. By 1994, he had attained the rank of detective inspector and was assigned to the CIB at OPP headquarters in Orillia.

Detective Inspector Hamelink's role in the investigation was that of case manager. He was regularly briefed by, and regularly provided instruction to, the investigating officers. Ultimately, whether or not to lay charges at the conclusion of the investigation was Detective Inspector Hamelink's decision.

The day after his assignment, Detective Inspector Hamelink attended at the District Headquarters in Long Sault and was briefed by Detective Inspector Duhamel on the allegations. Detective Inspector Duhamel gave him Detective Constable Chris McDonell's name, and Detective Constable McDonell became the lead investigator in Detective Inspector Hamelink's investigation. The following day, Constable Don Genier was assigned to assist.

With respect to Detective Constable McDonell's assignment as lead investigator, Chief Superintendent Fougère testified that given the family's expressed concerns, the optics of assigning Detective Constable McDonell to the subsequent investigation were poor. Detective Inspector Hamelink testified that had he been advised of the Seguin family's allegations regarding the conduct of Detective Constable McDonell, he might have addressed those concerns when he found out the officer was assigned to his investigation.

However, Detective Inspector Hamelink made it clear that he viewed Detective Constable McDonell as a seasoned and thorough investigator. He was not concerned by Detective Constable McDonell's work on the extortion investigation. According to Detective Inspector Hamelink, Detective Constable McDonell did not appear to have any predisposition to a particular outcome nor did he try to influence Detective Inspector Hamelink in deciding the results of the investigation.

In light of the Seguins' concerns, it may have been unwise to assign Detective Constable McDonell to the extortion investigation. That said, there is nothing in the evidence to suggest that he was biased or unprofessional in fulfilling his duties.

Coordination With Detective Inspector Tim Smith's Investigations

Around the time of Detective Inspector Hamelink's assignment, there were discussions between the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and OPP about the need for further investigations with respect to David Silmsers' allegations of sexual assault by Father Charles MacDonald and possible criminal conduct relating to the illegal settlement entered into between the Diocese and Mr. Silmsers. Detective Inspector Tim Smith was assigned to conduct these investigations, the details of which are in the following three sections, on February 3, 1994.

Meeting of Detective Inspectors Tim Smith and Fred Hamelink

On February 8, 1994, Detective Inspectors Smith and Hamelink met in Bells Corners to exchange information. At some point, either at this meeting or subsequently, the officers discussed issues raised by their concurrent investigations. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he was concerned about proceeding with David Silmsers as a victim in one investigation and a suspect in another. He was also worried that, because both investigations were interested in some of the same people, the investigators would "trip over each other."

Meeting of Officers and Peter Griffiths

Following his meeting with Detective Inspector Hamelink, Detective Inspector Smith called Peter Griffiths, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region. They discussed the method of interviewing David Silmsers and whether he would have to be cautioned regarding possible extortion:

On February 21, 1994, the day before the interview with Mr. Silmsers, Detective Inspector Smith, Detective Inspector Hamelink, and their investigating officers met with Mr. Griffiths. According to Constable Genier's notes, the meeting was approximately two and one-half hours long and was followed by a one-hour debriefing among the officers regarding follow-up on Mr. Silmsen.

Agreement That Detective Inspector Fred Hamelink Avoid David Silmsen

Detective Inspectors Smith and Hamelink discussed with Mr. Griffiths the need for coordination because Mr. Silmsen was both a complainant and a suspect in their concurrent investigations. Detective Inspector Smith suggested that he deal with Mr. Silmsen as a victim first, before Detective Inspector Hamelink approached Mr. Silmsen as a suspect. They agreed that Detective Inspector Hamelink would avoid Mr. Silmsen until Detective Inspector Smith had what he needed for his sexual assault investigation. As a result, Detective Inspector Hamelink's investigation "circled around getting all the background information they could, staying away specifically from David Silmsen."

At some point, it was agreed between the two officers that Detective Inspector Hamelink would watch Detective Inspector Smith's interview of Mr. Silmsen from behind one-way glass, while Detective Inspector Smith, at Detective Inspector Hamelink's request, would gently probe Mr. Silmsen with a few questions relevant to extortion. Mr. Griffiths testified that he was not aware of this arrangement between the officers.

Agreement to Exchange Crown Briefs

The two officers further agreed that once the investigations were complete, they would "compare notes" before delivering their Crown briefs to Peter Griffiths. As I discuss below, this agreement was not followed: Detective Inspector Hamelink submitted his brief without informing Detective Inspector Smith.

Interview of David Silmsen

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Michael Fagan interviewed Mr. Silmsen on the afternoon of February 22, 1994. Detective Inspector Hamelink watched the interview from behind one-way glass. Detective Inspector Smith did not caution Mr. Silmsen with respect to the allegations of extortion but did ask a few questions relating to the allegations "in passing" at the request of Detective Inspector Hamelink.

In response to Detective Inspector Smith's questions, Mr. Silmsen stated that he had been in contact with Ken Seguin's lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, regarding a civil settlement and that he did not intend to bring another complaint to the police because "the police weren't doing nothing in the first place."

Detective Inspector Hamelink's team did not conduct its own interview of Mr. Silmsen. Detective Inspector Hamelink completed his investigation and took his brief to the Crown before Detective Inspector Smith finished his investigation. Based on the reply he received from the Crown, Detective Inspector Hamelink decided not to interview Mr. Silmsen. When asked during his testimony whether an interview should have been done, Detective Inspector Hamelink stated, "There's a lot of things that in hindsight should have been done."

Information Sharing Between the Investigations

In addition to David Silmsen, the investigations had other areas where potential witnesses and evidence overlapped. In some instances, Detective Constables Fagan and McDonnell conducted joint interviews, and in these cases, of course, both teams would be apprised of the evidence obtained. Where one team only conducted interviews, Detective Inspector Hamelink testified that it was his expectation that Detective Constables Fagan and McDonnell would have been sharing information. Detective Inspector Hamelink also testified that he did not have to explicitly instruct Detective Constable McDonnell to share information with Detective Constable Fagan because he was "seasoned enough to do it on his own." Detective Inspector Hamelink was satisfied that the information sharing occurred at the level of the investigating officers as opposed to at the level of the case managers.

However, Detective Constable McDonnell testified that he did not share information directly with the other team; instead, he would report it to Detective Inspector Hamelink. He testified that he did not know if Detective Inspector Hamelink was then sharing this information with the other team.

It was clearly Detective Inspector Smith's expectation that his team would be provided with all relevant information, either in the course of the investigations or through the final comparison at the conclusion of the investigations.

Investigative Steps of Extortion Investigation

Interviews with Cornwall Probation Office Staff

Between February 3 and February 17, 1994, Detective Inspector Hamelink's investigators took statements from staff at the Cornwall Probation Office. The staff members were questioned about what they knew of the events leading up to Ken Seguin's suicide. Some said they had heard rumours that Mr. Seguin was under investigation. However, some of them told the officers they were unaware of discussions between Mr. Silmsen and Mr. Seguin regarding Mr. Silmsen's allegations of abuse.

Statement From Jos van Diepen

Detective Constable McDonell and Constable Genier had a lengthy interview with Jos van Diepen on February 14, 1994.

Mr. van Diepen provided information regarding a former probation officer, Nelson Barque, in his statement. In particular, he claimed that he had “gone through Nelson’s desk and saw a paper back of men in sexual positions.” Mr. van Diepen told the officers that Mr. Barque’s career had ended when he resigned following a complaint that he was sexually involved with one of his probationers.

Mr. van Diepen also provided information about a probationer who Mr. Barque had suggested live with Father Charles MacDonald. The probationer told Mr. van Diepen that he didn’t want to live there, allegedly reporting that Father MacDonald “was a queer—he liked little boys.” According to Mr. van Diepen, the probationer said that he woke up to find Father MacDonald sitting on his bed but wouldn’t say anything more.

Mr. van Diepen also mentioned hearing about a dinner party at which Father MacDonald sodomized Mr. Silmser and said Mr. Seguin was there and did nothing about it.

In his statement, Mr. van Diepen also provided information about who in the community was friends with, or spent a lot of time with, Mr. Seguin. Among others he named Gerald Renshaw, Ron Leroux, C-8, Malcolm MacDonald, and Father MacDonald.

Clearly this statement contained information relevant to Detective Inspector Smith’s investigation and should have been shared with him. It referenced Father MacDonald both in relation to allegations of inappropriate sexual conduct and as a close friend of Mr. Seguin. In this regard, it was consistent with Mr. Silmser’s claims. Unfortunately, it appears that the statement was not provided to Detective Inspector Smith either by the investigating officers or by Detective Inspector Hamelink, who reviewed the statement on June 1, 1994. Detective Inspector Smith had no recollection of the statement and it was not included in the Crown brief prepared by Detective Inspector Smith regarding the allegations against Father MacDonald.

Other Information Obtained About Nelson Barque

In addition to Mr. van Diepen, two other probation office staff members interviewed by Detective Inspector Hamelink’s team mentioned past allegations against Nelson Barque. In Emile Robert’s statement of February 15, 1994, he told Detective Constable McDonell and Constable Genier that when he joined the office, Ms Marcelle Léger was filling him in on his staff and, according to

Constable Genier's notes, she "advised him on Nelson Barque and that there was possibly another officer involved in sexual activities with clients."

Two days later, the two officers interviewed Stewart Rousseau, who in his statement said that Mr. Barque got in trouble when he became "involved" with one of his probationers and the Ministry had him resign.

Detective Inspector Hamelink's notes show that he reviewed these statements on May 16, 1994. However, he did not follow up on the information provided regarding Mr. Barque. As I understand Detective Inspector Hamelink's evidence, this was because he did not see any connection between those allegations and his investigation into extortion. Similarly, Detective Constable McDonell did not view Mr. Barque as relevant to the investigation and did not follow up with the CPS regarding the information it received about Mr. Barque.

I agree that the information provided about Mr. Barque was not related to the extortion investigation. It did, however, indicate potential sexual misconduct on the part of Mr. Barque and warranted further investigation. I find that Detective Inspector Hamelink should have ensured such follow-up occurred. This was another missed opportunity to uncover criminal activity by a former probation officer.

In 1995, Mr. Barque was charged and pleaded guilty to indecent assault and gross indecency in relation to incidents involving a former probationer. He was again charged with indecently assaulting former probationers in 1998 and committed suicide soon after. These charges are discussed in more detail in later sections. I mention them here only to note the extent of the wrongdoing the OPP might have uncovered had it taken appropriate action in 1994.

Meetings With the Children's Aid Society (CAS)

Detective Constable McDonell and Constable Genier met with Greg Bell of the CAS on February 8, 1994, and twice on February 14, 1994. Over the course of those meetings, the OPP and CAS shared information, and Mr. Bell provided the officers with a transcript of the statement David Silmsen gave to the CAS on November 2, 1993, a copy of the CAS investigation strategy, and a copy of case note pages where Ken Seguin's name appeared. On this last item, Mr. Seguin's name was highlighted in yellow and an entry where Malcolm MacDonald was referenced as a possible perpetrator was blanked out.

Detective Inspector Smith's team later made its own requests for information from the CAS. Again, it seems that full information may not have been shared between the two OPP investigations. In particular, Detective Inspector Smith testified that he did not have a copy of David Silmsen's November 2, 1993, statement to the CAS when he interviewed Mr. Silmsen on February 22, 1994.

Interviews With Friends and Neighbours

Early in the investigation, Detective Inspector Hamelink's team conducted interviews of friends and neighbours of Ken Seguin, including Gerald Renshaw, C-8, and Fern Touchette.

Detective Constable McDonell and Constable Genier interviewed Mr. Renshaw on February 9, 1994. Although Mr. Renshaw later reported allegations of being sexually abused by Mr. Seguin, he did not disclose this claim to the officers. He testified that he knew Detective Constable McDonell and did not trust him. He felt that the officer had hassled him in the past and was looking for ways to put him in jail. Mr. Renshaw testified, "I didn't want help from them [the OPP]; I didn't want them anywhere near me."

Within the statement taken from Mr. Renshaw, there is reference to Father MacDonald. He stated that he moved out of Mr. Seguin's residence because he didn't like the fact that Father MacDonald "would always go over with guys." This statement was not listed in any of the materials that Detective Inspector Smith submitted to the Crown and thus was probably not provided to him.

Detective Constable McDonell and Constable Genier interviewed C-8 on February 11, 1994. C-8 testified that he did not want to get involved so he did not tell the officers much. In fact, he told the officers that he "never heard of that David Silmsen guy, until [he] read it in the paper after Ken's death." In his testimony, C-8 stated he knew who Mr. Silmsen was and that he wanted money from Ken Seguin.

On March 28, 1994, Detective Constables McDonell and Fagan jointly conducted an interview of Ron Leroux at his residence in Maine. Like Mr. Renshaw and C-8, Mr. Leroux was not completely forthcoming in his interview.

In his statement, Mr. Leroux referred to Ken Seguin receiving a phone call and being distressed, but he did not reveal the full knowledge that he later claimed to have about Mr. Silmsen's demands for money from Mr. Seguin. Nor did he advise the OPP officers of any knowledge he had about Mr. Seguin having sexual relationships with probationers. It was in this statement that Mr. Leroux first told the police that the tapes found in his home in February 1993 had been put there by Mr. Seguin.

Interview of Malcolm MacDonald

On May 12, 1994, Detective Inspector Hamelink and Detective Constable McDonell met with Malcolm MacDonald. Mr. MacDonald was a key witness in the extortion investigation, because he was a friend of Ken Seguin, had acted as his lawyer in discussions with David Silmsen, and had obtained written statements from Mr. Seguin regarding his contact with Mr. Silmsen. As the friend and legal counsel of Father Charles MacDonald and because of his involvement in the illegal settlement agreement, Mr. MacDonald was also a key witness in Detective Inspector Smith's sexual assault, conspiracy, and obstruction of justice investigations.

Despite the overlap in interests, Detective Inspector Hamelink did not see the need to coordinate with Detective Inspector Smith before interviewing Mr. MacDonald. He testified that he expected that Detective Constable McDonnell would share information from the interview with Detective Constable Fagan the next time they met.

The interview lasted approximately one hour and included a discussion of Mr. MacDonald's representation of Father MacDonald with respect to Mr. Silmsen's complaint, an area that would clearly have been of interest to Detective Inspector Smith. Mr. MacDonald chose not to provide a statement at the interview, but he delivered a written document to the investigators the following day. Detective Inspector Hamelink testified that he did not give this statement directly to Detective Inspector Smith but that it would have formed part of his Crown brief (which, as noted above, Detective Inspector Smith did not receive).

There was also information recorded in Detective Inspector Hamelink's notes of the meeting that was not included in the statement prepared by Mr. MacDonald. One portion of the notes refers to Mr. MacDonald reviewing his file in the presence of Detective Inspector Hamelink:

I then asked him if he had any notes of any conversations he had had with David Silmsen. He unlocked his desk & from the top left hand drawer (his left) he removed a manila file folder which contained numerous documents, some with a red seal on the bottom of the page, newspaper clippings, an envelope with a handwritten statement which he said was Ken Seguin's. Malcolm MacDonald looked through this file. He then closed the file.

MacDonald when asked if he had any notes in this file about conversations between himself and David Silmsen said he didn't think so but there may be in another file which he kept. (Location of this file wasn't disclosed.)

The information that Mr. MacDonald had a file on the matter and notes on his conversations with Mr. Silmsen should have been of critical importance to both Detective Inspector Hamelink's and Detective Inspector Smith's investigations. Certainly, one could assume that a lawyer would have a file and would have made notes of his conversations. Because Detective Inspector Hamelink had actually confirmed the existence of the file and notes, he might have established grounds for a search warrant with respect to Detective Inspector Smith's investigations into conspiracy and obstruction of justice. In my view, this information was of such significance that Detective Inspector Hamelink ought to have ensured that it was immediately brought to his colleague's attention rather than relying on his expectation that it would make its way to Detective Inspector Smith through Detective Constables McDonell and then Fagan.

Also, Detective Inspector Smith ought to have had the opportunity to review Detective Inspector Hamelink's notes and Mr. MacDonald's statement prior to his own interview of Mr. MacDonald, which took place in October 1994 and is described in a later section, "Obstruction and Conspiracy Investigations."

Interviews of CPS Officers

Constable Genier and Detective Constable McDonell spoke to Constable Heidi Sebalj, the officer who investigated David Silmser's complaint to the CPS, on February 3, 1994, for almost an hour regarding her investigation. Detective Inspector Hamelink then spoke with Constable Sebalj on June 9, 1994. On June 13, 1994, Detective Inspector Hamelink attended CPS and spoke to Acting Chief Carl Johnston and Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis. He asked for a statement from Constable Sebalj regarding any conversations she had had with Mr. Silmser regarding sexual assault charges being laid against Ken Seguin. Acting Chief Johnston said they would have to get a legal opinion because there was a pending lawsuit.

On July 20, 1994, Detective Inspector Hamelink attended to interview Constable Sebalj. Detective Inspector Hamelink testified that he did not think it would be helpful to him to get any information or update from Detective Inspector Smith with respect to Constable Sebalj. The statement he took from Constable Sebalj refers to the original investigation and the involvement of Chief Claude Shaver and Sergeant Ron Lefebvre, matters that would have been relevant to Detective Inspector Smith's investigation. The statement does not appear in any of Detective Inspector Smith's materials submitted to the Crown.

Detective Inspector Hamelink's team also obtained statements that were prepared by Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet and Sergeant Lefebvre, who were also involved in the David Silmser case. It appears that only Staff Sergeant Brunet's statement was provided to Detective Inspector Smith and included in his brief on the conspiracy investigation.

Interactions With Seguin Family During the Investigation

One of the first steps taken by Detective Inspector Hamelink in his investigation was to meet with members of the Seguin family. On February 3, 1994, Detective Inspector Hamelink spoke to Nancy Seguin and arranged to meet with her, Doug Seguin, and Keith Seguin that afternoon. Following the three-hour meeting, Detective Constable McDonell took statements from each of the three family members. These statements do not appear to have been shared with Detective Inspector Smith.

Detective Inspector Hamelink and his officers had regular contact with members of the Seguin family through the course of their investigation. In a letter to Doug Seguin, the Chief Coroner wrote that his review of the case indicated that investigators spent a total of 83.5 hours with Seguin family members between November 25, 1993, and July 6, 1994. Detective Inspector Hamelink explained the contact he had with the family members as an attempt to ease their grief by sharing information:

... I was dealing with a grieving family, I was aware of that, a grieving family that had difficulty coming to terms with the death of a loved one, a brother and a brother-in-law. A grieving family that had difficulty coming to terms with the fact that there was community rumours about his alternate lifestyle. And a grieving family that had difficulty coming to terms with the fact that their brother was tied in some fashion to pedophilia.

Although Detective Inspector Hamelink had ongoing contact with several members of the family, he testified that Nancy Seguin came to see him most frequently. He said that she had difficulty coming to terms with the fact that Ken Seguin had killed himself and he tried to alleviate her concerns about the death. In particular, the officer assisted in providing her an opportunity to review photographs of the death scene, and later contacted the Coroner, the identification officer, and Detective Constable Randy Millar to provide answers to some of her questions.

In one meeting, Ms Seguin provided Detective Inspector Hamelink with two letters written to Ken Seguin's mother following his death, one from Father MacDonald and one from Mark Woods. Detective Inspector Hamelink did not recall taking copies of the letters and did not advise Detective Inspector Smith that Ms Seguin had a letter written by Father MacDonald in her possession. I did not have the benefit of reviewing those letters.

Detective Inspector Hamelink did advise Nancy Seguin to contact Detective Inspector Smith regarding information she had obtained when she met with Bishop Eugène LaRocque in January 1994. She did so and met with Detective Inspector Smith on March 8, 1994. This meeting will be discussed in the section "Obstruction and Conspiracy Investigations."

No Charges Laid in Extortion Investigation

On September 28, 1994, Detective Inspector Hamelink met with Detective Constable McDonell, who said that the Crown brief was complete. Arrangements were made to meet with Mr. Griffiths the following afternoon. There is no indication that Detective Inspector Hamelink made any effort to contact Detective Inspector Smith to compare information before meeting with Mr. Griffiths.

Detective Inspector Hamelink testified that the investigating officers assembled the brief on the extortion investigation. After he had read all the statements, he prepared the synopsis to be added to the brief as an outline of the investigation. Although Detective Inspector Hamelink testified that before he went to the meeting with Mr. Griffiths he had not formed an opinion, even tentatively, as to whether there were reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge, it appears he had, because his synopsis states in conclusion, “At this time, the police investigation has failed to provide the evidence to substantiate a criminal offence of Extortion pursuant to Section 346.(1) [sic] of the Criminal Code.”

On September 29, 1994, Detective Inspector Hamelink met with Mr. Griffiths in his Ottawa office and presented him with the Crown brief and a verbal briefing. The officer received Mr. Griffiths’ opinion in a letter dated October 12, 1994. Mr. Griffiths’ conclusion was that there was not sufficient evidence to provide reasonable and probable grounds to support a criminal charge of extortion against David Silmsers. No charges were laid.

In his opinion letter, Mr. Griffiths noted that the only witness statement that provided any evidence of an extortion threat was the one from Malcolm MacDonald. It appears from this statement that the supplementary occurrence report of Staff Sergeant D’Arcy Dupuis was not included in the Crown brief. In that report, Staff Sergeant Dupuis described a telephone call he received from Mr. Silmsers on November 24, 1993, during which Mr. Silmsers told him that “if they don’t pay within the next 48 hours,” he would go to the press.

Detective Inspector Hamelink met with the Seguin family on December 19, 1994. According to his notes, the meeting was arranged the week before when the Detective Inspector called Doug Seguin and advised him of the Crown’s decision regarding charges. At the meeting, the officer read them the letter from the Crown attorney and explained its contents.

Insufficient Coordination and Information Sharing Among Investigators

Detective Inspector Hamelink was unable to explain why he did not follow through on the agreement to get together with Detective Inspector Smith before the officers jointly submitted their briefs to Mr. Griffiths. Detective Inspector Hamelink did state that he was being “fiscally responsible” by concluding the investigation so that the investigating officers could go on to other investigations. This does not, however, amount to a reasonable explanation for not sharing his brief with Detective Inspector Smith and comparing information before submitting it to the Crown, as had been previously agreed.

It was clear from Detective Inspector Smith's testimony that he was relying on this agreement to ensure that he had full information prior to the submission of his brief to Mr. Griffiths. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he spoke to Detective Inspector Hamelink on the telephone some time after October 4 and expressed his displeasure that Detective Inspector Hamelink had submitted his brief in contravention of their agreement. Detective Inspector Hamelink testified that he was not aware that Detective Inspector Smith was displeased with his actions nor that he had reported his concerns to his supervisor.

I do not doubt Detective Inspector Smith's frustration in failing to receive Detective Inspector Hamelink's brief as planned. Nor do I condone the decision of Detective Inspector Hamelink not to share his brief with his colleague. I do question, however, whether Detective Inspector Smith could have made more of an effort at the time to remedy the situation. During his testimony, he could not recall, for instance, whether he spoke with Mr. Griffiths and asked him to look over the briefs together to ensure nothing was missed.

In any case, having reviewed the evidence, I find that there was insufficient coordination between Detective Inspector Hamelink's extortion investigation and Detective Inspector Smith's 1994 investigations. I point in particular to the failure to share information obtained in interviews with probation staff, Malcolm MacDonald, Gerald Renshaw, and the CPS officers.

Given the extent of overlap between the investigations and the evidence of common interest that was uncovered, Detective Inspector Hamelink should have taken steps to provide the relevant information to Detective Inspector Smith rather than relying solely on informal coordination between the investigating officers. Detective Inspector Smith also could have made greater efforts to provide Detective Inspector Hamelink with relevant information uncovered during his investigations. For example, he did not speak with Detective Inspector Hamelink about Detective Constable Fagan's interview with Father MacDonald, during which, as is described in a later section, "Re-Investigation of Father Charles MacDonald," he claimed Mr. Silmsen would often call him in a drunken state and was clearly after money.

The failure to share information is yet another missed opportunity. As I will discuss, Detective Inspector Smith testified that the issue of reasonable and probable grounds with respect to Mr. Silmsen's allegations against Father MacDonald was a very close call. He should have had all of the evidence available at the time before forming his opinion.

Commencement of Detective Inspector Tim Smith's 1994 Investigations

As previously discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service, on January 6, 1994, a story broke in the regional media about David Silmsers' allegations against Father Charles MacDonald, the settlement he reached with Father MacDonald and the Diocese, and the decision by the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) to close its investigation into this complaint. In the days that followed, Acting CPS Chief Carl Johnston contacted the Ottawa Police Service and asked it to review the CPS investigation into the Silmsers matter, and to look into whether members of the CPS downplayed or concealed Mr. Silmsers' allegations.

The Ottawa Police Service found a number of deficiencies in the CPS investigation and recommended an outside police agency be brought in to re-investigate Mr. Silmsers' allegations and to investigate the events surrounding his settlement with Father MacDonald and the Diocese and the CPS decision to stop its investigation. Acting Chief Johnston asked the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) to conduct this investigation. The details of the resulting investigations are described in the next two sections. However, before turning to those investigations, I think it useful to look briefly at the overall mandate under which they took place.

Communication Between Acting Chief Carl Johnston and Deputy Commissioner Ronald Piers

On January 28, 1994, Acting Chief Johnston wrote to Deputy Commissioner Ronald Piers following their telephone conversation earlier that day. In the letter, Acting Chief Johnston requested "the assistance of [the OPP] to conduct a completely new investigation of the allegation, as it appears to me that there were witnesses who were not interviewed," and because individuals other than David Silmsers had made allegations against Father Charles MacDonald.

A second letter, dated January 31, 1994, also appears to have been written following a telephone conversation between Acting Chief Johnston and Deputy Commissioner Piers during which they discussed the mandate of the OPP investigators. In his letter, Acting Chief Johnston suggests the OPP mandate be expanded. In particular, he asks that it cover media allegations of a conspiracy between the Cornwall police and the Catholic Diocese; reports of abuse at a group home in Cornwall; the possibility of an obstruction of justice investigation in relation to the David Silmsers settlement; and whether the CPS should proceed with an investigation of a local priest without cooperation from the victim.

A third letter from Acting Chief Johnston to Deputy Commissioner Piers, dated February 1, 1994, was written pursuant to a telephone call between them on the same day regarding “the specific mandate of your personnel conducting an investigation of the David Silmsers alleged sexual assault by a local priest.” Acting Chief Johnston writes:

I would request that your Police Service re-investigate the Silmsers matter in its entirety, the results of which, will respond to media allegations of a conspiracy between the Cornwall Police Service and the local Catholic Diocese, to effect a civil settlement with the alleged victim, Silmsers. Your investigation will also make a determination if the priest can or should be prosecuted, given the civil settlement to Silmsers and his refusal to testify.

Police Press Releases

The OPP issued a press release on February 2, 1994, regarding the CPS request that the OPP “conduct a new investigation into allegations of sexual assault against a local clergy which occurred approximately twenty years ago.” The release states that a member of the Criminal Investigation Branch has been assigned to the case and lists Superintendent Wayne Frechette as the contact. The release does not mention the other aspects of Acting Chief Johnson’s request, such as the allegations of conspiracy or obstruction of justice. This is a just one example of an incomplete press release. Others will be discussed in more detail in later sections of this chapter.

As described fully in Chapter 6, the Cornwall Police Services Board issued its own press release on the same day, which gave the incorrect impression that the Ottawa Police Service’s report (the Skinner Report) found little wrong with the CPS investigation of Mr. Silmsers’s complaint. In combination, these press releases failed to provide appropriate and accurate information to the public about the extent of the problems associated with the CPS investigation and the scope of the re-investigation by the OPP.

Assignment of Detective Inspector Tim Smith

On February 3, 1994, Detective Inspector Tim Smith was assigned by Superintendent Frechette to conduct an investigation in the Cornwall area. At the time, Detective Inspector Smith was at the Special Investigations Division of the Criminal Investigation Branch (CIB), Kingston Unit. Superintendent Frechette was the Director of the CIB and Detective Inspector Smith’s supervisor.

Detective Inspector Smith had been a member of the OPP since he joined as a probationary constable at the Barrie Detachment in 1967. He had extensive experience in criminal investigations, including investigations into allegations of police corruption, municipal corruption, and conspiracy to obstruct justice. From February 1990 to August 1997, he was assigned as the case manager in the investigations of St. Joseph's Training School for Boys, in Alfred, Ontario, and St. John's Training School, in Uxbridge, Ontario, both of which involved allegations of historical sexual abuse against young people.

When Detective Inspector Smith was assigned as case manager of the 1994 investigations in Cornwall, he continued in his role as case manager of the training school investigations. According to Detective Inspector Smith, the investigations themselves were mostly wound up but the prosecutions were ongoing. In addition, he was concurrently responsible for a number of other cases, including homicides. In my view, Detective Inspector Smith's workload was such that he had insufficient time to devote to the investigations in Cornwall. As I discuss in later sections, he was similarly overstretched during the Project Truth investigations.

In Detective Inspector Smith's notes from his call from Superintendent Frechette on February 3, 1994, he recorded that the OPP had been asked to do a complete re-investigation. He lists the "Questions to answer" as follows:

1. Was there a conspiracy between the Cornwall Police and Catholic Diocese to effect a civil settlement with alleged victim thus terminating criminal proceedings?
2. [W]as there obstruction of justice by lawyers who brought about civil settlement of assault victim which resulted in termination of police investigation upon consultation with local [C]rown attorney?
3. In absence of co-operation of alleged assault victim should Cornwall police consider proceeding with the prosecution against priest?

Detective Inspector Smith testified that these questions were dictated by Superintendent Frechette in their telephone call and that it was his understanding that they reflected the subjects of the investigation. Detective Inspector Smith understood that these questions had come from Acting Chief Johnston. Detective Inspector Smith also received a copy of the January 31, 1994, letter from Acting Chief Johnston to Deputy Commissioner Piers.

Detective Inspector Smith therefore understood that his investigation was threefold. First, he was being asked to re-investigate allegations of sexual assault perpetuated by Father Charles MacDonald.

Second, in relation to conspiracy allegations, Detective Inspector Smith testified that in his view he was not asked to look at any type of conspiracy or collusion between the Cornwall police and the Diocese but rather just the specific allegation that the two institutions conspired to effect an illegal settlement with Mr. Silmser.

And third, with respect to obstruction of justice, Detective Inspector Smith testified that he understood that he was being asked to investigate the roles of the lawyers, specifically Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc. He was not yet aware of Sean Adams' involvement in the settlement. There was also a mention of the local Crown attorney in the January 31 letter, and so Detective Inspector Smith understood that he was to look at Murray MacDonald's actions as well. Murray MacDonald, the local Crown attorney, had prosecuted some of the cases resulting from the Alfred investigation, into the St. Joseph's Training School, and Detective Inspector Smith had worked with him on previous cases. The fact that Detective Inspector Smith was now assigned to investigate Mr. MacDonald may have amounted to a conflict of interest and at the very least created the appearance of a conflict.

Although the letter of January 31 refers specifically to the actions of the lawyers, and not their principals, Detective Inspector Smith testified that he saw the actions of the lawyers and principals as part and parcel of the same thing. He recognized that the lawyers would be acting on behalf of their clients and therefore the clients, including the Bishop and the Diocese, were also subjects in his investigation.

While the investigation with respect to the illegal settlement was initially framed in terms of an investigation of conspiracy to effect the settlement between the CPS and the Diocese and an investigation of obstructing justice with respect to the actions of the lawyers, Detective Inspector Smith testified that he would have considered any criminal activity relating to the settlement or anything that might have caused the illegal settlement to have been brought about as part of his mandate. However, a review of his investigations suggests that Detective Inspector Smith had a narrower view of his mandate.

Assignment of Detective Constable Michael Fagan

Detective Inspector Smith testified that he asked for one officer to assist him in these 1994 investigations and specifically requested Detective Constable Michael Fagan. He had worked with the Constable for three years on the Alfred investigation. He wanted Detective Constable Fagan on the team because he had a knack of getting along with people and was comfortable dealing with victims of child sexual abuse. Detective Inspector Smith described Detective Constable Fagan as being very empathetic and doing a wonderful job with the most difficult victims in the Alfred investigation. The Detective Inspector had heard that Mr. Silmser could be a difficult complainant to work with, which was one of the reasons that Detective Inspector Smith wanted Detective Constable Fagan assigned.

Detective Inspector Smith felt that he would require the assistance of only one officer because he expected to take a hands-on investigative role himself. He was of the view that as an officer with a bit more experience and higher rank, it would be more appropriate for him to conduct the interviews with the Chief of Police, the Crown attorney, and the Bishop.

Comments on the Mandate of the Investigations

Having reviewed the evidence, I find that for the 1994 investigations assigned to Detective Inspector Smith, the OPP failed to define a mandate that would have provided appropriate direction and structure. As will be discussed in the section “Project Truth’s Mandate,” the mandate for the Project Truth investigations was similarly convoluted and ill-defined. In my view, weaknesses in both investigations can be attributed, in part, to their imprecise mandates.

It appears from the correspondence between Deputy Commissioner Piers and Acting Chief Johnston that the two discussed a number of issues and envisioned a broad and open-ended mandate for the OPP to investigate Mr. Silmser’s allegations and the associated settlement. However, this was ultimately communicated to Detective Inspector Smith as an assignment to conduct three separate and distinct investigations.

This is unfortunate, as a broad and global investigation would probably have been more efficient and effective. Such an investigation would have encouraged a re-investigation of the David Silmser matter in its entirety and brought to light any conspiracies or cover-ups in relation to the illegal settlement.

Instead, a significant portion of the investigation focused on the particular issue of whether the CPS had conspired with the Catholic Diocese to effect the civil settlement. Although this allegation, or rumours of it, was reported in the media, it is not clear that this should have been the focus of the investigation. A more appropriate focus of the investigation would have been the broader question of whether the CPS, or anyone else, was involved in ensuring that the allegations of sexual abuse did not become known.

Re-Investigation of Father Charles MacDonald

At the request of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS), the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) conducted a re-investigation into the allegations by David Silmser of abuse by Father Charles MacDonald in 1994. Detective Inspector Tim Smith was assigned to conduct the investigation. Although he described it as “very close,” he ultimately concluded that he had insufficient grounds to charge Father MacDonald.

Timing and Strategy of the Investigation

As discussed in the previous section, at this time, Detective Inspector Smith was also tasked with investigating an allegation of obstruction of justice and an alleged conspiracy between the CPS and the Diocese to effect an illegal settlement. However, the bulk of his team's investigative activity in the early months of 1994 was focused on re-investigating Mr. Silmsen's complaint against Father MacDonald. Detective Inspector Smith explained that he knew there was some media attention at the time and he felt strongly that there were other victims out there. He believed that if those victims did not come forward by Christmas, the likelihood of anyone coming forward was remote. He testified that he initially thought they could finish the investigation by December but that he did not want to put a deadline on it.

Although he was aware that Mr. Silmsen's complaints had previously been investigated by the CPS, with the involvement of the Children's Aid Society (CAS), it was Detective Inspector Smith's intention from the beginning to conduct his own investigation. His direction to Detective Constable Michael Fagan was to re-interview everyone who had been interviewed by Constable Heidi Sebalj in the initial investigation. He described his approach as taking a portion of the CPS investigation and "fine-tuning it."

Detective Inspector Smith was also looking for other alleged victims to help corroborate the complaint. Based on his previous experience, the officer considered this type of evidence of particular importance. Although he was aware that there was no longer a requirement of corroboration, it was his view that in historical cases, there was a very low chance of a conviction unless there were multiple victims. He testified, "There was a never a conviction on the one and one," referring to cases of one accused and one alleged victim.

While this statement may reflect his experience, I want to make clear that it does not reflect any requirement of Canadian criminal law. Not all perpetrators will have more than one victim. Such an accused will still be convicted where there is sufficient evidence of guilt. The testimony of a complainant does not need to be corroborated by other alleged victims. While the existence of multiple complaints may improve the likelihood of conviction, the lack of other victims should not unduly influence the police in determining whether reasonable and probable grounds exist to charge a suspect.

In addition to re-interviewing the altar boys identified in the CPS investigation, Detective Inspector Smith testified that the OPP also made some effort to find other altar boys who had served at St. Columban's between 1969 and 1975. He could not remember if they made any effort to interview other priests who would have lived in the rectory with Father MacDonald at St. Columban's.

Limited Contact With CPS and CAS

According to Detective Inspector Smith, he had “complete cooperation” from the CPS and “anything [he] wanted or required was provided.” He testified that everything he was given by the CPS would have been included in his Crown brief. The Crown brief synopsis of the CPS investigation and David Silmsers’s statement to the CPS are the only CPS materials listed in the index to Detective Inspector Smith’s Crown brief. This indicates to me that he did not receive important materials from the CPS, including copies of the notes taken by Constable Sebalj, Sergeant Ron Lefebvre, and Constable Kevin Malloy during their first interview with Mr. Silmsers on January 28, 1993 (discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service). In 2002, the notes of Sergeant Lefebvre were found by Michael Neville, the lawyer representing Father MacDonald, when he was granted access to materials collected by Constable Perry Dunlop. This incident will be discussed in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet testified that he briefed Detective Inspector Smith in early February and that his only other involvement in the re-investigation was a statement he gave to the OPP on August 18, 1994. Detective Inspector Smith spoke to Acting Chief Carl Johnston from time to time to keep him updated. Detective Inspector Smith also met briefly with Constable Sebalj on March 22, 1994, and they went over her notes of the investigation of Mr. Silmsers’s complaint.

Although aware of the CAS investigation of Father MacDonald, Detective Inspector Smith appears not to have contacted the CAS until March 21, 1994. At a meeting the following day, the officer informed Greg Bell, Bill Carriere, and Richard Abell of his plans for the investigation. The CAS provided him with some file materials, and arrangements were made for Detective Constable Fagan to come back to review the entire file. He did not come in to review the file until June, after Mr. Bell had made several follow-up calls to the OPP.

In my view, this was a missed opportunity for the OPP and CAS to coordinate their efforts and conduct a joint investigation. Moreover, it appears that the OPP did not take full advantage of the information sharing that did occur. It is unclear what use, if any, the OPP made of the materials provided by the CAS. Only Mr. Silmsers’s statement to the CAS is referenced in the Crown brief. Other items, including the minutes of the Project Blue meetings wherein the team laid out its reasons for the agency’s position that Father MacDonald presented a risk to children and male adolescents, could have been quite useful. While clearly not equivalent to reasonable and probable grounds, the factors and evidence used to justify the CAS position should have been of interest to the OPP.

On March 10, 1994, Detective Inspector Smith spoke to Acting Chief Johnston, who requested that he speak to Constable Shawn White and Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie and provide them with advice on an investigation they were conducting into sexual assault allegations. On March 22, 1994, Detective Inspector Smith met with these CPS officers and discussed Constable White's investigation into historical allegations of physical and sexual abuse at a local group home. Detective Inspector Smith provided the CPS officers with some advice on historical sexual abuse investigations and discussed some of the techniques the OPP had used when it investigated St. Joseph's Training School. Presumably, Detective Inspector Smith was providing this advice to the officers while at the same time investigating the CPS's handling of Mr. Silmsen's complaint. This raises questions of transparency and the appearance of conflict of interest.

According to Staff Sergeant Derochie, at this meeting the officers discussed whether Detective Inspector Smith's investigation might be expanded to include the allegations that the CPS was investigating. Detective Inspector Smith advised that he was investigating only David Silmsen's allegation of abuse. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he was not requested to become involved in the CPS investigation and that such a request would have to have been made to the Commissioner, not to him personally. I note that Acting Chief Johnston, in his January 31, 1994, letter to Deputy Commissioner Piers, did request that the OPP look into reports of abuse at a Cornwall group home. Detective Inspector Smith was provided with a copy of this letter, but he testified that he was not asked to investigate these allegations.

Interview of David Silmsen

Location of the Interview

Detective Inspector Smith took a statement from David Silmsen on February 22, 1994, in the presence of Detective Constable Fagan and Mr. Silmsen's lawyer, Bryce Geoffrey, at the OPP station in Kanata. Prior to Mr. Geoffrey arriving, Detective Inspector Smith observed that Mr. Silmsen was "quite antsy" and "very, very nervous." Detective Inspector Smith testified that he chose the location because it was equipped to videotape interviews, a feature he said was uncommon at the time. Moreover, the station was near Ottawa, where Mr. Geoffrey was located.

Unfortunately, at the time, the station had only "hard interrogation-type rooms" for the taking of videotaped statements, which, Detective Inspector Smith said, created a bad atmosphere for this type of interview. In hindsight and after learning of Mr. Silmsen's prior experience with police stations, Detective Inspector Smith testified that the location may have contributed to some of the difficulties during the interview and started it off on the wrong foot. He acknowledged that he would do things differently today:

Today if I was to interview Mr. Silmsen I would use a soft interview room, off site, I would speak to his lawyer and ask if he had had the chance to review all of the other statements prior and then proceed from there.

Preparation for the Interview

Before this interview with Detective Inspector Smith, Mr. Silmsen had already given at least five statements to various agencies. However, Detective Inspector Smith was in possession only of the written statement Mr. Silmsen had provided to the CPS. He testified that he believed he also had Constable Sebalj's notes. He may have been aware of some of the other statements at the time, such as the one given to the CAS, but he did not have copies of them.

Detective Inspector Smith failed to realize that this was about the sixth interview of Mr. Silmsen on the same subject matter. As a result, neither he nor Mr. Silmsen were as prepared as they could have been for this interview. Detective Inspector Smith did not recall having any discussion with Mr. Silmsen or his lawyer about the benefits of reviewing previous statements or what Mr. Silmsen might do to prepare for the interview. Detective Inspector Smith expected that Mr. Silmsen's lawyer would have prepared him. I note that this assumption presumed that his lawyer would have knowledge of and access to all of Mr. Silmsen's previous statements.

David Silmsen's Experience of the Interview

Mr. Silmsen testified that every time he gave a statement he had to relive the events, which was hard on him. He noted that the interview with Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan was particularly tough. In this interview, he talked about all three individuals who abused him, and he described it as the "broadest" interview he had had to date. He felt that Detective Inspector Smith "just pushed and pushed" and would not allow him to have a break. Mr. Silmsen testified that by the time of this interview he had been questioned so much his patience was low.

Detective Inspector Smith recalled a point in the interview when Mr. Silmsen left the room in an agitated state, and he agreed that Mr. Silmsen had some typical victim symptoms and reactions. The Detective Inspector said he was trying to get, as quickly as he could, what was needed from that statement, and he thought it was done as easily as possible. He testified that he felt this was his one and only opportunity. He did not want to take another statement because defence counsel would have a "heyday" with that, which would be even harder on the complainant.

Detective Inspector Smith's concern about multiple statements was warranted but perhaps late. By the time of his interview with Detective Inspector Smith, Mr. Silmsers had already provided at least five statements that could have provided material for defence counsel. In this regard, given Detective Inspector Smith's recognition of the dangers associated with victims providing multiple statements, it is difficult to understand why he did not advise Mr. Silmsers of the benefits of reviewing his other statements instead of relying solely on Mr. Silmsers's lawyer to do so.

Decision to Ask About Extortion and Not Caution

As noted above in the section "Investigation of David Silmsers for Extortion," Detective Inspector Smith had agreed with Detective Inspector Fred Hamelink to ask some questions of Mr. Silmsers relating to extortion. At the time of the interview, Mr. Silmsers was unaware that he was being investigated for extortion, and he did not know that Detective Inspector Hamelink was observing through one-way glass.

During the statement, Detective Inspector Smith discussed Mr. Silmsers's allegations against Ken Seguin. He asked if Mr. Silmsers had contacted Mr. Seguin in regard to a settlement. Detective Inspector Smith testified that nowhere in Mr. Silmsers's answers did he feel Mr. Silmsers was incriminating himself.

Detective Inspector Smith's notes indicate that some advice was sought from regional Crown Peter Griffiths regarding the need to caution Mr. Silmsers,²⁸ but Detective Inspector Smith could not recall if he received advice on the point. Still, he was confident that he could deal appropriately with the issue himself:

I'm experienced enough that if I'm interviewing somebody on a sexual assault, and I want to put a question to him somewhere of something else and they're going to get into it, then I would stop and caution and charter them and give them a secondary caution. And I wanted to avoid that at all costs when dealing with Mr. Silmsers as I did.

Detective Inspector Smith said he was "walking on eggshells" when he put questions to Mr. Silmsers about Mr. Seguin. Detective Inspector Smith was concerned that if Mr. Silmsers was approached as a suspect, they were "liable to lose everything."

28. Mr. Griffiths' views on this conversation are discussed in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Deterioration of Detective Inspector Tim Smith's Relationship With David Silmser

Unfortunately, the relationship between Detective Inspector Smith and Mr. Silmser deteriorated somewhat after the interview. The officer had further contacts with both Mr. Geoffrey and Mr. Silmser. However, in or around March 1994, Detective Inspector Smith advised Mr. Geoffrey that should he require anything further from Mr. Silmser, he would go through Mr. Geoffrey rather than “confront Silmser.”

Allegations Against Marcel Lalonde

In the course of the interview, Detective Inspector Smith asked Mr. Silmser about difficulties he had had with a schoolteacher. Detective Constable Ron Wilson of the OPP had told Detective Inspector Smith that Mr. Silmser made allegations against a teacher named Marcel Lalonde during his statement to the CAS on November 2, 1993. The CAS felt unable to act on the allegation because it was too vague.

In response to Detective Inspector Smith's questioning, Mr. Silmser disclosed that Mr. Lalonde was a grade 8 teacher at Bishop Macdonell School who had molested him at Mr. Lalonde's home. Mr. Silmser went on to provide more specifics of the alleged assaults and to confirm that Mr. Lalonde was his teacher at the time of the incident.

On March 22, 1994, there was a meeting between the OPP and CAS. According to Greg Bell's notes, they discussed why the CAS felt that it could not pursue the allegation against Mr. Lalonde without more details from Mr. Silmser. Detective Constable Chris McDonell said that Mr. Lalonde was still teaching at Sacred Heart. There is no indication in the notes that CAS was advised of the further details obtained by Detective Inspector Smith in his February 22, 1994, interview of Mr. Silmser.

On July 21, 1994, Detective Inspector Smith wrote to Acting CPS Chief Carl Johnston about the allegations against Mr. Lalonde. On a review of the evidence, it appears that this was the first time the information about Mr. Lalonde was referred to the CPS by either the OPP or the CAS. The letter sent to Acting Chief Johnston referred only to information in the CAS statement from Mr. Silmser, not to the additional information obtained by Detective Inspector Smith during Mr. Silmser's February 1994 statement.

Detective Inspector Smith, in his testimony, was shocked that he had delayed in referring the matter to the CPS and that he had missed providing both the CAS and the CPS with the information in his possession from Silmser's statement of February 22, 1994: “I'm being honest with you. It appears I missed it. I was unaware somehow or I've missed it, and it should have been reported.”

When asked about the importance of providing the CAS with the further information, Detective Inspector Smith responded, "If I had given that information there's no doubt in my mind that they would have acted on it."

I agree with Detective Inspector Smith that "there's no excuse" for not promptly sharing the information in his possession and appreciate his candour in acknowledging this oversight. As discussed in Chapter 6, the CPS concluded that it could not take further steps in part on the basis that it did not have any details that would allow it to pursue the matter further.

I am also concerned that the OPP referred Mr. Silmsen's complaint to the CPS rather than following up itself. I understand that allegations against Marcel Lalonde were not part of the mandate given to Detective Inspector Smith. However, referring the matter to CPS meant that Mr. Silmsen had to deal with two police agencies: one for the Father MacDonald complaint and another for Mr. Lalonde. This problem was compounded by the fact that Mr. Silmsen had already had a negative experience with the CPS following his original complaint against Father MacDonald.

Two years later, in fall 1996, the OPP did investigate Mr. Lalonde after receiving a further complaint of historical sexual abuse. The CPS conducted its own investigation of Mr. Lalonde in 1997 in relation to allegations by other complainants. Marcel Lalonde was charged by both agencies and eventually found guilty on a number of counts. However, none of the charges related to Mr. Silmsen's allegations. These two subsequent investigations are discussed in detail in Chapter 6 and later in this chapter.

Witness Statements Taken

The Crown brief of the re-investigation of Father Charles MacDonald lists twenty witnesses, in addition to Mr. Silmsen, from whom the OPP had statements. The majority of these individuals had been previously identified and interviewed by Constable Sebalj in the CPS investigation.

C-3 and C-56 each had made allegations against Father MacDonald during the CPS investigation. On February 16, 1994, Detective Constable Fagan spoke to C-3, who said he did not want to get involved in the OPP investigation. C-3 did advise Detective Constable Fagan of communications that he had recently had with Bishop Eugène LaRocque about his allegations. Detective Constable Fagan asked C-3 for a copy of his letter to the Bishop, but there is no indication he requested a copy of the Bishop's response. In my view, this should have been done. Detective Inspector Smith's team had no further contact with C-3 in the course of this investigation. Detective Inspector Smith acknowledged that C-3 was a potentially important witness but did not feel that the OPP ought to have taken further steps to try to encourage his cooperation. He stated:

We've banged on doors and we've written letters and we've done other things with others that were reluctant, good witnesses we could have had, and they've told us, "Leave me alone. Stay away from me. I've put that behind me." And if you leave them alone after a while and they see some things happen slowly after they'll come back; "Well, here's the phone number. Give us a call."

...

But if you hound them, sir, you reopen wounds and they'll disassociate themselves from it ... it's a balancing act, sir. You walk on eggshells when you deal with these reluctant victims. Sometimes you can get them; sometimes you can't.

C-56 was also re-contacted by the OPP in 1994. He provided a statement to Detective Constable Fagan on March 19, 1994, regarding the same incident he had described to Constable Sebalj, an allegation of uninvited sexual contact. There is nothing in the statement to indicate that C-56 did not want to participate in the investigation.

Two other witnesses who had not been identified in the CPS investigation, C-88 and C-89, gave statements to the OPP about their interactions with Father MacDonald. Detective Inspector Smith learned of C-88 during the initial meeting between his team and the CPS on February 7, 1994. Staff Sergeant Brunet advised Detective Inspector Smith of the telephone call that the CPS had received from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police referring an alleged victim, C-88. Detective Constables Fagan and McDonell travelled to New Brunswick to take a statement from C-88 on March 27, 1994. C-88 in his statement referred to an alleged incident that occurred in his young adulthood when he was subject to an unwanted sexual advance by Father MacDonald.

On April 5, 1994, Detective Constable Fagan took a statement from C-89, who described an alleged sexual incident that occurred between himself as a young man and Father MacDonald.

Detective Inspector Smith's team also had information that Monsignor Donald McDougald had told the CAS that in the fall of 1991 an anonymous person called the Diocesan Centre and claimed that Father MacDonald had committed an impropriety of a sexual nature.

Detective Inspector Smith was of the view that they had located at least four or five other possible alleged victims in addition to David Silmser. In reference to C-88 and C-89, Detective Inspector Smith stated, "They were persons of interest to send to the Regional Director for recommendations, whether they were going to be used as similar fact or whether they were going to be victims."

Detective Inspector Smith later pointed out concerns in using these other allegations as support for the allegations made by Mr. Silmsers, given the ages of the individuals and the nature of the allegations.

Interview of Father Charles MacDonald

On June 7, 1994, Detective Constable Fagan conducted an interview of Father MacDonald in the presence of Detective Constable Norman Hurtubise and Father MacDonald's lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald. Detective Inspector Smith testified that it had been his intention to be present for the interview but he was out of town at the time. He did not consider rescheduling the interview because he had been attempting to arrange it for some time and was anxious to get it done.

Detective Inspector Smith agreed it was an important interview and it had been his intention to be at important interviews; however, he felt that Detective Constable Fagan was fully capable of conducting this interview based on his experience working with him in the St. Joseph's Training School investigation in Alfred.

Detective Inspector Smith did not write out all the questions for Detective Constable Fagan but did fax him a list of some questions to address. He believed that he also reviewed some of the background facts with Detective Constable Fagan prior to the interview.

In reviewing the statement taken by Detective Constable Fagan, a number of weaknesses are evident. Many of these were acknowledged by Detective Inspector Smith in his testimony.

Father MacDonald had his lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, present at the interview and according to Detective Inspector Smith, Mr. MacDonald did "all the talking." Detective Inspector Smith testified that had he been there "the interview would have been conducted differently ... Malcolm MacDonald wouldn't control it." With or without a lawyer present, and even in the face of an outright denial by the suspect, important information could be gleaned from an interview. As Detective Inspector Smith testified:

I tried to conduct interviews of a number of religious people in the past and basically all I got from them was denial and self-serving statements. But what we did get mostly was that there was a knowledge between themselves and the victim which I was—that helped—that assisted.

Accordingly, Detective Inspector Smith would have asked about the relationship between Father MacDonald and Mr. Silmsers.

Unfortunately, Detective Constable Fagan failed to explore this important area. He did not ask about how well Father MacDonald knew Mr. Silmsers or about his relationship with altar boys generally. Detective Constable Fagan did not confirm the dates that Father MacDonald was assigned to particular parishes or confirm the roles he had in relation to young people. He also neglected to ask whether Father MacDonald had knowledge of parish records that would help clarify dates and events.

Among the various statements given by Mr. Silmsen and his family members up to this point, there were some discrepancies and uncertainties about the date that Mr. Silmsen first became an altar boy and the year of the retreat where Mr. Silmsen alleged he was assaulted. Some of these uncertainties could, and in my view should, have been investigated and potentially resolved by the OPP before the interview with Father MacDonald by reviewing school records, property records, and, of course, parish records. Detective Inspector Smith thought that an attempt was made to clarify those dates. However, it appears that in the interview, Detective Constable Fagan relied solely on the information provided by Mr. Silmsen in the February 22, 1994, interview. These dates are inconsistent with his earlier statements and were later proved incorrect.

Detective Inspector Smith agreed that in historical sexual abuse situations, it is useful for an investigator to accurately nail down as best as possible the dates in question. I agree and note that given the difficulties of memory over time, having independent records to verify recollection is of assistance to both the complainant and the alleged perpetrator who is responding to the allegations.

Detective Inspector Smith noted that this was the first time that he had done a non-institutional historical sexual abuse case:

Now, when I had an institution, sir, I had records—unbelievably—and I could—I had no difficulty on that.

You've brought to my attention now some of the things that we missed or maybe we should have thought about, and I agree with you.

While access to records is certainly made easier during an institutional investigation, nothing prevented Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan from attempting to obtain records during their re-investigation of Father MacDonald.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that Mr. Silmsen and his lawyer had said they would provide him with school records that were never forthcoming. Because of the importance of this evidence, I find that the OPP should have taken steps to obtain these records rather than relying on Mr. Silmsen.

The interview with Father MacDonald had other shortcomings. Detective Constable Fagan raised and then, inexplicably, did not follow up on Father MacDonald's involvement with C-3 and C-56. The entirety of the exchange he had with Father MacDonald on both was as follows:

M. Fagan: No I'm jus I'm ... are you familiar with a person by the name of [C-3]

C. MacDonald: Yes he was ... in the Parish when I was there um (pause)

M. Fagan: Are you familiar with a person by the name of [C-56]?

C. MacDonald: He was also a member of the Parish (inaudible) years [C-56] yes

Detective Inspector Smith testified that he would have explored Father MacDonald's relationship with these two individuals further. In addition, there were no questions about C-88, C-89, or the unidentified individual who had called the Diocesan Centre in 1991 with allegations against Father MacDonald. Again, Detective Inspector Smith agreed questions in this area might have been helpful.

The interview also could have further explored Father MacDonald's knowledge of the circumstances of the illegal settlement with Mr. Silmsr. Detective Inspector Smith notes that while questions could have been asked on this area, his understanding was that Father MacDonald "had little if anything to do with the settlement other than being—I think contributing some money." Given that the settlement came into existence only because of allegations made against Father MacDonald and that he was the direct beneficiary of the settlement, in my view, it would have been worthwhile to question him at least on his involvement and what he knew of the involvement of others.

As it happens, both Malcolm MacDonald and Father MacDonald raised the illegal settlement in response to Detective Constable Fagan asking why Mr. Silmsr would make these allegations. Father MacDonald stated that he believed Mr. Silmsr's motivation was money:

... with the telephone calls the screaming and the cursing and the drunken behaviour that he exhibited over these past ... eighteen months not to me but to different people it was evident he was after money ...

He went on to state:

... the columnist Claude McIntosh I think explained it very very well in um the article in the Free Holder [sic] some months ago about why if one would do that sometimes people in high profile positions panic at the thought of there [sic] name being publicly connected to a crime especial especially sexual assault rather than go through the agony of proving their innocence and enduring the stigma they are willing to buy the accusers silence (pause) I couldn't say it better myself I didn't like it go it goes against my principle to pay money on the other hand I had an excellent reputation and name in the diocese ...

Malcolm MacDonald similarly commented:

... I told the Bishop when he talked to then I said you know you even in a drunken state I could have defended this case from the charges from the way we knew what we had in front of us anyway ... the allegations cause were so I wouldn't give a cent an then I found out that they were gonna divvy up the money I said do what you want with it save the embarrassment the only reason

It is apparent from these answers that Father MacDonald had some knowledge of the interactions between Mr. Silmsen and others leading up to the settlement. No questions were put to Father MacDonald about his conversations with the Bishop or the Bishop's delegate. In fact, no follow-up questions to the comments about the settlement were put to Father MacDonald.

Detective Inspector Smith indicated that he probably would have reviewed the statement taken by Detective Constable Fagan within two weeks of June 7, 1994. Detective Inspector Smith was not sure whether or not he noted any deficiencies in the statement when he did review it, but he was clear that he was not going to do a second interview of Father MacDonald.

This is an interview that Detective Inspector Smith ought to have done himself. In his testimony, he took responsibility for the deficiencies in the statement and stated that he could have assigned a better interviewer to the case.

Preparation of Crown Brief

Detective Inspector Smith was contacted by Peter Griffiths on October 11, 1994, and asked to finish his three investigations soon because they were "dragging." Soon afterward, Detective Inspector Smith learned that Detective Inspector Hamelink had already submitted his brief in the extortion matter.

The Crown brief was finalized over the next month. Detective Inspector Smith stated he would have reviewed all of the statements. He did not know if he reviewed the final brief completely but he would have reviewed a rough version and directed Detective Constable Fagan to put it together and deliver it.

Detective Inspector Tim Smith's Views on Reasonable and Probable Grounds

With respect to reasonable and probable grounds, the brief's synopsis concluded:

Because of SILMSER's credibility, and selective memory, the investigators find it difficult to obtain the necessary reasonable grounds to believe these offences took place as indicated.

However there still remains strong suspicion that SILMSER was sexually assaulted in some manner by Father Charles MacDONALD.

Part of this suspicion would be supported by the Church providing a monetary settlement to SILMSER, without the necessity of a court hearing.

Should, on a review of all the evidence, by the prosecutors, indicate the investigators have misinterpreted the evidence obtained, and there exists probable grounds, charges may still be preferred.

In his testimony, Detective Inspector Smith made it clear that he formed the opinion early on that Silmsr was a victim of sexual abuse:

... I'll go back to Silmsr, and I'll tell you, I believed him, and I'll tell you why.

Within the statement and early in the statement, he mentioned that he went to the Archdiocese or the Diocese seeking an apology and a letter. And he stated that, "All I want is a letter of apology so I can show it to my mother, to show her that I'm not all that bad; that there were things that happened in my life to cause me to be the way I am."

And I can show you 100 other statements that we took in St. John's, in St. Joe's that were the same. These guys, all they wanted was recognition that it happened, an apology, and show it to their parents or loved ones and got on with life.

So when I saw that out of Dave Silmsr, no doubt in my mind, he was a victim.

Detective Inspector Smith later testified that while he believed that Mr. Silmsr had been sexually assaulted, he did not know who had done it and had difficulties with the “when and where.”

However, when questioned about the conclusion in the synopsis, Detective Inspector Smith stated his decision on reasonable and probable grounds was “very, very close.” He testified that he had no difficulty believing Mr. Silmsr regarding his allegations about events in the sacristy in the church and the events at the retreat, although he was not able to find corroboration of the events at the retreat. Detective Inspector Smith did “have difficulty” with the allegation regarding the assault during the car ride because it was quite different from the other complaints and because the violent nature of the assault seemed to him to be out of character for Father MacDonald. Of course, it would have been open to Detective Inspector Smith to lay charges on the first two allegations but not the third.

It seems his view on laying charges was influenced by his experience with the difficulties of succeeding in a historical sexual abuse prosecution where there is only one complainant. It was Detective Inspector Smith’s preference to wait for more victims to come forward who would strengthen the case. He stated:

... I could have laid the charges, but I’ll tell you that, from my experience, a Crown attorney would have no reasonable prospect of conviction and he wouldn’t proceed. And once that’s done, then I could never revisit it.

I am of the view that in making his decision about reasonable and probable grounds, Detective Inspector Smith was overly concerned with the probability of conviction. Crown counsel, not the police, is responsible for deciding whether a reasonable prospect for conviction exists in a particular case. Detective Inspector Smith was entitled to lay charges where he believed on reasonable grounds that an offence had been committed. If he felt more evidence was needed to bolster the prospect of conviction he should have taken further investigative steps.

I also note that Detective Inspector Smith’s comment that he could “never revisit” charges after a Crown decided not to proceed is incorrect. While it is not particularly common, Crown counsel may stay the prosecution of a charge for up to a year to allow the police to continue their investigations.²⁹ Charges withdrawn because the Crown determines there is no reasonable prospect of conviction may also be re-laid where new evidence comes to light. I accept that these could, however, lead to other possible Charter applications.

29. Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 579.

On December 21, 1994, Detective Inspector Smith received a letter from Mr. Griffiths advising that reasonable and probable grounds did not exist to lay charges in respect of any of the four incidents alleged by Mr. Silmsler. Mr. Griffiths' views and his communications with Detective Inspector Smith on this matter are set out in detail in Chapter 11.

David Silmsler As a Complainant

In the synopsis, Detective Inspector Smith described Mr. Silmsler as a "most difficult victim to deal with." In his testimony, the officer stated, "Silmsler, I can tell you was, of all the victims that I have ever investigated, is the most troubled individual I'd ever had as a victim." I note that Detective Inspector Smith also agreed that much of Mr. Silmsler's behaviour was consistent with that of victims of sexual assault whom the officer had encountered in prior investigations.

Mr. Silmsler's behaviour during the investigation also appears consistent with the expert evidence I heard regarding adult survivors of historical sexual abuse. Dr. Peter Jaffe testified:

Survivors aren't always friendly, cooperative people; survivors are angry, distrustful, suspicious of any professional, even their own lawyer. When you're talking about being violated in childhood, you know, in a trust relationship, you remain vigilant about every relationship, and many survivors are angry, suspicious, distrustful. They use alcohol and drugs to medicate themselves and deal with the pain.

Dr. Jaffe emphasized the importance of those in the justice system—lawyers, judges, and police officers—understanding the potential long-term effects of abuse. While not wishing to stereotype all victims, he noted, "Survivors are not polite, friendly, cooperative sometimes ... They make it very difficult."

In my view, Detective Inspector Smith did have this understanding. He testified, again in relation to his investigation in Alfred, that some of the victims he encountered did not trust the police and generally had difficulties dealing with people in positions of authority.

Detective Inspector Smith also testified that he was not concerned by Mr. Silmsler's past experience with the police:

[Silmsler's] record was, he was an angel compared to some of the ones that we'd—we were dealing with murderers and rapists and robbers and everybody, and [Silmsler's] criminal record was—I don't know if I can say it here and that, but it was really insignificant.

Given his appreciation of the difficulties involved with victims of historical sexual abuse, I find several of the comments in the Crown brief synopsis troublesome.

For instance, Detective Inspector Smith pointed to Mr. Silmsner's selective memory, particularly in regard to the alleged rape, as one problem. However, in his earlier testimony, Detective Inspector Smith gave evidence about his experience in Alfred and noted that victims were "selective" in describing details of abuse and particularly reluctant to disclose offences of penetration. The expert evidence heard during this Inquiry confirmed that the disclosure of abuse is often incremental in cases of historical sexual assault.

Detective Inspector Smith also noted in the synopsis:

SILMSNER's recent request following news releases that he still wishes charges laid despite receiving a monetary settlement is suspect.

He is presently pursuing a civil action against the Cornwall Police Service, relating to the release of his statement to the press, and the findings of this investigation can only enhance his position in that endeavour.

I disagree with Detective Inspector Smith's assertion that the findings of his re-investigation of Father MacDonald would affect the determination of civil liability for the unauthorized release of a victim's statement to the press.

In any case, Detective Inspector Smith expanded on his use of the word "suspect" during his testimony before me:

I questioned his sincerity. You know, okay, he wants to proceed with charges now at this point and then also that he wouldn't speak to me without a lawyer being present—that further back—and that all of a sudden I had a feeling that we're being used for—to pursue his civil suit now that the—he's got his $32,000.

Earlier, however, Detective Inspector Smith stated that he was very familiar with concurrent civil and criminal proceedings as those had happened all through the St. Joseph's and St. John's training school investigations. Detective Inspector Smith testified that the fact that a victim was seeking a civil settlement did not affect his view of the credibility of that victim.

Problems With the Investigation

Having reviewed the evidence, I find that the OPP failed to take proper investigative steps and employ proper techniques in the 1994 re-investigation of Father Charles MacDonald. In addition, I find that Detective Inspector Smith failed to sufficiently supervise Detective Constable Fagan to ensure that interviews were properly conducted.

As set out above, there were significant flaws in the preparation and execution of the key interviews of David Silmsen and Father MacDonald. Also, insufficient investigative steps were taken to obtain independent records verifying important dates and to identify and follow up with further victims.

Although Detective Inspector Smith had experience investigating historical sexual abuse in an institutional setting, he had no experience with non-institutional cases, which he acknowledged were more difficult. While such investigations are now part of the OPP's major case management plan, given the particular complexities and sensitivities that arise in historical sexual abuse cases, I recommend that case managers consult with the Regional or Detachment Sexual Abuse Coordinator early in the planning phases of such investigations and include these experts as part of the investigative team.

Obstruction and Conspiracy Investigations

In addition to the re-investigation of Father Charles MacDonald, Detective Inspector Tim Smith also investigated two related issues in February 1994: the alleged conspiracy between the Cornwall Police Service and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall to effect a civil settlement that terminated the CPS investigation of David Silmsen's sexual assault allegations; and the alleged obstruction of justice by lawyers who brought about that civil settlement in consultation with the local Crown attorney.

Meeting With CPS Chief Claude Shaver

It was clear that the Diocese had been involved in effecting the civil settlement with Mr. Silmsen. Therefore, with respect to this conspiracy investigation, the question for Detective Inspector Smith was whether the Cornwall Police Service had conspired with it in deciding not to pursue criminal charges against Father MacDonald.

Detective Inspector Smith's theory was that if there was a conspiracy involving the Cornwall police, Chief Claude Shaver had to be involved:

The common denominator in the whole issue of the charges not proceeding and the settlement coming about and the catalyst for everything was Malcolm MacDonald.

So for that theory to work, Malcolm had contacted the Bishop, he had contact with Jacques Leduc, he had contact with Luc Brunet and he had contact with Murray MacDonald. But for the whole thing to work there had to be the okay of the Chief. Luc Brunet couldn't make that decision, nor could Constable Heidi Sebalj, nor could anybody else in that department because the Chief was the one that assigned and nobody in there could bypass the Chief to make that theory work.

I question Detective Inspector Smith's starting premise that Chief Shaver had to be complicit in any conspiracy involving the CPS. Police officers do not need to inform their chief when they decide whether or not they have formed reasonable and probable grounds for a charge. Moreover, it is unclear to me why Detective Inspector Smith believed that the CPS officers could not have acted without the approval and knowledge of their chief. Other than the initial assignment of the investigating officer, Chief Shaver had had very limited involvement in the investigation of Father MacDonald.

Prior to meeting with the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) officers, Chief Shaver sent Detective Constable Fagan a seven-page statement summarizing the case, which he had prepared for his lawyer.

On the afternoon of July 13, 1994, Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan met with Chief Shaver for two hours at his home. This was the only time that Detective Inspector Smith spoke with Chief Shaver. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he remembered that meeting "very vividly." He and Detective Constable Fagan met and reviewed Chief Shaver's statement just before the interview.

Detective Inspector Smith described Chief Shaver as "a hard interview"—an individual who is very dynamic and who takes over a conversation. Aside from some additional information Chief Shaver conveyed about his career and his teaching profession, Detective Inspector Smith did not see anything in what Chief Shaver told him that was glaringly different from the statement he had provided.

Detective Inspector Smith did not take notes during the interview, at Chief Shaver's request. He made very few notes after the interview. It is my view that Detective Inspector Smith should have taken notes during the interview, or failing that, he should have made detailed notes about the discussion afterwards.

Admission by Father Charles Macdonald to Bishop Eugène LaRocque

In his statement, Chief Shaver wrote that Bishop Eugène LaRocque had advised him that Father MacDonald had made an admission in October 1993. The statement reads, "The Bishop contacted me later and advised that the Priest had admitted the assault and that it was an isolated incident and he was prepared to leave for the treatment / assessment Center immediately."

In his testimony, Detective Inspector Smith recalled that Chief Shaver did not have notes of the conversation, but confirmed that the Bishop said that Father MacDonald admitted the assault.

Chief Shaver, in his testimony before me, said that the statement was incomplete. The Bishop at first said that Father MacDonald admitted the assault but then immediately corrected himself and said that Father MacDonald had admitted to an isolated homosexual relationship (see Chapter 6, “Institutional Response of the Cornwall Community Police Service”).

That said, it was clearly Detective Inspector Smith’s understanding at the time that Chief Shaver had been told by the Bishop that Father MacDonald admitted sexually assaulting David Silmsr. During this Inquiry, Detective Inspector Smith was asked if it seemed reasonable to him to have an agreement to have a priest removed from the parish if he admitted to an alleged assault. Detective Inspector Smith said:

In the absence of anything else that was being done, and I guess the Chief—I know that he hasn’t got very much investigative background, criminally anyway—that this was probably the best-case scenario he could make since the case had been closed on him. The allegation dates—only one allegation dates back to the seventies, which would be 20-some odd years prior, and this priest would be taking treatment. That seems reasonable to me at that—you know, at that juncture.

In my view, Detective Inspector Smith should have considered the impact of what Chief Shaver and the Bishop had decided. The agreement to remove Father MacDonald from the parish could have been explored in more detail to see if it was also an attempt to obstruct justice, given that with Father MacDonald’s apparent admission, Chief Shaver might have been able to re-open the investigation into Father MacDonald, even without the cooperation of Mr. Silmsr.

Source of Settlement Funds

Another area of interest identified by Detective Inspector Smith in his testimony was Chief Shaver’s information regarding the settlement funds. In his statement, Chief Shaver stated that the Bishop had advised him that of the $32,000 paid to David Silmsr, the Diocese had contributed $10,000, Father MacDonald had contributed $10,000, and another $12,000 came from an unnamed source. Detective Inspector Smith testified that this was of interest to him because he had a feeling that the unnamed source was Malcolm MacDonald.

Despite this interest, Detective Inspector Smith said the question of who paid the money was not really an issue for him in his investigations of the alleged conspiracy or obstruction of justice.

In my view, the source of the funds was potentially important evidence and given that Detective Inspector Smith was tasked with investigating the circumstances of the illegal settlement, I am surprised that he did not make more effort to confirm this information. There is no indication that the payments were made illicitly, and so presumably the amounts and payers could have been traced through financial records. The source of the funds might have helped identify co-conspirators. Yet it appears that Detective Inspector Smith did not make any effort to obtain these records either by requesting them or seeking search warrants.

Quality of the CPS Investigation

According to Detective Inspector Smith, during the interview, Chief Shaver readily admitted that the Cornwall Police Service's investigation of David Silmser's complaint was poor. But Detective Inspector Smith testified that this admission did not make it a conspiracy.

Detective Inspector Smith agreed that it was troubling that the Children's Aid Society (CAS) and the probation office were not notified by CPS of the allegations in the course of the investigation. However, the level of secrecy surrounding the CPS's file on David Silmser's complaint did not raise his suspicions. As discussed in Chapter 6, very limited information about the matter was initially entered on the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) system, nor was anything further entered during the active investigation. After the decision was made to close the investigation, when Chief Shaver discovered the investigation had not been documented, he ordered Constable Sebalj to enter it as a project file, which was only accessible to a limited number of people. According to Detective Inspector Smith, it was not unusual to keep high-profile investigations "under wraps" in the early stages.

No Interviews With Other CPS Officers

As noted above, Detective Inspector Smith believed that none of the other officers involved in the David Silmser complaint could have conspired with the Diocese without the Chief being involved, and he was convinced that the Chief would not have conspired with the Bishop because, he said, "When I spoke to the Chief it was abundantly clear that he and the Bishop did not get along at all and really would not agree to anything."

Accordingly, Detective Inspector Smith testified that he did not feel it was necessary to pursue any further investigation of Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet or any other senior CPS staff. In early 1994, prior to his meeting with Chief Shaver, Detective Inspector Smith had spoken informally with Constable Sebalj and Staff Sergeant Brunet. Staff Sergeant Brunet provided a statement to Detective Inspector Hamelink's team that was shared with Detective Inspector Smith, and Constable Sebalj provided a brief statement to Detective Constable Fagan relating to her contacts with Murray MacDonald. Detective Inspector Smith did not feel the need to interview these officers to take formal statements. He also chose not to speak with other officers who were involved in the David Silmsers complaint, such as Sergeant Steve Nakic, Staff Inspector Stuart McDonald, Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis, Sergeant Claude Lortie, Sergeant Ron Lefebvre, or Constable Kevin Malloy.

Another reason Detective Inspector Smith gave for not interviewing officers was “fear of reprisal.” Yet he also testified that he did not have any concerns that the disciplinary proceedings against Constable Perry Dunlop might make officers less willing to come forward.

Finally, Detective Inspector Smith testified that in his experience, officers would come forward if they had information:

One reason—another reason is that they wouldn’t tell us anything, but if we were around, we used to get notes slipped under our door or back at your hotel room or you would get some indication as to what was going on and where to look. In this case—and we waited quite a period of time and the police department knew what we were there for—we didn’t get one, what we call a kite or a note or a telephone call or anything dropped off, an envelope, from anybody regarding this.

Detective Inspector Smith was of the view that when investigating a police force you either interview everyone on the police force or no one.

Detective Inspector Smith did state that in hindsight it would probably have been beneficial to get statements from more officers. I agree and find his justifications for not interviewing CPS officers less than satisfying. I am unconvinced that officers who may have been involved in a conspiracy would have come forward on their own. Moreover, several of the officers had already been interviewed during the investigation by the Ottawa Police Service as set out in Chapter 6.

No Interview of Constable Perry Dunlop

Detective Inspector Smith also chose not to interview Constable Perry Dunlop. He was aware of Constable Dunlop’s involvement in releasing Mr. Silmsers statement to the CAS but was of the view that he had no other relevant information:

He’s the one that made the allegations against the police force. He wanted the matter investigated. We investigated. What other information did he have at that point other than what I already had? And that was that he disclosed the statement to the CAS and that was it.

Detective Inspector Smith also said that he was concerned because Constable Dunlop was on sick leave and could have claimed that an interview would exacerbate his stress.

Given the allegations of cover-up that Constable Dunlop made against the CPS, it would have been prudent to interview him to determine what, if any, information he had to justify those claims. Detective Inspector Smith should not have decided, without even attempting to speak to Constable Dunlop, that he had no information to offer.

Investigation of the Crown's Involvement

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan took a statement from Murray MacDonald on July 14, 1994. Detective Inspector Smith knew Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald before this investigation. They had worked together on a homicide case and on some of the Alfred training school prosecutions.

Detective Inspector Smith did not think that his professional relationship with Mr. MacDonald created a conflict of interest, but he agreed there could have been a perception of conflict. Given the publicity surrounding these allegations and the widespread controversy in the community over them, Detective Inspector Smith should have been more alert to the possibility of a perceived, if not actual, conflict of interest in investigating Mr. MacDonald. He should have put his mind to this issue before embarking on the investigation.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that he considered Mr. MacDonald a suspect but he did not caution him. Mr. MacDonald, in his testimony, stated that he was told he was a “person of interest” with respect to the investigation. The tone of the interview, however, suggests that Detective Inspector Smith was not seriously looking at Mr. MacDonald as part of a conspiracy or obstruction of justice. Detective Inspector Smith did not challenge him on his answers and at one point seemed to be prompting him to say that he recognized that it was not unusual to have a civil settlement in the course of a criminal prosecution.

Murray MacDonald testified that he had never seen a copy of the settlement document before Detective Inspector Smith showed it to him in the interview. He also stated that he was not aware that it contained a bar on criminal proceedings. It is unclear from the statement, but presumably he meant that he was not aware of a bar on criminal proceedings when he was asked to give an opinion in 1993; it would be surprising if he were not aware of it at the time of the interview, given the widespread publicity surrounding the incident in January 1994. Detective Inspector Smith evidently believed Mr. MacDonald on this point because he testified that if Mr. MacDonald had seen the settlement documents at the time, there would have been a big difference in what transpired.

Investigation Into the Diocese

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan interviewed at least five Diocesan officials. Detective Inspector Smith also had a meeting with Doug and Nancy Seguin that touched on the involvement of the Diocese in the illegal settlement.

Information From Nancy and Doug Seguin

On March 2, 1994, Nancy Seguin called Detective Inspector Smith at the suggestion of Detective Inspector Hamelink, who thought she might want to speak with Detective Inspector Smith “regarding the settlement.” Detective Inspector Smith met with Nancy and Doug Seguin at their home on March 8, 1994, for just over three hours and discussed, among other things, a meeting she had with Bishop LaRocque on January 10, 1994. Detective Inspector Smith took notes but did not take a statement.

Ms Seguin told Detective Inspector Smith that the Bishop had admitted to her that in return for the settlement monies, David Silmser was to “stay quiet” and “not bring charges against Father Charles.” Detective Inspector Smith asterisked that portion of his notes because he intended to bring it to the Bishop’s attention when they spoke. These comments were significant because, if accurate, they would indicate that the Bishop knew, no later than January 10, 1994, that the purpose of the settlement was to terminate criminal proceedings. Ms Seguin also recalled that the Bishop told her he was against the settlement but that the canon lawyer had made the decision.

Interview of Jacques Leduc

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan took a statement from the Diocese’s lawyer, Jacques Leduc, on August 2, 1994. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he did not caution Mr. Leduc because Mr. Leduc’s signature was not on the final settlement document. I note that Detective Inspector Smith did caution the Bishop, whose name also was not on the documents and whose instructions would have been carried out by Mr. Leduc. Detective Inspector Smith suggested the difference may have been that he had different information by the time he interviewed the Bishop one month later. He did not, however, elaborate on what information that might be.

It is evident that when he interviewed Mr. Leduc, Detective Inspector Smith already believed that Malcolm MacDonald was the prime target and, in his words, that Jacques Leduc would “be a better witness than an accused.” Detective Inspector Smith also testified, “I was satisfied at this point, pretty well in my own mind, that Malcolm MacDonald had drafted that document.”

Detective Inspector Smith's views in this regard seemed to be largely based on his opinion that Mr. Leduc was not a criminal lawyer and therefore would not have known enough about criminal law to insert the illegal clause in the settlement document. This conclusion was based on an assumption by Detective Inspective Smith. He did not investigate Mr. Leduc's knowledge of criminal law by asking Malcolm MacDonald or others about Mr. Leduc's experience.

In addition, I note that the drafting of civil settlements, including the inclusion of non-disclosure clauses, was probably more familiar to a civil lawyer like Jacques Leduc than to a criminal lawyer like Malcolm MacDonald. In fact, Mr. Leduc testified at this Inquiry that in 1992 he had helped an alleged victim of sexual abuse obtain a civil settlement from a diocese in Quebec. Further, Mr. Leduc's answers during the interview clearly indicate that he did know that the parties could not seek to end criminal proceedings through a civil settlement and that he was involved in the drafting process.

In regard to the reference to "criminal proceedings" in the settlement document, Mr. Leduc testified, "there is no doubt in my mind ... that, then and now, that ... the ... release was not to refer to any criminal proceedings whatsoever."

In his interview, Mr. Leduc told Detective Inspector Smith that both he and Malcolm MacDonald believed the matter was purely civil and did not involve criminal matters. Mr. Leduc went on to say that had he caught the inclusion of the reference to criminal proceedings, he would have asked Mr. MacDonald to remove it. In his testimony, Detective Inspector Smith agreed that he had some "preconceived notions" about the settlement agreement based on the legal background of the lawyers involved. In my view, these notions should have been revisited, particularly given the different information that was provided by Mr. Leduc in his interview.

Mr. Leduc told Detective Inspector Smith that he prepared a draft "Release and Undertaking Not to Disclose" and faxed it to Mr. MacDonald, who was having some difficulties because he had never prepared this type of document. After a break in the taped interview, Mr. Leduc clarified his description of the drafting process:

... I prepared a draft, which I faxed to Malcolm MacDONALD. We had a telephone conversation ... about the ... the draft, and ... Malcolm ... fine tuned it, and he may have ... sent it back to me, I'm not sure whether he did or not, but I suspect he did, and I would have made some corrections, particularly to the way in which the Bishop was described, and the way in which I believe the Episcopal Corporation was ... described. So I would have at that time, had an opportunity of ... looking at the document that was presented to me by Malcolm. ... I have no reason to believe that ... that document ... that I looked at in draft is not one and the same document that was signed ... but I don't know that for a fact. ... also I can indicate to you that ... the word criminal in paragraph two of the document, could have been there at the time, and ... I certainly did not catch it ...

It is apparent from this description that Mr. Leduc was involved in the drafting process and that a paper trail of draft versions of the document at the centre of the investigation probably existed. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he did not think it was important to examine the faxes going back and forth between the lawyers nor any notes the lawyers may have made during this time period. I disagree. In my view, reviewing the drafts exchanged between the lawyers could have been of great assistance in determining who had inserted and who had reviewed the illegal clause.

Mr. Leduc's own statements indicate that he did know that a settlement could not legally terminate criminal proceedings and that he was aware of the issue. Nevertheless, Detective Inspector Smith conducted the interview as though Mr. Leduc was a witness rather than a potential suspect. The recorded portion of the interview was only twelve minutes long. There was a twenty-six-minute gap in the middle of the interview that was not part of the recorded statement. Unfortunately, Detective Inspector Smith again took no notes of this discussion. During the interview, Detective Inspector Smith simply asked what happened and allowed Mr. Leduc to tell his story. Detective Inspector Smith did not challenge Mr. Leduc's version of the events; he did not ask Mr. Leduc follow-up questions about the drafting of the release; he did not confront him with the information provided by Nancy Seguin; nor did he ask why the Diocese was willing to pay thousands of dollars without a lawsuit underway or any formal threat of legal action.

It is not within my mandate, and I do not wish, to make any finding as to whether Mr. Leduc inserted the illegal clause in the settlement agreement with David Silmsen. It is clear to me, however, that Detective Inspector Smith did not sufficiently probe Mr. Leduc's involvement. He was not assertive in the interview with Mr. Leduc, did not attempt to obtain search warrants for Mr. Leduc's files relating to this matter, and failed to interview any of Mr. Leduc's staff. Further investigation might have uncovered important information. Further preparation and consultation with others who had investigated lawyers would probably have been helpful.

Interview of Bishop Eugène LaRocque

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan interviewed Bishop LaRocque on September 12, 1994, for one hour and fifteen minutes. The first part of the interview dealt with the background of David Silmsen's complaint. The Bishop was then cautioned and questioned about the settlement document.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that he spent a fair bit of time preparing for this interview. He reviewed statements, notes, and the Diocesan protocol. Having reviewed the transcript, I consider this interview to have been considerably more thorough than the one he conducted with Mr. Leduc.

During the interview, Detective Inspector Smith questioned the Bishop on a number of topics. He asked the Bishop about the alleged admission made by Father MacDonald and reported to Chief Shaver. The Bishop stated that Father MacDonald never admitted to any sexual contact with young people. Detective Inspector Smith also put to the Bishop the comments made by Nancy Seguin. The Bishop denied telling her that he paid the money to keep Mr. Silmsr from continuing with the criminal charges. Similarly, when Detective Inspector Smith questioned the Bishop about inconsistencies between his version of the events leading up to the settlement and those of Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc, the Bishop maintained that he had been convinced by the lawyers to enter the settlement and would not have agreed had he known about the illegal clause.

After testifying about these inconsistencies, Detective Inspector Smith was asked if he found it suspicious that the Bishop had met with Chief Shaver, met with officials from the Children's Aid Society, and then held a press conference, all to discuss aspects of the settlement, yet without unsealing the settlement documents to confirm what it said. He answered, "It's easy to be suspicious about everything, but—but people make honest mistakes." Detective Inspector Smith testified that generally he found the Bishop to be truthful and forthright. He then acknowledged in his testimony that "not opening the very documents in question is something that would cause some suspicion." After reviewing the investigation documents and listening to his testimony, Detective Inspector Smith's suspicions appear to have been much more pronounced when he testified then during his investigation.

Interviews of Other Diocesan Officials

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan interviewed Mr. Gordon Bryan, the Bursar of the Diocese, on September 13, 1994, and obtained the envelope containing the original settlement documents. The officers also took an eight-minute taped statement. In the interview, Detective Inspector Smith asked questions regarding the cheque that Mr. Bryan provided to Mr. Leduc and the envelope he received from Mr. Leduc shortly thereafter. Unfortunately, in my view, Detective Inspector Smith did not ask what Mr. Bryan knew about the settlement, including whether he had any information about the source (or sources) of the payment.

Detective Constable Fagan interviewed Father Denis Vaillancourt in September and Monsignor Donald McDougald in October, primarily regarding the Diocese's response to David Silmsers's complaint and the minutes of the meeting held with Mr. Silmsers in early 1993.

Interview of Father Charles MacDonald

In the previous section, I described Detective Constable Fagan's interview with Father MacDonald during the 1994 investigations. As mentioned, Detective Constable Fagan failed to ask Father MacDonald any questions with respect to the conspiracy and obstruction of justice investigations. In my view this was a significant oversight. Father MacDonald was the direct beneficiary of the settlement agreement, and he should have been questioned as to his knowledge of and involvement with it.

Statements From Other Lawyers

Interview of Sean Adams

Detective Inspector Smith met with Sean Adams on September 13, 1994. Mr. Adams had provided Mr. Silmsers with independent legal advice on the settlement and was being interviewed with respect to the allegations of obstruction of justice. Detective Inspector Smith said Mr. Adams was cautioned because his name appeared on the settlement document.

Mr. Adams advised that this was not his normal area of practice and that he did not recognize the significance of the clause regarding the termination of the criminal process. Detective Inspector Smith did not ask why he agreed to act for Mr. Silmsers and provide advice when he was not familiar with this area of law. Having reviewed the interview statement and hearing Detective Inspector Smith's evidence about the interview, I again point out that further preparation and perhaps consultation with others who had investigated lawyers would probably have been helpful.

With respect to the preparation of the settlement, Mr. Adams could only advise that Malcolm MacDonald provided the document to him. He could not say who prepared it.

Interview of Malcolm MacDonald

The final interview in the investigation was that of Malcolm MacDonald on October 28, 1994. Detective Inspector Smith cautioned Mr. MacDonald because his signature was on the document. The taped interview was approximately one hour in length. Detective Inspector Smith described Mr. MacDonald as "a hard man to pin down" and "as slippery as an eel."

Mr. MacDonald stated that both he, on behalf of Father Charles MacDonald, and the Bishop were reluctant to make any settlement. He suggested it was Mr.

Leduc who pushed for a settlement. Mr. MacDonald's account of the process of drafting the release was similar to Mr. Leduc's.

Significantly, Malcolm MacDonald suggests in his statement that, in his view, the understanding among the parties was that the settlement would conclude both the civil and criminal proceedings. He also suggests that this would have been clear to Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald when he discussed the proposed settlement with Murray MacDonald before it was finalized.

Detective Inspector Smith formed the opinion, having interviewed the three lawyers involved in the settlement, that Malcolm MacDonald was the least credible.

Conclusion of Investigations

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan prepared the Crown briefs in November 1994. Detective Inspector Smith reviewed the rough versions but did not think he reviewed the finished versions because there was some rush to get them to the Regional Director.

In the synopsis of the conspiracy brief, Detective Inspector Smith stated that the OPP had found "no evidence" to support the allegation that an agreement had ever been reached by the Cornwall police, the Crown attorney and the Diocese to not proceed with charges in the David Silmsen matter. Detective Inspector Smith agreed that his decision that there were no reasonable and probable grounds in relation to conspiracy "was not a close call."

Significantly, in the obstruction synopsis, nothing singles out Malcolm MacDonald as the target of the investigation. The synopsis states:

This document [the settlement agreement] was prepared, and reviewed by three practicing lawyers for the Province of Ontario.

It is difficult to understand how three knowledgeable, and experienced solicitors, could condone, and approve of such a document, not realizing Section two of the contract clearly obstructs justice.

Peter Griffiths, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, concluded that the evidence in the conspiracy brief did not reveal criminal activity. No charges were laid (see Chapter 11, "Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General"). In relation to the obstruction brief, Mr. Griffiths advised Detective Inspector Smith that there might be grounds to charge Malcolm MacDonald and that he was going to consult with another Crown. On January 30, 1995, Detective Inspector Smith spoke to Mr. Griffiths, who indicated that charges should be laid against Mr. MacDonald for obstruction of justice.

Malcolm MacDonald was charged by the OPP with attempt to obstruct justice on February 3, 1995. The OPP prepared and issued a press release about the arrest. Detective Inspector Smith prepared a draft and sent it to Orillia within hours of Mr. MacDonald being charged.

The details of the prosecution are set out in Chapter 11. I note here that the OPP did have some continuing involvement in gathering evidence. In early January 1995, Jacques Leduc, upon the request of Detective Constable Fagan, sent a letter enclosing a redacted release that he had on file from a previous settlement in a Quebec matter where he was acting for the victim. He specified to Detective Constable Fagan that he would not have faxed this document to Malcolm MacDonald because Mr. MacDonald did not read French. Accordingly, this was not one of the documents that were exchanged between Mr. Leduc and Mr. MacDonald during the preparation of the David Silmser settlement.

Detective Inspector Smith told Mr. Griffiths of the release precedent when they spoke on January 30 and advised that it did not contain any mention of criminal matters. Unfortunately, it appears clear from the transcript of the Malcolm MacDonald court proceedings that the Crown attorney assigned to the case was under the impression that the French precedent provided to the OPP by Mr. Leduc was the same document that Mr. Leduc had sent to Mr. MacDonald as a precedent during the settlement with David Silmser.

On September 12, 1995, Malcolm MacDonald pleaded guilty to unlawfully attempting to obstruct justice and received an absolute discharge.

Flaws in the Conspiracy Investigation

It is apparent that Detective Inspector Smith came to the conclusion early on, and primarily on the basis of his meeting with Chief Shaver, that the CPS was not involved in any conspiracy to effect a civil settlement with David Silmser. Detective Inspector Smith believed that if a conspiracy existed, it had to involve Chief Shaver, and he was convinced Chief Shaver would not have agreed to anything with the Diocese because of his poor relationship with the Bishop. As a result, he did not feel the need to further investigate other officers involved. In my view this was an error and Detective Inspector Smith's starting premise was flawed.

I note that Chief Shaver wrote a letter to Archbishop Carlo Curis after his meeting with Bishop LaRocque stating that the Bishop was "extremely helpful and understanding." He also wrote a letter to the Bishop indicating his pleasure at their meeting. Moreover, there was evidence before Detective Inspector Smith that Chief Shaver and the Bishop did in fact come to an agreement, namely that if Father MacDonald admitted the assault, he would be removed from the parish and sent to Southdown, a psychological treatment centre for members of the clergy.

This is not to suggest that I believe Detective Inspector Smith came to the wrong conclusion regarding CPS's role in the settlement. I have heard nothing to suggest that the Cornwall Police Service was involved in conspiring with the Diocese to effect a civil settlement with Mr. Silmser or conspiring with the Diocese to terminate the criminal proceedings. I do, however, believe Detective Inspector Smith's conclusion was premature and arrived at without fully investigating the allegations. I point in particular to his failure to formally interview the CPS officers involved, including Staff Sergeant Brunet, Constable Sebalj, and Constable Dunlop.

Flaws in the Obstruction Investigation

Having reviewed the evidence, I find that Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan failed to take the proper investigative steps and employ proper techniques in their investigation of obstruction of justice. In particular, I note a lack of rigour in confirming the information provided to them by witnesses.

It appears that Detective Inspector Smith relied almost exclusively on the statements taken from the potential suspects and witnesses as the foundation for this investigation. He made no request of Mr. Leduc for any documents or notes in his possession relevant to the settlement. I note that Mr. Leduc subsequently provided a copy of the draft release with handwritten notations in a civil proceeding. This was never provided to the OPP, and would have been of far more use than the generic precedent Mr. Leduc sent to them. Detective Inspector Smith acknowledged at the hearing that he would have liked to have seen this during his investigation and that it would have led him to question Mr. Leduc more carefully.

Nor did Detective Inspector Smith ask Malcolm MacDonald to provide certain relevant documentation in his possession, despite the fact that during the interview he actually mentioned his notes and his deposit book as places where there might have been further information.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that he was satisfied with having obtained the original settlement agreement because it made his case. He had Malcolm MacDonald "cold." He believed that evidence of criminal activity on the part of the other lawyers could be uncovered at Mr. MacDonald's trial. Because Mr. MacDonald pleaded guilty, there was no trial and apparently no follow-up by Detective Inspector Smith.

This is consistent with Detective Inspector Smith's testimony that from early in the investigation, Malcolm MacDonald was his prime target. However, it is somewhat incongruent with the conclusion in the Crown brief synopsis, which does not differentiate among the lawyers in relation to their involvement with the settlement.

I believe that some of the shortcomings in this investigation can be explained by the investigators' lack of knowledge about how lawyers operate. A number of claims made by the lawyers involved should have raised Detective Inspector Smith's suspicions. I am thinking, for example, of Mr. Leduc's claim that he delivered a cheque to Mr. MacDonald and authorized its release to Mr. Silmsner without reviewing the final release documents, not even to confirm they were signed.

In addition, Detective Inspector Smith cited solicitor-client privilege as one reason he did not request the lawyers' files. While lawyers' communications with clients are usually confidential, an exception exists where those communications are criminal themselves or made in furtherance of a crime.

Accordingly, I recommend that if not already established, a procedure should be put in place to ensure OPP officers investigating lawyers as suspects have specialized training and knowledge, or are able to consult with someone who does, such as a Crown attorney in the Special Prosecutions Unit.

Final Comments on the 1994 Investigations

The Mandate

The foundation of the three investigations was the illegal settlement with David Silmsner. There was inevitable overlap between the witnesses, suspects and illegal acts in the three investigations. It was Detective Inspector Smith's understanding that the terms of the investigation were in large part framed by the media. While he did not think this caused any detriment to his investigation, Detective Inspector Smith did agree that in hindsight, it would have been easier for him to have simply approached this as an investigation into an illegal settlement and gone from there. I agree, as I have set out in the section relating to the mandate Detective Inspector Smith was given, "Commencement of Detective Inspector Tim Smith's 1994 Investigations."

First Press Release

Following the receipt of regional Crown Attorney Griffiths' opinion letters on December 21, 1994, advising that there were no reasonable and probable grounds in either the Father Charles MacDonald sexual abuse investigation or the conspiracy investigation, Detective Inspector Smith prepared a draft press release. Mr. Griffiths also had some input. The draft was then sent to the OPP's media staff, who released the final version.

Both the draft sent by Detective Inspector Smith and the version released to the public address only two of the three investigations Detective Inspector Smith conducted in 1994. The release is titled "No Charges Laid in Alleged Conspiracy" and advises that no grounds exist "to lay charges against a Cornwall priest in the alleged assault, nor to lay charges in the alleged improper relationship between the Diocese and the Cornwall Police.” It makes no reference to the illegal settlement or the obstruction of justice investigation, which was still ongoing at that point and, as set out above, did lead to charges being laid against Malcolm MacDonald.

Detective Inspector Smith agreed that more should have been included in the press release so that public would not have been left with the impression that there was “no issue here.”

In my view, the press release left the impression that Detective Inspector’s nine-month investigation revealed no wrongdoing in relation to the settlement made with David Silmser. This was incorrect and misleading, and demonstrates one instance where the OPP failed to provide appropriate information to the community through the media. The OPP’s relationship with the media is discussed further in the section, “External Pressures: The Media, Websites, and Garry Guzzo.”

Investigation of Milton MacDonald

In early 1994, a criminal investigation was commenced into Milton MacDonald, a former Reeve of Lancaster, Ontario. Milton MacDonald is Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald’s father and Detective Inspector Randy Millar’s father-in-law.

Background

Milton MacDonald had been investigated for and convicted of child sexual abuse in the late 1960s or early 1970s. His wife was aware of the incident; his children, including Murray MacDonald and Detective Inspector Millar’s wife, Marlene, were not. Detective Inspector Millar had heard rumours of the allegations as a child. He assumed the MacDonald children knew about these allegations and that they were not discussed. In 1994, neither Murray MacDonald nor Detective Constable Millar had heard any rumours regarding recent misconduct by Milton MacDonald prior to C-91 coming forward with allegations.

The MacDonald Family Learns of the Allegations

In the early evening of February 11, 1994, Murray MacDonald received a telephone call from his father. According to Murray MacDonald’s statement to the police five days later, his father said that a man, C-91, had called to tell him that he had been instructed by his parents to give a statement to a local OPP officer, Constable Hugh McClement, by 6:00 p.m. that day. C-91 said his parents told him “person[s] who don’t act properly with children should be reported.”

After the call from his father, Murray MacDonald questioned whether this might be an extortion attempt. He called back his parents to ask if they thought money was involved. During this call, his mother advised him of Milton MacDonald's previous conviction. Murray MacDonald then contacted his sister, Marlene (Detective Inspector Millar's wife), because he "felt he should share the information with a family member." He asked Detective Constable Millar to join the call.

According to Murray MacDonald, he was cognizant of "the precarious position" both he and Detective Constable Millar were in with respect to this complaint, given their relationship with Milton MacDonald and their professional positions. He advised Detective Constable Millar in their very first conversation regarding the matter that if a complaint was reported, Detective Constable Millar ought to ensure that the District Commander, Superintendent Carson Fougère, was immediately made aware of the situation. Detective Constable Millar contacted Constable McClement that evening, who confirmed that he had not received a complaint. Detective Constable Millar advised Murray MacDonald of this fact.

The following day, February 12, 1994, a family meeting was arranged among the siblings. At the meeting, Detective Constable Millar suggested to the family that they go to see C-91 to "confront him to see what he was going to do with his complaint." According to Detective Constable Millar, "everyone seemed to think that since there had been no formal complaint that it might be better to leave it alone for now." Detective Inspector Millar testified that Murray MacDonald would have been part of any discussions that day.

Detective Constable Randy Millar Meets With C-91's Father

The following day, February 13, 1994, Detective Constable Millar and Murray MacDonald spoke just before Murray MacDonald left for the Royal Ottawa Hospital to seek to have his father admitted. At this time, Detective Constable Millar said that he was going to see C-91's father. Murray MacDonald told Detective Constable Millar that he trusted his judgment and that whether or not to speak to C-91's father was his call. Either in this or an earlier conversation, Murray MacDonald told Detective Constable Millar to be careful in contacting C-91's father. Detective Constable Millar responded that he thought he could make contact without compromising his position.

While Murray MacDonald was in Ottawa, Detective Constable Millar met with C-91's father at the officer's home. The two had been neighbours for a number of years and knew one another. Detective Constable Millar described his conversation with C-91's father as follows:

I told [C-91's father] that I was concerned that maybe something had happened and that I wanted to get to the truth to find out if this was a criminal or moral issue. I told him that it hinged on the age of [C-91] at the time. That if they were adults it would be a moral issue but if [C-91] was younger that perhaps it would be a criminal issue.

Detective Inspector Millar did not see how his speaking with C-91's father could be perceived as using his position as a police officer in an inappropriate way. He testified that he was trying to "get to the truth of whether this actually happened or not and it did happen and we turned him in."

Given Detective Constable Millar's position as a police officer and his family relationship with Milton MacDonald, it is unfortunate that he chose to visit C-91's father. This is mitigated, however, by the fact that he and C-91's father had been neighbours and were on good terms. In addition, I think it is clear from the officer's subsequent actions in reporting the complaint that he did not intend to use his position to attempt to conceal the matter or to prevent a proper investigation.

Detective Constable Randy Millar Reports Allegation to Superintendent Carson Fougère

According to Detective Constable Millar's statement, after this meeting, he was "feeling very bad about the situation," so he called Superintendent Fougère and advised him of what had occurred to date. Superintendent Fougère said that the matter would have to be investigated. Detective Constable Millar then received a call from C-91's father, who told him that Milton MacDonald had molested C-91 when C-91 was fourteen years old. According to Detective Constable Millar's statement, he told C-91's father that he should not hear any more but would arrange for outside investigators to be assigned. He then called Superintendent Fougère back to advise him of this call.

Chief Superintendent Fougère recalled that Detective Constable Millar made it clear that he wanted the matter properly and transparently investigated and asked the District Commander to assign an outside Detective Inspector. As a result, Superintendent Fougère called the Director of the OPP Criminal Investigation Branch to request that the matter be investigated by that branch. Chief Superintendent Fougère did not recall Detective Constable Millar advising him of his conversations with C-91's father.

In his statement, Detective Constable Millar said that he eventually got hold of Murray MacDonald and told him that an officer from outside the area would be assigned to perform an investigation.

In his testimony before me, Murray MacDonald recalled that he and Detective Constable Millar agreed that the officer would report the complaint to the OPP before Murray MacDonald took his father to the hospital. However, I prefer the accounts of the events given directly after the disclosure in February 1994 and find that Detective Constable Millar made the decision to notify Superintendent Fougère after his first conversation with C-91's father, before any complaint was made. Still, it appears that from the outset, Murray MacDonald was rightly of the view that any complaint ought to be referred to outside investigators. Accordingly, it appears likely that Detective Constable Millar's decision to call Superintendent Fougère was based, at least in part, on Murray MacDonald's prior advice to him. In any event, it is clear that the allegation was initially disclosed to Detective Constable Millar by Murray MacDonald, albeit in his capacity as a family member rather than as a police officer, and it was that disclosure that set in motion the events leading up to Detective Constable Millar's report to Superintendent Fougère.

OPP Interaction With the Children's Aid Society (CAS) During the Investigation

On March 4, 1994, CAS social worker Bill Carriere contacted the OPP after hearing on the news that a Lancaster-area man was suspected of child sexual abuse. As discussed in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society, the CAS had already heard from CAS employees that there were rumours about Milton MacDonald in the Lancaster community. According to Mr. Carriere's notes, Sergeant Norm Duhamel advised him that the OPP were investigating a matter related to an individual in the Lancaster area but he was not at liberty to give Mr. Carriere details. Sergeant Duhamel said that the matter related to historical sexual abuse and did not involve children currently under the age of sixteen, and that there was no indication that the accused was in a position of authority with children or that any children were currently at risk.

On March 30, 1994, Mr. Carriere received a call from Constable Ben Beattie advising that the OPP had received information about a child, currently fourteen, who was allegedly abused when he was thirteen. After discussion, the two agreed that the OPP would proceed without the involvement of the CAS and update the CAS on progress.

On April 11, 1994, Mr. Carriere called the OPP for an update on the victim interview. He was provided with information and told that he would be provided with the victim's statement. He was also told that he would be provided with a list of victims' names so that he could cross-check CAS records. On April 19, 1994, Mr. Carriere was informed that the OPP would not release the victims' names to CAS. He was not given an explanation.

It is difficult to understand the OPP's concerns about providing the CAS with further details in this case. I neither heard nor saw any reason not to disclose the information that had been promised to Mr. Carriere. Indeed, the failure to disclose prevented the possibility of a joint investigation with the CAS and prevented the CAS from providing any victim assistance it might have wanted to facilitate. Moreover, cooperation with the CAS might have assisted the OPP in finding other victims.

I want also to comment here more generally on the problems that arise from the lack of clarity regarding the duty to report in cases of historical sexual abuse. This situation reinforces the need to have the Child and Family Services Act duty-to-report clause amended to specifically include historical sexual abuse. Public institutions would therefore need to amend their existing protocols to reflect this amendment.

Arrest and Prosecution

In May 1994, Milton MacDonald was charged with eleven offences relating to the sexual molestation of eight young boys over a thirty-year period. He pleaded guilty to nine of the charges and was sentenced to a period of incarceration of twenty-two months. An outside Crown attorney handled the matter.

1994 Investigation of Nelson Barque

As discussed in Chapter 5, on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, Nelson Barque was a probation and parole officer in Cornwall from August 19, 1974, to May 4, 1982. He was the probation officer for Robert Sheets, C-44, and Albert Roy, all of whom alleged that he sexually abused them. He also allegedly abused C-45, a probationer of Ken Seguin, at the probation office. Chapter 5 and Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service, describe Mr. Barque's background, as well as the investigations conducted in 1982 and in 1994 into allegations that he sexually abused Mr. Sheets and C-44. The Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) became involved in 1994, when Mr. Roy made a complaint against Mr. Barque. In 1998, the OPP investigated Mr. Barque again, this time in relation to allegations made by C-45 and Mr. Sheets. That investigation will be discussed in a later section of this chapter.

Complaint Made by Albert Roy

In November 1994, Albert Roy contacted the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and alleged that Nelson Barque and Ken Seguin sexually abused him when he was on probation in the mid-1970s. Mr. Seguin, who committed suicide in November 1993, was Mr. Roy's probation officer in 1977 when Mr. Roy was sixteen years old. Mr. Roy testified that after about three months, Mr. Barque took over as his probation officer while Mr. Seguin went on vacation. Mr. Roy alleged that it was during this period that Mr. Barque sexually abused him. He said that when he reported the abuse to Mr. Seguin, Mr. Seguin also began to abuse him sexually.

As discussed in Chapter 6, Mr. Roy gave a statement to CPS Constable Heidi Sebalj on November 24, 1994. Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet of the CPS contacted Detective Inspector Tim Smith and Detective Inspector Burns of the OPP's Long Sault Detachment because the alleged abuse might have occurred outside of CPS jurisdiction. As detailed earlier in this chapter, the OPP had also been involved in the investigation related to Mr. Seguin's death and possible extortion by David Silmser earlier in 1994.

On November 25, 1994, Constable Sebalj and OPP Detective Constable Chris McDonnell attempted to identify Mr. Barque's residence to determine if it was outside of CPS jurisdiction. Ultimately, the OPP and CPS decided to jointly investigate the allegations, and OPP Detective Constable William Zebruck was assigned to work in collaboration with CPS Constable Heidi Sebalj.

Information Sharing Between Constable Heidi Sebalj and Detective Constable William Zebruck

Constable Sebalj briefed Detective Constable Zebruck on November 29, 1994. She contacted C-44 on December 1, 1994, to obtain a witness statement but he was adamant he did not want to be involved in the police investigation. She obtained a copy of Mr. Barque's file from the Cornwall Probation Office as well as a copy of the Ministry of Correctional Services' investigation into allegations of unprofessional conduct by Mr. Barque. Constable Sebalj provided copies of these materials to Detective Constable Zebruck.

Detective Constable Zebruck testified that he and Constable Sebalj shared information during the joint investigation and for a time after he arrested Mr. Barque and laid charges. However, it seems that Detective Constable Zebruck either did not receive or did not follow up on information from Constable Sebalj regarding C-44, although he noted he may have attended the interview. Similarly, Detective Constable Zebruck testified that he and Constable Sebalj did not discuss her investigation of complaints by Mr. Silmser, who had also made allegations against Mr. Seguin. This is unfortunate. Corroborative evidence is difficult to find in cases of historical sexual assault. Where it is found, it should, of course, be shared with all relevant parties.

Interviews of Robert Sheets and C-90

Early in the investigation, Detective Constable Zebruck met with Robert Sheets at his parents' residence. According to Detective Constable Zebruck, Mr. Sheets alleged that he was a victim of Mr. Barque but he did not want to cooperate with the investigation and refused to provide a statement. The date of the meeting is unclear as there is no record of it in Detective Constable Zebruck's notes. The officer testified that he would not take notes if he did not feel that the information was of interest or if the person giving the information did not want to be a witness.

Detective Constable Zebruck interviewed C-90 on December 3, 1994, but did not take a recorded statement. According to Detective Constable Zebruck's notes, C-90 alleged that Mr. Barque kept pornographic magazines in the locked left-hand drawer of his desk, that he always kept his office door locked, and that he once walked in on Mr. Barque engaged in a sexual activity with Mr. Sheets.

Multiple Interviews of Albert Roy

Albert Roy gave three statements over the course of the CPS/OPP investigation. On December 6, 1994, OPP Detective Constable McDonell interviewed Mr. Roy at Constable Sebalj's office. It is unclear how Detective Constable McDonell became involved in the investigation and why this second interview of Mr. Roy was necessary. Mr. Roy provided essentially the same information regarding his abuse by Mr. Seguin and Mr. Barque as he had provided to Constable Sebalj on November 24, 1994.

Mr. Roy testified that he did not understand why he was being interviewed a second time but that he was told it was regarding someone else's allegations of sexual abuse against Mr. Seguin. Mr. Roy also said he experienced anxiety at being interviewed by multiple police officers and that he found Detective Constable McDonell to be particularly intimidating:

And I felt intimidated by him. I felt belittled by him. I felt that he didn't care. He placed me in a position that was—physically he placed me in a position in front of him that was intimidating and made me feel very uneasy, and he was very bold to me, very brisk, and he had no patience for whenever I had a hard time answering one of his questions ... He wanted to know details and he pushed it.

After I talked to this police officer, I was sick.

Through no fault of his own, Detective Constable McDonell's body language and mannerisms clearly made Mr. Roy uncomfortable. This complaint reinforces the need for training on the sensitivity required when investigating allegations of sexual assault. I reiterate here the importance of proper training and periodic refresher courses or seminars for all officers involved in these investigations.

Mr. Roy was interviewed for a third time on December 16, 1994; this time by Detective Constable Zebruck at the Cornwall Police Service. Detective Constable Zebruck testified that he conducted this interview to “make sure I—you know, he didn’t have anything further to add to what he already said.” He conceded that no new information was gleaned from the third interview and that it was probably unnecessary.

Although sometimes necessary because complainants will only disclose the full extent of their abuse over time, taking multiple statements from a complainant should be avoided where possible. Providing these statements can re-traumatize a victim and increases the risk of inconsistencies in a complainant’s evidence that could be exploited by defence counsel at trial.

Incident in the Car Between Detective Constable William Zebruck and Albert and Vicky Roy

After taking a statement from Mr. Roy on December 16, 1994, Detective Constable Zebruck asked him to identify Mr. Barque’s residence. Mr. Roy testified that while they were driving there, Detective Constable Zebruck commented that Mr. Barque’s arrest would be hard on his family. Mr. Roy recalled Detective Constable Zebruck saying that Mr. Barque would likely commit suicide:

He used, I guess, the official term for oral sex and he said, “What’s a little,” the word, and then he said—I believe his exact wording was, “What’s the harm in a little,” again the technical word he used for oral sex “going to do?”

In his testimony, Detective Constable Zebruck was certain he would not have made this sort of comment, but he did not independently recall not saying it. Vicky Roy corroborated her husband’s version of the incident and stated that she encouraged him to make a complaint to Detective Constable Zebruck’s superiors. Mr. Roy testified that when he arrived home, he contacted the Long Sault Detachment and asked to speak to Detective Constable Zebruck’s supervisor. Mr. Roy said that the person he spoke to told him he would “take care of it.” Mr. Roy testified that he heard nothing further about the matter.

It is evident to me that Roys are still bothered by these alleged comments. Having heard the Roys’ version of the event and Detective Constable Zebruck’s testimony, I believe some sort of comment was made that upset the Roys. Police officers should be sensitive and supportive when dealing with victims, particularly victims of sexual assaults and abuse.

Interviews of Probation Staff

Between January 3 and February 6, 1995, Detective Constable Zebruck interviewed a number of people—including Carole Cardinal, Louise Quinn, Marcelle Léger, Gerald Desnoyers, Peter Sirrs, and Jos van Diepen—who were employed at the Cornwall Probation Office at the time that Mr. Barque worked there. At the hearings, Detective Constable Zebruck said he did not know if he took recorded statements from all of these individuals. Ms Quinn, Ms Léger, Mr. Sirrs, and Mr. van Diepen could even not recall being interviewed by Detective Constable Zebruck when questioned before this Inquiry.

It is unclear from Detective Constable Zebruck's notes whether he followed up on information obtained during these interviews. For example, Ms Quinn gave the officer the names of three people who might be able to assist in the investigation as potential victims or witnesses. There is no indication in Detective Constable Zebruck's notes that any of these people were contacted. He explained during his testimony that at the time of the investigation, he only made note of a contact with an individual if that person had "something to contribute to the investigation."

Detective Constable McDonell had interviewed most of the staff of the Cornwall Probation Office in February 1994 during the investigation of David Silmsen for extortion. He testified that as a result of the statement he had taken from Mr. van Diepen, he became aware of allegations of inappropriate sexual contact between Mr. Barque and his clients. As noted in the section on that investigation, the allegations made against Mr. Barque were not followed up.

Detective Constable Zebruck testified that Detective Constable McDonell did not brief him, nor did he know that Detective Constable McDonell had previously interviewed probation office staff. Accordingly, when conducting his own interviews, Detective Constable Zebruck did not have the statements taken in February 1994. It is unfortunate that Detective Constable McDonell did not tell Detective Constable Zebruck about these interviews. He should have. Better communication between these officers could have reduced the number of interviews Detective Constable Zebruck had to conduct and it could have improved the quality of information he obtained in his interviews.

Detective Constable Zebruck testified that it occurred to him during the investigation that Mr. Barque might have sexually abused other probationers while employed by the Ministry of Correctional Services. However, he never raised this possibility with his superiors, nor did he discuss it with Constable Sebalj or Detective Constable McDonell.

Deficiencies in the Investigation

On January 3, 1995, Nelson Barque was charged with indecent assault and gross indecency in relation to incidents involving Albert Roy. Mr. Barque pleaded guilty to the indecent assault of Mr. Roy on July 10, 1995, and was sentenced to four months of incarceration and eighteen months of probation.

Despite these results, in my view the 1994 investigation of Mr. Barque displayed a disappointing lack of thoroughness. Detective Constable Zebruck failed to take proper investigative steps and employ proper techniques, including not taking proper actions in the taking of statements, the identification of corroborative evidence, and the identification of, and follow-up with, further possible victims.

In particular, I point to Detective Constable Zebruck's inadequate note taking and his failure to follow up on leads that might have revealed further victims of Mr. Barque, such as those individuals whose names were given to him by probation office staff, or other possible perpetrators, such as Richard Hickerson and Ken Seguin.

As discussed, Mr. Roy alleged that Mr. Seguin sexually abused him. It does not appear that Detective Constable Zebruck took any investigative steps to follow up on this allegation. C-90 told Detective Constable Zebruck that Mr. Hickerson was buying alcohol for and having a sexual relationship with Robert Sheets. Although Mr. Seguin was dead at the time Detective Constable Zebruck conducted his investigation, Mr. Hickerson was not. Detective Constable Zebruck did not pass on this allegation to the CPS, the Children's Aid Society, or his superiors at the OPP, nor did he flag Mr. Hickerson's name in the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) system. As will be discussed in a later section, Project Truth investigated Mr. Hickerson in 1998. He was about to be charged, but committed suicide before the arrest date. The allegations made against him might have become known earlier had Detective Constable Zebruck conducted a more thorough investigation or alerted the appropriate authorities in 1994.

1995 Investigation of Father Charles MacDonald

As previously discussed, in 1994, Detective Inspector Tim Smith and Detective Constable Michael Fagan conducted an investigation into allegations of sexual abuse made by David Silmsier against Father Charles MacDonald. The officers determined that they lacked reasonable and probable grounds for charges at that time. The fact that Mr. Silmsier was the sole complainant was a factor in this decision. In 1995, the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) learned of additional complainants, and the investigation was reopened.

Albert Lalonde

On May 1, 1995, Detective Constable Fagan advised Detective Inspector Smith of a new complainant against Father MacDonald named Albert Lalonde. Detective Constable Norman Hurtubise had already interviewed Mr. Lalonde at the Long Sault Detachment. On May 12, 1995, Detective Constable Fagan took another statement from Mr. Lalonde.

Detective Inspector Smith advised David Silmsen's lawyer, Bryce Geoffrey, of the new alleged victim during a phone call on May 10, 1995, and told Peter Griffiths, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, on May 19. Detective Inspector Smith does not have any further notes regarding Mr. Lalonde and could not recall during his testimony before me why no further action was taken in the spring of 1995.

On August 16, 1995, Detective Constable Fagan wrote to Detective Inspector Smith enclosing copies of the statements regarding "the last complaint against Father Charlie." He said he was sending a copy to Crown Attorney Curt Flanagan. Mr. Flanagan testified he could not recall whether he had been asked for or had given a legal opinion.

In 2002, not long after a stay of proceedings was granted in the Father MacDonald trial for charges relating to several other complainants, Mr. Lalonde contacted the Cornwall Police Service to report the abuse he alleged to have suffered from Father MacDonald. The CPS officer assigned to the case asked the OPP for materials from the 1995 investigation. In a letter enclosing Mr. Lalonde's 1995 statements, Detective Inspector Pat Hall advised the CPS that these materials had been sent to Crown Attorney Flanagan on August 16, 1995, for a legal opinion.

It is unclear whether Mr. Lalonde was informed in 1995 that his allegation against Father MacDonald was not being pursued. During his interview with the CPS in 2002, he seemed uncertain as to the status of his case with the OPP.

Albert Lalonde's 2002 allegations are discussed further in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service. One of the alleged incidents occurred outside CPS jurisdiction and so was investigated by the OPP in 2002. In the course of that investigation, Detective Constables Don Genier and Joe Dupuis interviewed Mr. Lalonde and took statements from his brother, ex-wife, and daughter. They also spoke to and obtained notes from Mr. Lalonde's psychiatrist. The officers determined that they did not have reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges. Crown counsel who reviewed the brief agreed, as discussed in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

I wish to note here, however, that the fact this investigation resulted in no charges appears to have been a factor in the decision not to lay charges in both the CPS and OPP investigations in 2002.

Unfortunately, it is difficult to comment on the OPP's 1995 investigation because of the almost complete lack of documentation regarding this matter.

John MacDonald's Complaint Referred to the OPP

On August 23, 1995, Detective Constable Michael Fagan told Detective Inspector Tim Smith that David Silmsner had called Detective Constable Fagan, Detective Constable Chris McDonell, and the CPS to say he had located another alleged victim of Father Charles MacDonald from "out west." Detective Constable Fagan also said that Inspector Richard Trew of the CPS had a letter from the same victim, John MacDonald, regarding an alleged sexual assault by Father MacDonald. The letter, dated August 11, 1995, was sent to Father Kevin Maloney, who turned it over to the CPS on August 15, 1995.

Following discussions between Detective Inspector Smith and Inspector Trew, it was decided that the OPP would take this case for three reasons. First, the OPP had already conducted extensive background research on Father MacDonald in its previous investigation. Second, there was some potential for conflict for the CPS because John MacDonald appeared to have some connection to David Silmsner, who had recently sued the CPS. Finally, it seemed from Mr. MacDonald's letter that many of the alleged acts occurred in the St. Andrews area, which is OPP jurisdiction. The case was handed over to Detective Inspector Smith on August 25, 1995.

It appears that John MacDonald was not informed of this decision by the OPP. On September 11, 1995, he was advised by CPS Constable David Bough that the OPP would be handling his complaint. On September 12, 1995, Mr. MacDonald and Carson Chisholm visited the Cornwall Police Station and attempted to drop off a copy of a statement Mr. MacDonald had prepared. Though he could not recall exactly what happened at the station, Mr. MacDonald testified that Mr. Chisholm was "abrasive." This is corroborated by a CPS officer's notes from that day, which describe Mr. Chisholm attending at the station "in a very belligerent mood" with Mr. MacDonald. According to these notes, Mr. Chisholm demanded that the police take the statement and "lay a charge immediately."

Two weeks later, on September 25, 1995, John MacDonald met with Richard Abell of the Children's Aid Society. Mr. MacDonald expressed frustration with difficulties he was having in getting his complaint heard. He told Mr. Abell that he was "up in the air" and that "doors were being closed in [his] face." Mr. Abell called Detective Inspector Smith and said that Mr. MacDonald was keen to talk to him. Detective Inspector Smith contacted Mr. MacDonald that same day and arranged for an interview. Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan took a statement from Mr. MacDonald on September 28, 1995.

It is my view that Detective Inspector Smith should not have waited a month to contact Mr. MacDonald to tell him that he would be taking the case. Had Detective Inspector Smith followed up with Mr. MacDonald sooner, the scene at the Cornwall Police Station might have been avoided.

Father Kevin Maloney Complains of Harassment by David Silmsers and John MacDonald

Detective Inspector Smith later learned that Father Maloney had told the Cornwall Police Service on August 19, 1995, that he had received two telephone calls from Mr. Silmsers and one from John MacDonald and that he wanted them to be told to stop calling him until the investigation was complete. Constable Emma Wilson-King of the CPS contacted both men and asked them not to contact Father Maloney.

Both Mr. Silmsers and Mr. MacDonald testified that they did not understand why they were being told not to contact Father Maloney as they did not think they were doing anything wrong. In my opinion this led to further confusion and distrust for these complainants with respect to their relationship with the police service. Detective Inspector Smith also became aware that Sean Adams, who had advised Mr. Silmsers in the illegal settlement, was Father Maloney's counsel.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that he tried to put aside these issues and focus on the sexual assault allegation:

Well, it was a rat's nest, to put it bluntly. It was hard to sort out and hard to investigate ... But what I was trying to do is to let all those side issues go aside ... and stay with the sexual assault. And then see what happens; what falls by the wayside after.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that he would not have given the CPS any advice in terms of sensitivity in dealing with sexual assault complainants. He also stated that he thought the CPS's response to the Father Maloney's complaint was reasonable. With the benefit of hindsight, I disagree. The CPS should have addressed Father Maloney's concerns in a manner that better promoted the relationship between the police and the complainants.

Contact Between Alleged Victims of Father Charles MacDonald

It is clear the police knew from the commencement of the investigation that John MacDonald had some connection with Mr. Silmsers. Mr. MacDonald testified that at no time did the OPP tell him not to speak with Mr. Silmsers or to any other former altar boys. However, during the statement taken by Detective Inspector Smith on September 28, 1995, there was a discussion about Mr. MacDonald's contacts with Mr. Silmsner and how they might affect his credibility. Detective Inspector Smith questioned Mr. MacDonald about the timing of his first contact with Mr. Silmsner and established that it was after he wrote the letter to Father Maloney on August 11, 1995.

While it appears that Detective Inspector Smith did not expressly advise Mr. MacDonald not to communicate with Mr. Silmsner, it is clear Mr. MacDonald understood the dangers of such contact. He told Detective Inspector Smith that he started taking notes after his first call from Mr. Silmsner because "I don't want anybody to think there[']s] an infusion here between the two."

John MacDonald contacted Detective Inspector Smith on a few occasions in October and November 1995 asking for updates on the investigation. According to Mr. MacDonald's notes, it was his understanding that Detective Inspector Smith was waiting to have his statement transcribed.

On November 8, Detective Inspector Smith returned a call from John MacDonald's wife, who told him her husband was upset that he had "heard nothing." Detective Inspector Smith told her that they were attempting to locate the former altar boys Mr. MacDonald had named in his statement. Detective Inspector Smith then spoke directly with Mr. MacDonald. According to Mr. MacDonald's notes, he and Mr. Silmsner were going to meet with C-3, another alleged victim of Father MacDonald, on November 11. Detective Inspector Smith warned Mr. MacDonald that they could jeopardize the case by meeting together.

Detective Inspector Smith's notes state he advised Mr. MacDonald not to discuss evidence or specifics of what happened, and to write down everything that was said. He also told Mr. MacDonald to have C-3 contact the OPP if C-3 wanted to testify.

Complaint on Hold Until After Constable Perry Dunlop's Hearing

In their November 8 conversation, Detective Inspector Smith told Mr. MacDonald that the investigation of his complaint was on hold until after Constable Perry Dunlop's hearing on November 23, 1995. As discussed at length in Chapter 6, Constable Dunlop had been charged under the Police Services Act for providing the Children's Aid Society with the statement that David Silmsner gave to the OPP disclosing his allegation of abuse by Father MacDonald.

According to John MacDonald's notes, Detective Inspector Smith also advised him to stay away from Constable Dunlop and his family because they had "their own agenda."

On November 20, 1995, Detective Inspector Smith attended the Long Sault Detachment and was shown a Standard-Freeholder article in which Mr. MacDonald quoted Detective Inspector Smith as saying the investigation would not start until Constable Dunlop was dealt with. Detective Inspector Smith wrote in his notes that this was “not entirely true” and that “Dunlop is now using MacDonald + Silmsner to further his cause.”

The next day, Detective Inspector Smith spoke to lawyer Bryce Geoffrey, who represented Mr. MacDonald, Mr. Silmsner, and C-3, and expressed his displeasure about the news article. He said that from now on he would communicate with Mr. Geoffrey’s clients only through him. On November 23, 1995, Mr. MacDonald called Detective Inspector Smith, who advised him that “any conversation on anything he wanted from me would be done through his lawyer.”

The Crown assigned to prosecute the Father MacDonald case, Robert Pelletier, took a similar approach. After receiving an unpleasant call from Mr. Silmsner, Mr. Pelletier told Mr. Geoffrey that if Mr. Silmsner wanted to communicate with him again, he should do so through his lawyer. This is an example of problems that can arise in the absence of a Victim/Witness Assistance Program (discussed further in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General”). I realize it may be challenging, but efforts must be made to better understand all complainants.

Detective Inspector Smith met with and interviewed C-3 on November 24, 1995, in the presence of his lawyer, Mr. Geoffrey.

Submission of the Crown Brief

On January 3, 1996, Detective Inspector Smith spoke to regional Crown Peter Griffiths and said that the OPP would have a brief to him within two weeks. In his notes, Detective Inspector Smith wrote that the officers felt that with the two additional victims there were reasonable and probable grounds to lay indecent assault charges against Father MacDonald. The brief was submitted later in January.

Detective Constable Fagan advised Detective Inspector Smith on January 16, 1996, that Mr. Griffiths had told him that the alleged “indecent assault” when C-3 was sixteen years of age was considered consensual and no charges were warranted. The remaining allegations would be reviewed by Crown Pelletier, who was picking up the brief.

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan had prepared the Crown brief, including the synopsis, together. The portion of the synopsis dealing with David Silmsner is copied almost verbatim from the synopsis in the 1994 brief. Accordingly, the error in the dates of the abuse is reproduced and the synopsis’ conclusion suggests, as it did in 1994, that the officers did not have reasonable and probable grounds. Detective Inspector Smith, however, testified that he was satisfied that they had reasonable and probable grounds, as he had already advised Mr. Griffiths. Detective Inspector Smith’s concern was with reasonable prospect of conviction. He explained:

Once I lay the charges the clock, I say, starts ticking and then the prosecutors decide that there's no reasonable prospect of conviction, they withdraw the charges or they're stayed. I can't revisit those. I can't go back and re-lay those charges, so those victims would never be before—never get before a courts [sic].

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan met with Mr. Pelletier, whom Detective Inspector Smith had worked with on the St. Joseph Training School case in Alfred, on January 31, 1996. According to Detective Inspector Smith, at the time, Mr. Pelletier was perhaps the most experienced Crown attorney in sexual assault investigations in Canada. At the meeting, Mr. Pelletier was given four briefs: the original investigation of David Silmsner's complaint by the CPS, the investigation conducted by the Ottawa Police Service into the propriety of the Cornwall investigation, materials related to the settlement between Mr. Silmsner and the Church, and materials relating to the complaint by Mr. Silmsner against the CPS and the Crown attorney's office in Cornwall with regard to the initial decision not to lay charges.

On February 7, 1996, Detective Inspector Smith provided Mr. Pelletier with the extortion brief prepared by Detective Inspector Hamelink as well as videotapes of the complainants' interviews.

Robert Pelletier Recommends Charges Be Laid

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan met with Mr. Pelletier again on February 21, 1996. He had reviewed the briefs and statements and, according to Detective Inspector Smith's notes, it appeared that he would recommend charges.

At this meeting, Mr. Pelletier provided the appropriate wording for the information and provided advice regarding the charges. There was also a discussion about the arrest and the press release. Mr. Pelletier confirmed his opinion that charges should be laid in a letter dated March 5, 1996.

Father Charles MacDonald Arrested

Father MacDonald was arrested on March 11, 1996.

In his opinion letter, Mr. Pelletier also provided advice on the arrest, indicating that it would be sufficient for Father MacDonald to surrender himself and be provided with a summons for the first court date. Detective Inspector Smith said that he was in agreement with Mr. Pelletier about this approach. He rarely "brought anybody in handcuffs into jail or court."

Detective Inspector Smith advised CPS Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet, lawyer Bryce Geoffrey, and Bishop Eugène LaRocque of the impending charges on March 6, 1996, prior to the arrest. That afternoon, Detective Inspector Smith was contacted by someone from CBC's Fifth Estate program who said they had reliable information that charges were going to be laid and asked Detective Inspector Smith to confirm. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he "had an idea" that the source of this information was Constable Dunlop.

A press release confirming that charges had been laid was issued on March 11, 1996. As will be discussed in later sections, further charges were laid against Father MacDonald in 1998 and 2000 as part of the OPP's Project Truth investigation.

C-8's Allegations Against Father Charles MacDonald

After Father Charles MacDonald was arrested in March 1996, an additional complainant, C-8, came forward in January 1997. Before disclosing his allegations of abuse to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), C-8 first made these claims to Constable Perry Dunlop of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) during a private investigation that Constable Dunlop was performing while he was on sick leave. Father MacDonald was charged in 1998 in relation to these allegations, but just before his trial in 2002, C-8 recanted his allegations against Father MacDonald.

C-8 Provides Statements to Constable Perry Dunlop and Others

C-8 contacted Constable Dunlop in early June 1996 in order to tell him about allegations of abuse by Ron Leroux and Marcel Lalonde. Shortly thereafter, C-8 provided a statement to Randy Porter, a retired police officer from Toronto who assisted Constable Dunlop and Charles Bourgeois, Constable Dunlop's lawyer. Mr. Bourgeois testified that he instructed Mr. Porter to take this statement from C-8.

During this interview, C-8 was asked a number of questions about Ken Seguin and about individuals whom he had seen at Mr. Seguin's home. He said he had known Father MacDonald for years and that when he was thirteen years old, Father MacDonald had "made a pass" at him at "St. Clemens Parish."

C-8 provided another statement on December 12, 1996. By this time, C-8 had met with Constable Dunlop on several occasions. In this statement, C-8 alleged he was sexually assaulted by Father MacDonald at St. Columban's Church when he was twelve or thirteen years old. He said Father MacDonald was the first person to sexually abuse him. In this statement he also alleged abuse by Marcel Lalonde.

C-8 provided a third statement on January 23, 1997. In this statement he made an additional allegation against Father MacDonald, claiming that he was abused with a candle at his father's funeral.

This statement was taken on the same day that C-8 had a court appearance for sexual assault charges relating to a teenage girl. Mr. Bourgeois acted as C-8's lawyer on these charges. Mr. Bourgeois testified that although he recalls the statement and was present for the discussions, he could not remember why the statement was taken on that day.

As discussed further in the section “Interactions between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop,” in March 2002, prior to Father MacDonald’s trial, C-8 told Crown attorneys Lorne McConnery and Kevin Phillips that he wanted to drop the charges against Father MacDonald. He said that the incident at his father’s funeral never happened. He also testified before this Inquiry that the allegations he made against Father MacDonald were false.

C-8 Provides Statements to the OPP

On January 23, 1997, the same day that C-8 gave his third statement to Constable Dunlop, he also attended the Lancaster OPP Detachment with Mr. Bourgeois and read this prepared statement in the presence of Detective Constable Don Genier. According to Mr. Bourgeois, he brought C-8 to the OPP because C-8 wanted to file a criminal complaint against the individuals who allegedly abused him. Detective Constable Genier then conducted two videotaped interviews of C-8: one in respect of his allegations against Mr. Lalonde and another in respect of his allegations against Father MacDonald.

C-8 does not recall the OPP following up with him regarding his allegations about Father MacDonald.

Detective Constable Don Genier Sends Videotape to Detective Constable Michael Fagan

On January 27, 1997, Detective Constable Genier contacted Detective Constable Fagan to advise him of C-8’s video statement and said he would provide a copy. Detective Constable Genier mailed the videotaped interview of C-8 regarding his allegations against Father MacDonald to Detective Constable Fagan on February 10.

According to Detective Constable Genier’s notes, he also informed Detective Inspector Tim Smith that he told Detective Constable Fagan about C-8’s allegations of abuse by Father MacDonald. However, Detective Inspector Smith testified that he does not think he was aware of the January 23 statement taken from C-8. He said he was away for almost three weeks in February 1997.

Father Charles MacDonald’s Preliminary Inquiry

The preliminary inquiry in R. v. Charles MacDonald began on February 24, 1997. That evening, C-8 appeared on television and spoke about his allegations against Father MacDonald. As will be discussed in further detail in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General,” Crown attorney Robert Pelletier was unaware of C-8’s allegations until the issue was raised the next day in court. As a result of this new development, counsel for Father MacDonald requested an adjournment of the preliminary inquiry. It resumed in September 1997.

According to Detective Constable Genier’s notes, he received a call from Detective Constable Fagan, who was in court, the morning of February 25, 1997. Detective Constable Fagan asked him several questions about C-8’s allegations of abuse by Father MacDonald. He apologized because he thought the video he had received from Detective Constable Genier pertained to Marcel Lalonde.

It therefore appears that Detective Constable Fagan had not reviewed the videotaped statement from C-8 prior to the preliminary inquiry and that neither Detective Constable Fagan nor Detective Inspector Smith had informed Mr. Pelletier of C-8’s allegations.

This information should have been provided to Mr. Pelletier, who probably would have disclosed it to the defence. This may not have avoided an adjournment, but at the very least the Crown would have been fully informed and prepared to deal with the issue at the preliminary inquiry.

Detective Constable Genier later faxed a copy of C-8’s statement to Detective Constable Fagan and met with him and Mr. Pelletier at the courthouse. The three of them then met with defence counsel. Detective Constable Genier answered questions about the events surrounding C-8’s complaint, such as how C-8 became involved with Charles Bourgeois. According to Detective Constable Genier’s notes, he advised the lawyers that when he arrested C-8 he was on the phone with Mr. Bourgeois. He also said that C-8 had mentioned he was friends with Constable Dunlop and had spoken to him about the charges against him involving a teenage girl, and that “disclosure of [C-8]’s abuse soon followed.”

On February 27, 1997, Detective Constable Genier received a call from Detective Constable Fagan advising that Mr. Pelletier wanted C-8 interviewed and had a number of questions that he wanted asked. Detective Constable Genier met with C-8 that day at the Ottawa courthouse cafeteria and took a statement. C-8 recalls that he attended the Father MacDonald preliminary inquiry because Constable Dunlop asked him to go with him for support. He recalls being pulled aside by two OPP officers as he was leaving the courthouse on February 27. He said Constable Dunlop and Helen Dunlop told him to stay away from them, but he gave them an interview anyway.

As will be discussed in the section “Project Truth Investigation of Father MacDonald,” charges were laid against Father MacDonald in respect of C-8’s allegations in January 1998.

Investigation and Prosecution of Marcel Lalonde

Marcel Lalonde worked as an elementary school teacher with the Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry County Roman Catholic Separate School Board from 1969 until 1997, when he was suspended following his arrest on sexual abuse-related charges.

The Cornwall Police Service (CPS) first became aware of and investigated allegations of sexual abuse against Mr. Lalonde in 1989. No charges were laid following the investigation. Mr. Lalonde's name again came to the attention of the CPS in 1994 when it received information from the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) that David Silmser had told the Children's Aid Society that his former teacher, Mr. Lalonde, had abused him. The allegation was not pursued because of Mr. Silmser's lack of cooperation. These investigations are discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service.

This section focuses on the 1996 investigation of Mr. Lalonde by the OPP, the OPP's interaction with the CPS during its concurrent investigation of Mr. Lalonde, and the disclosure issues that arose during Mr. Lalonde's prosecution.

CPS Refers C-68's Complaint to the OPP

As previously discussed in Chapter 6, in the fall of 1996, probation officer Sue Lariviere informed the CPS that one of her probationers, C-68, had alleged sexual abuse by Mr. Lalonde. Constable René Desrosiers of the CPS was assigned to follow up. Constable Desrosiers informally interviewed C-68 about his allegations on October 30, 1996. C-68 told him that when he was twelve years old, he was sexually abused by his teacher, Mr. Lalonde, during overnight camping trips. Because the abuse disclosed by C-68 took place outside CPS jurisdiction, Constable Desrosiers referred the complaint to the Lancaster OPP.

At the time, Constable Desrosiers was not aware of the previous CPS investigation of Mr. Lalonde. He did not run any background checks on Mr. Lalonde because, he testified, he was turning the matter over to the OPP, which had the same computer system as the CPS and so could run its own search of the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative. Unfortunately, the earlier investigation by the CPS predated this automated system and therefore it contained no record of the investigation.

The fact that a previous investigation had taken place was not discovered until the fall of 1999 when a witness said during a preparation meeting before trial that he had been interviewed by the CPS in the late 1980s about Mr. Lalonde. The files relating to that investigation were found only after a manual search of the CPS's contact cards by the CPS records department and a physical search of the CPS archives by Constable Desrosiers.

Accordingly, when the OPP was referred C-68's complaint in 1996, it had no way of knowing that a prior investigation had taken place. The OPP did not have the advantage of the information gathered by the CPS during the previous investigation.

Investigation of C-68's Complaint and Arrest of Marcel Lalonde

Detective Constable Don Genier of the Lancaster Detachment was assigned to the investigation of C-68's allegations on November 4, 1996. Don Genier joined the OPP on October 16, 1989, and became a member of the Criminal Investigation Branch in October 1993. As discussed in Chapter 12, on process, Detective Constable Genier did not testify at this Inquiry. Information about his investigation into C-68's complaint has largely been taken from his duty notes and his prior testimony in criminal proceedings.

The day of his assignment, Detective Constable Genier spoke to C-68's sister and mother, both of whom were previously aware of the allegations. He also met with school board officials Kevin Linden and Bernard Warner, the Superintendent, to discuss the file and obtain information. Detective Constable Genier maintained regular contact with Mr. Warner throughout the investigation.

On January 6, 1997, Detective Constable Genier contacted Mr. Warner and told him that Mr. Lalonde would be arrested the following morning. Mr. Warner stated that upon the laying of criminal charges, Mr. Lalonde would be suspended by the school board. The following day, Detective Constables Genier and Chris McDonnell arrested Mr. Lalonde and laid charges with respect to C-68. Mr. Lalonde was released on bail after a hearing that day.

Detective Constable Don Genier Discovers Other Alleged Victims of Marcel Lalonde

During his investigation of C-68's complaint and after Mr. Lalonde's arrest, Detective Constable Genier obtained information about other possible victims of Mr. Lalonde.

One of these alleged victims was David Silmsier. It appears that Detective Constable Genier was aware that Mr. Silmsier, an alleged victim of Father Charles MacDonald, had previously made allegations against Mr. Lalonde. In his testimony at Mr. Lalonde's preliminary inquiry, Detective Constable Genier stated, "I was familiar with the 1994 case with David Silmsier, and I had recalled a mention of Marcel Lalonde in that transcript."

Detective Constable Genier put a great deal of effort into attempting to locate Mr. Silmsier to discuss his allegations. On January 23, 1997, Detective Constable Genier received a call from Detective Constable Michael Fagan, who was working on the Father MacDonald case. David Silmser's wife, Pamela, had advised Detective Constable Fagan that her husband did not want to talk about the abuse committed by Mr. Lalonde until the court proceedings with Father MacDonald were completed. According to Detective Constable Genier's notes, Detective Constable Fagan asked her to have Mr. Silmser call the Lancaster Detachment when he was ready.

Detective Constable Genier also reviewed the 1994 Crown brief on the re-investigation of Father MacDonald and made efforts to contact the witnesses named therein to ask if they had any association with Mr. Lalonde.

He obtained important leads through this process. For example, Albert Lalonde, whom Detective Constable Genier apparently contacted because of his association with the Father MacDonald investigation, told Detective Constable Genier that when he mentioned the investigation to his brother, his brother guessed it was about Marcel Lalonde. By following up with Albert Lalonde's brother, Detective Constable Genier obtained the names of further possible victims. These names were referred to the CPS, as discussed below.

Detective Constable Genier learned of another possible victim of Marcel Lalonde, C-8, who was under investigation for sexually assaulting a teenage girl. On December 18, 1996, Detective Constable Genier spoke to C-8 as a suspect in this investigation. C-8 told Detective Constable Genier that he had been abused by Father MacDonald and Mr. Lalonde. The following day, Detective Constable Genier arrested and charged C-8 with the sexual assault of the teen. On January 3, 1997, Detective Constable Genier contacted C-8 and asked if he would "lay his complaint of being sexually assaulted by Lalonde." According to Detective Constable Genier's notes, C-8 said that his lawyer was away and he would be in touch when he returned.

On January 23, 1997, Detective Constable Genier met with C-8 and his lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, at the OPP's Lancaster Detachment. Detective Constable Genier conducted two videotaped interviews: one in relation to C-8's allegations against Father MacDonald and the other in relation to his allegations against Mr. Lalonde. During each interview, C-8 read a prepared statement. At the conclusion of the interviews, C-8 provided names of other possible victims of Mr. Lalonde, including C-66. Constable Perry Dunlop had assisted C-8 in the preparation of his statements. At the time of the interviews, Detective Constable Genier was not aware of Constable Dunlop's involvement.

OPP Refers Further Marcel Lalonde Complaints to CPS

The OPP laid charges against Marcel Lalonde only in relation to the allegations made by C-68. All of the other victims and potential victims uncovered by Detective Constable Genier were referred to the CPS. It appears that the referrals were made on the basis that the alleged offences in those cases took place in CPS jurisdiction. CPS Constable René Desrosiers was assigned to that investigation, which is described in detail in Chapter 6.

One individual was referred to CPS on January 21, 1997. This alleged victim had told Detective Constable Genier that Mr. Lalonde had taken photographs of him and had other photographs of boys in his possession.

On January 27, Detective Constable Genier received a call from C-45, who claimed to have been sexually assaulted by Mr. Lalonde. This complainant was also referred to the CPS.

On January 28, Detective Constable Genier met with Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet of the CPS, provided him with names of further victims, and advised that a press release might encourage other victims to come forward. Detective Constable Genier also told Staff Sergeant Brunet that two of the alleged victims had mentioned that Mr. Lalonde had a photo album containing pictures of many boys; that C-45 alleged that he had been assaulted by Ken Seguin and Nelson Barque at the Cornwall Probation Office in 1971; and that C-8 had given two separate interviews to Detective Constable Genier in relation to allegations made against Father MacDonald and Mr. Lalonde. The videotaped statements of C-8 were given to the CPS on March 13, 1997.

OPP Involvement in CPS Arrest of Marcel Lalonde and Search of His Residence

On April 29, 1997, the CPS laid charges against Mr. Lalonde in relation to the complaints made by C-8, C-45, C-66, and a number of other individuals. That day, the CPS executed a search warrant of Mr. Lalonde's home. They seized five photo albums which contained Polaroid pictures of teenagers drinking alcohol in Mr. Lalonde's home. The teenagers were clothed. They also found five nude photographs.

Crown Murray MacDonald advised Detective Constable Genier of the arrest that same day.

On May 22, Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Steve Seguin attended the CPS and looked through photo albums seized from Mr. Lalonde's residence. On December 5, 1997, Constable Desrosiers turned over to Detective Constable Genier, in his capacity as a Project Truth officer, a list of names of people identified in the photos.

The Decision Not to Include the Marcel Lalonde Case in Project Truth

On April 1, 1997, Detective Constable Genier met with Crown Attorney Guy Simard. Mr. Simard explained that the Marcel Lalonde case would be reassigned because there was a conflict of interest in the Cornwall Crown Attorney's Office. The prosecution was eventually assigned to the Brockville Crown Attorney's Office.

Detective Inspector Smith asked Detective Constable Genier to attend a meeting at the regional Crown's office on April 24, 1997.

On April 24, Detective Constable Genier attended this meeting with Detective Inspector Smith, Detective Sergeant Pat Hall, Detective Constable Fagan, Peter Griffiths, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald, and Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier. The purpose of the meeting was to discuss a brief of materials that had been provided by Constable Dunlop's counsel, Charles Bourgeois, to Chief Julian Fantino, of the London Police Service. The "Fantino Brief" contained statements from alleged victims, including C-8 and David Silmser, alleging abuse by Mr. Lalonde. It was that the OPP would investigate all of the allegations in the Fantino Brief. This meeting is discussed in detail in the section "Project Truth: Initial Meetings Between OPP and Crowns."

Despite several references to Mr. Lalonde in the Fantino brief, the allegations against him did not become part of Project Truth. It is not clear whether the decision to exclude the Marcel Lalonde allegations was made at this meeting or some time later. Detective Constable Genier became a member of the Project Truth team and remained responsible for the OPP's investigation into Marcel Lalonde. It was expected that he would be able to deal with any overlapping issues that arose between the Marcel Lalonde case and the Project Truth investigation.

OPP and CPS Charges Against Marcel Lalonde Are Combined

Following the arrest of Mr. Lalonde by the CPS, Constable Desrosiers assumed responsibility for all of the CPS complainants while Detective Constable Genier remained responsible for the one OPP complainant, C-68. Sometime before the preliminary inquiry, a new information was sworn combining the counts contained in the information of January 1997 sworn by the OPP and the information of April 1997 sworn by the CPS.

Coordination of Disclosure

On August 18, 1997, Detective Constable Genier attended a meeting with Detective Inspector Smith and Crown Attorneys Curt Flanagan and Claudette Wilhelm to discuss disclosure issues relevant to the Marcel Lalonde and certain Project Truth investigations. Unfortunately, as I describe below, this meeting did not prevent disclosure problems from arising.

Significant coordination between CPS and the OPP was required for effective disclosure during the Marcel Lalonde prosecution. Constable Desrosiers testified that he and Detective Constable Genier would each look after the disclosure from their own police services. Neither had the opportunity to review the documents the other was disclosing. Faxes of disclosure requests from the Crown's office were sent to both officers. They would then contact each other to determine who would respond to each request. Sometimes they delivered disclosure packages to the Crown on the other's behalf. However, Constable Desrosiers testified that, even then, he was not privy to what was being disclosed by Detective Constable Genier, other than seeing the request to which he was responding.

Detective Inspector Hall, on the other hand, testified that Detective Constable Genier and Constable Desrosiers dealt with disclosure requests jointly. Detective Inspector Hall's evidence suggested that both officers were fully informed as to the other's disclosures. In this regard, I prefer the evidence of Constable Desrosiers. Detective Inspector Hall was not Detective Constable Genier's supervisor in regard to the Marcel Lalonde investigation since Detective Constable Genier was acting in his capacity as a local detachment officer. Constable Desrosiers, on the other hand, was directly involved and was quite clear in his evidence as to the procedure the officers followed.

Disclosure Issues Arising During the Preliminary Inquiry

Mr. Lalonde's preliminary inquiry commenced on January 13, 1998. Constable Perry Dunlop was called by defence counsel to give evidence. It became evident during Constable Dunlop's testimony that he had not disclosed all documents in his possession relevant to the Marcel Lalonde prosecution.

Constable Dunlop stated in his testimony that he had seen Detective Constable Genier at the Court and thought "he would have everything [Perry Dunlop] provided to the OPP." In other words, Constable Dunlop appeared to be saying that Detective Constable Genier had all of the notes that he had given to the OPP.

On April 29, 1998, Crown Claudette Wilhelm asked Detective Constable Genier for "all notes from Constable Dunlop [to] be disclosed pertaining to Lalonde investigation." Detective Constable Genier's notes state that he did not find any notes pertaining to Constable Perry Dunlop's interview with C-8. He then spoke to Detective Sergeant Hall about the Crown's request. Detective Sergeant Hall advised that he had spoken to Constable Dunlop in October of 1997 and all notes pertaining to the Marcel Lalonde investigation were supposedly in the material received from Constable Dunlop.

Detective Constable Genier prepared a memo to Detective Sergeant Hall requesting him to contact Constable Dunlop to ascertain if he had any other information regarding Mr. Lalonde. Detective Sergeant Hall contacted Constable Dunlop, read to him the notes that the OPP had in its possession relating to Mr. Lalonde, and asked if Constable Dunlop had anything further in his possession. Detective Sergeant Hall pointed out that Constable Dunlop had indicated in his evidence at the preliminary inquiry that the OPP were in possession of all his notes but that very little was provided. Constable Dunlop advised that he would check his notes again and advise if he had any further information.

As I will explain below, Project Truth was in fact already in possession of relevant notes from Constable Dunlop that had not been disclosed to the Crown. However, Constable Dunlop also had notes in his possession that he had not disclosed to the OPP. It appears that no one realized this until just before the Lalonde trial was about to begin in the fall of 1999.

Constable Desrosiers testified that he was not aware that Constable Dunlop had provided any disclosure to Project Truth until he saw Detective Constable Genier's memorandum to Detective Sergeant Hall. In particular, he was not aware that Constable Dunlop had provided a yellow binder in October 1997, which contained notes relevant to Mr. Lalonde.

In joint investigations involving more than one police force, I would recommend that one officer be responsible for all disclosure requests. This officer should have a contact on the other force or forces who assist with disclosure, but one person should oversee and track which items have been disclosed to the Crown on behalf of all police forces involved in the investigation.

Disclosure Issues Around the First Trial Date

Mr. Lalonde was committed to trial following the preliminary inquiry, and a trial date was set for October 4, 1999. On September 29, 1999, defence counsel wrote to the Crown requesting notes taken by Constable Dunlop on September 11, 1996, and on December 12, 1996.

These notes were in the package of materials that Constable Dunlop had delivered to Project Truth in a yellow binder in October 1997. The disclosure of notes in Constable Dunlop's possession is described in detail in the section entitled "Interactions Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop." Both notes related to contact Constable Dunlop had with C-8; however, neither made any reference to Mr. Lalonde. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not believe there was anything in the yellow binders that was relevant for disclosure in the Marcel Lalonde prosecution.

In my view, any notes obtained by Project Truth that showed contact between Constable Dunlop and any of the complainants in the Marcel Lalonde prosecution ought to have been disclosed to the Crown upon receipt. Moreover, after Constable Dunlop's contact with C-8 was raised at the preliminary inquiry, it became quite clear that the Crown was interested in obtaining any notes that Constable Dunlop had made in this regard. Accordingly, it ought to have been apparent to the OPP that notes in its possession indicating such contact, whether or not they referred to Mr. Lalonde specifically, should have been disclosed to the Crown.

On October 1, 1999, Detective Constable Genier met with the Crown and was provided with notes that Constable Dunlop had given Constable Desrosiers the day before. In addition to the notes of September 11 and December 12, 1996, Constable Dunlop had disclosed another note dated November 19, 1996, that referred to a conversation between him and C-8 about Mr. Lalonde. Detective Constable Genier checked the Project Truth files and found a similar typed version of these handwritten notes. Detective Constable Genier's notes indicate he would disclose the material to defence counsel.

On the morning of October 4, 1999, the date scheduled for the start of the Marcel Lalonde trial, Crown Wilhelm requested more of the materials from Constable Dunlop that were in Project Truth's possession. Detective Constable Genier obtained two black binders that had been disclosed by Constable Dunlop to the OPP in July 1998 and reviewed them with Crown Wilhelm. Crown and defence counsel then went in chambers. Detective Constable Genier noted: "Matter will be adjourned because of victims being involved in other matters which defence claims sections pertain to accused—Lalonde." The trial was adjourned to September 11, 2000.

I note that if the matter had not been adjourned due to the late disclosure of the notes from Constable Dunlop, it would have had to have been adjourned for another reason. As I have discussed in detail in Chapter 6, on October 5, 1999, Constable Desrosiers learned of the 1989 investigation conducted by the CPS into allegations against Mr. Lalonde. This material had not yet been disclosed to the defence.

In the days following the adjournment of the trial, Crown Wilhelm met with Detective Constable Genier and Detective Sergeant Hall regarding the relevant materials in the possession of Project Truth and went to the Project Truth offices to review those materials. As a result, it appears from Detective Constable Genier's notes, further documents were identified and a package was sent to defence counsel including "all statements pertaining to Marcel Lalonde and Perry Dunlop." Detective Inspector Hall testified that he recalled Crown Wilhelm coming to the OPP offices and preparing a list of documents that she wanted for disclosure.

There is nothing before me to indicate what specifically was identified by Crown Wilhelm from the Project Truth files as relevant to the Marcel Lalonde prosecution. However, there were many areas of intersection between Project Truth and the Lalonde investigation that may have posed complications regarding disclosure.

For example, as mentioned above, on the day of Mr. Lalonde's arrest by the CPS, his residence was searched and a number of photographs were seized. One of these photographs was of Father MacDonald with two young people at the rectory. One of the young people was identified by Project Truth as C-107, whom Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall interviewed in December 1997.

Although this individual had no issues with Father MacDonald, he gave the officers information concerning possible abuse by Mr. Lalonde. Following the interview, C-107 mailed a statement to Detective Sergeant Hall disclosing abuse by Mr. Lalonde but indicating that he did not want to pursue criminal charges.

Given the overlap between the Marcel Lalonde investigation and Project Truth, in particular the joint victims and Constable Dunlop's involvement with some of those victims, it is not surprising that Project Truth came into possession of information that was relevant to the Marcel Lalonde prosecution. It is clear that information was not effectively and efficiently shared. In my view the OPP failed to develop and apply proper practices or protocols to ensure effective cooperation with the Cornwall Police Service and local OPP detachments, including disclosure procedures in relation to issues arising from the involvement of Constable Dunlop in Project Truth investigations.

Crown Claudette Wilhelm's Request for Assistance From the OPP

Detective Inspector Hall received a letter from Assistant Crown Attorney Wilhelm dated October 5, 1999, requesting that the OPP again attempt to obtain full disclosure from Constable Perry Dunlop. Crown Wilhelm also asked Detective Inspector Hall to speak with Constable Dunlop and ask him not to contact any of the complainants in the Marcel Lalonde case.

As I discuss in detail in the section "Interactions Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop," Detective Inspector Hall discussed Crown Wilhelm's letter and request with a number of people, including his superior officers, Detective Superintendent Larry Edgar and Detective Inspector Klancy Grasman, CPS Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie and Acting Inspector Rick Carter, and Marc Garson, Director of Crown Operations, Western Region. The discussions revolved around what they could do to obtain any additional materials in Constable Dunlop's possession and whether Constable Dunlop should be investigated for obstruction of justice. Detective Inspector Hall was advised by his superiors that he should not interview Constable Dunlop.

On October 28, 1999, Detective Inspector Hall replied to Ms Wilhelm's letter and informed her that he could not comply with her request to speak with Constable Dunlop. Detective Inspector Hall wrote that it "would not be prudent" for him to become involved with Constable Dunlop on matters not subject to the Project Truth investigation. Detective Inspector Hall also wrote:

While dealing with Project Truth matters, and as a Detective Sergeant, I had contact with Constable Perry Dunlop on numerous occasions regarding his disclosure in our matters. He has assured Project Truth officers that he has provided all disclosure relating to our investigation. I have no reason to believe otherwise at this time. (Emphasis added)

This comment from Detective Inspector Hall is in stark contrast to the information available at that time. In the fall of 1998 Constable Dunlop had refused to sign a memo confirming that he had made full disclosure. Nothing had occurred since that time that would demonstrate that full disclosure had been made. Quite to the contrary, the disclosure of the November 19, 1996, note demonstrated that Constable Dunlop had items in his possession that he had not given to the OPP. In addition, this statement is inconsistent with the discussions that Detective Inspector Hall was having with Staff Sergeant Derochie and Acting Inspector Carter around this time about investigating Constable Dunlop for obstruction of justice or obtaining a search warrant for his residence.

As discussed in Chapter 11, on November 19, 1999, Marc Garson issued an opinion following his meeting with Staff Sergeant Derochie. This opinion led to the preparation of a comprehensive order by the CPS to Constable Perry Dunlop in consultation with Assistant Crown Attorney Wilhelm. The order required Constable Dunlop to disclose all notes that he had related to the Marcel Lalonde case. Detective Constable Genier and Constable Desrosiers conducted a thorough review of the materials subsequently produced by Constable Dunlop to “avoid any further adjournment” in the Marcel Lalonde matter “due to undisclosed material on the part of Perry Dunlop.”

Marcel Lalonde’s Conviction

Marcel Lalonde’s trial was held in September 2000, and he was convicted on November 17, 2000, on charges relating to four of the complainants: C-45, C-8, C-66, and another individual. He was acquitted of charges in relation to the remaining complainants, including C-68. On May 3, 2001, Mr. Lalonde was sentenced to a period of incarceration of two years less a day.

Events Leading up to Project Truth

Constable Perry Dunlop’s Lawsuit and Private Investigation

As mentioned in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service, in June 1996, CPS Constable Perry Dunlop launched a lawsuit against the Cornwall Police Service, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, and a number of others, claiming over $40 million in damages. The lawsuit focused primarily on the events surrounding the illegal settlement with David Silmser and the subsequent Police Services Act charges that were brought against Constable Dunlop for disclosing Mr. Silmser's statement to the Children's Aid Society. The action alleged malicious prosecution, negligence, abuse of process, and defamation. It also alleged that the CPS's treatment of Constable Dunlop "was part of a greater conspiracy to keep a lid on allegations of sexual abuse involving prominent individuals in Cornwall which included Father Charles MacDonald and the late Ken Seguin."

Shortly after the statement of claim was issued in this lawsuit, Constable Dunlop's lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, sent a letter to then Ontario Provincial Police Commissioner Thomas O'Grady, requesting full disclosure of all documents from the investigations into "Father MacDonald, Ken Seguin, Angus Malcolm MacDonald, and the Cornwall Police Service" on the basis that these files contained information relevant to Constable Dunlop's civil suit.

Commissioner O'Grady forwarded the letter to Detective Inspector Tim Smith and asked him to respond. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he had never had a request from a civil lawyer like this before. He contacted Robert Pelletier, the Crown responsible for the Father MacDonald prosecution, who advised that it would be inappropriate for Detective Inspector Smith to provide the materials to Mr. Bourgeois while the criminal process was ongoing.

Detective Inspector Smith responded to Mr. Bourgeois by letter dated August 19, 1996, stating that he would not be provided with anything from the police files. Detective Inspector Smith did not believe that he heard from Mr. Bourgeois after that. Although Mr. Bourgeois may not have been pleased with it, I believe this was the most appropriate response to his request.

Beginning around June 1996 and continuing into spring 1997, Constable Dunlop, who was off work on sick leave, along with his wife, brother-in-law, and lawyer, began speaking to witnesses and alleged victims about allegations of sexual abuse in the Cornwall area. They compiled a number of witness statements and affidavits, some of which were used to support Constable Dunlop's civil action. This private investigation is described in detail in Chapter 6.

Constable Dunlop's statement of claim was amended on November 15, 1996. The most notable change was that the lawsuit now claimed that there was a "clan" of pedophiles from the Cornwall area who had sexually abused minors since 1957. Members of this group were alleged to have met at Stanley Island in late August or early September 1993 and conspired to cover up the criminal allegations against Father MacDonald and Mr. Seguin. Another amendment to the lawsuit alleged that the defendants "and other conspiring parties used their positions of supreme trust and authority to facilitate suppress and condone unlawful, illegal, immoral and perverse acts rather than consider the safety of children in the community.” Further, the amended statement of claim alleged that Father MacDonald, Malcolm MacDonald, and Mr. Seguin had conspired to injure Constable Dunlop and his immediate family.

Involvement of Chief Julian Fantino

On December 16, 1996, Charles Bourgeois contacted London Chief of Police Julian Fantino (now Commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police). Chief Fantino was known for his force’s work on a high-profile investigation into the sexual exploitation of boys called Project Guardian.

Mr. Bourgeois asked Chief Fantino to investigate the allegations of child sexual abuse that had been identified by Constable Dunlop. He wanted Chief Fantino to review an assortment of materials and provide feedback. Commissioner Fantino testified that at the time he had heard of Constable Dunlop through the media.

Commissioner Fantino testified that he felt it would be “totally inappropriate” to involve himself in this matter. He stated that he had no jurisdiction, no time to deal with it, and enough of his own work to do. Moreover, Commissioner Fantino testified that he told Mr. Bourgeois he did not wish to receive any material, would not provide feedback on it, and would not conduct an investigation of any kind. He told the Inquiry that he suggested that Mr. Bourgeois send the material to the CPS or to the Ontario Provincial Police’s Project P. However, Mr. Bourgeois wanted these documents to be reviewed by a third party. This was, in part, because of Constable Dunlop’s lack of trust in the local authorities. Mr. Bourgeois had no specific recollection of the conversation but confirmed in his testimony that Chief Fantino referred him to Project P.

On December 19, 1996, Chief Fantino received a package from Mr. Bourgeois consisting of a binder with seventy-four tabs, a videotape, and some audiotapes. The binder contained statements and affidavits from a number of alleged victims and witnesses, pictures of and background information on various priests and other alleged perpetrators, the amended statement of claim for Constable Dunlop’s civil action against the CPS and others, assorted media articles, the charge sheet of the Police Services Act charges against Constable Dunlop, as well as related judicial decisions, and an excerpt from the book Boys Don’t Cry. These materials became known as the “Fantino Brief.”

In the accompanying covering letter, Mr. Bourgeois wrote, “[M]y clients and I sincerely appreciate the considerable time, effort and commitment you will be affording this case,” and, “After so many failed attempts, they feel you are the man for the job.” The letter went on to say, “We would greatly appreciate your opinions and direction concerning this matter and await your reply on Monday, January 6, 1997.”

Commissioner Fantino conceded that the wording of the covering letter suggests that he had agreed to review the materials but said that was “totally contrary” to what he had told Mr. Bourgeois several days before. Commissioner Fantino testified that Mr. Bourgeois was dismissive of all that he had said and was intent on sending him the material “no matter what.” My view is that Mr. Bourgeois and the Dunlops were desperate to have this matter dealt with by someone in authority.

Commissioner Fantino believed that he first saw the letter and materials in January 1997. After “perusing” the material to determine what should be done with it, Chief Fantino was “more convinced than ever that the material was not anything that [he] needed or should have had in [his] possession” and that the material should be turned over to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP). He met with Detective Chief Superintendent Wayne Frechette, then head of the OPP’s Criminal Investigation Bureau, in early February 1997 and gave the material to him. Chief Fantino considered this to be the end of his role in the matter. He did not contact Mr. Bourgeois or the Dunlops to acknowledge receipt of the materials or to tell them that he had forwarded them to the OPP. Chief Fantino thought Mr. Bourgeois had been discourteous in sending him the materials and testified that he felt that he was “being used.”

I commend Commissioner Fantino for taking the initiative to ensure that the materials were forwarded to the proper authorities. However, I find it unfortunate that he did not inform Mr. Bourgeois of what he did with the materials, which might have reduced Constable Dunlop’s sense of frustration in convincing someone to look into these allegations.

After a discussion among senior officers at the OPP Headquarters in Orillia, a decision was made to give the Fantino Brief to Detective Inspector Tim Smith. He received it on or around February 18, 1997. Detective Inspector Smith thought that he was chosen to look over the brief because he had been involved in the 1994 investigations in Cornwall and, at the time, no one else had comparable experience in the investigation of historical child sexual abuse. Though Detective Inspector Smith had recent experience investigating historical sexual assaults in the St. Joseph’s and St. John’s Training School cases, he did not have any experience in investigating historical sexual assaults outside an institutional setting, aside from his 1994 investigation into allegations against Father Charles MacDonald.

Detective Inspector Smith received his instructions in a telephone call from Detective Chief Superintendent Frechette. He was not given any specific directions, but rather was told to “take care of it.” Detective Inspector Smith informed Detective Chief Superintendent Frechette that he was planning to retire soon and that he would only be able to work on the matter for a year.

After he received the brief, Detective Inspector Smith contacted Chief Fantino, whom he knew personally. Chief Fantino expressed his view that the way he had received the materials was improper but told Detective Inspector Smith that the brief appeared to be well prepared and that it contained a number of allegations that required investigation. Chief Fantino also gave Detective Inspector Smith some advice based on his experience in Project Guardian, particularly in relation to victim services.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that after he reviewed the brief, he knew that it was going to require a large-scale investigation. In addition, around the same time that the Fantino Brief was being referred to and reviewed by Detective Inspector Smith, other information related to the brief was coming to light, including information contained in the videotaped statements of Ron Leroux and C-8 and further documentation relating to Constable Dunlop's action against the CPS. According to Detective Inspector Smith, "documentation was floating all over the place ... at this period of time."

Ron Leroux's Complaint to the OPP in Orillia

In the same month that the OPP received the Fantino Brief, Ron Leroux gave a statement to two OPP officers in Orillia outlining allegations similar to those contained in the brief.

On February 7, 1997, Mr. Leroux arrived at the OPP Headquarters in Orillia with Mr. Bourgeois to give a statement. According to Mr. Bourgeois, this had been arranged pursuant to Chief Fantino's suggestion to him that they report the allegations in the Fantino Brief to the OPP's Project P. Mr. Leroux and Mr. Bourgeois met with Detective Constables Dan Anthony and Catherine Bell, and Mr. Leroux gave two videotaped statements, the first lasting several hours.

During the first videotaped statement, Mr. Leroux read aloud from two documents that had been included in the Fantino Brief: his statement to Constable Dunlop on December 4, 1996, and his affidavit dated November 13, 1996. In addition to reading these statements, Mr. Leroux expanded on certain points throughout. Detective Constables Anthony and Bell also asked a number of follow-up questions about issues raised in the statements.

In the course of the first interview, Mr. Leroux made a number of allegations about instances of sexual abuse that he had experienced or witnessed, and, further, made allegations about a "clan" of pedophiles operating in or around the Cornwall area.

In particular, Mr. Leroux claimed to have witnessed the abuse of several boys at a religious retreat at Cameron's Point where sheets were put over the boys' heads and candles placed in their rectums. Mr. Leroux also claimed that several priests had abused him. He made a number of allegations about Malcolm MacDonald, who he said abused children in his law office. Mr. Leroux claimed that some of the children, after being abused by their lawyer, would "go upstairs to probation office and get it again.” He also referred to videotapes seized from his home by the OPP in 1993 (see “Videotapes Found in Ron Leroux’s House by the OPP” earlier in this chapter). He claimed the tapes belonged to Ken Seguin, that they contained homemade child pornography, and that the majority of it was made by Mr. Seguin.

In the course of the interview, Mr. Leroux described a “clan” of pedophiles in Cornwall. He said he saw “clan” members with adolescent male prostitutes during trips to Fort Lauderdale, Florida. The “clan” also met at the parish house in St. Andrews and at Malcolm MacDonald’s cottage on Stanley Island near Summerstown, Ontario. Mr. Leroux said boys were brought to the cottage and molested by various members of the group.

Mr. Leroux claimed that the members of the “clan” were well-connected, and he insinuated they were able to avoid criminal prosecution. He described the group having a “VIP meeting” at Malcolm MacDonald’s cottage in late August or early September 1993, after which Mr. Seguin had told Mr. Leroux the allegations against Mr. Seguin were settled.

Mr. Leroux also claimed the clan was “prepared to take human lives to continue the cover up for sexual improprieties” and mentioned, in particular, that Mr. Seguin, Malcolm MacDonald, and Father Charles Macdonald had threatened to kill Constable Dunlop and his family. However, Mr. Leroux told the officers later in the interview that he did not think the men were capable of carrying out the threat and that they were just “ranting and raving.”

The Project Truth investigation eventually revealed that few of Mr. Leroux’s claims were well founded and most others were greatly exaggerated or simply untrue. Many elements of Mr. Leroux’s statement became the basis for rumours and gossip within the media and the Cornwall community. It is significant to note, therefore, that at this Inquiry, Mr. Leroux testified that a number of things he said in his various statements were false. In particular, Mr. Leroux testified that he had not witnessed a ritual at the Cameron’s Point retreat involving sheets and candles. He further admitted that he did not even know some of the people he had identified as belonging to the “clan” of pedophiles.

Mr. Leroux testified that Constable Dunlop and Mr. Bourgeois told him to leave the names in the statement because someone else would know them. Mr. Bourgeois, on the other hand, testified that he did not know on February 7, 1997, that parts of Mr. Leroux’s affidavit were false, and he denied telling Mr. Leroux to leave in the names of individuals he could not identify.

However, a few of Mr. Leroux’s claims were consistent with statements made by others and with evidence uncovered by Project Truth. For example, a number of complainants came forward and alleged that they had been abused by Malcolm MacDonald, and he was arrested by Project Truth based on some of these allegations. Numerous individuals also told Project Truth that they were abused by probation officer Ken Seguin. In addition, Project Truth learned that tapes containing some form of pornography were seized from Mr. Leroux's home in 1993 and were then destroyed by the OPP.

I believe that Mr. Bourgeois and Constable Dunlop did not intentionally influence Mr. Leroux. However, Mr. Leroux was a highly suggestible individual, and because of the use of leading questions in Constable Dunlop's interviews with him, he adopted certain ideas that were put to him as his own.

The allegations made by Mr. Leroux were not immediately investigated by the OPP. Helen Dunlop later told Detective Sergeant Pat Hall and Constable Steve Seguin that she was told that the investigations were being forwarded to the OPP's Major Cases Unit.

Assignment of Detective Sergeant Pat Hall to the Death Threat Investigation

On March 14, 1997, Constable Dunlop contacted Detective Constable Anthony in Orillia and asked for a formal investigation into the death threats that had allegedly been made against him and his family.

A few days later, on March 18, 1997, Helen Dunlop contacted Constable Seguin at the OPP's Long Sault Detachment to inquire about the status of the death threats investigation. Constable Seguin then contacted Orillia and was informed that Detective Inspector Smith was the contact on the file.

The following day, Detective Inspector Smith spoke to Detective Inspector Klancy Grasman at the Criminal Investigation Bureau, who asked him what was being done about the death threats. Detective Inspector Smith told Detective Inspector Grasman that he had been away, but said that he would look into the matter. It is apparent from Detective Inspector Smith's notes that he was previously aware of the allegations of death threats made by Mr. Leroux to the Orillia officers. Detective Inspector Smith later told Detective Sergeant Pat Hall that he was concerned that the Dunlops would file a complaint against the OPP for not acting sooner. Detective Inspector Smith called Helen Dunlop and advised her that he would be supervising the investigation, which was to be conducted by other officers.

Detective Inspector Smith then contacted Chief Superintendent R.J. Eamer and asked that Detective Sergeant Hall be assigned to investigate the complaint, with the assistance of Constable Seguin. Detective Sergeant Hall then worked out of the Criminal Investigation Unit of #10 District Headquarters. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he requested Detective Sergeant Hall because he hoped to involve him in the investigation of the other issues raised in the Fantino Brief. Detective Inspector Smith knew that he would not be able to investigate the Fantino Brief on a full-time basis and he wanted to bring in an experienced investigator. Detective Sergeant Hall, who initially hoped to retire at the end of July 1997, was unaware of Detective Inspector Smith's broader plans.

Detective Inspector Smith called Detective Sergeant Hall that day, March 19, 1997, and briefly explained the death threats complaint to him. The investigation of the death threats is described in a later section of this chapter.

Project Truth: Initial Meetings Between OPP and Crowns

After Detective Inspector Tim Smith reviewed the Fantino Brief, he contacted Crown Robert Pelletier on March 18, 1997, and set up a meeting for March 20. At the meeting, Detective Inspector Smith provided Mr. Pelletier with the brief and they discussed whether any of the materials in it needed to be disclosed to the defence in the Father Charles MacDonald prosecution. They decided that Mr. Pelletier would review the brief and set up a meeting with the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) and Peter Griffiths, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region.

This meeting was scheduled for April 24, 1997. Detective Inspector Smith invited Detective Sergeant Pat Hall and Detective Constables Don Genier and Michael Fagan to attend. Detective Sergeant Hall had the Fantino Brief at this time but was not aware of all the allegations in it. He testified that he had very little to say at the meeting.

In addition to Mr. Griffiths and Mr. Pelletier, local Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald was also present. My views on Crown MacDonald's presence at the meeting are discussed in Chapter 11, dealing with the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

It was decided at this meeting that the OPP would investigate all of the allegations in the Fantino Brief. Mr. Griffiths agreed to write a letter to the OPP formally requesting an investigation.

Before the meeting, Detective Inspector Smith determined that the investigation should take the form of a special project. Although Detective Inspector Smith testified that he did not really want to take this on because he had just finished a major investigation, he also said that "there was nobody else really at the time ... that ... had the qualifications I had to do this." The other participants agreed that he should lead the investigation with a team of officers working under his direction.

Peter Griffiths testified that he did not have any reservations about asking Detective Inspector Smith to take on the case, notwithstanding the fact that the officer would be required to revisit his previous investigation into the conspiracy allegations (discussed earlier in this chapter). Citing the arrest of Father MacDonald in 1996, Mr. Griffiths noted that Detective Inspector Smith had demonstrated that he was capable of changing his opinion and laying charges when new information was uncovered.

Unfortunately, there was no discussion at the meeting about how to properly frame the mandate of this special project. Both Mr. Griffiths and Mr. Pelletier believed that some of the allegations relating to the “clan of pedophiles” were not well-founded. Yet there was no discussion about whether all the allegations should be investigated. Mr. Griffiths testified that although certain allegations “didn’t have a ring of truth about them ... stranger things have happened in the world and that’s why I asked that the entire brief be investigated.”

I do not criticize the decision at the April 24 meeting to take all of the allegations contained in the Fantino Brief seriously. I do question the OPP’s apparent failure to determine for itself the most appropriate way to investigate sexual abuse in the Cornwall area. It appears that the scope of the investigation was dictated by the information collected by Constable Perry Dunlop, rather than by a rational and well-thought-out strategy developed by the OPP. As I discuss in the section “Project Truth’s Mandate,” this led to the creation of a mandate that provided insufficient structure and focus for Project Truth.

My other criticism of this meeting relates to note taking. Although this was the founding meeting for a major investigation, none of the participants took minutes or detailed notes of what was decided. Detective Inspector Smith took some brief point-form notes of the key points:

Review allegations + invest to date.

Review Dunlop brief + allegations.

Decision—finish preliminary witnesses MacDonald + Silmsen.

Ask for an adj. [adjournment] prior to decision. Police investigate new allegations.

Disclose Dunlop brief to Neville.

Investigate all allegations.

Letter of request to be made to Supt. Larry Edgar by Peter Griffiths.

Detective Sergeant Hall’s notes are equally sparse. Given the magnitude and scope of the investigation contemplated, it would have been appropriate to have a note taker present and to write a report following the meeting.

It is clear to me that the participants at this meeting were not all aware of the enormity of the task they had undertaken. Detective Inspector Smith told Detective Sergeant Hall that the investigation would take from six months to one year. Detective Sergeant Hall had been planning to take advantage of a special option that would allow him to retire on July 31, 1997, but he withdrew his retirement request and agreed to take on the investigation, thinking that it would run until about April 1998, at which point he could retire at any time with two weeks notice. Mr. Griffiths testified that he had no idea that the investigation would last several years, involve hundreds of interviews, and compile over thirty Crown briefs.

Detective Wendy Leaver, an expert in the investigation of historical sexual offences, testified that she found many officers involved in these cases “had no idea” how a pedophile operates and would underestimate the number of victims involved. Historical sex abuse cases, she said, require specialized investigations that “demand resources and commitment and a long investigation.” Given their involvement in the Alfred investigations, which lasted seven years, Mr. Griffiths and Detective Inspector Smith should have known this, and I therefore find their expectations somewhat puzzling.

Quick action was not taken on all items discussed at the meeting. A month later, on May 27, 1997, after a follow-up call from Detective Inspector Smith, Mr. Griffiths prepared the agreed-upon letter to Detective Superintendent Larry Edgar of the OPP’s Criminal Investigation Bureau requesting “that Det. Insp. Smith be assigned to investigate the Dunlop/Bourgeois brief.”

Mr. Griffiths was appointed as a judge of the Ontario Court of Justice in May 1998. After writing this letter, his involvement in what was to become Project Truth was minimal.

Constable Perry Dunlop Delivers Government Brief to Ministries

On April 8, 1997, approximately two weeks before the April 24 meeting between the OPP officers and the Crowns, Constable Perry Dunlop attempted to deliver a set of four binders, a tape of the Fifth Estate episode featuring him, and a covering letter to three different institutions: the Ministry of the Attorney General, the Ministry of the Solicitor General, and the Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services (OCCPS).

The binders contained the same documents as the Fantino Brief plus some additional materials, including three new statements from victims and materials disclosed during the Police Services Act charges against Constable Dunlop. The materials in these binders are referred to throughout this Report as the “Government Brief.”

The covering letter was seven pages long and set out numerous allegations of sexual abuse, as well as an allegation that the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and others had conspired to obstruct justice. It also explained some of the history of the case.

Constable Dunlop first went to the Ministry of the Solicitor General and met with John Periversoff, Special Assistant, Policing Office of the Deputy Solicitor General. Mr. Periversoff accepted the letter from Constable Dunlop but declined to take the binders. He agreed to sign a receipt for the letter.

Constable Dunlop then went to OCCPS but was unable to meet with its chairperson, Murray Chitra. He left his entire package with a clerk-assistant, who signed a receipt for him.

Constable Dunlop's last stop was the Ministry of the Attorney General. Michael Austin, Records and Support Assistant, accepted the full package of materials and signed a receipt for them.

Only Solicitor General's Materials Passed on to the OPP

Unfortunately, only the Ministry of the Solicitor General passed the material it received on to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP). Because the Ministry had accepted only Constable Dunlop's covering letter, the OPP did not receive the binders that Constable Dunlop had attempted to deliver with it. OCCPS held onto the material and did not transfer it to anyone. OCCPS first contacted the OPP about the materials in July 1998 when the issue was raised in the media. All that is known about the Government Brief that was delivered to the Ministry of the Attorney General is that the Ministry was later unable to locate it. This controversy is discussed in more detail later in this chapter in the section entitled "External Pressures: The Media, Websites and Garry Guzzo" and in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Indications to OPP That Constable Dunlop Delivered Additional Materials

The OPP did not obtain a copy of the Government Brief until July 31, 1998, over a year after it had been delivered. However, in April 1997, it received several indications that Constable Dunlop had produced additional materials. Helen Dunlop told Detective Sergeant Pat Hall on April 4, 1997, that her husband was going to Toronto to deliver a package to the Solicitor General that week. Detective Sergeant Hall did not ask Ms Dunlop what these materials were or request a copy of them.

On April 14, 1997, Detective Inspector Smith also learned of the delivery of the binders. He received a call from Bart Caron of the Policing Services Division of the Ministry of the Solicitor General. Mr. Caron told him that Constable Dunlop had delivered a package and a letter to the Ministry of the Solicitor General, which had refused it and referred it to OCCPS. Mr. Caron told Detective Inspector Smith that he would provide him with a copy of Constable Dunlop's letter. Detective Inspector Smith failed to follow up with OCCPS in order to obtain the materials that were sent to it. Like Detective Sergeant Hall, Detective Inspector Smith should have mentioned the delivery of the binders at the April 24 meeting at which the Fantino Brief was discussed.

The OPP did receive the covering letter that was sent to the Solicitor General at or around the time of the April 24 meeting. The letter lists “four volumes of documents” as one of the enclosures. In the body of the letter, Constable Dunlop describes the documents that he received as disclosure through the Police Services Act hearing. The Fantino Brief consisted of only one binder and did not include the Police Services Act investigative materials. These discrepancies should have led the OPP to consider whether the materials delivered by Constable Dunlop on April 8 contained information not already in their possession.

Notwithstanding the above, Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall became aware of the fact that Constable Dunlop had produced material in addition to the Fantino Brief only in July 1998. They received a copy of the Government Brief from Constable Dunlop on July 31, 1998. In a later section entitled “Interactions Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop,” I explain how the OPP became aware of these new materials and the effect of their delayed disclosure on the Project Truth investigation.

Constable Dunlop Is Told OPP Will Investigate All Allegations

On April 30, 1997, Detective Sergeant Hall left a voice mail message with the Dunlops, informing them that the brief sent to Chief Fantino had been forwarded to the OPP and that the OPP would be investigating all of the allegations. Since Constable Dunlop had not delivered his updated brief, containing three new statements from victims, to the OPP, it is unfortunate that he did not ensure that the investigators had received it. However, the responsibility for the delay must be attributed to the government agencies who accepted the materials but failed to forward them to the appropriate authority.

On May 1, 1997, Solicitor General Robert Runciman wrote to Constable Dunlop confirming that he had received Constable Dunlop’s letter and stating that it would be inappropriate for his Ministry to become involved in operational policing matters. He informed Constable Dunlop that his concerns were being investigated by the OPP and said, “If you have new information that may assist the investigators, I would strongly urge you to make your concerns known to the investigators, as these allegations properly fall within the jurisdiction of the OPP.” He suggested that Constable Dunlop should report the misconduct of police officers in accordance with the Police Services Act. Mr. Runciman enclosed a brochure entitled “How To File a Complaint Involving a Police Officer.”

Peter Griffiths, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, also replied to Constable Dunlop’s letter to the Solicitor General on June 23, 1997. He informed Constable Dunlop that the materials that were given to Chief Fantino had been brought to the attention of the OPP, which was investigating the allegations of sexual assault.

Initial Plan and Initial Coordination Meetings for Project Truth

On May 14, 1997, Detective Inspector Tim Smith, Detective Sergeant Pat Hall, Detective Constable Steve Seguin, and Detective Constable Don Genier met with Detective Inspector Leo Sweeney to put together a plan for the investigation discussed at the April 24 meeting. Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall decided to name the special project “Project Truth” because the purpose of the investigation was to discover the truth behind the allegations in Constable Perry Dunlop’s materials.

Recent Major Investigations Into Child Sexual Abuse In Eastern Ontario

In putting together the plan for Project Truth, the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) had experience from two recent major investigations on historical child sexual abuse that it had conducted in the area to draw upon.

Project Jericho was a joint investigation between the OPP, the Prescott Police and child welfare investigations from Family and Children’s Services. It began as a result of allegations of sexual abuse in Prescott that were first disclosed in 1989. Early in the investigation, in March 1990, a Crown prosecutor was assigned to the case and was consulted on charges. Victim/Witness Assistance Program (VWAP) services were available from Janet Lee, who was seconded on a full-time basis to Project Jericho.

Project Jericho uncovered historical and ongoing abuse. The investigation led to a total of 275 victims (current and historical cases) and 119 alleged perpetrators (both male and female). Project Jericho was considered a success on many levels, and according to Dr. Peter Jaffe, it is an example of moving from a horrific tragedy to development of some hope and efforts at prevention.

The second recent major OPP investigation into historical sexual abuse was an investigation into allegations of abuse at the St. Joseph’s Training School in Alfred. St. Joseph’s was a school operated by Christian Brothers. The allegations surfaced when a reporter interviewing a number of individuals noticed that quite a few of them were alleging historical sexual abuse. The matter was brought to the attention of the OPP, and Detective Inspector Smith was assigned as the case manager in early 1990. The investigative team was solely composed of OPP officers. Cosette Chafe was seconded on a full-time basis to the Alfred investigations, where there were five VWAP positions set up before the preliminary inquiries began. Robert Pelletier was assigned to head a five-member prosecution team which included Murray MacDonald.³⁰

30. Four of the five Crowns were assigned to Alfred prosecutions full-time.

After approximately a year of investigation, there were dozens of suspects and several hundred complainants. The investigators provided the Crown with 8,000 pages of victim statements and requested recommendations on charges. The initial investigation, the subsequent investigation, the consultation, the laying of charges and the prosecution all flowed seamlessly, according to Mr. Pelletier. As a result of the investigation, twenty people were charged with regard to 165 complainants. The prosecutions took three years to complete.

The Operational Plan for Project Truth

Detective Inspector Smith had begun work on an operational plan in March 1997. He met with Detective Sergeant Hall again on June 5, 1997, to put together the plan that would be submitted to OPP Headquarters for approval. Both officers had experience in writing such plans. Detective Inspector Smith wrote the portion that set out the overview of the investigation, and Detective Sergeant Hall drafted the request for financial resources.

The operational plan gave an estimate of the size and scope of the investigation, the resources, including human resources, required for the investigation, and the manner in which it would be conducted.

The initial funding request for the project was for $136,260. This budget included vehicle rental, travel throughout the province to interview victims and witnesses, accommodation and meals, office rental, the salary of a secretary, and the equipment and supplies required for the project. This budget did not include the officers' salaries, and it had been agreed that the officers assigned to the project would work eight-hour shifts and thus would receive little or no overtime pay for project work.

Although Detective Inspector Smith had initially convinced Detective Sergeant Hall to become involved on the understanding that the investigation was to take from six months to one year, the operational plan submitted to the Criminal Investigation Bureau stated, "It is anticipated that this project will require at least one year to complete." The plan warned that a shorter investigation would be detrimental to the ultimate success of subsequent prosecutions:

Experience in previous large scale sexual abuse investigations involving male victims has shown that it is difficult to accurately estimate the number of potential victims that may ultimately report abuse. Male victims of sexual abuse struggle with disclosing what may have occurred and do not readily come forward. In some cases it can take months if not years to report the abuse. Should an investigation be conducted with haste, charges laid and legal proceedings commenced, experience has shown further victims will come forward causing extreme difficulties with disclosure and problems within the judicial process. Many times the results are piecemeal prosecutions which result in acquittals, stays of prosecution or the withdrawal of charges.

According to Detective Inspector Hall, Detective Inspector Smith wrote this section based on his experience with the St. Joseph's Training School investigations and prosecutions. Detective Inspector Hall believed that Detective Inspector Smith was referring to the fact that victims are often reluctant to be the first to come forward, but that once one person comes forward, other victims typically make allegations.

The plan noted that at least eighteen suspected pedophiles would be under investigation. It also stated:

Many studies into the abuse of paedophiles, indicates this type of sexual behaviour is not perpetrated in random isolated incidents, but is a continuing and constant course of action involving multiple victims over a period of many years.

The authors of the plan appear to have had a good sense of the problems that could arise in a multi-victim, multi-offender investigation in terms of the large numbers of victims who may come forward. However, they vastly underestimated the time that would be required to complete the investigation and the resources, both financial and human, that would be needed. Experienced officers like Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall should have known that one year was not sufficient for this type of project.

Some of the officers assigned to Project Truth testified that they often worked more than a regular workday. Detective Constable Seguin said, "[T]his is one of those all-consuming investigations ... it kind of takes over your life." Detective Inspector Hall said that he was forced to limit overtime even though there was enough work to have the officers working twelve hours a day or on weekends.

Detective Inspector Smith emphasized the dedication of the officers who joined Project Truth, explaining that they missed overtime pay that they would have received if they stayed at their local detachments. It seems to me that limits on overtime pay placed an arbitrary cap on the investigation. Once they became aware of the enlarged scope of the investigation, Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall should have had some discretion in determining when overtime was necessary, and the OPP should have made additional resources available if and when they were requested.

Understaffing an investigation like Project Truth does a disservice to potential victims and to the police officers involved. Dr. Peter Jaffe testified before me that officers and other professionals exposed to sexual assault cases can experience a type of “vicarious trauma”:

... I think it's one of the things that shuts down investigations. People don't want to talk about it. People don't want to deal with it. It's very painful and I've been involved with many police officers and Crown attorneys who were impacted in a very profound way and can't carry on investigations or prosecutions because the level at which this touches them in their own life, their own connection to the community and also their own children who they now see as vulnerable in a different way.

In the course of the hearings, I heard from experts who testified about the overwhelming nature of multi-victim, multi-offender investigations like Project Truth. In relation to large historical cases, Detective Wendy Leaver said, “I believe our officers try to do the best they can with the training they have ... It's almost an impossible task to deal with it.” Similarly, Dr. Jaffe testified that multi-victim, multi-offender matters are complex and overwhelm local resources because they are “beyond what any individual agency is usually designed to deal with.”

For this reason, adequate funding and organizational support are crucial. So too is collaboration with other relevant agencies, including child protection services, school boards, and the Crown attorney, and I discuss this need further in other portions of this Report.

Selection of Officers

Detective Inspector Smith was in part responsible for the strains on his officers' time because he wanted the investigation to be carried out by a small team. He explained the rationale for this approach as follows:

The advantage of having a small team is that everybody knows everything that's going on, and I call it participatory type management. It includes the investigators, a supervisor, myself, everybody has input. We listen to everybody's ideas and then we plan a direction and we go in that direction. So, if one officer, for example, got sick or was unable to attend, one of the other officers could pick it up because he would know that other officer's case.

Detective Inspector Smith explained that the investigators assigned to him during the St. Joseph's Training School investigation were not qualified to do historical sexual assault investigations. In addition, they came from all over Ontario, which led to lost time and other aggravations. For Project Truth, Detective Inspector Smith wanted a small team of local officers whom he could train and who wanted to work on the project.

Detective Inspector Smith initially wanted six officers to be assigned to Project Truth. This included himself, Detective Sergeant Hall, and four officers who would work in teams of two, with an older officer and a younger officer on each team. Detective Sergeant Hall would supervise the two teams. There would be at least one bilingual officer among them.

However, only Detective Constables Genier and Seguin were initially assigned in addition to Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall. A third Detective Constable, Joe Dupuis, joined the team in September 1997, after Claude Marleau and C-96 came forward with allegations against ten additional perpetrators.

Pat Hall held the rank of detective sergeant when he was assigned to Project Truth in 1997 and was promoted to detective inspector in April 1999. Detective Sergeant Hall had experience conducting and supervising sexual assault investigations. He had worked on cases of historical sexual abuse, both in institutional and non-institutional settings. He had taken a number of training courses on sexual assaults and sexual abuse, including the joint Children's Aid Society–police training that was offered by the Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse. The last course he had taken dealing with sexual assault was in December 1990, almost seven years before the beginning of Project Truth. Detective Sergeant Hall also had some experience in investigating other police officers. Between 1996 and 1999 he was responsible for conducting investigations into misconduct under the Police Services Act as well as into criminal actions by municipal police officers and other members of the OPP.

Detective Inspector Smith thought very highly of Detective Sergeant Hall. During the hearing, Detective Inspector Smith said:

So the best officer that I know in the OPP, and I have dealt with him for years and years, who should have been in the CIB [Criminal Investigation Bureau] but for some reason wasn't, was a fellow by the name of Pat Hall. Most experienced investigator that I know. If I was going to take this case then I wanted him.

Detective Constable Steve Seguin was the most junior member of the Project Truth team. He was hired by the OPP in 1991. When he was assigned to Project Truth in May 1997, he was promoted to the rank of detective constable. Detective

Constable Seguin had some training in sexual assault investigations through the Intermediate Constable Level IV course and the Criminal Investigations Course, but he had not taken any specialized courses on the subject. He had investigated a number of sexual assaults prior to joining Project Truth, although none of these cases involved historical allegations of male-on-male abuse.

Detective Constable Seguin remained assigned to Project Truth until January 2000. He continued to assist with various matters after leaving the project and returned to the project full-time between February 2004 and October 2005.

The second Detective Constable assigned to Project Truth was Don Genier. Detective Constable Genier was the only member of the team who spoke French. In conjunction with the Cornwall Police Service, he had investigated the allegations of sexual abuse perpetrated by Marcel Lalonde, and he was assisting the Crown with disclosure obligations and other pre-trial matters on that case when Project Truth began.

A third Detective Constable, Joe Dupuis, was assigned to Project Truth in September 1997. Joe Dupuis became an OPP officer in 1972 and retired in May 2003. He had taken the Criminal Investigations Course, but no courses that were solely devoted to sexual assault investigations.

Other officers had been considered for the team but were not available or turned the assignment down. None of the Detective Constables had experience or training in investigating historical sexual assaults.

It is unfortunate that the OPP did not draw on the officers in the region who had experience investigating historical and non-institutional sexual abuse, such as those involved in Project Jericho. The Project Truth team also failed to make use of the Regional Sexual Abuse Coordinator and her Assistant Coordinator, who were in place at the time.

No female officers were considered for positions on Project Truth. Although the allegations in the Fantino Brief primarily involved male-on-male abuse, Project Truth's mandate was not limited to male victims, and a number of female victims did in fact come forward. In addition, some male victims may prefer to speak to a female officer about their experience. It is my view that victims should be given a choice as to the gender of the officer.

Another problem with the team selected was that it put a strain on the work force in the local detachments. Both Detective Constables Genier and Dupuis were based out of the Long Sault Detachment before joining Project Truth. Detective Inspector Smith was concerned about taking too many resources from the region, and asked for Detective Constable Dupuis only after he was unable to obtain an officer from another jurisdiction whom he had requested. The Long Sault Detachment was left short-staffed, which contributed to significant problems, including a failure to act on a complaint about Jean Luc Leblanc that is discussed later in this chapter.

The final member of the Project Truth team was Marion Burns, the project's administrative assistant.

Mandate

During the spring of 1997, Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall developed the mandate for Project Truth, based on the materials contained in the Fantino Brief and the statement given by Ron Leroux to the OPP in Orillia in February 1997. I discuss the mandate at length in a separate section of this chapter. It is sufficient to say here that the mandate was largely based on the allegations contained in the Fantino Brief and had two components: (1) to investigate individual allegations of sexual abuse in Cornwall and area, both historical and ongoing; and (2) to examine an alleged conspiracy among some of the suspects, as well as the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, the Crown attorney, and the Cornwall Police Service.

Interactions With Other Institutions

Involvement of the Crown

The initial plan for Project Truth called for Crown attorneys to play a role in reviewing evidence gathered by police and to give advice on the laying of charges. This is not the norm in most police investigations but is more common in special projects. Typically, the police make decisions about whether they have reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge without input from the Crown. There are a number of reasons for consulting the Crown in cases of historical sexual abuse, however, and Detective Inspector Smith had used this approach in some of his prior investigations.

Due to amendments to sexual assault provisions in the Criminal Code, the police sometimes required advice on which charges to lay. In addition, historical allegations can be more difficult to prove at trial because of the lack of physical evidence and the fading memories of victims and witnesses. Thus, the police may consult with the Crown to determine whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction based on the evidence available, rather than laying charges prematurely. Unfortunately, as described elsewhere in this Report, in some cases there were significant delays in receiving an opinion from the Crown. These delays are explained in part by the fact that no dedicated Crown was assigned to Project Truth. I discuss this issue in Chapter 11, "Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General."

Initial Meetings With the Cornwall Police Service (CPS)

In the months when the OPP was putting together the plan for Project Truth, Detective Inspector Smith had a number of meetings with the CPS to inform them of the investigation and to coordinate their work.

CPS Chief Anthony Repa initially contacted Detective Inspector Smith on April 16, 1997, and informed him of the allegations made by Constable Perry Dunlop in his civil action against the Cornwall police and others. Detective Inspector Smith testified that Chief Repa volunteered to send him a copy of the amended statement of claim. Detective Inspector Smith wanted to compare this document to the one he had received in the Fantino Brief.

Detective Inspector Smith sent Chief Repa a formal letter a few days later to inform him that the OPP would be investigating all criminal allegations contained in the civil action, regardless of where the crimes had taken place. Detective Inspector Smith informed Chief Repa of the upcoming April 24 meeting with regional Crown Peter Griffiths. Chief Repa testified that he would have promised Detective Inspector Smith the full cooperation of the Cornwall Police Service.

Chief Repa did not recall if he received any documentation about the matters that had been decided at the April 24 meeting. However, on May 14, 1997, Detective Inspector Smith informed him that he would be investigating all of the allegations made by Constable Dunlop and Charles Bourgeois, both in Cornwall and in the surrounding area. Detective Inspector Smith recalled that Chief Repa insisted that he did not want Project Truth to become a task force that investigated every sexual assault in town. Detective Inspector Smith agreed and told him that the OPP was to look at the allegations made in the Fantino Brief. Unfortunately, no formal protocol was put in place, and issues did arise with respect to overlapping jurisdiction. These are discussed below in the section addressing Project Truth's mandate.

Detective Inspector Smith also asked Chief Repa if he could set up a meeting to speak to Constable Dunlop and "lay down some ground rules." Detective Inspector Smith testified that he wanted to thank Constable Dunlop for his brief and ask him to refer complainants to the OPP and to refrain from making comments in the press that could jeopardize the investigation. This meeting is discussed in more detail in the section "Interactions Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop."

Chief Repa tasked Inspector Richard Trew to act as a liaison between the two police forces. He was to ensure that the OPP received any documents needed from the CPS. Inspector Trew was also to deal with Constable Dunlop and ensure that he turned over all material in his possession to the OPP. Inspector Trew was chosen for this role primarily because he was one of the few people at the upper level of the CPS who was not being sued by Constable Dunlop. Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie replaced Inspector Trew in late September 1999 as the liaison with the OPP.

Initial Meeting With the Children's Aid Society (CAS)

On May 15, 1997, Detective Inspector Smith contacted Richard Abell, executive director of the Children's Aid Society (CAS), informed him about the allegations in the Fantino Brief, and told him that the OPP would be investigating allegations of abuse involving prominent people in the community. Mr. Abell told Detective Inspector Smith that neither Constable Dunlop nor Mr. Bourgeois had told him about the allegations; rather he had learned of them from the Diocese. Detective Inspector Smith suggested that the CAS and the OPP work together on the investigation, with the OPP acting as the lead agency.

Detective Inspector Smith met with Mr. Abell and Bill Carriere on May 21, 1997, to discuss how the CAS and the OPP could work together during Project Truth. Also at this meeting were Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Don Genier. Detective Sergeant Pat Hall was briefed afterwards. At the meeting, Detective Inspector Smith provided the CAS with a copy of the Fantino Brief so the CAS could review it for any allegations about current abuse.

A wide range of matters was discussed at this meeting, and the following decisions were made:

- The OPP would interview Ron Leroux without the CAS present, although the CAS could provide the OPP with a list of questions to be asked.
- The OPP would give the CAS all records of interviews.
- The CAS would speak to senior Church officials about access of accused clergy members to children.
- The CAS would explore treatment resources for any victims who came forward.
- The CAS's response to any media inquiries would include an invitation for victims to come forward to either the police or the CAS.
- If the CAS was approached by a victim, it would take a statement and encourage the individual to speak to the OPP.
- The OPP would inform victims that it was working with the CAS and encourage them to talk to the CAS.
- The OPP would inform the CAS of any suspects who had access to children and of any children believed to be in danger.
- The OPP and the CAS would conduct parallel investigations into allegations of abuse and would share information.

Although an agreement was reached on these points, no written protocol was put in place to formalize the arrangement. Both Detective Inspector Smith and Mr. Abell testified that it would have been advisable to exchange a letter of understanding or a formal protocol to confirm the respective tasks of each institution.

Unfortunately, in the absence of a protocol, both institutions failed to follow up on various elements of their agreement, and they never initiated a joint investigation.

For example, the OPP did not provide the CAS with every statement that they took. Mr. Abell testified that he was glad not to receive every statement, because this would have been impossible for the CAS to deal with as it had trouble storing its own materials. Nor did the OPP systematically inform the CAS of all suspects so that the CAS could assess whether there were children at risk. The CAS was informed of the names of some suspects just prior to or only after their arrest.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that the statements taken by Project Truth were available to the CAS upon request. By passively allowing the CAS to view his files rather than proactively keeping the CAS informed of individual suspects who were under investigation, he may have complied with the letter of the agreement with CAS, but not its spirit. The purpose of the arrangement was to allow CAS to assist victims and to keep children out of harm's way. There was no need to wait until an arrest to engage the participation of the CAS.

Both the OPP and the CAS said that they had a good relationship. Although they did not have regular meetings or a designated liaison officer, Detective Inspector Hall testified that the lines of communication remained open.

Nonetheless, I find that more could have been done to ensure effective communication and cooperation. In particular, I believe a written protocol between the two agencies would have clearly defined their respective roles and would have led to more information sharing. The OPP's failure to develop and apply proper practices with the CAS is particularly unfortunate in Project Truth cases that involved allegations of current abuse, such as the Jean Luc Leblanc and Jacques Leduc investigations. I discuss these shortcomings below in sections devoted to these individual investigations.

Getting the Investigation Started

Shortly after the meeting between the Project Truth officers and Detective Inspector Sweeney on May 14, 1997, Detective Constable Seguin began identifying the various suspects, alleged victims, and other relevant information contained in the materials provided by Constable Dunlop and the statement given by Ron Leroux. It took several months to complete this task.

The operational plan was completed and submitted on June 12, 1997. It was initially rejected and additional information was requested. Detective Inspector Hall attributed the delay in approval to an internal dispute within the OPP:

I think there was a difference of opinion as to what should have been in there and there was also a different opinion as to who should be paying for it; whether it should be headquarters in Orillia or whether it should come out of regional funds.

Detective Inspector Smith explained the delay as follows:

We were in the throes of change within the OPP and we had a new deputy commissioner who had no investigative experience whatsoever and who was, what I would call, a bean counter. And I had four senior officers that had all kinds of investigative experience and had written operational plans who had signed my operational plan and there were games being played.

I think we were in the throes of having a new commissioner at that time and there were people jockeying for that position and I think that I got caught in the middle of that ...

Prior to the approval of the plan, Detective Inspector Smith was self-funding some of the expenses associated with the investigation.

At the end of July 1997, Detective Inspector Smith was informed that the funding for the project had been approved, and Detective Sergeant Hall was given a cheque for $10,000 to get Project Truth off the ground. The operational plan may not have been officially approved at that point in time, but the officers were given the go-ahead to begin the investigation.

Both Detective Inspectors Hall and Smith testified that they did not feel that the delay in approving the operational plan impeded their investigation. Detective Inspector Hall said that they needed this time to dissect the Fantino Brief and determine the direction of the investigation.

The officers were aware of the need to quickly investigate the allegations against Father Charles MacDonald because there was an ongoing prosecution against him. However, no interviews were conducted in relation to these allegations until September 1997. This is obviously troublesome given that delay ultimately became an issue in this prosecution.

In my view, the Criminal Investigation Bureau's delay in approving the operational plan and releasing funds could have created significant obstacles, and I therefore find the OPP failed to secure, make available, and assign resources to Project Truth in a timely manner. I would have recommended an overhaul of the approval process but was informed during the hearings that this has already taken place. According to Deputy Commissioner Chris Lewis, “Back in those days, we had one part-time person that processed all that. There was inconsistency in the forms, there was inconsistency in the approval process, and it was frustrating.”

He said the system is now much improved: there are several people working in this area, and the forms are standardized and can be filed electronically. Deputy Commissioner Lewis testified that “the Pat Halls of the current day will get their project plans in through a consistent format and be able to get what they can justify and truly need.”

Initial Media Announcements of Project Truth

Shortly after the financing for Project Truth was approved, Detective Inspector Klancy Grasman spoke with the Ottawa Sun about the investigation. An article appeared in the Ottawa Sun on July 26, 1997, announcing the beginning of the investigation. A similar article appeared in the Brockville Recorder and Times on July 28. This article said that Project Truth would be investigating a “purported pedophile group in Cornwall.” The article criticized the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) for not commencing the investigation sooner, given that it had been aware of the allegations for months.

Press Release

These articles were published before an official press release for Project Truth was issued on July 28. This press release stated, “The Major Cases Section of the Ontario Provincial Police is investigating allegations of sexual abuse in the Cornwall, Ont. area ... OPP investigators have been investigating since early spring (1997) and will continue to do so.” Detective Inspector Tim Smith testified that he did not have input into this press release, but noted that the investigation into the death threats against the Dunlop family had been ongoing for several months, and that the OPP had been doing some other work on the investigation.

In my view, the press release is misleading and overstates the work done by the OPP up to this point. It is unclear whether the OPP planned to make an official announcement for the beginning of the project, or whether it released this statement in reaction to the negative publicity in the press. The operational plan for Project Truth did not set out a clear media strategy. It simply said, “If deemed necessary, a press release will be made with advice on its presentation from Media Relations.” Detective Inspector Pat Hall testified that any media strategy would have come out of OPP Headquarters in Orillia.

The media coverage surrounding the start of Project Truth encouraged victims to come forward. On July 28, 1997, Claude Marleau contacted the OPP alleging that numerous men had abused him. His friend, C-96, also came forward with allegations of abuse at this time. Mr. Marleau testified that he had seen an article about sexual abuse in Cornwall on July 27 in Le Soleil, a Quebec City paper, which referred to the Ottawa Sun article. Mr. Marleau said that this article motivated him and his friend to contact Project Truth, in order to protect children in the Diocese from ongoing abuse:

[J]amais ça m’était passé par la tête de judiciaiser cela jusqu’à ce que je vois dans le journal qu’il y avait encore des enfants dans le Diocèse ici qui se faisaient abuser. Bon, bien, c’était assez. Ça paraît peut-être chevalier de ma part, mais c’était cela qui me guidait et c’est cela qui guidait mon copain à l’époque.

Press Conference

The OPP held an official press conference on September 25, 1997. By then, the Project Truth office had been set up and they wanted to make the phone number available to the public. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he and Detective Sergeant Hall requested the press conference also to fill the information vacuum:

Pat Hall and I asked for these news conferences because of all the press that had been coming along ... our force had a propensity for giving out limited information, and I’d indicated to my superiors, you know, that we’re getting all types of rumours down here, all kinds of different press, we’ve got to do something, we have to say something.

Neither Detective Inspector Smith nor Detective Sergeant Hall attended the press conference. Detective Inspector Smith said he did not want to have to answer questions about the specifics of the ongoing investigation. Instead, Superintendent Carson Fougère, Director of Operations, Eastern Region, was present at the press conference. Superintendent Fougère had a more limited knowledge of the investigation and thus would not reveal evidence being considered by the police when answering questions. OPP Detective Superintendent Larry Edgar and Cornwall Police Service Inspector Richard Trew also attended.

Superintendent Fougère was briefed by both Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall before the conference, and they put together some of the materials that Superintendent Fougère relied upon. A press release prepared by a media specialist within the OPP accompanied Superintendent Fougère's media package.

The media release stated, "Any male person who may have been, or is presently being sexually abused by a paedophile, or has any information regarding this type of activity is urged to call the investigators," thus implying that Project Truth was limited to allegations of abuse perpetrated against men. This was a mistake. Although the Fantino Brief was largely about male victims, some allegations related to possible female victims, and Project Truth later investigated a few allegations brought forward by women.

The media coverage following the press conference emphasized that the OPP was investigating the existence of a pedophile ring. Detective Inspector Smith said that this was the media's spin and was not the message being sent by the OPP. Superintendent Fougère testified that it was not his practice to correct errors made by the press.

Just as victims came forward after the media coverage in July 1997, additional victims contacted the OPP following the September press conference. C-101 came forward the following day, and Kevin Upper contacted Project Truth four days later.

Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall, and Detective Constable Steve Seguin, testified that the media coverage had the effect of encouraging victims to come forward.

I commend the officers for recognizing that the media can have a positive effect on an investigation, and I applaud Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall for requesting the initial press conference. It appears that Detective Inspector Smith in particular recognized the need to keep the press informed. However, I find the efforts of the OPP in this regard insufficient and appreciate Detective Inspector Smith's candour in recognizing that mistakes were made. Detective Inspector Smith admitted that the OPP had done a poor job of letting the public know what was going on throughout the Project Truth investigation. The OPP's response to media covering Project Truth is further discussed in the section "External Pressures: The Media, Websites and Garry Guzzo."

Overview of Project Truth Investigations

The Duration of Project Truth

The planning stages of Project Truth began in spring 1997, with the review of the Fantino Brief and the meeting held on April 24 in which it was decided that the allegations in the Fantino Brief would be investigated.

The investigative phase of Project Truth began in earnest immediately after the media coverage at the end of July 1997, with the interviews of Claude Marleau and C-96. As previously discussed, some of the officers had begun working shortly after the April 24 meeting on arranging the logistics for the project and on analyzing the materials in the Fantino Brief in order to plan the investigation.

The investigative stage of Project Truth concluded three years later, in the summer of 2000. An official press release announcing the end of the investigation was issued in August 2001 after the officers received an opinion on the last of the Crown briefs. Project Truth officers remained available to deal with incoming complaints through their local Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) detachments, and continued to provide assistance with ongoing prosecutions. The last Project Truth prosecution ended on October 18, 2004, when Justice Plantana stayed the proceedings against Jacques Leduc.

Number of Victims and Suspects Identified

After their initial review of the Fantino Brief, Project Truth officers identified eighteen men as potential suspects. OPP records indicate that throughout Project Truth, seventy-one individuals were identified as suspects in sexual abuse investigations. The Cornwall Police Service and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall were also investigated during the conspiracy investigation. Sixty-nine individuals are recorded as coming forward to Project Truth with allegations of sexual abuse.

These figures are based on OPP records. Having reviewed the evidence, I have found some minor inconsistencies in the manner in which victims and suspects were entered into Project Truth's database. For example, in some instances where complaints were referred to another police agency, the names of the complainants and alleged suspects were not included in the Project Truth register documents, and in other instances they were. In addition, some individuals who disclosed abuse but did not want to make a formal complaint were listed as witnesses rather than as victims. As a result, these statistics appear to underestimate the total number of complainants and alleged perpetrators known to Project Truth.

Over the course of Project Truth, the officers took several hundred statements from victims, witnesses, and suspects.

Suspects Not Investigated

Project Truth did not investigate all seventy-one suspects listed in its database. At least fourteen suspects had died prior to the start of the investigation. In addition, Project Truth officers determined that at least eighteen alleged perpetrators did not fall within Project Truth's mandate. Some of these suspects were referred to other police forces.

Suspects Investigated but Not Charged

A number of individuals were identified as suspects but were not charged for a variety of reasons. In four cases, the suspects were investigated but died prior to charges being laid. Other suspects were not charged because no victims had been identified, the suspect could not be found, or the victim was reluctant to come forward. Thirteen other individuals were investigated, but the police determined that charges were not warranted.

Charges Laid and Outcome of Prosecutions

Project Truth laid 115 charges against fifteen suspects in relation to allegations of sexual abuse made by thirty-four individuals. Project Truth officers were also involved in the court process in relation to the six charges that were laid against Father Charles MacDonald in 1996 involving three additional victims.

Of the fifteen individuals arrested by Project Truth, only one was convicted in Ontario. This appears to be the statistic most frequently cited in the media and by Project Truth's detractors, but it does not tell the whole story. Convictions were obtained in two cases related to Project Truth. Marcel Lalonde, an alleged perpetrator mentioned in the Fantino Brief, was investigated jointly by the OPP and the Cornwall Police Service and was convicted on a number of abuse-related charges. Although this was not a Project Truth case, the OPP's investigator in this matter was Detective Constable Don Genier, who was a member of Project Truth. Father Paul Lapierre was prosecuted in both Ontario and Quebec. Although he was acquitted on the Project Truth charges in Ontario, he was convicted in Quebec of charges brought by Quebec police as a result of investigative work done by Project Truth officers.

Of the other individuals arrested by Project Truth, four suspects, including Father Lapierre, were found not guilty after a trial. Four suspects died before their trials.

In three other cases, the Crown withdrew the charges prior to trial. The charges against Keith Jodoin were withdrawn because the Crown determined that there was no reasonable prospect of conviction. In the Bernard Sauvé and Father Romeo Major cases, the charges were withdrawn because the alleged victims were too ill or unwilling to proceed.

Three other cases ended in a stay of proceedings. In the case of Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere, the charges were stayed because he was too ill to make full answer and defence at a trial. In the case of Father Charles MacDonald, the charges were stayed due to delay. The charges against Jacques Leduc were initially stayed due to willful non-disclosure. The stay was successfully appealed, but a further stay was granted during the retrial due to delay. These cases are discussed in detail in Chapter 11, dealing with the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Daily Workings of Project Truth

Roles of the Officers

Throughout Project Truth, Detective Sergeant Pat Hall was responsible for day-to-day decisions such as assigning tasks and giving direction to the investigators. While Detective Inspector Tim Smith was the case manager, he made major decisions, such as whether a person should be arrested, or whether an allegation fell within the project mandate, but often in conjunction with Detective Sergeant Hall. The two officers were in close contact with one another, even though Detective Inspector Smith was not often in the office. Pat Hall was promoted to Detective Inspector and became case manager in April 1999, after Detective Inspector Smith effectively retired, at which point he made these decisions on his own.

The case manager was responsible for reporting to the Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB) in Orillia. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he would have reported to the Director or the Deputy Director of CIB. After Detective Inspector Hall became case manager, he submitted written reports beginning in July 2000. His first report included an overview of the Project Truth investigation to date.

Detective Inspector Smith was responsible for prioritizing the investigations conducted by Project Truth, and Detective Inspector Hall took on this task after Detective Inspector Smith retired.

Each investigation was assigned a lead investigator. Although one person was designated as the officer responsible for the investigation, the officers were supposed to share information and assist each other on their cases. Detective Inspector Hall was the only person who read every statement. Information sharing between the officers was done informally.

Detective Inspector Hall supervised Detective Constables Steve Seguin, Don Genier, and Joe Dupuis. He met with them regularly and made decisions about whom to interview, which allegations to follow up on, and whether certain tasks should take priority. Although Detective Inspector Hall closely managed and directed the investigative work of his officers, the officers made some of their own decisions to follow up on information they received. Detective Inspector Hall reviewed every statement they took. He also reviewed, and in some cases prepared, the Crown briefs before they were submitted.

The vast majority of the Project Truth interviews were conducted by Detective Constables Seguin, Genier, and Dupuis. Detective Inspector Smith participated in only a few interviews. Detective Inspector Hall was involved in some investigative work, particularly in relation to the death threat and conspiracy investigations.

After arrests were made, the officers remained involved in the trial process. They assisted with the disclosure of documents to the defence, assisted the Crown in preparing witnesses, and delivered subpoenas to victims and witnesses. The officers also provided some assistance to the victims, as described at the end of this section.

Availability of the Officers

The officers assigned to Project Truth did not work on the project full-time. They had other ongoing work and were often called away from the project to assist officers at the local detachments.

The supervising officer, Detective Sergeant Hall, and the case manager, Detective Inspector Smith, were also away from the project on a regular basis due to other work assignments.

Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis both testified that Detective Inspector Hall was at the Project Truth office almost every day. However, Detective Inspector Hall testified that he was regularly assigned other work and that when he became detective inspector and case manager in 1999, no more than 50 percent of his time was devoted to Project Truth.

Detective Inspector Smith was at the office significantly less frequently. He testified that he never spent more than one or two days per week on Project Truth, and he acknowledged that there were some periods when he was away from the project for months at a time. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he spoke to Detective Inspector Hall by phone while he was away, but he did not take any notes of these conversations. This was not the only gap in Detective Inspector Smith's notes. In comparison to Detective Inspector Hall's notes, which I observed to be consistently of good quality, Detective Inspector Smith's notes appeared less thorough and were sometimes lacking in detail.

Problems With Staffing

In my view, staffing was a problem for Project Truth. There were not enough officers, and those assigned to the project were not exclusively devoted to the investigation.

Detective Inspector Smith's plan for the investigation, outlined above under "Initial Plan and Initial Coordination Meetings for Project Truth," called for a team of four investigating officers as well as a supervisor and a case manager. Instead, only three investigating officers were assigned. As Project Truth went on, many new victims came forward, thus increasing the number of alleged perpetrators under investigation.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that the officers were overworked and Detective Constable Seguin said that they regularly worked long days. Detective Constable Seguin testified that the investigations would have proceeded more quickly had the project had additional resources. It is my view that the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) failed to assign sufficient resources to Project Truth to ensure that investigations into historical sexual abuse were conducted in a timely manner.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not ask for additional officers. He said, “[T]he reason why I didn’t ask is I knew there was nothing available. I mean, resources were a problem.”

Despite his belief that additional resources would not have been forthcoming, in hindsight I find it unfortunate that Detective Inspectors Hall and Smith never formally requested them. As noted above, Detective Inspector Hall did not submit a report to the CIB until July of 2000. It is difficult to assess whether the OPP would have provided additional human or financial resources had a request been made justifying their need based on the significant increase in the size of the project, but in hindsight, this would probably have been a useful strategy.

A second staffing problem that arose was the lack of specialized training on sexual abuse investigations among the officers assigned to Project Truth. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he wanted a small team of dedicated officers whom he could train. However, there was little opportunity for such training to take place. Detective Inspector Smith did not directly oversee the officers’ work and spent little time at the office.

Detective Inspector Smith gave the officers some initial instructions on conducting interviews during the May 14, 1997, meeting with Detective Inspector Leo Sweeney, Detective Sergeant Hall, and Detective Constables Seguin and Genier. Detective Inspector Smith also explained to the officers that it was important to “be there” for the victims, and that the victims needed support. Detective Inspector Hall testified that in the fall of 1997, when Detective Inspector Smith perceived a problem in the way statements were being taken, he showed the officers some of the briefs that he had prepared in the Alfred training school investigation to give them an idea of what he expected. Both Detective Inspectors Hall and Smith said that there was improvement after this.

However, the officers were not given any in-depth training on male-on-male historical sexual abuse either before or during the investigation. Detective Constable Seguin testified that he did not recall whether Detective Inspector

Smith gave the officers specific instructions on how to take interviews from people, and noted that it would have been useful to have some kind of specific protocol or set of guidelines to deal with male-on-male historic allegations.

The importance of proper training, particularly in sexual assault and child sexual abuse cases, cannot be understated. Expert witness Detective Wendy Leaver testified, "No one should be interviewing a victim unless they've been trained." Interviewing complainants in sexual assault cases requires particular skill and sensitivity because the victim "for the first time in their life, is disclosing to you ... one of the worst situations that has ever happened to them."

In addition, properly trained officers obtain better results in interviews. Dr. Peter Jaffe testified that sometimes incremental disclosure, whereby a complainant reveals the full extent of his or her abuse only over the course of a series of interviews or statements, is impossible to avoid. This can create inconsistencies and disclosure problems in criminal proceedings. However, with "enhanced skill and patience and collaboration," it is possible to reduce the instances of incremental disclosure. Dr. Jaffe noted that skilled interviewers have a way of "creating a climate" in which complainants are more open and forthcoming about their experience.

In my view the OPP failed to properly train the investigators in the conduct of investigations into allegations of sexual abuse, including historical abuse.

Officers chosen to take part in special projects should have specialized training. I recommend that in the future, before police officers are selected for special investigations, a thorough check of their training history should be conducted. If deficiencies are noted, extra training should be provided. Deputy Commissioner Chris Lewis acknowledged that the officers assigned to Project Truth did not have adequate training. He also testified, "We would not have another Project Truth-type investigation" wherein officers were not specially trained, because adequacy standards have been introduced that require special training for any officer investigating a sexual assault. Accordingly, my recommendation should not be difficult to implement.

I would also recommend that officers who investigate historical sexual abuse be provided with periodic refresher courses or seminars, in order to sharpen their skills and to update them on new developments in the understanding of historical sexual abuse, in the law relating to these cases, and in best practices in investigating them.

Detective Inspector Smith made contradictory comments about the officers' performance. According to a will-state of Superintendent Sweeney, prepared for this Inquiry, Detective Inspector Smith said the following in a pre-retirement telephone call on February 23, 1999:

Pat Hall would be an excellent person to replace Smith. The detectives are not self-starters and self-initiated, Genier is good. Joe talks too much, likes to be important. Seguin is always looking for an easy way out.

At the hearing, Detective Inspector Smith confirmed that he made these comments, but also said that despite this, he had no concerns about how he staffed his team, and that in hindsight, he would not have staffed the team differently. Detective Inspector Smith said of his officers, “They believed in this investigation. They ate, lived, slept it.”

The hard work and dedication of the police officers assigned to Project Truth is evident. The officers involved gave up other opportunities and probably missed out on overtime pay they would have earned had they remained at their local detachments. Whatever the shortcomings of particular investigations, I have no doubt that the officers involved were committed to Project Truth.

Case Management

A software program called ACCESS was put in place to assist the officers in tracking the investigation. ACCESS was an existing program that was adapted for use by Project Truth. It was a relatively new program, and this was the first time that Detective Sergeant Hall had used it.

The program allowed officers to place each individual interviewed into a category: suspect, victim, witness, or “other.”

The program allowed the officers to track suspects, victims, persons giving statements, Crown briefs, charges, and court appearances. Detective Inspector Hall testified that the system was helpful in allowing him to keep track of all the people involved in the investigation. He also said that it was helpful in producing statistics for press releases. The electronic file system was backed up by a physical file system in the office.

The ACCESS program was also used to generate a list of statements to be included in Crown briefs, and thus assisted the officers in this work. The officers would use this list to identify the relevant pages in their notebooks to be disclosed along with their will-states.

One of the weaknesses in the system, however, was that it would not identify documents relevant for disclosure purposes if that document was not associated with a statement taken by an officer. This is one reason why Detective Constable Dupuis’ notes of the conversation between C-16’s mother and Constable Perry Dunlop was not initially provided to the Crown in the Jacques Leduc prosecution; the incident was not associated with a statement, and thus was not entered into the ACCESS system.³¹ Detective Inspector Hall testified that the contact with Constable Dunlop would have been identified if only Detective Constable Dupuis had consciously recalled it while he was preparing his will-state. This issue is discussed further in the section on the investigation of Jacques Leduc.

The ACCESS program was also used to help the officers keep track of the relationships between the various individuals connected to the project. The tracking of linkages is discussed in more detail later in this chapter.

Office Space

Project Truth operated out of three locations during the course of the investigation. It was initially located at the OPP's Lancaster Detachment. In September 1997, the office moved to space rented from the Ministry of the Environment on Amelia Street in Cornwall. As the investigative phase of Project Truth wound down in the summer of 2000, the office moved again to the OPP's Long Sault Detachment.

There was a break-in at the office on Amelia Street on May 20, 1998. A computer and a laptop were stolen. The filing cabinet was broken into, but no files were taken. Detective Inspector Hall testified that the missing computers held no information that would have compromised the investigation and that the investigators did not lose any information as a result of the theft. The break-in was investigated by the Cornwall Police Service (CPS), which determined that the intruders were just looking for money. I heard no evidence that the break-in compromised the investigation in any way.

Materials From Previous Investigations

The officers gave mixed testimony about whether they had all of the materials from previous investigations into matters relevant to Project Truth, such as the 1993 CPS investigation into allegations made by David Silmser against Father Charles MacDonald, the 1994 Ottawa Police Service review of this investigation, Detective Inspector Smith's 1994 investigations, and Detective Inspector Fred Hamelink's investigation into allegations that Mr. Silmser was attempting to extort Ken Seguin.

Detective Inspector Hall was uncertain in his testimony, but said that he believed that in the fall of 1997 they had all of these materials except Detective Inspector Hamelink's extortion investigation.

31. The non-disclosure of this conversation created significant problems in the Leduc prosecution.

This is addressed in the section of this chapter dealing with the Jacques Leduc investigation and prosecution.

However, Detective Constable Dupuis testified that in September 1997 he did not have a copy of the initial investigation into Father MacDonald. Detective Constable Dupuis also said that when he began working on the Project Truth conspiracy investigation, he was not aware that Detective Inspector Smith had conducted a similar investigation in 1994. In fact, Detective Constable Dupuis' notes indicate that he received all of the above materials, with the exception of Detective Inspector Hamelink's investigation, when he met with Detective Constable Michael Fagan on November 26, 1998.

It is clear then, that even if Project Truth was in possession of the materials, one of its investigators was unaware of their existence. This is a further indication of Detective Inspector Smith's limited involvement. He should have briefed his team on his 1994 investigations at the outset of Project Truth and ensured the officer assigned as lead investigator of the Father MacDonald and the conspiracy investigations, Detective Constable Dupuis, had the relevant information.

Detective Inspector Hall said that he obtained an edited version of the materials from Detective Inspector Hamelink's extortion investigation either from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board or through a Freedom of Information Request in late 1997 or early 1998. Detective Inspector Hall requested an unedited copy of the brief from the CIB in July 2001. It is unclear to me why it was so difficult to obtain the original brief.

Investigative Methods

One of the most important investigative methods used by Project Truth was the taking of statements. The officers would generally begin an investigation by interviewing the victim. Different formats were used for different types of witnesses. If the witness did not have a lot to say to the investigators, only a written statement would be taken. If the witness was not a victim, but had some useful information for the investigators, they would take an audio statement. The officers would also take an audio statement from witnesses who were in poor health, in case they were unable to testify in court. Statements from victims would generally be videotaped.

There were some logistical difficulties with this method. The officers often had audio equipment with them, but if they wanted to videotape an interview, they had to take the witness to a local detachment.

Ideally, interviews with vulnerable witnesses, like sexual assault complainants, should be conducted in a neutral location (rather than an interrogation room). Advances in technology and victim services since Project Truth have been made this easier to achieve. Modern video equipment is portable and interviews can be conducted in witnesses' homes if necessary. However, the technology must be capable of producing good-quality videos; otherwise the evidence is less useful in court proceedings.

Complainants can also be made more comfortable by officers who explain what to expect in the interview and how the complainant can properly prepare. This preparation may include gathering records or other documents to assist in obtaining accurate dates, and the officer may help the complainant with this task.

After statements were taken, they would be typed and transcribed. The officer who took the statement would also proofread it to ensure accuracy. Detective Inspector Hall testified that this process took some time and he would generally not read the statements until they were typed.

The alleged perpetrator was generally the last person to be interviewed. Detective Inspector Hall testified that this is a common police practice and is done to allow officers to have the most information possible before approaching the suspect.

In addition to taking statements, Project Truth included one major surveillance operation. As discussed later in this chapter, upon receiving information that Jean Luc Leblanc had been recently seen with children, a multi-day surveillance operation was put in place that allowed the officers to identify one of Mr. Leblanc's victims. There was also a brief period of surveillance in August 2001. The officers followed Jacques Leduc's wife for less than an hour when she had set up a meeting with one of Mr. Leduc's alleged victims. Although the allegations made against Mr. Leduc were also current, no other surveillance was used in the course of that investigation.

Another investigative method employed was the gathering of institutional records in order to corroborate various facts and dates surrounding the allegations. The officers obtained school records and driver's licence histories, for example. They also obtained a variety of documents from the Diocese and from Church officials that gave identifying information about priests and allowed the officers to establish the date and place of the priests' postings. Some of these documents were subjected to forensic analysis to ensure they had not been altered. The officers also took photographs and made diagrams of various locations where abuse had allegedly occurred.

A review of the evidence indicates that the officers did not execute any search warrants throughout Project Truth. Detective Inspector Hall explained that warrants would have alerted the public as to who was under investigation:

The difficulty with search warrants is you have to file them at the court, and the information obtained is open to the public unless you get a sealing order, and I knew for a fact—I was getting calls from the media asking if we had done any search warrants. Mr. Dunlop was inquiring if we had done any search warrants, and we wanted to keep our information out of the media. So that was another reason for—if we could do our investigation by being less intrusive with a search warrant and accomplish what we wanted to do, that's the way we did it.

I note that a sealing order might have resolved these concerns. In addition, regardless of the potential consequences, there were some instances in which I believe it would have been appropriate for the officers to have executed search warrants. I point in particular to cases where the officers believed the perpetrator was in possession of child pornography, including pictures of his victims. This issue will be addressed in the sections that follow on the individual investigations.

Cooperation From the Diocese

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he had a number of meetings with Bishop Eugène LaRocque in order to obtain information for the Project Truth investigation. Detective Inspector Hall described the meeting he and Detective Inspector Smith had with Bishop LaRocque in March 1998:

We also explained that we would need certain information from the Diocese in regards to the locations of the various priests. I also discussed how that may be obtained; we could execute search warrants or he could cooperate and provide it, and he indicated that he would cooperate fully.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he approached Bishop LaRocque on a number of occasions with requests for documents and that the Bishop cooperated. In particular the OPP requested pictures of clergy members, as well as information about where they served. The officers also attempted to obtain lists of altar boys. Due to the Bishop's cooperation, Detective Inspector Hall said that he did not have to resort to using a search warrant to obtain the Diocese's files. Where the Bishop did not have the document that was requested, he made suggestions about how the information could be obtained.

However, Detective Inspector Hall also stated that the Bishop "didn't volunteer anything to us" and further that "he was cooperative but he didn't go overboard."

Detective Inspector Hall never asked the Bishop whether he had any files relating to sexual misconduct by priests, and he admitted that even if the Bishop had information regarding the sexual abuse of young people by priests, "I don't think he would have provided it voluntarily."

As discussed in some detail in Chapter 8, "Institutional Response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall," the Diocese did in fact have correspondence from victims outlining their abuse, letters of concern from other community members, as well as internal investigations into alleged misconduct by priests.

Detective Inspector Hall explained that he did not attempt to obtain a search warrant to obtain files of this nature because:

I'd have to know what I was looking for. I mean you have to have some expectation there's a document there that you want to achieve by way of a search warrant, so if you're writing up your Information to obtain a search warrant you have to have some reasonable and probable grounds that it's there and there now, and—I mean it's a fishing trip.

Detective Inspector Hall was not aware that Detective Inspector Smith had used search warrants during his investigation at the Alfred training school. In my view, at minimum, the officers should have made a general request for information relating to any allegations for sexual abuse of young people by priests in the possession of the Diocese. The Bishop's response might have provided additional grounds to obtain a search warrant.

Detective Inspector Hall also made arrangements with the Bishop to contact priests ahead of their arrests in order to ask them to voluntarily come in, rather than requiring the OPP to obtain an arrest warrant.

Cooperation With the Cornwall Probation Office

I would contrast the approach of the Diocese with the proactive approach taken by the Ministry of Correctional Services. In this case, it was the Ministry that approached Project Truth for information.

As discussed in Chapter 5, "Institutional Response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services," Paul Downing was tasked to investigate alleged wrongdoing by probations employees in August 2000, after information about certain employees appeared on one of the projecttruth.com websites.

Mr. Downing first contacted Detective Inspector Hall on August 11, 2000, to explain that he was acting as an investigator pursuant to the Ministry of Correctional Services Act and to arrange for an exchange of information. According to Detective Inspector Hall, Mr. Downing was particularly concerned by claims made about Father Kevin Maloney, who was a chaplain at the Cornwall jail, and Jos van Diepen, a probation officer.

Detective Inspector Hall met with Mr. Downing on September 27, 2000. Detective Inspector Hall showed him the interview report of Jos van Diepen and allowed him to take notes from it but would not give him a copy for his investigation. Detective Inspector Hall explained that the OPP has a policy that prohibits officers from providing third parties with copies of statements that are being used in ongoing investigations, other than to Crown attorneys for disclosure purposes.³² He explained that Mr. Downing could have asked Mr. van Diepen for permission to obtain his statement, or asked Crown Attorney Shelley Hallett for a copy. Mr. Downing testified that it “absolutely” would have helped to have a copy of Mr. van Diepen’s statement.

32. According to Detective Inspector Hall, Part 10 of the Police Orders.

At this meeting Detective Inspector Hall also told Mr. Downing that his investigation had found no evidence of wrongdoing by Father Maloney. I would note that in September 2000, Detective Inspector Hall was still waiting for an opinion from the Crown on this matter.

It is my opinion that the OPP needs to develop better protocols for the sharing of information with public institutions in order to allow these institutions to respond to allegations of sexual abuse perpetrated by their employees. Likewise, public institutions should consult with policing agencies to ensure that their policies and procedures for the investigation of alleged employee misconduct do not interfere with police investigations.

Interactions With Complainants

Interacting with complainants was an important role for the officers assigned to Project Truth. This predominantly involved interviewing and taking statements from complainants, but also sometimes included assisting them in navigating through the criminal justice process and referring them to appropriate support services.

Detective Inspector Hall testified at the hearings that there was “no funding anywhere” for victim assistance and that his officers were left to make “feeble attempts” to assist victims by offering them, for example, a victim assistance videotape produced during the Project Guardian investigation in London, Ontario.

Unfortunately, at the time of Project Truth, Cornwall did not have an established Victim/Witness Assistance Program (VWAP). This program updates victims about their cases and familiarizes them with the criminal court process and the various support services available to them. The Ottawa VWAP provided support to some Project Truth complainants, with varying degrees of success. This is discussed fully in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

Project Truth officers also provided some support services to complainants. In particular, the officers informed victims of court dates, assisted with Criminal Injuries Compensation Board applications, made referrals to counsellors, and, toward the end of the prosecutions, assisted with the preparation of victim impact statements.

Some of the victims who testified at the hearing were pleased with the way they were treated by Project Truth officers and were satisfied with the assistance they were provided. Others were disappointed and felt the officers were insensitive or treated them without sufficient respect and compassion. Specific examples of the assistance provided to victims, and victims’ experience with the Project Truth officers, are discussed below in the sections on particular investigations.

Project Truth's Mandate

As mentioned above, the mandate of Project Truth was based on the Fantino Brief and on Ron Leroux's February 1997 statement taken in Orillia. However, the mandate was drafted in a manner that gave the officers some discretion to investigate matters that were related to, but not contained within, these materials.

Unfortunately, it appears that the mandate was not clearly defined, was applied inconsistently, and was not well understood by non-Project Truth officers or by alleged victims. This is apparent in a number of investigations, which I briefly describe below. Specific examples of problems created by mandate issues are elaborated on in later sections.

Detective Inspector Tim Smith and Detective Sergeant Pat Hall developed the mandate for Project Truth in the spring of 1997. Its final wording was as follows:

This investigation is being conducted into paedophile activity both historic and ongoing in the Cornwall, Ontario area. The alleged suspects are prominent and respected citizens of Cornwall, and include lawyers, Catholic priests, a Catholic Bishop, teachers, probation officers, businessmen, a former Chief of Police and the present Crown Attorney. The alleged offences occurred and are occurring both in the City of Cornwall and the outlying area.

In addition, it is alleged the suspects were able to terminate investigations and prosecutions against them by abusing their positions of trust within the community. It is alleged the Crown Attorney, the Diocese of Cornwall and the Cornwall Police conspired to obstruct justice in these matters.

Although there was no mention of Constable Perry Dunlop or Chief Julian Fantino, Detective Inspector Smith testified that the "mandate of Project Truth was the Fantino Brief." Detective Inspector Hall added that the mandate stemmed from the May 27, 1997, letter from Peter Griffiths to the Ontario Provincial Police's Criminal Investigation Bureau requesting that "Det. Insp. Smith be assigned to investigate the "Dunlop/Bourgeois brief." Mr. Griffiths testified, "My understanding of what was being investigated was the contents of the Fantino Brief."

However, Detective Inspector Hall testified that the mandate was written in a manner that gave Project Truth some ability to go beyond the allegations made in the Fantino Brief:

[I]f it related to what we were investigating, to the parties investigated, if it was common victims, it could very well ... you have to have some flexibility but we were framing it fairly tightly as to what information we had at the time we were preparing this ... It had to be connected in some way in relation to what Mr. Griffiths was asking us to do.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that there was no requirement under the mandate for any individual suspect to be in a position of trust and authority over the alleged victim.

There were two components to the mandate. The first was to investigate individual allegations of abuse. Throughout Project Truth, questions arose as to whether a particular complainant's allegations fell within the mandate of Project Truth. The second component of the mandate involved an examination of a conspiracy. The scope and quality of the conspiracy investigation is addressed later in this chapter.

Understanding of the Mandate by the OPP Outside Protect Truth

There was confusion about the scope of Project Truth's mandate among the local Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) detachments and even in the higher ranks of the OPP's command structure.

Detective Inspector Randy Millar of the Long Sault Detachment testified that his understanding was that Project Truth was only to look into cases of historical sexual abuse. Detective Constable Chris McDonell, who worked out of both Long Sault and Lancaster Detachments during Project Truth, also believed that Project Truth's mandate was to look into historical abuse. He testified that he had never seen the mandate in writing, nor had the mandate been explained to him in person.

Likewise, when Constable Charlene Davidson of the Lancaster Detachment became aware of C-16's allegations of abuse by Jacques Leduc, she did not know whether the complaint fell within Project Truth's mandate. Fortunately, she contacted Project Truth and shared the allegations with them so that they could take on the complaint.

Chief Superintendent Carson Fougère, who was Director of Operations, Eastern Region, in 1997 and acted as spokesperson during two Project Truth press conferences, testified he had never seen the mandate in writing prior to this Inquiry's hearing. Chief Superintendent Fougère said he was not aware that Project Truth was investigating the Crown attorney's office in relation to allegations of obstruction of justice.

He testified, "[M]y understanding of the mandate was to, in fact, investigate current and historic allegations of sexual abuse of people." He added that Project Truth was not gender-specific and that suspects were not limited to individuals who were a "pillar of the community." He said, "[M]y understanding was that no one was to be excluded. We were to find out, once and for all, what is the extent, if any, of this activity.”

It is quite striking to me that Chief Superintendent Fougère, a senior official in the OPP at the time of Project Truth, believed the scope of the project to be significantly broader than it was. I am concerned that this may indicate a lack of awareness by senior OPP management of Project Truth’s mandate.

Clearly, the mandate of Project Truth was not adequately communicated to, nor understood by, all officers who had direct contact with the project. I recommend that in the future the mandate for special projects be communicated to all OPP officers and, for example, be sent to local detachments and posted in full view with a contact number to call if there are questions or a need for further information.

Understanding of Mandate by the Cornwall Police Service

Detective Inspector Smith was in touch with Cornwall Chief of Police Anthony Repa during the initiation of Project Truth. Chief Repa insisted that he did not want Project Truth to become a task force that investigated every sexual assault in Cornwall. Detective Inspector Smith agreed and told him that the OPP was going to look at the issues in the Fantino Brief. Chief Repa testified that he was not consulted about the wording of the mandate and that he did not recall seeing a written version of it.

No formal protocol was put in place to respond to questions of overlapping jurisdiction between Project Truth and the Cornwall Police Service (CPS). The expectation seemed to be that senior officers would work out any overlap or referral questions informally as they arose.

A number of CPS officers testified they were unaware of the scope of Project Truth’s mandate, and several were uncertain about when they should refer complaints to Project Truth. CPS Inspector Richard Trew testified that most complainants contacted Project Truth directly.

Detective Inspector Smith knew that jurisdictional questions were bound to arise. He was correct. Decisions regularly had to be made as to what allegations would be investigated by Project Truth. Those that did not fit the mandate needed to be referred elsewhere. Unfortunately, as I describe below, these decisions were not always made consistently or promptly and sometimes led to delays in the investigations.

Mandate Decisions

Allegations Against Marcel Lalonde

Marcel Lalonde, a schoolteacher, was arrested by the OPP in January 1997 and by the CPS on April 29, 1997, in relation to allegations of sexual abuse made by a number of individuals. The written mandate of Project Truth developed by Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall made specific reference to allegations of sexual abuse by “teachers.” Moreover, many alleged victims identified in the Fantino Brief claimed to have been abused both by Mr. Lalonde and by other suspects in the Project Truth investigations. Notwithstanding these factors, the complaints against Marcel Lalonde were not brought into Project Truth.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that the allegations against Mr. Lalonde fit the Project Truth mandate and would have been part of the special project had they not already been under investigation by the CPS and the local OPP detachment. He said he would not “take over an investigation that was well underway.”

A number of alleged victims of Marcel Lalonde had other complaints that were investigated by Project Truth. The decision to exclude Mr. Lalonde from Project Truth meant that these complainants had to cope with concurrent investigations conducted by the CPS for one alleged perpetrator and by Project Truth for another.

According to Detective Sergeant Hall, the overlapping issues and associations between Project Truth and Mr. Lalonde were not complicated. He noted that Detective Constable Genier was involved in both Project Truth and the Mr. Lalonde investigation. If there was anything Detective Constable Genier felt Detective Sergeant Hall should know regarding the Mr. Lalonde prosecution, he could advise.

In my view, the decision not to include Mr. Lalonde in the Project Truth investigations may have had an impact on the investigators’ ability to develop connections between the alleged perpetrators; properly identify materials in the possession of Project Truth required for disclosure in the Lalonde prosecution; and provide appropriate services to victims who were complainants in both the Marcel Lalonde and Project Truth prosecutions.

Claude Marleau and C-96

Once Project Truth was underway, the decision as to whether a particular allegation fell within the mandate was made either jointly by Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall or by Detective Sergeant Hall on his own if Detective Inspector Smith was absent. After Detective Inspector Smith retired, Detective Inspector Hall made the decisions alone. Detective Inspector Hall testified that decisions over mandate issues were not debated for a long time; he and Detective Inspector Smith made the decision and never looked back.

The officers were faced with a major mandate decision almost immediately after the Project Truth investigation was announced to the public. On July 28, 1997, Claude Marleau contacted the OPP to disclose allegations of sexual abuse. He gave a statement on July 31, 1997, in which he alleged that he had been abused by a number of individuals, including several Catholic priests. Mr. Marleau also alleged that he was abused by a hotel owner, a butcher, a music store owner, and a doctor who was also a Coroner. No allegations against these individuals were made in the Fantino Brief.

Detective Inspector Hall explained that Mr. Marleau's allegations clearly fell within the mandate of Project Truth because they involved members of the Catholic clergy. Some of the other individuals fit within the mandate because they were businessmen or prominent persons, and the rest were taken on because Mr. Marleau was the common victim.

When Mr. Marleau came forward, he brought his friend C-96, who also alleged that he had been sexually abused. C-96 made allegations against the butcher who had allegedly abused Mr. Marleau, as well as a restaurateur. These complaints were all taken on by Project Truth.

Mr. Marleau's allegations came to light at the very beginning of the Project Truth investigation. Although they did not involve individuals identified by Ron Leroux or Constable Perry Dunlop, I believe that it was reasonable for Project Truth to take on these cases. The officers would not have known at that point whether the priests accused by Mr. Marleau had any connection to the priests mentioned in the Fantino Brief.

However, the decision to take on these complaints set a number of precedents that expanded the Project Truth investigation well beyond the Fantino Brief. In particular, it meant that Project Truth would investigate allegations made against people who were not mentioned in the Fantino Brief if the suspect fit within one of the categories of individuals listed in the mandate, including the general category of "prominent persons."

It also suggested that Project Truth would take on complaints against people who had no link to the Fantino Brief or to any of the mandate categories if the victim also alleged abuse by someone who was within the mandate. This would avoid the problems associated with a victim having to split his or her complaint and deal with two different police forces.

Two problems arose from this decision. First, as previously mentioned, the expansion of the mandate put an additional strain on Project Truth's human and other resources. Mr. Marleau and C-96's initial complaints significantly increased the size of Project Truth from eighteen to twenty-seven suspects. Mr. Marleau later disclosed alleged abuse by an additional suspect.

Second, the precedents set with the handling of Mr. Marleau's allegations were not consistently followed. Some complainants' allegations were split between the OPP and CPS, and coordination issues then arose, as I describe below.

C-97

Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall had to make a second mandate decision early on in the investigation when another victim, C-97, came forward with allegations against a number of individuals.

On September 17, 1997, Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Joe Dupuis interviewed C-97, who alleged that he had been abused by Brian Dufour and four other individuals. C-97 also told the officers that Nelson Barque invited him over to his house to do drugs, and hugged him once. C-97 said that Ken Seguin used to tell him that he looked good in his jeans and that he heard rumours about Mr. Seguin “fooling around with” C-5 and C-19. However, C-97 said that “they never did anything sexual to me.”

Brian Dufour worked at the Cornwall Youth Residence (renamed Laurencrest) when he allegedly abused C-97. C-97 told the officers that he believed that Mr. Dufour was still working as a childcare worker in Brampton.

Project Truth determined that the allegations fell within its mandate, presumably given Mr. Dufour’s occupation as a childcare worker and his connection to Laurencrest. There was also some connection to the Fantino Brief because of C-97’s contact with Mr. Seguin and Mr. Barque.

Project Truth investigated Mr. Dufour and eventually laid charges against him on April 6, 2000. Mr. Dufour died four days after his arrest, on April 11, 2000. The investigation of Brian Dufour will be discussed in greater detail later in this chapter.

Detective Inspector Hall wrote to CPS Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie on April 19, 2000, referring the outstanding allegations made by C-97 to the CPS. The letter noted that Mr. Dufour had died, and said:

In the course of interviewing [C-97], he had indicated he was sexually abused by [four other individuals].³³ There is an indication that some of the abuse has been reported to the Cornwall Police Service.

We do not feel the additional allegations of [C-97] fall within the mandate of Project Truth. Therefore, since BRIAN DUFOUR is deceased, we are attaching a complete copy of his interview of 17 SEP 97 for your attention and whatever action you deem appropriate.

I have a number of comments to make regarding this referral. First, one of the four individuals referred to CPS was the wrong person; C-97 had made allegations against a schoolmate's brother, not the schoolmate. I also note that the schoolmate is listed, wrongly, as a "suspect" in a number of Project Truth's tracking documents, such as the Association Report, and the All Involved Persons Report.

33. Names used in original letter.

More importantly, I think the OPP acted inappropriately in referring these allegations to another police force almost three years after the initial complaint was made. At the hearing, Detective Inspector Hall was unable to justify this decision and agreed that three years was too long of a delay. Detective Inspector Hall said that if C-97 had not made allegations against Mr. Dufour, he would have decided back in 1997 that the other allegations did not fall within Project Truth's mandate.

C-10

C-10 is one of the alleged victims whose complaints were split between Project Truth and the CPS.

On February 3, 1998, C-10 gave a statement to Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis in which he alleged that Carl Allen had abused him between 1962 and 1964. C-10 also alleged abuse by Malcolm MacDonald, Ken Seguin, and a priest named Father Scott. C-10 said that he had spoken to Constable Perry Dunlop about these allegations a few weeks previously, and that Constable Dunlop had referred him to Project Truth.

As discussed later in this chapter, Project Truth investigated the allegations against Malcolm MacDonald. However, they referred the allegations against Mr. Allen to the CPS on April 2 or 3, 1998. Mr. Allen worked as a farmhand, and although the officers did not testify on this point, it seems likely that they did not consider him a "prominent person." The OPP did not investigate or refer Father Scott, as they eventually learned that he had died prior to Project Truth.

The decision to refer one of C-10's complaints to CPS is inconsistent with the practice established with Claude Marleau and C-96, whereby Project Truth investigated all of their allegations, even though some suspects did not fall within the mandated categories.

I also note that Detective Sergeant Hall was uncomfortable sharing certain information with the CPS because the CPS was under investigation for the conspiracy to obstruct justice. Accordingly, Detective Sergeant Hall, upon advice from Detective Inspector Smith, gave the CPS only the pages of C-10's statement that related to Mr. Allen. He did not provide the portions of the statement dealing with the allegations against Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Seguin, or revealing the contact with Constable Dunlop. In addition, the statement was not given to CPS Constable René Desrosiers until June 4, 1998, two months after the complaint was referred.

C-66

C-66 was interviewed by the CPS in March 1997 and alleged that he had been abused by Marcel Lalonde. At that time, he told the CPS that he had also been abused by Bernard Sauvé but no investigation into Mr. Sauvé was conducted. In spring 1998, Project Truth became aware of allegations made by C-66 against Bernard Sauvé. Detective Sergeant Hall and Detective Inspector Smith decided that Project Truth should take on this complaint.

At the hearings, Detective Inspector Hall was unable to explain why Mr. Sauvé, a convenience store owner, fell within the mandate. He said, “[T]here may have been a reason why at the time,” and that he would have to “read the interview report to see if he mentioned any other names or whatever.” C-66’s statement contains no obvious connection to other witnesses or suspects involved in Project Truth, other than Marcel Lalonde, who was mentioned in the Fantino Brief but was not investigated by Project Truth.

In April 1997, the CPS arrested Mr. Lalonde for allegedly abusing C-66 and others, and C-66 was working with the CPS as a witness in that prosecution. The decision by Project Truth to take on the allegations against Mr. Sauvé thus meant that C-66 had to deal with two different police forces. The fact that the CPS had not acted upon his initial complaint regarding Mr. Sauvé was probably a factor in the decision.

Staff Sergeant Brian Snyder of the CPS testified that he was surprised that Project Truth took jurisdiction over the Bernard Sauvé complaint. His understanding of the Project Truth mandate was that the OPP was looking into “[h]igh profile individuals as well as multiple victims.” In his view, the Bernard Sauvé case did not fit within this mandate.

It is evident that the Project Truth mandate was not clear to CPS officers. Project Truth’s inconsistent application of the mandate undoubtedly did not help in this understanding.

As will be further described later in this chapter, Mr. Sauvé was charged on March 11, 1999. However, those charges were eventually withdrawn, in part because of C-66’s unwillingness to go forward due to stress-related health problems and anxiety about the court proceedings. I am concerned that having his allegations split between police agencies may have contributed to C-66’s stress and anxiety.

David Petepiece

The mandate decision made by Project Truth in relation to David Petepiece’s complaint is also notable. Detective Inspector Hall cited the fact that the alleged perpetrator was an Anglican priest as one reason why no investigation was undertaken by Project Truth. In a letter to Mr. Petepiece, Detective Inspector Hall stated:

The mandate of Project Truth was to investigate historic allegations of a sexual nature involving the Catholic Clergy and other prominent persons in the Cornwall area. This did not include every sexual assault allegation in the City of Cornwall that was reported, and did not include allegations against members of other religions. (Emphasis added)

This indicates to me that, at least in this instance, Detective Inspector Hall's understanding of the mandate was quite narrow.

Mr. Petepiece's complaint and Project's Truth's handling of it are set out in detail in a later section.

St. Joseph's and St. John's Training Schools

Strictly speaking, the St. Joseph's Training School in Alfred, Ontario, and the St. John's Training School in Uxbridge, Ontario, did not fall within the mandate of Project Truth. However, Project Truth officers did investigate some religious personnel who had a connection to these schools.

Some of the allegations investigated came from the Fantino Brief. For example, C-15 alleged that Father Kevin Maloney abused him at St. Joseph's Training School. The Crown determined that Father Maloney should not be charged, because there was no evidence found that he was ever at the Alfred school.

In addition, two alleged victims came forward in the fall of 1997 and claimed that they had been abused by a brother at a branch of St. John's Training School in Alexandria. The alleged perpetrator was eventually identified as Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere. Project Truth charged Brother Carriere, but the charges were stayed due to his health. Both these cases will be discussed in greater detail later in the chapter.

Cases involving St. Joseph's were handled by the Project Truth team because Detective Inspector Smith was in charge of the Alfred investigation. When Detective Inspector Smith retired in 1999, Detective Inspector Hall inherited all of Detective Inspector Smith's outstanding cases. At times, Project Truth was asked to investigate priests from Alfred in order to help Alfred victims in their civil suits. However, Detective Inspector Hall was reluctant to use Project Truth resources in this manner if the victim did not want charges to be laid eventually.

Allegations Against Jean Luc Leblanc

The Jean Luc Leblanc case, which is more fully discussed later in the chapter, demonstrates the differing views as to Project Truth's mandate held by officers within the OPP.

Mr. Leblanc was a school bus driver and some of the allegations made against him were current. Detective Sergeant Randy Millar of the Lancaster Detachment first learned of concerns about Mr. Leblanc in September 1998 but did not follow up. Mr. Leblanc came to the attention of Project Truth in December 1998.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that Mr. Leblanc would not have been a Project Truth case if the local detachments had acted on it earlier. However, he also said that had Detective Sergeant Millar contacted him in September 1998, Project Truth would have taken it on. Detective Inspector Hall acknowledged that Mr. Leblanc had some connection to the Fantino Brief, as there were allegations made that he was connected to, and abused children in the presence of, Malcolm MacDonald.

Detective Inspector Millar testified that he did not think Mr. Leblanc fell within Project Truth's mandate. His understanding was that Project Truth was only investigating historical sexual assaults. Detective Constable McDonnell said the same.

These varying opinions make clear that within the OPP there was no common understanding of the project's mandate.

Marc Latour

On June 19, 2000, Marc Latour contacted Project Truth and told them that he had been sexually assaulted by his grade 3 teacher, Gilf Greggain, and by another person in a position of trust and authority named in the Fantino Brief.

Despite the fact that Mr. Greggain fell within one of the enumerated categories of the mandate (schoolteacher), Detective Inspector Hall determined that Mr. Latour's allegations did not fall within the Project Truth mandate.

He explained that "the information wasn't part of Mr. Dunlop's material" and that it was his view that "pretty well" only teachers who were named in the Fantino Brief fell within his mandate. Detective Inspector Hall did not look into whether there were any connections between Mr. Greggain and Marcel Lalonde, the teacher who was named in Constable Dunlop's materials. Detective Inspector Hall also appears to have disregarded the fact that there was a tie to the Fantino Brief through the allegations against the other person accused by Mr. Latour, possibly because that person was deceased.

Detective Inspector Hall was asked by counsel whether the timing of the complaint played a role in his decision that it was outside his mandate. He answered:

No, no. We were there for any allegation that came in. It didn't matter. Even after Project Truth was concluded, if somebody came with an allegation after, the officers were prepared to investigate it.

He noted that once Project Truth was effectively shut down, the officers remained available through their local detachments.

However, Detective Inspector Hall also testified that in the summer of 2000, Project Truth was in the process of winding down and the last Crown brief was submitted in August 2000. He also acknowledged that in June 2000, he was tying his mandate "very tightly" to the Fantino Brief. In my view, this decision indicates that by the summer of 2000, the scope of the Project Truth mandate was considerably narrower, at least in Detective Inspector Hall's mind, than it was in spring 1997 when Claude Marleau and C-96's complaints were taken on by the project.

Detective Inspector Hall wrote to Staff Sergeant Rick Carter of the CPS and referred the allegations to him, saying, "Mr. Latour was advised he would be contacted by an officer from your Police Service." The CPS investigation of these allegations is discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service.

C-14

On October 17, 2000, C-14 contacted Detective Inspector Hall and alleged that he had been abused by two individuals. One of the alleged perpetrators was deceased. The other was a mentally challenged boarder who had lived at the same group home as C-14 in the 1970s. C-14 had been referred to Project Truth by MPP Garry Guzzo's office. C-14 told Detective Inspector Hall that the OPP had looked at the matter in 1991 but did not pursue it. C-14 testified that Constable Peter Huffey, the OPP officer who investigated the issue in 1991, told him that "he didn't think it was a criminal case; that this was a civil matter."

Detective Inspector Hall determined that C-14's complaint did not fall within Project Truth's mandate. He referred the matter to OPP Detective Inspector Bruce MacKinnon the day after receiving the complaint. Detective Constable John Ralko of the Long Sault Detachment was assigned to the case. After completing his investigation, Detective Constable Ralko informed C-14 that he did not have reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges.

In C-14's case, there was no connection to the Fantino Brief and the alleged abused was not a "prominent" person. Detective Inspector Hall referred the matter promptly and it was dealt with by a local OPP detachment. In my view, the mandate decision made in relation to C-14's complaint was correct.

Victims' Perspectives on Impact of Mandate Decisions

In addition to C-66, C-10, and C-97, a number of other complainants had to deal with both Project Truth and the CPS because the OPP determined that certain suspects were not within their mandate. These include Marcel Lalonde's victims, such as C-8, C-45, and his brother. Some of these victims had to deal with parallel investigations and prosecutions.

CPS Constable Desrosiers testified that it was stressful for victims to go through parallel prosecutions, but that he was not party to any discussions about how this stress could be reduced. He also said that he would not have necessarily been aware when one of the victims he was dealing with was testifying in an OPP matter. He would not know how their evidence was received or how well they held up in cross-examination.

One of the victims testified that he was confused about why his allegations were split between the two police forces. He blamed both forces for this. During direct examination, C-10 said:

[W]hy was Carl Allen a Cornwall matter and Malcolm MacDonald and the other guys, why was they a provincial matter? Why would the Cornwall police not deal with that? It was in Cornwall I was molested, and that has always been a question. It still is today ... they all happened in Cornwall, so it should have been dealt with by the Cornwall police. I don't understand why they weren't.

In cross-examination, C-10 also questioned why the OPP did not deal with his allegations against Mr. Allen.

Implications of an Ill-Defined Mandate

In my view, the cases described above clearly demonstrate that there was little common understanding of the scope of the Project Truth mandate and consequently considerable inconsistency in its application.

Initially, Project Truth investigated allegations with no connection to the Fantino Brief in order to prevent complainants from having to split their complaints between police agencies. However, this practice was not consistent. Decisions on mandate at times appear to have been made on an arbitrary and ad hoc basis; an allegation against a convenience store owner was taken on, but one against a teacher was not. Where it was determined that a complaint did not fall within the Project Truth mandate, referrals to other police agencies were not always made promptly.

Accordingly, I find that the OPP, and Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall, failed to clearly define the Project Truth mandate in a manner that would have provided appropriate direction and structure to the project.

It appears that the mandate for Project Truth was largely defined by the allegations uncovered by Constable Dunlop. The OPP failed to determine for itself the appropriate scope of the project. In my view, it may have been more effective for Project Truth to simply investigate all allegations of non-familial, historical sexual abuse involving young people in the Cornwall area, rather than attempting to determine whether a case fell within its mandate based on the position of the alleged perpetrator.

I understand that such an approach would have resulted in a significantly larger investigation, probably requiring more resources. That said, a broader mandate also would have had significant benefits. It would have provided a clear structure to the project, been less confusing for complainants, and allowed the investigating officers to examine possible linkages between all suspects. This last point is of particular importance given the allegations about conspiracies and “pedophile rings.” The conspiracy investigation and linkage analysis conducted by Project Truth are discussed in later sections of this chapter.

Interactions Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop

Project Truth began as a result of the investigative work conducted by Cornwall Police Service (CPS) Constable Perry Dunlop, his lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, and his brother-in-law, Carson Chisholm, which began in 1996. At that time, Constable Dunlop was on sick leave from his position with the CPS. During this time, the group interviewed a number of alleged victims and witnesses of sexual abuse. Some of the information gathered during this investigation was used to support Constable Dunlop’s multi-million-dollar civil action against the CPS, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, and others. Constable Dunlop’s private investigation, as well as some highlights of his background and his career with the CPS, is set out in the section on Perry Dunlop in Chapter 6, “Institutional Response of the Cornwall Community Police Service.”

As discussed in the previous sections, the Fantino Brief produced by Constable Dunlop formed the basis of the Project Truth mandate. The officers in charge of Project Truth, Detective Inspector Tim Smith and Detective Sergeant Pat Hall, had numerous contacts with Constable Dunlop. Many of those encounters involved attempts to obtain the Constable’s notes, statements, and other materials relating to his contacts with alleged victims of sexual abuse. Because Constable Dunlop was a police officer at the time of his private investigation, he had a duty to disclose these materials. He also should have recorded these contacts and kept organized notes of his conversations with alleged victims.

In addition, issues arose as a result of comments made in the media by Constable Dunlop and his wife, Helen, as well as Constable Dunlop's continuing contacts with alleged victims and their families.

In January 2000, Constable Dunlop was given a written order to draft a comprehensive will-state about his contacts with victims and witnesses and to disclose all relevant materials in his possession. Mr. Dunlop did not complete his testimony at this Inquiry, an issue which I have explained in detail in Chapter 12, on process, but this will-state provides his perspective on events, albeit written several years after the fact and after numerous conflicts and difficulties had arisen. In this section, I will make some reference to this will-state, but I will also consider Constable Dunlop's sworn testimony at the various legal proceedings that arose as a result of the investigations into allegations of sexual abuse. I am mindful not only of the time gap between the writing of the will-state and the events described therein, but also of the fact that this document is not always consistent with his testimony under oath.

Initial Meeting Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop

On June 11, 1997, Detective Inspector Smith met with Constable Dunlop. Detective Inspector Smith explained that the purpose of the meeting was to "lay down some ground rules" with Constable Dunlop. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he wanted to thank the Constable for the Fantino Brief and ask him to refer any other complainants to Project Truth. He also wanted to ask Constable Dunlop "to give us a chance."

CPS Inspector Richard Trew also attended this meeting. Inspector Trew had been assigned to act as a liaison between the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) and the CPS in matters relating to the Project Truth investigation. Inspector Trew testified that he had been assigned to this task partly because he was one of the few executive-level officers of the CPS who was not being sued by Constable Dunlop. Inspector Trew said very little during this meeting.

At the meeting, Detective Inspector Smith discussed a number of issues with Constable Dunlop. Detective Inspector Smith explained that he had the Fantino Brief and that all of the allegations in it would be investigated. Constable Dunlop was told that a team of investigators had been assigned, and that an outside Crown attorney was going to be in charge of the file.

According to Constable Dunlop's will-state, Detective Inspector Smith shared some information about matters loosely related to the case, such as the Varley shooting, the tapes seized at Ron Leroux's residence, and some of the allegations against Malcolm MacDonald. In testimony, Detective Inspector Smith agreed that he talked to Constable Dunlop about these matters, but he disagreed with how Constable Dunlop interpreted his comments.

While Detective Inspector Smith was no doubt trying to befriend Constable Dunlop to try and persuade him to assist the OPP in its investigation, the amount of information he chose to share with Constable Dunlop is surprising. By 1997, Constable Dunlop was a very public figure who had spoken repeatedly to local, regional, and national media outlets concerning his own circumstances and those of others. In hindsight, Detective Inspector Smith's sharing of information loosely related to the Fantino Brief was not prudent. Some of the information that he shared with Constable Dunlop, such as the videotape seizure and destruction, predictably became public and led to more rumours and innuendo.

Detective Inspector Smith asked Constable Dunlop to refrain from speaking to the media and act professionally when in court. According to Detective Inspector Smith, Constable Dunlop had shown up in uniform at a preliminary hearing in the Father Charles MacDonald prosecution and made some derogatory comments toward Father MacDonald and his defence counsel. According to Inspector Trew's notes, Constable Dunlop agreed with these requests.

Detective Inspector Smith and Inspector Trew testified that Constable Dunlop was told during this meeting that in the future he was to refer victims to Project Truth. Detective Inspector Smith's notes indicate that Constable Dunlop was told that victims should not be interviewed by him, his lawyer, or his brother-in-law, Carson Chisholm. According to Constable Dunlop's will-state, Detective Inspector Smith told him, "I should advise my brother in law Carson Chisholm not to take anymore statements."

Constable Dunlop also noted in his will-state:

I distinctly remember at this meeting I inquired as to victims. More specifically sexual assault victims who come forward to me. What if they wish my presence at a statement they may give to police. Inspector Tim Smith indicated there was no problem with that.

The message was clear. Get the statement. That was the priority.

At the hearings, Detective Inspector Smith said that he told Constable Dunlop that if victims came forward who did not want to speak to Detective Inspector Smith, then Constable Dunlop could be present during the statement. Detective Inspector Smith testified that the message that he was trying to send was, "Get the person to come to us." Constable Dunlop's will-state confirms that "Smith wanted me to forward all further victims to him."

Detective Sergeant Hall did not attend the meeting but was later informed about what had transpired. He testified that he was aware that Constable Dunlop had been told that he could act as a “coach” or intermediary to bring victims to Project Truth.

It is clear that Constable Dunlop was being given mixed messages in this meeting about his role in the investigation. On one hand, he was told to refrain from taking statements from victims, but on the other hand, he was told that he could continue to be in contact with victims and that his role was to bring them in to Project Truth and, if necessary, to act as a coach for them.

Detective Inspector Smith did not ask Constable Dunlop to turn over any outstanding notes that he had. Detective Inspector Smith said that this request was made at a later meeting.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that “it was a good meeting” and that Constable Dunlop had indicated that he would cooperate “100 percent.”

August 7, 1997 Meeting Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop

Detective Inspector Smith met with Constable Dunlop again on August 7, 1997. Inspector Trew and Detective Sergeant Hall attended this meeting as well. These three officers all took notes and testified about what transpired. Unfortunately, Constable Dunlop’s will-state only says, “Meeting at H.Q. with Inspector Tim Smith, Detective Pat Hall and Inspector Trew. The meeting was about unauthorized release to the media.”

The meeting was held in part because David Silmsner had come to the OPP alleging that Constable Dunlop had told him there was a plot by Father MacDonald, Malcolm MacDonald, and Ken Seguin to kill Mr. Silmsner. At that time, Detective Sergeant Hall was investigating an allegation that these same three men had threatened to kill Constable Dunlop and his family. This investigation is discussed in a later section of this chapter.

Constable Dunlop denied having told Mr. Silmsner that there was a plot against Mr. Silmsner’s life. Detective Sergeant Hall asked Constable Dunlop to provide a statement. According to Detective Sergeant Hall, Constable Dunlop became agitated by this request. Detective Inspector Smith intervened and suggested that Constable Dunlop speak with Mr. Silmsner “and straighten it out and get back to us.” Detective Sergeant Hall testified that Constable Dunlop later told him that he had cleared the matter up with Mr. Silmsner but that he did not provide any notes about this contact.

The second purpose for the meeting was to discuss comments that Constable Dunlop had made in the press. An article had appeared in the Ottawa Sun several days earlier that referred to the death threats against the Dunlop family, Constable Dunlop's lawsuit, and some of the other allegations made in the Fantino Brief. Both Constable Dunlop and his wife were quoted in this article.

Detective Sergeant Hall testified that he and Detective Inspector Smith were concerned that Constable Dunlop's comments could lead perpetrators to destroy evidence. Further, the comments could discourage complainants from coming forward, as they might be concerned that if they did, their information could end up in the media. Inspector Trew's notes simply say, "Constable Dunlop was strongly advised not to comment on any criminal cases that Insp. Smith and his team are working on because this could possibly jeopardise these cases."

According to Detective Inspector Smith's notes, Constable Dunlop explained that the media had caught him off-guard, and he agreed to refrain from speaking to the press in the future.

The Ottawa Sun article also mentioned that numerous victims were coming forward to the Dunlops. Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall asked Constable Dunlop to provide the names of the witnesses whom he had spoken to, as well as any statements or notes that he had, by August 15, 1997. He was told to give these items directly to Detective Sergeant Hall, who had been designated as the OPP officer responsible for liaising with Constable Dunlop. Detective Inspector Smith said in testimony at this Inquiry that Constable Dunlop should have known about his disclosure obligations as a police officer, "but I was just going to tell him anyway."

Constable Dunlop's will-state says that he had several contacts with alleged victims as recently as two weeks before this meeting, and that he referred these individuals to Project Truth.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that in this meeting, Constable Dunlop was again given the message that he could be present during statements taken by the OPP, if that was the only way to get a particular victim to come forward. Inspector Trew also testified that Constable Dunlop was told that he could be used as a "coach" to get a victim to come forward, but that he could not be actively involved in the case. Inspector Trew's notes indicate, "I also made it very clear that Constable Dunlop could not be involved with taking statements."

Constable Dunlop was again being given mixed messages about contacts with alleged victims. In addition, at this meeting Constable Dunlop was explicitly directed to speak to an alleged victim, Mr. Silmsen, about allegations that he had made to the police. Constable Dunlop was not clearly told in these first two meetings to keep track of his contacts with victims or to inform the OPP immediately when he had been contacted by a victim.

After the meeting, Inspector Trew issued a memo to Constable Dunlop that stated:

Media releases by unauthorized persons could possibly jeopardize the ongoing investigation by the Ontario Provincial Police into the allegation of sexual assault.

Therefore, unless authorized by the Chief of Police and within the guidelines of Directive #59, no members of the Cornwall Police Service will release information to the media.

According to Inspector Trew, this memo was an order.

Detective Sergeant Pat Hall Obtains Additional Names From Constable Perry Dunlop

On August 15, 1997, Detective Sergeant Hall went to Constable Dunlop's residence to obtain the items he had promised to disclose at their meeting the previous week. Constable Dunlop provided a list of people that the OPP should speak to as potential victims or witnesses of sexual abuse. Only the initials of some people were provided, and Constable Dunlop told Detective Sergeant Hall that he wanted to contact these individuals first because some of them had given their names in confidence. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he gave Constable Dunlop time to do this.

Constable Dunlop did not have copies of his notes available, but he said that he would provide them when he returned from vacation in two weeks. Detective Inspector Hall testified that Constable Dunlop seemed cooperative at this encounter.

Constable Perry Dunlop Won't Give Detective Sergeant Pat Hall Notes Upon Advice From His Lawyer

Detective Sergeant Hall contacted Constable Dunlop on September 23, 1997, to obtain the notes that Constable Dunlop had agreed to provide. Detective Sergeant Hall's notes state that Constable Dunlop said that his lawyer had advised him not to provide the notes due to his ongoing lawsuit against the Cornwall Police Service, the Diocese, and others. Constable Dunlop told Detective Sergeant Hall to call his lawyer to discuss the matter. According to Constable Dunlop's will-state, "I was unsure as to what I was required to hand over to Police. I knew there was a lawyer client privilege, and felt that my counsel should be contacted."

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he advised Detective Inspector Smith of the difficulty that he was having in obtaining Constable Dunlop's notes. Detective Inspector Smith called CPS Inspector Trew and informed him of Detective Sergeant Hall's conversation with Constable Dunlop.

Detective Inspector Hall explained at this Inquiry why the OPP had to seek the assistance of the CPS to obtain disclosure from Constable Dunlop:

He [Perry Dunlop] was a Cornwall police officer. We had no control over him whatsoever, so I don't think we really had to ask. I mean, I think Inspector Trew determined, from the information we were not receiving, that they had to do something.

Inspector Trew issued a written order to Constable Dunlop, dated September 25, 1997. The order reminded Constable Dunlop that he had a statutory duty as a police officer to disclose information about victims or alleged sexual assaults. It also said that notwithstanding the fact that the materials were with Constable Dunlop's lawyer, he was to "disclose to Inspector Tim Smith, or his investigator, all your notes, tapes, statements, etc. that you have made or received" by October 3, 1997.

Inspector Trew met with Constable Dunlop on September 26, 1997, and gave him a copy of the order. According to Inspector Trew's notes, Constable Dunlop commented, "[T]hat's fine."

It is my view that the OPP acted appropriately by informing their contact at the CPS of the difficulties obtaining compliance from Constable Dunlop and that Inspector Trew took appropriate action by issuing a direct written order to Constable Dunlop.

On October 3, 1997, Constable Dunlop called Inspector Trew from Toronto, where he was meeting with his lawyer. The purpose of the call was to request an extension of the deadline for disclosure. Inspector Trew agreed to the extension as long as the material was provided as soon as possible, and he told Constable Dunlop that he would require a written report explaining the delay.

On October 6, 1997, Inspector Trew spoke to Constable Dunlop's lawyer, Charles Bourgeois. According to Inspector Trew's notes, Mr. Bourgeois said that Constable Dunlop was at his firm reviewing materials to see if there was anything that was not already given to the OPP. Mr. Bourgeois said that he had already turned over a brief to the OPP. Inspector Trew told Mr. Bourgeois that Constable Dunlop was a police officer and should have been taking notes when he had interviews with victims or witnesses. Mr. Bourgeois further stated that some of Constable Dunlop's notes might be subject to solicitor-client privilege. Inspector Trew responded that notes made by police officers concerning criminal offences have to be disclosed to proper authorities. Inspector Trew requested that Mr. Bourgeois provide something in writing stating that Constable Dunlop was attempting to comply with his disclosure obligations. At this Inquiry, Mr. Bourgeois testified that he had no recollection of this conversation.

Mr. Bourgeois sent Inspector Trew a letter on October 8, 1997, stating that Constable Dunlop was reviewing his materials in order to comply with the order, and that Constable Dunlop would provide the materials to the OPP by October 10, 1997, “except for materials previously provided to the O.P.P. or any materials that fall under the solicitor-client privilege.”

Mr. Bourgeois testified that he did not recall writing this letter but he acknowledged that it bore his signature. He said at the hearings that he assumed that the materials that fell under solicitor-client privilege were his own handwritten notes, although he did not recall the advice that he gave to Constable Dunlop on the matter, nor did he remember assisting his client in identifying the documents that were to be disclosed. Mr. Bourgeois did not recall whether he told Constable Dunlop that he did not have to disclose personal notes taken during his interviews with various people.

Inspector Trew kept Detective Sergeant Hall apprised of his discussions with Mr. Bourgeois, and Detective Sergeant Hall in turn informed Detective Inspector Smith.

A decision was made to have Constable Dunlop give his materials directly to the OPP, in part to ensure continuity of possession and in part because the CPS was under investigation by the OPP. Inspector Trew did not want the CPS to be accused of having tampered with the materials.

Constable Dunlop Discloses Yellow Binder and Additional Materials

Constable Dunlop met with Detective Sergeant Hall on October 10, 1997, and turned over a yellow binder with nine tabs of materials, as well as three audio-cassette tapes that contained interviews with Ron Leroux, Robert Renshaw, and Gerald Renshaw.

The binder contained the index to the Fantino Brief, a variety of handwritten notes from contacts from a number of individuals, including alleged victims, and various lists, including a list of alleged pedophiles, and lists of possible victims or witnesses.

Some of the materials in the binder mentioned Marcel Lalonde, and there were notes from conversations with C-8, an alleged victim of Mr. Lalonde, about matters not directly related to Mr. Lalonde. Although the Lalonde case was a joint CPS and OPP investigation and not a Project Truth matter, OPP Detective Constable Don Genier was responsible for disclosure in the Marcel Lalonde prosecution. As was discussed in the Marcel Lalonde section earlier in this chapter, some of the materials in Project Truth’s possession, including the materials in the yellow binder, were not turned over to the Crown for two years, until the fall of 1999.

Detective Sergeant Hall was aware at the time that there were materials that were not disclosed at this time because Constable Dunlop and his counsel claimed that they were subject to solicitor-client privilege.

I accept that Constable Dunlop was acting upon his understanding of the legal advice of his lawyer, Charles Bourgeois. This said, I have two comments to make about this privilege claim.

The first is that many of the items in Constable Dunlop's or his lawyer's possession were wrongly classified as being subject to a solicitor-client privilege claim. This mistake may have stemmed from the very nature of Constable Dunlop's civil lawsuit against the CPS, the Diocese, and others. The amended statement of claim, which was later struck with leave to amend, was improperly framed to include allegations of abuse perpetrated by a "clan" of pedophiles. These allegations were only tenuously related to the harm suffered by Constable Dunlop. However, because the amended statement of claim referred to sexual abuse committed against others, either Constable Dunlop or his lawyer may have believed that the statements and notes relating to these alleged victims were properly subject to solicitor-client privilege or even litigation privilege. It is unfortunate that once the amended statement of claim was modified to remove these unrelated allegations, no one reassessed the privilege claim that was being asserted over the notes.

Second, I find that the OPP failed to properly react to the assertion of the privilege claim. There were a number of possible responses. If the OPP was uncertain whether a claim of solicitor-client privilege superseded a police officer's duty to disclose, it should have sought legal advice. It may even have been helpful to have a lawyer contact Mr. Bourgeois to discuss the state of the law surrounding this issue and possibly reach a mutually acceptable solution.

Furthermore, no attempt was made to determine the nature of the documents that were being withheld. Detective Sergeant Hall did not request a detailed list of documents for which privilege was claimed. It is a common practice in civil litigation to require a party to provide a detailed list that describes privileged documents without disclosing the privileged information. Although Detective Sergeant Hall may not have been aware of this, a lawyer would have been able to give him this information. Thereafter, asking for such a list would not have been an unduly burdensome request.

C-18 Tells OPP That He Wasn't Abused

A few weeks later, Detective Constable Genier interviewed C-18. The Fantino Brief contained a statement from C-18 alleging that he had been abused by a priest. On October 22, 1997, Detective Constable Genier spoke with C-18, who said that he was never abused, although he recalled “advances made by a priest.” According to Detective Constable Genier’s notes in the case management register:

Dunlop contacted him [C-18] and showed him several photos and wanted him to disclose abuse. Dunlop stated—you can make money ...

[C-18] told Dunlop who he knew and said he chose not to pursue it. Dunlop stated he put together a statement for [C-18] and later would have him sign it. [C-18] later did sign it because he felt it wasn’t going anywhere. [C-18] stated that Dunlop “sweetened it up a bit.”

Detective Inspector Hall testified that the fact that C-18 changed his story in his interview with the OPP was troubling to the Project Truth team. He said that they tried to pursue the matter with C-18, but he refused to cooperate any further.

This interview provided an early indication to Project Truth that Constable Dunlop might have utilized improper techniques during his private investigation that may have unduly influenced witnesses. This should have alerted the officers to the need to be aware of and track Constable Dunlop’s contact with victims and witnesses, so that they could address any possible contamination of their cases.

Further, it is my view that they should have raised the matter with Constable Dunlop, both to hear his side of the story and to obtain any notes that he had in relation to his contact with C-18.

Constable Perry Dunlop Fires Lawyer Charles Bourgeois

In a letter dated November 21, 1997, Constable Dunlop terminated the services of Mr. Bourgeois as his lawyer. At this Inquiry, I stated that the reasons for the end of this relationship are subject to solicitor-client privilege.

Mr. Bourgeois testified that he assumed that at the end of the retainer, he would have returned all of Constable Dunlop’s materials to him.

A few days later, on November 24, 1997, the Cornwall Police Service brought a motion to strike Constable Dunlop’s statement of claim. Mr. Bourgeois did not attend the motion, and Constable Dunlop asked for an adjournment in order to seek new legal counsel. The judge allowed the motion to strike, but granted leave to amend the statement of claim and re-file it by February 2, 1998. Constable Dunlop retained new counsel, and the Court permitted him to file an amended claim that did not include all of the allegations regarding the “clan of pedophiles.” According to Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie’s notes, Constable Dunlop eventually settled his lawsuit in December 2002 for $40,000.

Constable Perry Dunlop's Contact With Project Truth Victims

During the first year of the Project Truth investigation, Constable Dunlop had contact with a number of Project Truth victims and their families. By July 1998, the officers were aware that Constable Dunlop had been in contact with C-10, C-16's mother, and possibly others.

They also would have been aware that Constable Dunlop had been in contact with alleged victims prior to Project Truth, based on the statements in the Fantino Brief and the notes in the yellow binder. Constable Dunlop claimed in his will-state that he referred many of these people to Project Truth.

Constable Dunlop had also had contact with other alleged victims, most notably C-2, but Project Truth was unaware of these contacts.

All of these contacts are described in more detail in the relevant investigation sections.

July 23, 1998, Meeting Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop

On July 23, 1998, Detective Inspector Smith, Detective Sergeant Hall, and Inspector Trew had another meeting with Constable Dunlop. Constable Dunlop's will-state contains a detailed description of this meeting. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he thought Constable Dunlop had tape-recorded the meeting.

One of the purposes of the meeting was to discuss Constable Dunlop's contact with victims, including his recent contact with C-16's mother. Detective Inspector Hall testified there was some discussion about the extent of the contact and the reasons for it. According to Detective Inspector Smith, Constable Dunlop explained that C-16's mother had initially contacted him, but Detective Inspector Smith was concerned by the fact that Constable Dunlop later called her back.

Neither Detective Sergeant Hall nor Detective Inspector Smith made notes of the fact that they had raised the issue of Constable Dunlop's contact with C-16's mother during this meeting. This became an issue during the trial of Jacques Leduc, and will be discussed in more detail in that section.

It would have been prudent for the Project Truth officers to have reminded Constable Dunlop that his duty of disclosure was ongoing, and thus he had a duty to disclose notes of the contacts that he had with victims after Project Truth began. I cannot see how these notes would be subject to solicitor-client privilege, given that they were not tied to his civil action.

The second major purpose of the meeting was to discuss disclosure, particularly in light of comments that Helen Dunlop had recently made in the media.

As discussed in the section “External Pressures: The Media, Websites, and Garry Guzzo,” shortly after a number of suspects were arrested on July 9, 1998, Helen Dunlop told the Ottawa Sun that none of the men arrested were named in the materials that she and her husband had turned over to the OPP, and that at least ten more people could be added to the list of those charged. Indeed, none of the suspects arrested that day were accused in statements in the Fantino Brief.

According to Constable Dunlop’s will-state, Ms Dunlop also said in the media, “Every parent should be knocking down the O.P.P.’s door demanding to know who these pedophiles are.” Detective Inspector Smith told Constable Dunlop that these comments could undermine the confidence of victims in the investigation and that they would not come forward if such comments continued.

Detective Inspector Smith asked Constable Dunlop to speak to his wife about this, but Constable Dunlop said, according to Detective Inspector Smith’s notes, that his wife does what she wants.

Inspector Trew testified that Helen Dunlop, in speaking to the media, had referred to affidavits that the OPP did not have. Detective Inspector Hall also testified that Ms Dunlop told the press that boxes of material had been delivered to the Ministry of the Attorney General and the “Top Cop.” Detective Sergeant Hall wanted to know what Ms Dunlop was talking about, as the Project Truth investigators had only received one binder (the Fantino Brief) and the letter that Constable Dunlop had written to the Solicitor General, dated April 7, 1997.

Constable Dunlop was surprised by this. He explained that he had delivered four volumes of evidence to the Ministry of the Attorney General and the Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services (OCCPS) on April 8, 1997, and that he had attempted to deliver the same materials to the Solicitor General’s Office, but it refused to accept the binders. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he was not aware of these additional materials at the time. I refer to these materials throughout this Report as the “Government Brief.”

Constable Dunlop agreed to photocopy these materials and provide them to Project Truth. According to Detective Sergeant Hall’s notes, he also asked Constable Dunlop to provide him with a memo confirming that the OPP had all of his materials.

Delivery of the Government Brief to Project Truth

On July 31, 1998, Constable Dunlop met with Inspector Trew and advised him that the materials that he had promised to provide to Project Truth were ready. According to Inspector Trew’s notes, Constable Dunlop said that he would not write a letter stating he had handed over all his materials, but that he would sign a letter to this effect written by Project Truth, as long as his lawyer could review the letter first.

Later that day, Detective Sergeant Hall met with Constable Dunlop, who provided him with the following:

- two black binders, Volumes 1 and 2;
- 2 plastic-bound binders, Volumes 3 and 4;
- copy of memo to Chief Julian Fantino, London Police Service;
- copy of memo to Solicitor General Robert Runciman, and Mr. Runciman's reply;
- copy of reply from regional Crown Attorney Peter Griffiths; and
- copy of receipt of material from the OCCPS, the Ministry of the Attorney General, and the Ministry of the Solicitor General.

Constable Dunlop had Detective Sergeant Hall sign a receipt saying:

Received from Constable Perry Dunlop of the Cornwall Police Service—

Four Volumes of documents marked "Submission by Constable P. Dunlop, of The Cornwall Police Service."

The Ontario Provincial Police "Project Truth Investigators" never received the full package that was delivered to the Office of the Attorney General, or the Office of the Solicitor General, Ontario Civilian Commission on Policing Services that was hand delivered on the 8th of April 1997 to the said offices by Constable Perry Dunlop.

The first two binders contained eighty-five tabs of material. The first seventy-four tabs were identical to the Fantino Brief, and the remaining eleven tabs consisted of new material. Volumes 3 and 4 contained material from the Police Services Act charges against Constable Dunlop. This material had not been given to Chief Fantino.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that only three items were useful to him from the eleven tabs of new material in the first two binders. These were a statement from C-8, taken in January 1997, an affidavit from Robert Renshaw, and a statement from C-130.

However, Detective Inspector Hall added that by July 1998, he already had these items in his possession. He testified that the rest of the new material in Volumes 1 and 2 "wasn't overly helpful for investigative purposes." It included a pamphlet on reporting child abuse, Constable Dunlop's resumé, news clippings, and a statement of claim from a victim of whom Project Truth was already aware.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that Volumes 3 and 4 consisted of materials that were disclosed during the Police Services Act prosecution against Constable Dunlop after he gave David Silmser's statement to the Children's Aid Society. They contained interview reports from various Cornwall Police Service officers, extensive notes from CPS Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie, and other investigative material compiled by CPS Staff Sergeant Brendon Wells. Detective Sergeant Hall did not already have this material, and he said at the hearings that it was useful for his conspiracy investigation.

Notwithstanding the usefulness of the material, Detective Inspector Hall stated at the hearings that the failure of the Ministry of the Attorney General to deliver the material to him did not affect his investigation in any way.

In his will-state, Constable Dunlop wrote:

I think I realized why on September 23rd 1997 Detective Sergeant Pat Hall was upset at me for not handing materials over before my counsel was contacted. Detective Sergeant Pat Hall had not been provided with all the material. It was now clear at this meeting. The Attorney General's Office as well as the Solicitor General's Office, did not forward the material to the assigned investigators the OPP.

It is my view that Constable Dunlop is mistaken in this comment. He had other relevant materials in his possession that were not included in the Government Brief, nor in the yellow binder that he provided in October 1997. As I have previously mentioned, Constable Dunlop may have wrongly been under the impression that some of these materials were protected by solicitor-client privilege. In addition, he had been in contact with alleged victims since the fall of 1997, and he was obligated to disclose the notes of these contacts by the duty of ongoing disclosure and by Inspector Trew's written order of September 25, 1997.

Although OCCPS informed Project Truth in 1999 that it had the materials that had been delivered in April 1997, the Ministry of the Attorney General was never able to find its copy of them. In the years that followed, Detective Inspector Hall made several requests to Ministry officials, asking them to determine what had happened to the materials. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he never received a satisfactory answer. This issue is discussed in detail in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry.

After reviewing the materials, Detective Sergeant Hall informed Ms Dunlop that the binders did not contain any significant new material. Detective Sergeant Hall also wrote to Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier and provided him with material from the binders that had to be disclosed to defence counsel in the Father Charles MacDonald prosecution.

OPP Request for an Investigation of Constable Perry Dunlop

Detective Inspector Hall testified that at some point in July or August 1998, he and Detective Inspector Smith spoke with Inspector Trew and requested that the CPS conduct an investigation of Constable Dunlop. According to Detective Inspector Hall, the CPS asked the OPP to make this request in writing. Detective Sergeant Hall consulted with OPP Headquarters and it was determined that they should not make a written request for an investigation, as it could be perceived that the OPP was investigating Constable Dunlop.

Constable Perry Dunlop Refuses to Sign Memo on Disclosure

On August 11, 1998, Detective Sergeant Hall met with Constable Dunlop at his home and presented him with a letter to sign confirming that he had disclosed all of his materials. The letter said:

I, PERRY DUNLOP, have provided to the Ontario Provincial Police, Project Truth, copies of all notes, audio/video tapes and interview statements, pertaining to both criminal and civil matters that are in my possession. (Emphasis added)

Constable Dunlop said that he had a problem with the reference to “civil matters” and said he wanted to obtain legal advice before signing the letter. I agree that Constable Dunlop was justified in refusing to sign a document that made reference to his civil matters and in seeking legal advice on this issue.

Detective Sergeant Hall spoke with Helen Dunlop on August 27, 1998. She asked if her husband had signed the disclosure letter. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he found this odd, and that he concluded that she and her husband had a difference of opinion about signing the letter. Ms Dunlop told him that their lawyer had told Constable Dunlop not to sign because of their ongoing civil action. She also said that Constable Dunlop might have another tape of Ron Leroux to disclose.

On September 17, 1998, Detective Sergeant Hall met with Constable Dunlop again and gave him another memo to sign. This memo did not make reference to Constable Dunlop’s civil matters. According to Detective Sergeant Hall, Constable Dunlop told him that although he agreed with the memo, he wanted to show it to his lawyer before signing. He also told Detective Sergeant Hall about the video of Mr. Leroux reading a statement and said that he would provide a copy. The tape had been made in December 1996.

Constable Dunlop contacted Detective Sergeant Hall on October 1, 1998, at 3:15 p.m. and told him that he had a copy of the Ron Leroux videotape ready.

According to Detective Sergeant Hall, he asked Constable Dunlop if he would sign the memo confirming that he had disclosed all his materials, and Constable Dunlop said “absolutely.”

Detective Sergeant Hall met with Constable Dunlop half an hour later. Constable Dunlop provided the tape of Mr. Leroux’s statement but refused to sign the memo. He wrote “advised not to sign” at the bottom of this document. During court proceedings in the Father MacDonald prosecution, Constable Dunlop testified, “I was advised not to sign by my lawyer.”

The following day, Detective Sergeant Hall contacted Inspector Trew to advise him that Constable Dunlop did not sign the letter confirming he had supplied all relevant materials pertaining to Project Truth. Inspector Trew testified that he did not believe that he took this up with Constable Dunlop.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that Constable Dunlop’s refusal to sign the letter caused him to conclude that Constable Dunlop still had relevant materials in his possession.

Detective Inspector Hall added that he knew that Constable Dunlop had not provided all his notes after he reviewed the videotape provided by Constable Dunlop. The tape showed Constable Dunlop presenting Ron Leroux with a photo line-up. Constable Dunlop appeared to be taking notes in the video. However, Constable Dunlop had not provided Project Truth with a copy of these notes.

Constable Perry Dunlop’s Call to Claude Marleau

In the fall of 1998, the question of contacts between Claude Marleau and Constable Dunlop was raised by the defence in the prosecution of an alleged abuser of Mr. Marleau.

Around 10:00 a.m. on November 16, 1998, Detective Sergeant Hall attempted to call Constable Dunlop at home and spoke with his wife, Helen. Ms Dunlop said her husband was sleeping, having just finished a night shift. Detective Sergeant Hall asked if she had any notes about her interactions with Mr. Marleau. She said that there was a letter dated October 3, 1997. Detective Sergeant Hall asked her to check with her husband and determine whether there were any other notes.

Ms Dunlop testified that she did not remember talking to the OPP about Mr. Marleau and she did not know why they would be asking her about him. She said that the only dealings she had with him was sending him one letter and one package. This is described further in the section “Investigations of Complaints of Claude Marleau and C-96.”

Detective Sergeant Hall then asked Detective Constable Joe Dupuis to contact Mr. Marleau. Detective Constable Dupuis was told by Mr. Marleau that he had just spoken with Constable Dunlop, and that Constable Dunlop had asked Mr. Marleau to fax him the materials requested by the OPP.

Detective Sergeant Hall called the Dunlop residence again just after 10:30 a.m. He spoke with Constable Dunlop and asked why he was contacting Mr. Marleau. According to Detective Sergeant Hall's notes:

He [Constable Dunlop] really didn't have any explanation for contacting MARLEAU, and he went on to say he felt comfortable getting on the stand and repeated, put me in the stand, meaning the witness box. I replied it may never get to that if we can't satisfy disclosure issues. I said you are a police officer, you know we have to disclose everything. I said we are trying to cover his ass as well. He took exception to that.

Detective Sergeant Hall then asked about the notes that were taken during the videotaped interview of Mr. Leroux. Detective Sergeant Hall's notes state, "He [Constable Dunlop] became agitated saying he will take the stand on that matter. He further stated, don't call me anymore, call my lawyer." Constable Dunlop then provided the name and contact information for his lawyer, John Morris.

Constable Dunlop did not note this incident in his will-state, but he does have notes of it, although they appear to be wrongly dated December 16, 1998. These notes confirm that Detective Sergeant Hall asked Constable Dunlop why he was contacting Mr. Marleau and that he asked about the notes that were taken during the interview with Mr. Leroux. Constable Dunlop described Detective Sergeant Hall's manner as "terse, unprofessional, edgy."

At the hearings, Detective Inspector Hall said, "[I]n hindsight maybe I shouldn't have said it was covering his ass but we're talking police officer to police officer here and I'm trying to enforce what I need to get from him."

Detective Inspector Hall testified that after this conversation, he immediately contacted Inspector Trew and informed him of what had transpired. Chief Anthony Repa acknowledged that the Cornwall Police Service was briefed on the fact that Detective Sergeant Hall was not convinced that Constable Dunlop had provided all of his disclosure.

Detective Sergeant Hall also wrote to Crown Attorney Alain Godin on November 17, 1998, and informed him of the difficulties in obtaining disclosure from Constable Dunlop. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not recall getting a response to this letter, nor did he recall getting any direction from Mr. Godin.

Detective Inspector Hall also testified that he had a discussion with Shelley Hallett about Constable Dunlop's notes and that he did not get much direction back from her.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that events in the fall of 1998, in particular Constable Dunlop's refusal to sign the memo and the conversation about his contacts with Mr. Marleau, caused his relationship with Constable Dunlop to change for the worse. In addition, he acknowledged that the Dunlops were not happy with the December 1998 decision not to lay charges in relation to the death threats against the Dunlop family and that this “probably had an effect on my relationship with them.”

Despite the fact that Detective Sergeant Hall did not believe he had all of Constable Dunlop’s materials, it does not appear that any significant action was taken until disclosure issues arose in the Marcel Lalonde prosecution in the fall of 1999. It is my view that the OPP should have considered asking the CPS to issue another order to Constable Dunlop or requested a formal legal opinion about what action could be taken. Neither the OPP as an institution, nor its case managers for Project Truth, Detective Inspector Smith and later Detective Inspector Hall, were able to develop and apply proper practices or protocols to ensure effective cooperation with the CPS in dealing with Constable Dunlop’s involvement in OPP investigations and prosecutions.

Contact With Victims in 1999

The OPP was aware that Constable Dunlop was continuing to have contacts with victims into 1999. He met with C-104 on April 7, 1999, and took a videotaped statement from him. The OPP interviewed C-104 the following day, and he disclosed this contact with Constable Dunlop.

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie Becomes the CPS Liaison Officer

In September 1999, Inspector Trew retired and Staff Sergeant Derochie became the Cornwall Police Service’s liaison with Project Truth. Staff Sergeant Derochie testified that he was assigned to this role because he was in the Professional Standards Branch and because he was involved in a number of issues regarding Constable Dunlop.

Issues Arising in the Marcel Lalonde Trial

As was discussed in detail in the section “Investigation and Prosecution of Marcel Lalonde,” a number of issues involving Constable Dunlop arose during the prosecution of Marcel Lalonde. Constable Dunlop had had contact with a number of victims and alleged victims of Mr. Lalonde, including C-8 and C-68.

Constable Dunlop testified in the preliminary inquiry on January 15, 1998. He told the Court that he still had some undisclosed materials in his possession that related to the Lalonde prosecution, and that Detective Constable Genier “would have everything [Perry Dunlop] provided to the OPP.”

The trial of Mr. Lalonde was initially scheduled to begin on October 4, 1999. On September 29, 1999, Crown Claudette Wilhelm received a letter from defence counsel requesting notes taken by Perry Dunlop on September 11 and December 12, 1996. These notes were in the package of materials that Perry Dunlop had delivered to Project Truth in a yellow binder in October 1997. As these notes were in the OPP's possession, responsibility for the delay in disclosing them lies with OPP and not with Constable Dunlop or the CPS.

However, on October 1, 1999, Constable Dunlop disclosed a handwritten note dated November 19, 1996, in which C-8 described the alleged abuse by Mr. Lalonde. This note was not in the Fantino Brief, the Government Brief, or the yellow binder. This note is one of several documents that Constable Dunlop failed to disclose to the police in a timely manner, despite a written order from the CPS in the fall of 1997.

The note is also significant because Constable Dunlop had testified at the preliminary inquiry that between June 1996 and January 1997, C-8 did not disclose the details of his alleged abuse by Marcel Lalonde. He had also promised at the preliminary inquiry to provide all of his notes that related to C-8's allegations about Mr. Lalonde.

The trial was subsequently adjourned to September 11, 2000, due to this late disclosure, but also because of the CPS's failure to locate and disclose a file of a previous investigation into Marcel Lalonde.

Crown Wilhelm had serious concerns that Constable Dunlop had not disclosed all of his materials. She expressed these concerns to CPS Acting Inspector Rick Carter and Staff Sergeant Derochie on October 4, 1999, and to Detective Inspector Hall in a letter dated October 5, 1999. She noted in this letter that the defence claimed that Constable Dunlop had contact with other alleged victims of Marcel Lalonde. She asked Detective Inspector Hall to obtain any additional notes from Constable Dunlop that he might have about these contacts and to ask him to refrain from speaking to victims.

On October 6, 1999, Detective Inspector Hall met with Staff Sergeant Derochie and Acting Inspector Carter. They discussed the possibility of obtaining a search warrant for Constable Dunlop's materials, but Detective Inspector Hall did not feel there were sufficient grounds for a warrant. They also discussed a possible investigation into Constable Dunlop for obstruction of justice or perjury. Detective Inspector Hall testified that it was the CPS officers' idea to investigate Constable Dunlop, although Staff Sergeant Derochie testified that Detective Inspector Hall encouraged him to investigate these issues. Detective Inspector Hall said that he did have the authority to investigate Constable Dunlop, although he did not object to the CPS doing so.

Detective Inspector Hall spoke with OPP Detective Superintendent Larry Edgar the following day, who instructed him not to interview Constable Dunlop.

Detective Inspector Hall then met with Marc Garson, Director of Crown Operations, Western Region, on October 13, 1999. Staff Sergeant Derochie had requested the meeting but was unable to attend. Mr. Garson was of the opinion that if an investigation into Constable Dunlop was to be conducted, it should not be done by the CPS or by the OPP, but rather by an outside agency. Detective Inspector Hall's notes state that the following conclusions were reached at this meeting:

1. I am not investigating Dunlop nor do I intend to.
2. If an investigation, someone other than C.P.S. should do it.
3. It is my opinion that Cornwall P.S. want Dunlop investigated.

Detective Inspector Hall contacted Staff Sergeant Derochie a few days later and told him that he would not be investigating Constable Dunlop. He wrote to Crown Wilhelm on October 28, 1999, and told her that he would not speak with Constable Dunlop about his contacts with victims or about his disclosure, as she had requested.

Mr. Garson also met with Staff Sergeant Derochie and then gave him a legal opinion outlining the CPS's disclosure obligations and the Crown's responsibilities, and providing advice on what action should be taken.

Detective Inspector Hall met with Staff Sergeant Derochie on November 25, 1999. Staff Sergeant Derochie told him that Mr. Garson had recommended that Constable Dunlop be re-interviewed about disclosure. Staff Sergeant Derochie told Detective Inspector Hall that the Cornwall Chief of Police would be asking for an outside agency to conduct an investigation into the allegations that Constable Dunlop had committed perjury or obstructed justice in the Lalonde case. Finally, Staff Sergeant Derochie advised Detective Inspector Hall that he would issue an order to Constable Dunlop requiring him to produce all his materials and to cease communicating with victims.

CPS Issues Comprehensive Order to Constable Perry Dunlop

On January 10, 2000, Staff Sergeant Derochie provided Constable Dunlop with a comprehensive order requiring him to disclose all materials in his possession related to the Marcel Lalonde matter or to allegations of sexual abuse being investigated by the OPP or the CPS.³⁴ In addition, the order required Constable Dunlop to provide a comprehensive will-state, outlining all of his contacts with alleged victims or witnesses in all of these cases. He was further ordered not to communicate with the media and to cease and desist from investigating any criminal activity that might be the subject of the Project Truth investigation. He was to refer other victims who came forward to him to Project Truth.

34. The full text of the order is set out in Chapter 6, "Institutional Response of the Cornwall Community Police Service."

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he was not asked for input into the order and that he did not review it before it was given to Constable Dunlop. The order was drafted by Staff Sergeant Derochie, in consultation with Crowns Claudette Wilhelm and Marc Garson, and CPS counsel.

Constable Dunlop asked to have time to consult with a lawyer about the order. Staff Sergeant Derochie agreed, and Constable Dunlop signed the order on January 17, 2000. Constable Dunlop was taken off uniform patrol duties and was assigned to work on his will-state full-time until it was completed.

At this Inquiry, Detective Inspectors Hall and Smith took the position that they had no authority over Constable Dunlop and that it was up to the Cornwall Police Service to ensure that its officer provided disclosure. CPS Chief Anthony Repa agreed that the OPP had no power over Constable Dunlop and that any measures to make Constable Dunlop comply had to be done in conjunction with the CPS.

I am of the view that Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall should have insisted that the CPS have Constable Dunlop comply with his disclosure obligations much sooner than the fall of 1999. At the latest, this should have happened in October 1998, when Constable Dunlop refused to sign the memo acknowledging that he had disclosed everything in his possession. Detective Inspector Hall advised Inspector Trew of the refusal, but it does not appear to me that anyone followed up with Constable Dunlop after relations broke down in November 1998, until the issue surfaced in the Marcel Lalonde prosecution in October 1999. Detective Inspector Hall testified that if Constable Dunlop had been given the order sooner, the trial of Father Charles MacDonald might not have been delayed in May 2000.

Disclosure of Contact With C-2

On January 17, 2000, Constable Dunlop contacted Detective Inspector Hall and advised him that almost two years ago he had spoken to C-2, an alleged victim of Father MacDonald. C-2 had contacted the Cornwall Police Service on February 12, 1998, and spoken to Constable Dunlop. The Constable had met with C-2 on February 16, 1998, and was told about his alleged abuse, but according to his will-state, Constable Dunlop did not take a statement. Constable Dunlop says in his will-state that he referred C-2 to Project Truth. Detective Inspector Hall's notes say that Constable Dunlop told him that C-2 had told Constable Dunlop that he was not ready to come forward yet and that he wanted to keep his identity between the two of them at that time. Given that the Father MacDonald matter was before the courts, it would have been prudent for Constable Dunlop to have disclosed C-2's contact with him to the OPP. This information was relevant in an ongoing criminal case.

The OPP interviewed C-2 on January 26, 2000, and he told the officers about his alleged abuse by Father MacDonald. Father MacDonald was charged in relation to these allegations on April 10, 2000. The matter is further discussed in the section “Project Truth Investigation of Father Charles MacDonald” and in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

Preparation of the Will-State and Incremental Disclosure

Between January and April 2000, Constable Dunlop worked on the will-state that he had been ordered to provide. On January 18, 2000, Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Dupuis met with Constable Dunlop in order to interview him as part of Project Truth’s conspiracy investigation. They presented him with a list of forty-four questions. Constable Dunlop explained that he was currently preparing his will-state and asked if he could incorporate his answers to these questions in this document. Detective Inspector Hall agreed.

In the months when Constable Dunlop was preparing his will-state, he began incrementally turning over tapes, notes, and other documents to Staff Sergeant Derochie and Acting Inspector Carter. Staff Sergeant Derochie testified that Constable Dunlop was instructed to provide everything that he had, regardless of whether he had already turned it over. A copy of these documents was then given to Detective Inspector Hall. Detective Inspector Hall testified that Project Truth already had most of the materials that Constable Dunlop turned over, with the exception of his notes. Detective Inspector Hall said that he received a bundle of notes that was three to four inches thick. Most of these notes had been taken while Constable Dunlop was off-duty. Notwithstanding his work status, Constable Dunlop failed to disclose his notes in a timely fashion to the CPS. These notes contained allegations of criminal conduct and/or information relevant to on-going criminal investigations and as a police officer, off-duty or not, Constable Dunlop was required to provide them to the CPS in a timely fashion.

Constable Dunlop completed his will-state on April 7, 2000, and Detective Inspector Hall was provided with a copy of it, along with four binders of appendices, on April 10, 2000. Constable Dunlop also delivered a copy of his will-state to Crown Shelley Hallett on June 27, 2000.

Ottawa Police Service Investigation of Constable Perry Dunlop

In addition to the comprehensive order issued to Constable Dunlop on January 10, 2000, the Cornwall Police Service also determined that he should be investigated for two issues. The first was “the apparent inconsistency” between his testimony at the Marcel Lalonde preliminary inquiry and the notes that were subsequently disclosed. The second issue related to Crown Robert Pelletier’s concerns about events during a preliminary hearing in the Father MacDonald prosecution. There was an allegation that Constable Dunlop had sent C-8 to look at witnesses during this hearing. At the same hearing, Gerald Renshaw testified that Constable Dunlop was in uniform when he took a statement from him that was used to support his civil action.

On January 6, 2000, CPS Chief Repa wrote to Ottawa Chief of Police Brian Ford requesting an investigation into these matters. Two Ottawa Police Service officers were assigned to conduct this investigation. They determined that the allegations about the events at the preliminary inquiry were unsubstantiated. However, they concluded that “Constable Dunlop’s testimony contradicts in several points his actual notes and Will-State.” Their report noted, “The Crown Attorney from the West Region is to review and decide if charges of perjury are appropriate or if the matter will be left for the courts to pursue this matter at the trial of Marcel Lalonde on September 11, 2000.” The Crown determined that there was no reasonable prospect of conviction and the Ottawa police informed Chief Repa in July 2000 that no charges would be laid.

Constable Perry Dunlop Leaves Cornwall

On June 29, 2000, Constable Dunlop left the Cornwall Police Service and sued for constructive dismissal. The Dunlop family moved to British Columbia in July 2000. Helen Dunlop testified that they wanted to go somewhere where nobody knew them, to get away from the stress and raise their children.

C-8 Recants Just Prior to Marcel Lalonde Trial

The trial of schoolteacher Marcel Lalonde was held in September 2000. In a preparatory meeting with Crown Claudette Wilhelm and CPS Constable René Desrosiers on September 7, C-8 admitted that he had lied in a statement that he had given to Constable Dunlop. On September 19, 2000, C-8 testified that contrary to his previous allegations, he had not been abused by Mr. Lalonde on a school trip to Toronto. C-8 told the Court:

I guess when I was talking with Perry he’s telling what I, you know, he kept asking me if anything—if anything has happened within the school itself because he said, “If it did,” he says, “You can sue the school board instead of just suing him.” And somehow I ended pulling the trip Toronto [sic] in on that statement which I should of never of done because I believe it’s not right. I don’t want to see the guy get off for something that I said wasn’t true. Everything else I’ve said was true on the statements.

Notwithstanding the recantation of C-8, Justice Monique Métivier found Marcel Lalonde guilty on six counts relating to C-45, C-8, another victim, and C-66 on November 17, 2000.

C-8 was investigated for perjury as a result of his evidence. Crown Wilhelm advised not to lay charges, despite sufficient evidence to do so, in part because “[a]lthough there is no evidence of overt actions by other individuals to cause [C-8] to perjure himself, it is evident that individuals took advantage of his mental state to further their own agendas.”

After C-8 gave this testimony, he received a phone call from Helen Dunlop. In an interview with police, C-8 said:

She [Helen Dunlop] said, what are you doing [C-8]? I thought we were your two best friends?

I’m like, yah, you are Helen. So what the hell are you lying for? I said, no, I’m not lying Helen. She said I think you’re lying. You are lying. No Helen, I’m sorry, but I says, I can’t fucken do this ... she says, I hope you can sleep good at night ... it was very stupid, and I said no. And then she said goodbye [sic]. I’m surprised that she even said by [sic].

Ms Dunlop testified at the hearings about why she called C-8:

Because I was upset that he had changed so dramatically in such a short amount of time. I don’t know if they had something on him or what made him change so dramatically, but it upset me because he had told the truth and now he was undoing the truth and making Perry look like the bad guy, and that upset me. And I wanted to phone and get it from him why are you doing this?

This is yet another area I would have expected Commission counsel to question Mr. Dunlop about. Without his evidence, I am not prepared to conclude that he was as suggestive in his questioning of C-8 as C-8 has related. However, by conducting investigations without the knowledge or authorization of the CPS, failing to keep proper notes and other records, and then failing to disclose relevant information in a timely manner, Constable Dunlop put this witness’ credibility and thus this prosecution in jeopardy.

Charges Against Father Charles MacDonald Withdrawn

C-8 had also told Constable Dunlop that he had been allegedly abused by Father MacDonald. One of the allegations involved an assault with a candle on the day of his father's funeral. On March 12, 2002, Crown Lorne McConnery interviewed C-8 to prepare him for trial. According to notes taken by Crown Kevin Phillips, C-8 said that he initially spoke with Constable Dunlop because he wanted to make a complaint about Ron Leroux. C-8 said that he gave a written statement about Mr. Leroux and that he "never saw it again." C-8 began to cry, and Mr. Phillips' notes state:

Unprompted, [C-8] goes back to impressing upon us that he never wanted to make a complaint about Father Charles in the first place. He says that while he was talking to Dunlop "I felt like more was better" and that he included Father Charles "to satisfy Perry." [C-8] says that he felt pressure as a result of being rushed around all the time. "He (Dunlop) kept pushing the fucking priest." "I felt like I had to do all of this."

C-8 then said that the events at his father's funeral didn't happen. He said, "I felt pressured. I was made to feel that more was better." Again, while I am not prepared to conclude that Constable Dunlop pressured C-8 as alleged, his failure to follow standard police protocol and obey lawful orders put this prosecution in jeopardy for this and other reasons.

Crown McConnery then decided to withdraw the two charges against Father MacDonald that related to the alleged abuse of C-8. This issue is described in greater detail in Chapter 11.

When C-8 was being interviewed by the CPS about his testimony in the Lalonde matter, he said that Constable Dunlop "never said, [C-8], I want to you lie for me, no ... I just felt like I was obligated."

C-8 testified at this Inquiry that, at the time, he was facing charges for sexually assaulting a teenage girl and Constable Perry Dunlop:

... was the only friend I had. I had nobody around and Perry was taking me to his place all the time for meals and, you know, I was a family figure, you know, meet his kids, everything is good. You know, he's playing music. You know, I feel like I'm part of the family. How do I let them down, you know? ... I felt like I had to give him something. I just couldn't remember so I felt I had to fabricate something.

Constable Dunlop dealt with vulnerable individuals when he was speaking to victims. The mistakes he made in, at the very least, unwittingly pressuring C-8 are indicative of the fact that he lacked specialized training on the investigation of historical sexual abuse. This said, he should have known that asserting any pressure on complainants during the reporting of their allegations was improper and could jeopardize their cases. In addition, as a police officer, he should have known that certain techniques, such as asking leading questions while taking statements, are problematic.

Perry Dunlop's Testimony in Father Charles MacDonald 11(b) Motion

In May 2002, Mr. Dunlop testified in a motion to stay proceedings against Father MacDonald. He was questioned extensively about the disclosure of his notes and other materials.

He told the Court that he hid his notes and that he kept them in many different places because he was afraid that someone would come in and seize them. It took him a significant time to gather all of his materials because of this practice. He claimed that he was not able to produce them when initially requested because he was not given the time to do so, until he was directed to complete his will-state in 2000. Considering that Constable Dunlop was given both oral and written orders as early as mid-1997, I find his testimony on this point wholly unsatisfactory. If he did not have sufficient time to gather up his documents and then disclose them as he stated, he should have asked for time off to fulfill this function. He was a police officer with several years of experience at the time and was well aware of police and Crown disclosure requirements in criminal prosecutions.

He added that he did not trust the OPP to take custody of his evidence, because the OPP had destroyed the tapes that they seized from Ron Leroux's residence in 1993. He added that he "just didn't trust him [Detective Sergeant Pat Hall]. I just didn't like his demeanor ... I found him terse." In my view Constable Dunlop had lost perspective and therefore no longer had confidence in Project Truth officers' ability to conduct these investigations.

Finally, Mr. Dunlop added that he could not say for a fact that everything that he had assembled had been turned over.

The stay of proceedings was granted on May 13, 2002.

Further Request for an Investigation of Perry Dunlop for Perjury or Obstruction of Justice

In the months following the stay of proceedings in the Father MacDonald matter, numerous conversations took place between Detective Inspector Hall, officials from the Cornwall Police Services, and various Crown attorneys about whether Mr. Dunlop should be investigated for perjury or obstruction of justice, and who should initiate and conduct the investigation. Staff Sergeant Derochie testified that the CPS was concerned with the “optics” of the CPS conducting an investigation into Mr. Dunlop, given that he was suing them and the CPS had been accused of persecuting him. Detective Inspector Hall took the position, “It is not the mandate of the Ontario Provincial Police to investigate Perry DUNLOP.”

It was decided that Detective Inspector Hall would compile a list of incidents to be investigated and that while the CPS was prepared to investigate, it would seek advice from the Crown as to whether an outside police force should do so. If the decision was made to bring in an outside police force, the CPS would make that request. I have heard no evidence that this list was ever prepared.

In June 2003, Chief Repa wrote to Crown Murray MacDonald “to seek clarification as to whether or not allegations of criminal misconduct occurred in matters pertaining to the Project Truth investigation and subsequent trials.” The letter said:

The concerns or allegations about Mr. Dunlop pertain to his apparent continuous contacts with witnesses or potential witnesses; the withholding of evidence; and counseling perjury. Mr. Dunlop was a police officer in the Province of Ontario for a portion of the time frame of these allegations. These allegations have not been forwarded to us in a formal manner but rather we have been put on notice that the allegations have been made. We are now waiting the decision and guidance of the Crown Attorneys involved in the criminal proceedings.

James Stewart, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, replied to this letter, stating that Marc Garson had looked into similar allegations in 1999 and that the Crown’s advice was unchanged. He added that if a brief was prepared, the Crown would review it, but stated, “The Crown does not normally investigate matters and normally does not tell a police service to investigate a given individual.”

It is my view that Mr. Stewart’s response was correct. It is the police’s responsibility to investigate and the Crown’s role is to give an opinion, where necessary, on issues such as whether a reasonable prospect of conviction exists or if there are reasonable and probable grounds for charges.

The CPS then asked Detective Inspector Hall to provide them with a will-state or a statement as a basis for the investigation, but Detective Inspector Hall suggested waiting until the criminal proceedings against Jacques Leduc had concluded. Staff Sergeant Derochie testified that shortly after this happened, this Inquiry was called and the matter was put on hold.

Lack of Timely Disclosure

Constable Perry Dunlop had contact with many alleged victims in the various cases investigated by the OPP. Some of these encounters were problematic, most notably the influence he had on certain individuals, such as C-8, Ron Leroux, and C-18, while other contacts were much more benign. Although these interactions were raised in a number of the prosecutions, I would note that these contacts were never the sole reason why convictions were not obtained.

Mr. Dunlop testified in the Father MacDonald matter, “Throughout this whole case that I’ve been involved with, Your Honour, I’ve become this person that people want to contact, and I don’t turn victims away for the simple humanity of it.”

It is certainly understandable why Mr. Dunlop continued to be there for victims who reached out to him, and why he occasionally did some reaching out on his own. It is clear to me that he is a compassionate individual whose involvement in these matters began with the best of intentions.

What is less understandable is why Constable Dunlop did not provide the disclosure that was requested by the OPP in a timely manner.

Part of this failure is attributable to poor legal advice. It is also partly due to Constable Dunlop’s complete lack of trust in public institutions and his inability to retrieve his own documents in a timely fashion. I understand that Constable Dunlop believed he was wrongly investigated, or in his mind, persecuted by his own police service, but I fail to see how this led to a complete lack of trust in the OPP. Project Truth was put in place as a result of his work and at his request. Although Constable Dunlop may have been disappointed that he was not given a greater role in this project, it does not excuse his failure to cooperate.

Constable Dunlop also provided misleading or contradictory statements in his notes and when he testified in various judicial proceedings. One example is when he was asked when C-8 initially disclosed that he was a victim of abuse of Marcel Lalonde. Another is when he was questioned about providing documents to Richard Nadeau, which were then posted on his website.

He continued providing statements to the media despite being served with police orders by his superiors and requested to refrain from doing so by Project Truth officers. It was explained to him that communicating with the media could jeopardize prosecutions, undermine the investigations, and prevent victims from reporting. Despite it all, he continued to do so.

Although Constable Dunlop’s cause, the protection of children, was undoubtedly in the public interest, at some point it seems that Constable Dunlop came to believe that the ends justified the means. He acknowledged this as early as 1995 in his interview with the television program The Fifth Estate. Certainly by the time of the Project Truth investigation, he had lost objectivity and his sense of professional responsibility. Ironically, he engaged in activities that had a negative impact on his ultimate objective of securing convictions against alleged perpetrators of child sexual abuse.

It is important to emphasize that the OPP failed to develop and apply proper practices or protocols to deal with the problems that arose from Constable Dunlop's involvement in the Project Truth investigation and, in particular, some of the problems created by his lack of cooperation.

The OPP should have done more to obtain full disclosure from Constable Dunlop more quickly. They could have asked him much earlier through the CPS to organize his materials and prepare a will-state and a list of documents in his possession.

As for his contact with plaintiffs and witnesses, the OPP needed to track these contacts and develop a plan to minimize exposure from them.

As previously noted, the OPP should not have waited until disclosure issues arose in the Marcel Lalonde trial in the fall of 1999. The OPP should have acted immediately after Constable Dunlop refused to sign the release in 1998.

I am cognizant of the fact that the OPP lacked jurisdiction and the CPS had to issue the orders, but the OPP had to fully inform the CPS of the problems. I do not think the CPS was fully aware of the extent of Constable Dunlop's interference in the OPP investigations and prosecutions. The OPP needed to communicate better with the CPS.

Project Truth Investigation of Father Charles MacDonald

As previously mentioned in this chapter, on March 11, 1996, Father Charles MacDonald was arrested in relation to allegations of abuse made by David Silmser, John MacDonald, and C-3.

After the arrest, a number of new allegations were made against Father MacDonald. C-8 came forward to the OPP in January 1997, and the Fantino Brief included a number of allegations about abuse perpetrated by Father MacDonald.

Assignment of Detective Constable Joe Dupuis to Father Charles MacDonald Investigation

As discussed earlier, Detective Constable Joe Dupuis joined the Project Truth team in September 1997. Shortly after joining Project Truth he was assigned to be the lead investigator on the Father MacDonald investigation.

In early September 1997, Detective Constable Dupuis did not have a copy of the earlier investigation into Father MacDonald. Detective Constable Dupuis did not have an opportunity to review the file on Father MacDonald when he was initially assigned to this investigation. He was not aware of the status of earlier charges against Father MacDonald including the fact that the preliminary inquiry had been adjourned in February 1997 because of allegations by a new complainant, C-8, and that it had resumed in early September and been completed.

Detective Constable Dupuis' principal role was to deal with the new allegations against Father MacDonald. He was not involved with the prior counts that were already before the court. That was Detective Constable Michael Fagan's investigation. Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he remembers receiving the file from Detective Constable Fagan but he could not recall when this was. On November 26, 1998, Detective Constable Dupuis met with Detective Constable Fagan. This was more than one year after Detective Constable Dupuis was assigned this investigation. At the meeting he took possession of four volumes that he identified as the investigation into sexual assault, the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and Ottawa Police Service investigation into sexual assault, the alleged agreement not to lay charges by the CPS, the Crown attorney and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, and the allegations of obstruction of justice. It does not appear that he received a copy of Detective Constable Fagan's current investigative file.

Detective Constable Dupuis indicated in his notes that on December 9, 1998, he attended the courthouse in Cornwall and picked up a copy of the information laid by Detective Constable Fagan. Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he received his instructions about the investigation primarily from Detective Sergeant Hall.

According to Detective Inspector Hall, the OPP recognized the need to fast-track the Father MacDonald case because it was an ongoing matter before the court. Detective Inspector Hall explained that the Father MacDonald case was the "highest priority" and that he recognized the need to ensure they did not get into trouble with Charter delays.

Despite the fact that this was a stated priority, no interviews were conducted until September 1997. In addition, Detective Constable Dupuis was the lead investigator assigned to this case even though he did not join the Project Truth team until September 1997.

Given the need to prioritize the Father MacDonald investigation, I question why Detective Constable Dupuis was assigned as the lead investigator. It might have been more appropriate to assign either Detective Constable Steve Seguin or Detective Constable Don Genier to the file given that by September 1997, they had been involved with Project Truth for several months and were familiar with the allegations contained in the Fantino Brief. In contrast, Detective Constable Dupuis was completely unfamiliar with the new allegations and with the charges against Father MacDonald that were making their way through the court system at that time.

Detective Inspector Hall explained that the delay in this investigation was due to several factors: Project Truth was not set up until August 1997; the officers were still dissecting the Fantino brief; and the team was dealing with the allegations made by Claude Marleau. Detective Inspector Hall also said that one of the interviews relating to the Father MacDonald case was conducted in Edmonton and it was delayed in order to coordinate the interview with a trip for a separate investigation in the Northwest Territories in which Detective Inspector Hall was involved.

I find these reasons insufficient to explain the delay in the Father Macdonald investigation. Detective Constable Seguin or Detective Inspector Hall could have conducted local interviews during the summer of 1997. Moreover, the Father MacDonald investigation should have taken priority over investigating Mr. Marleau's complaints because of the need to avoid undue delay with his charges.

I also find it problematic that Detective Constable Dupuis did not have the entire file regarding the previous investigation on Father MacDonald at his disposal when he was first assigned to the investigation and that there was some delay in getting this to him.

New Alleged Victims Come Forward to OPP

During the fall of 1997, the OPP conducted a number of interviews of new complainants. Three of the individuals were identified either directly or indirectly from the Fantino Brief. Kevin Upper contacted the Project Truth office after reading a newspaper article about the investigation.

C-4

In early fall 1997, Detective Constable Dupuis contacted C-4 and left a message on his answering machine. Although Detective Constable Dupuis did not say why he was calling, C-4 was aware of what was going on in Cornwall and knew Detective Constable Dupuis was calling to ask if he had any information that could help the investigation. According to C-4, receiving that first call was a "very traumatic experience" and he had to decide whether to call Detective Constable Dupuis back. On October 9, 1997, Detective Constable Dupuis left another message for C-4.

On September 18, 1997, Detective Constable Dupuis interviewed one of C-4's brothers and learned that Carson Chisholm had tried to interview him in February 1997 and wanted to know if he was a victim of Father MacDonald. This individual did not make any allegations against Father MacDonald but did say that both of his brothers also knew Father MacDonald. At the time, Detective Constable Dupuis did not know who Mr. Chisholm was, but he was sure someone was assigned to find out who he was and what his involvement was.

Detective Constable Dupuis was able to reach C-4 on the phone on October 21, 1997, and asked if he could interview him for Project Truth. C-4 understood that Detective Constable Dupuis was calling people who had served as altar boys at a particular church. Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin attended C-4's home and interviewed him, during which time he said he had been sexually abused by Father MacDonald. Arrangements were made to take a videotaped statement.

Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin took a videotaped statement of C-4 on October 28, 1997. C-4 told the officers that he had been sexually abused by Father MacDonald at a cottage in Egansville when he was approximately seventeen years old. In November 1997, Detective Constable Seguin contacted C-4 and asked if the OPP could take a statement from his wife. Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin again attended C-4's home on November 27, 1997, to take a statement from his wife and have C-4 review his own statement. The officers asked C-4 if he had told his parents about the alleged abuse and asked to interview them. At this point C-4 had not told his parents. He explained that he grew up in a "very closed family" so it was difficult for him to talk to his parents about this kind of thing. C-4 spoke with his parents before they were approached by the OPP. Detective Constable Seguin interviewed C-4's parents on January 7, 1998.

Robert Renshaw

Another alleged victim interviewed by the Project Truth officers in the fall of 1997 was Robert Renshaw. In February 1997, Mr. Renshaw had met with Constable Perry Dunlop and told him he had been a victim of Father MacDonald and Ken Seguin in his youth. Robert Pelletier found out about Constable Dunlop's interactions with Mr. Renshaw and on March 14, 1997, he asked Detective Constable Genier to interview Constable Dunlop about this. Detective Constable Genier took a statement from Constable Dunlop regarding his involvement with Mr. Renshaw.

On November 5, 1997, Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis met with Mr. Renshaw at the OPP's Walkerton Detachment and took a video statement from him. Mr. Renshaw testified that his wife was asked to stay out of the room during the interview and that the behaviour of the officers made him feel like he "was the bad guy." Mr. Renshaw also said he had difficulties with Detective Constable Seguin's name:

The very first day that I met Mr. Dupuis and Mr. Seguin, I kind of thought that it was a little weird that you're going to send me a police officer with the same name as Ken Seguin, and I expressed those opinions, and I found after that, that everything went to hell in a handbag to deal with him.

During this interview, Mr. Renshaw alleged that Ken Seguin abused him over a considerable period of time, during some of which Mr. Seguin was his probation officer. He also alleged abuse by Father MacDonald. He explained that after his father passed away, he was having difficulty dealing with it and he asked Mr. Seguin if he knew of anyone who could help him. A few days later, Mr. Seguin brought Mr. Renshaw to Father MacDonald's house, where Father MacDonald sexually assaulted him.

According to Mr. Renshaw, both officers were polite during the interview and gave him as much time as he needed to answer the questions. They never challenged him or suggested he was not telling the truth.

Mr. Renshaw testified that he received a call from his sister in northern Alberta who told him that Detective Constable Seguin had phoned her and told her Mr. Renshaw's story. He said the officers had never told him they would be contacting her or any of his siblings. He had not had a relationship with his sister for almost thirty years and found this phone call "very intrusive." Mr. Renshaw had no more dealings with Detective Constable Seguin after this.

Kevin Upper

Another alleged victim, Kevin Upper, gave the OPP a videotaped statement regarding his allegations against Father MacDonald on October 3, 1997. Mr. Upper told Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis that he had been an altar boy at St. Columban's Church for several years, during which there was an incident when Father MacDonald sexually molested him. Mr. Upper was unclear on the dates when he was an altar boy. He does not recall the police or Crown showing him church bulletins that may have had dates on them from when he was serving mass. Mr. Upper suggested that the officers ask his mother for details about when he was an altar boy.

C-5

Another alleged victim, C-5, was interviewed by the OPP on September 30, 1997. Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis interviewed C-5 for approximately forty minutes. Most of the discussion related to his alleged abuse by Malcolm MacDonald and Ken Seguin. When asked if anyone else abused him, he disclosed abuse by Father Charles MacDonald while in confession at his school. This was the first time he had disclosed this alleged abuse to anyone.

Father Charles MacDonald Arrested and Second Set of Charges Laid

The Crown brief based on the fall 1997 Project Truth investigation was provided to Robert Pelletier on January 6, 1998. The Crown recommended a number of charges be laid against Father MacDonald in relation to the complainants discussed above as well as C-8, whose allegations were discussed in an earlier section of this chapter.

An information was sworn on January 26, 1998, and arrangements were made for Father MacDonald to surrender himself to Detective Constable Dupuis for arrest the following day. Detective Sergeant Hall understood that the Crown would likely want to join these new charges with the initial set of charges that preceded Project Truth. He assumed this was what the Crown would do because having more allegations would increase the likelihood of a conviction. The decision to join the charges is discussed in detail in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

Hallway Discussion Between Michael Neville and Robert Pelletier

Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he recalls a chance meeting in an Ottawa courthouse hallway between Crown Pelletier and Father MacDonald’s defence counsel, Michael Neville, who discussed the Father MacDonald case. According to Detective Constable Dupuis, Mr. Pelletier advised Mr. Neville that further charges were coming and asked if he wished to have one trial or two. Mr. Neville replied that he wanted one trial and that in return he would waive his client’s section 11(b) Charter right to be tried within a reasonable time. Detective Constable Dupuis believes the conversation took place before January 26, 1998, but he could not recall whether it occurred before or after he delivered the Crown brief to Mr. Pelletier on January 6, 1998. Detective Constable Dupuis testified that the conversation did not have any effect on the way that he conducted the investigation. He did not record this conversation in his notes. Detective Constable Dupuis did not discuss this conversation with anyone until the stay application was brought in 2002, at which time he advised Crown Lorne McConnery and possibly Detective Inspector Hall about this discussion.

Detective Inspector Hall recalled hearing about a conversation between Mr. Pelletier and Mr. Neville in which there was some indication that Mr. Neville was going to waive Father MacDonald’s section 11(b) right. Detective Inspector Hall heard that this information was going to be put on the record at a subsequent court appearance by Crown Pelletier, but he did not attend the next appearance and it was not put on the record. This issue is discussed in more detail in Chapter 11.

Father Charles MacDonald's "Apology" Letters

The OPP became aware in late 1998 and early 1999 of letters written by Father MacDonald to alleged and potential alleged victims. On September 1, 1998, the OPP interviewed C-100. This was an "informal interview" because C-100 was not very keen to participate in the investigation. He told Detective Constable Seguin that he was sexually abused by Father MacDonald but did not remember what happened other than a dream he had of being abused by Father MacDonald. He said he did not remember much of his childhood prior to seventeen years of age. C-100 also told Detective Constable Seguin that he had received a greeting card from Father MacDonald dated December 31, 1997, saying Father MacDonald was sorry about what he did to C-100 and did not mean to hurt him in any way.

In January 1999, the OPP learned that C-4 had also received a letter of apology from Father MacDonald. Detective Constable Dupuis went to C-4's home on January 22, 1999, to give him a copy of his statement to read prior to meeting with the Crown in preparation for the upcoming preliminary inquiry, and C-4 told him about the letter. Father MacDonald gave this letter, dated December 30, 1997, to C-4's brother sometime in or after March 1998; he in turn gave it to C-4 in late summer 1998. The letter stated:

I realize now I should have said or written these words to you a long time ago. I honestly didn't realize you were hurting.

What's done is done—but I want to tell you, [C-4], that I am very sorry for causing you any hurt or pain. It was never my intention to hurt you. I wish I could change things, but ...

Again I'm sorry. I hope you can find it in your heart to forgive me.

Sincerely, Charles F.

Approximately one month later, Detective Constable Dupuis interviewed C-4's brother about the letter. He said that Father MacDonald had contacted him in March 1998 and asked if they could meet because he had a letter for C-4 that he could not deliver to C-4 himself, “he said because of a restraining order.” Detective Constable Dupuis asked C-4’s brother if Father MacDonald said anything about C-4. The brother replied, “Just before he left, Charles was apologetic for his actions, and said to me, ‘He was of age.’” Detective Constable Dupuis could not recall if he took any action and acknowledged that he should have looked into this further and found out if there was in fact a restraining order. I agree. Father MacDonald had been released on conditions not to contact complainants. Given the information Detective Constable Dupuis had received from C-4’s brother, he should have investigated further to determine if Father MacDonald had breached release conditions or attempted to obstruct justice. In my view, the OPP should have tried to interview Father MacDonald about this.

Preliminary Inquiry

The OPP officers contacted the victims to advise them of the upcoming preliminary inquiry date. The preliminary inquiry began in March 1999. On May 3, 1999, Father MacDonald was committed to stand trial on all counts. Following the preliminary inquiry, Detective Constable Dupuis continued to have contact with the complainants to assist in their preparation for upcoming phases of the court process.

The pre-trial was scheduled for September 7, 1999. On September 7, it was put over to October 22, 1999.

Change in Crown Attorney

As will be discussed in further detail in Chapter 11, in the spring of 1999, Shelley Hallett took over responsibility for prosecuting the Father MacDonald case from Robert Pelletier. It appears that Detective Constable Dupuis contacted some of the complainants to advise them of the change in Crown. This is yet another instance where Victim/Witness Assistance Program services would have been helpful to Project Truth officers and complainants.

C-2’s Allegations

In early 2000, the OPP became aware of another individual alleging he was abused by Father MacDonald. On January 17, 2000, Detective Inspector Hall received a call from Constable Perry Dunlop, who said that a victim had contacted him two years earlier, on February 12, 1998. The person had said that he was not ready at that time to come forward. Constable Dunlop felt that Project Truth should contact this individual. Constable Dunlop had recently been ordered by his superior officer to provide a detailed will-state outlining all his contacts with victims of sexual abuse who might be of interest to the Project Truth investigation.

Detective Constable Dupuis interviewed C-2 on January 21, 2000. During this meeting, C-2 made allegations of sexual abuse against Father MacDonald, so Detective Constable Dupuis arranged for a videotaped interview to be conducted on January 26, 2000. At this point, the trial of Father MacDonald was scheduled for April 2000.

The allegation made by C-2 was different from previous allegations against Father MacDonald. In particular, he alleged he had been drugged and abused by more than one person in a ritualistic way. The volume of the Crown brief dealing with the C-2 allegations was provided to Crown Hallett on March 23, 2000. On March 30, 2000, she wrote a letter to Detective Inspector Hall recommending charges against Father MacDonald in respect of C-2's allegations. She noted that although one of his allegations was unusual, "there have been other bizarre allegations made by other complainants, unknown to [C-2], with respect to Charles MacDonald." She also pointed out that his second allegation, of being abused while making confession, bore some resemblance to complaints made by other individuals.

Charges were laid against Father MacDonald in respect of C-2's allegations on April 10, 2000. The initial trial date was adjourned and the preliminary inquiry on C-2's counts was completed on August 30, 2000. Detective Constable Dupuis does not recall having any discussions with Detective Inspector Hall or Crown Hallett about whether to adjourn the trial and add these new counts to the indictment. He was not asked his opinion regarding the merits of joining all the charges together, nor did he have an opinion at the time as to what should be done. Detective Inspector Hall recalls one discussion with Ms Hallett about whether an adjournment would be granted in the Father MacDonald case because of C-2 coming forward. Detective Inspector Hall said that he preferred that the trial go forward or at least be adjourned for only a short period. He explained that although it was ultimately the Crown's decision, the police would have some input into such a decision.

An indictment for all the charges, including those that related to C-2, was prepared on October 18, 2000. The decision to join these new charges with the older charges, and the decision in April 2002 to withdraw these charges, will be explored more fully in Chapter 11.

Dunlop Boxes

On April 18, 2000, nine banker's boxes of material from Constable Perry Dunlop were brought to the Project Truth office. Detective Constable Dupuis recalls that they were moved there from the Cornwall Police Service so that Ms Hallett could go through them, although he cannot recall what prompted the boxes to be moved. As will be discussed in Chapter 11, the boxes were moved at Ms Hallett's direction, and Detective Inspector Hall was not happy about it.

Detective Constable Genier reviewed the boxes for material relevant for Project Truth files other than Father Macdonald and Jacques Leduc. As Detective Constable Genier explained in his statement to the York Regional Police, those files were assigned to Detective Constable Dupuis and the review was going to be done by Ms Hallett. Detective Inspector Hall testified that although Detective Constable Genier was not assigned to review the nine boxes for disclosure in those two cases specifically, had he seen anything of relevance he would have pointed it out to Ms Hallett or Detective Constable Dupuis. Given that disclosure problems had already arisen in the Marcel Lalonde case, it would have been prudent for Detective Inspector Hall to assign Detective Constable Dupuis to assist as he was involved in both the Father MacDonald and Leduc cases.

Application to Stay Father Charles MacDonald Proceedings

In April 2002, defence counsel filed an application to stay the proceedings against Father MacDonald based on unreasonable delay. On May 13, 2002, Justice Chilcott allowed the section 11(b) application and all the charges were stayed.

Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he thought the Father MacDonald case had been moving too slowly and that he had discussed this with other Constables who felt the same way. However, according to Detective Constable Dupuis there was no concern among the officers that there would be a delay argument made by defence prior to the stay application. He realized there was a problem when defence counsel brought the stay application. Detective Constable Dupuis did not think the issue of delay was one that he had to deal with personally.

Detective Inspector Hall felt that the principal reason for the adjournment of the trial in May 2000 was the laying of additional charges in respect of C-2's allegations and joining those charges with existing charges to be prosecuted at the same time. Detective Inspector Hall explained that if Project Truth had heard about C-2's allegations in 1998 when he first spoke to Constable Dunlop, they would have been investigated at that time and charges would have been laid in 1998 rather than 2000, which could have led to two years less delay. Detective Inspector Hall acknowledged, however, that even without the C-2 allegations other problems necessitated an adjournment in 2000, such as the further disclosure by Constable Dunlop.

Investigation of Death Threats

Ron Leroux swore an affidavit that was included in the brief given to Chief Julian Fantino in December 1996. In the affidavit, he claimed to have overheard death threats being made against Constable Perry Dunlop and his family by Malcolm MacDonald, Father Charles MacDonald, and Ken Seguin, at Mr. Seguin's residence in or around November 1993. Mr. Leroux repeated these claims during his statement at the OPP Orillia Detachment in February 1997. Detective Sergeant Pat Hall was assigned to investigate these allegations in March 1997. The Crown brief was completed on August 19, 1998, and Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier provided his written opinion on December 22, 1998. Detective Sergeant Hall concluded that there were no reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges and, after reviewing the brief, Mr. Pelletier agreed.

Initial Investigative Action

It appears that Detective Inspector Tim Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall initially acted quickly in relation to the death threats. After being assigned to the case on March 19, 1997, Detective Sergeant Hall promptly set up an interview with Helen Dunlop for March 21 to determine whether she and her family were in immediate danger. Detective Inspector Smith contacted Chief Anthony Repa of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and informed him that he was investigating a threat against Constable Dunlop and his family. At Detective Inspector Smith's request, Chief Repa entered the Dunlop residence in the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative system as a high priority so that officers could respond quickly in case of a call.

Detective Sergeant Hall and Detective Constable Steve Seguin interviewed Helen Dunlop on March 21, 1997. She insisted on tape-recording the interview. Ms Dunlop described the conversation that Mr. Leroux claimed he had overheard between Mr. Seguin, Father MacDonald, and Malcolm MacDonald. The threats were allegedly made just before Mr. Seguin's suicide in the fall of 1993. She explained that her husband had reported this allegation to Chief Fantino in London because they could not take the information to the Cornwall or Ottawa police. She also explained that death threats had been made against her daughter in the past, and that a woman had been subsequently charged (see Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service).

Ms Dunlop expressed frustration at the lack of action by the police against the conspirators. She claimed that she was concerned about the death threats but stated that she did not feel that she needed protection at that time, unless the police felt that she did after speaking to the alleged conspirators.

I believe that Ms Dunlop's concerns should be placed in some context. The alleged threats had been made three years earlier and had not been acted on. Ms Dunlop first learned of the death threats on October 30, 1996, after Mr. Leroux told her husband and Charles Bourgeois about the conversation he overheard. The Dunlops did not immediately report this to the police. The death threats were first referenced in the amended statement of claim for Constable Dunlop's civil action that was filed on November 15, 1996. The first time the threats were directly mentioned to police authorities was in December 1996, when Mr. Bourgeois sent Chief Fantino a package of materials. As previously mentioned, these materials were forwarded to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in February 1997. At some point, Constable Dunlop also reported the threats to the Metro Toronto Police, although the exact date is unclear.

Ms Dunlop testified that she believed the threats to be real and that both she and her husband found them quite upsetting. I find the Dunlops' failure to report the threats immediately to the authorities inconsistent with the actions of individuals who were truly afraid for their lives. This inconsistency may be explained, in part, by other issues facing the Dunlop family at this time, which are more fully described in Chapter 6.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that this was the first time he had investigated death threat allegations that were so dated. He said that typically alleged victims go to the police immediately after they find out about the threats. He questioned why no one had gone to the police sooner and noted that no attempts had been made to harm the Dunlops since the threats were allegedly uttered three years earlier.

The officers asked Ms Dunlop if her husband would agree to be interviewed. She informed them on April 4, 1997, that he did not wish to be interviewed. Constable Dunlop's refusal may also have affected their view regarding the validity of the threats.

On March 24, 1997, Detective Sergeant Hall told Ms Dunlop that the CPS had been notified about the death threats. He also told her that he would be conducting the investigation. She asked to be kept informed.

Detective Sergeant Hall spoke with Ms Dunlop again on April 4, 1997. She asked whether he had interviewed either Malcolm MacDonald or Father Charles MacDonald, and he informed her that this "would be our last stop." Detective Sergeant Hall said that he would update her the following week.

Detective Sergeant Hall was concerned that Mr. Leroux had said nothing about the threats when he was interviewed by the OPP in November 1993 after Mr. Seguin's suicide, or again in March 1994 during the extortion investigation. Detective Sergeant Hall planned to interview Mr. Leroux in Maine. However, on April 8, 1997, Detective Sergeant Hall was asked to attend a meeting with regional Crown Peter Griffiths that was scheduled for April 24, 1997. Detective Inspector Smith asked him to wait until after the meeting to interview Mr. Leroux.

The week before the meeting, Detective Sergeant Hall informed Constable Dunlop that he was meeting with Mr. Griffiths on April 24 to review the case and obtain directions. Detective Sergeant Hall contacted the Dunlops again on April 30 and left a message that a decision had been made to investigate all of the allegations in the Fantino Brief.

Ms Dunlop testified that the police did not follow up with her or inform her of the status of her complaint. However, the evidence clearly demonstrates that, at least at the outset, Detective Sergeant Hall attempted to keep her informed about the progress of the investigation.

Investigation After the Initiation of Project Truth

After the April 24 meeting, it is clear that other Project Truth matters became a priority and Detective Sergeant Hall took no active steps to advance the death threat investigation between April 30 and July 30, 1997. Twice during this period he spoke to Ms Dunlop, who expressed frustration at the time the investigation was taking. She was also concerned that he had not yet interviewed Father MacDonald or Malcolm MacDonald and asked why they had not been arrested based on the materials that Constable Dunlop had provided. Ms Dunlop seemed to be tying the death threats very closely to the allegations of abuse in the Fantino Brief.

David Silmsen's Death Threat Complaint

On July 30, 1997, David Silmsen contacted the Prescott Detachment of the OPP and informed them that he was also the target of death threats. The Commander of the Prescott Detachment relayed this information to Detective Sergeant Hall, who set up an interview with Mr. Silmsen for August 1.

During this interview, Mr. Silmsen said that Constable Dunlop had told him that Mr. Seguin, Father MacDonald, Malcolm MacDonald, and a few other unnamed individuals had plotted to kill Mr. Silmsen as well as Constable Dunlop. Mr. Silmsen was quite upset when he came in for the interview. He testified at the hearing, "I was worried about it. If somebody's getting death threats, now, I'm going to be worried because I'm stuck right in the middle of this thing too."

Shortly after this statement was taken, Detective Sergeant Hall, Detective Inspector Smith, and Inspector Richard Trew of the CPS met with Constable Dunlop on August 7, 1997. The officers discussed a number of issues with Constable Dunlop, which are outlined in detail in the section "Interactions Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop." They also told Constable

Dunlop about Mr. Silmsen's allegations. Constable Dunlop denied telling Mr. Silmsen that threats were made toward him. Detective Sergeant Hall asked Constable Dunlop if he would give a statement to this effect. This upset Constable Dunlop, and Detective Inspector Smith resolved the situation by telling him that he could speak to Mr. Silmsen to straighten out the matter. The officers told Constable Dunlop that they would see if this satisfied Mr. Silmsen.

The following week, Constable Dunlop told Detective Sergeant Hall that he had spoken to Mr. Silmsen and cleared up the misunderstanding. The officers did not follow up with Mr. Silmsen. Several months later, in mid-November, Mr. Silmsen called Detective Sergeant Hall wanting to know if the police were still investigating the death threats and whether charges would be laid. Detective Sergeant Hall told him that they were investigating and that the information would be taken to Crown Pelletier for a decision on charges.

Detective Sergeant Hall provided the same information to Helen Dunlop when he spoke with her on November 17, 1997. He also told her that he had arranged to visit Mr. Leroux. Ms Dunlop informed Detective Sergeant Hall that she wanted to be updated every thirty days on the progress of the investigation.

Interview of Ron Leroux

Detective Sergeant Hall and Detective Constable Don Genier interviewed Ron Leroux in Maine on November 25, 1997, about the death threats and other matters raised in his statements. Detective Inspector Hall testified that the interview was delayed until this time because he was busy with Project Truth. He also wanted to combine this trip with another he had to make for a separate investigation.

During the interview, Mr. Leroux told the investigators that he did not hear how Malcolm and Charles MacDonald intended to carry out the threat. He also said that he was uncertain whether they were serious: "I figure this is the ranting and ravings of a bunch of old men here." Mr. Leroux stated that when he first told Constable Dunlop about the threats, Constable Dunlop did not "get excited."

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not find Mr. Leroux to be credible. Based on Mr. Leroux's statement and the other information he had to date, the officer did not feel that he had subjective grounds to lay charges.

Interviews With Suspects

Father Charles MacDonald was interviewed on January 27, 1998. He opted not to comment on the death threat allegations. Malcolm MacDonald was not interviewed until June 8, 1998. He denied the allegations.

Detective Sergeant Hall attributed the delay in interviewing Malcolm MacDonald to the fact that the officers were conducting interviews in the Father

MacDonald abuse case. He also cited a murder investigation, the 1998 ice storm, and the fact that Malcolm MacDonald went south in the winter as causes for the delay.

Submission of Crown Brief and Discussions With Helen Dunlop

Detective Sergeant Hall prepared a Crown brief and submitted it to Crown Pelletier on August 19, 1998, despite not having reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge. In the time between the Ron Leroux interview and the submission of the Crown brief, Detective Sergeant Hall received a number of calls from Helen Dunlop, who wanted to know whether Malcolm MacDonald or Father Charles MacDonald had been interviewed. In December 1997, Detective Sergeant Hall learned that Ms Dunlop had contacted Crown Pelletier. Detective Sergeant Hall called her to explain that it is the police who lay charges, not the Crown.

In June 1998, Detective Sergeant Hall told Ms Dunlop that a brief had been put together for a Crown attorney to review. He said that he did not know which Crown would review it but that it would probably be someone from Toronto. Detective Sergeant Hall spoke with Ms Dunlop again after he had sent the brief to Mr. Pelletier in August 1998, and again told her he did not know who the reviewing Crown would be.

Detective Inspector Hall explained at this Inquiry that although he sent the brief to Mr. Pelletier, he did not tell Ms Dunlop that Mr. Pelletier would be doing the review because Mr. Pelletier “may have wanted to send it off. I mean ... I didn’t know for certain that he was going to be the ultimate person to review that file at that time.”

I am unsure why Detective Sergeant Hall refused to tell Ms Dunlop which Crown would be providing the opinion. Perhaps he was aware that the Dunlops were upset and distrustful because of the connection between Robert Pelletier and Murray MacDonald. In my view, Detective Sergeant Hall demonstrated a lack of transparency in his dealings with Ms Dunlop on this matter, which may have contributed to the breakdown in the relationship between the Dunlops and Project Truth.

Mr. Pelletier provided a written opinion on the investigation on December 22, 1998. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not feel that a four-month delay in reviewing the brief was unreasonable, given the size of the brief, its relatively less urgent nature, and the totality of what it contained.

Mr. Pelletier recommended that no charges be laid, for a number of reasons. Notably, the statements made by the suspects did not clearly indicate that the Dunlops were being threatened with death and that the only witness, Mr. Leroux, waited three years to bring the complaint. Moreover, Mr. Leroux did not think that the men were serious or capable of carrying out the threats. While Mr. Leroux attributed Ken Seguin's suicide to the fact that he wanted to escape the pressure of being part of the conspiracy, Mr. Pelletier believed that it was more probably caused by Mr. Seguin's fear of exposure of his own activities. Finally, there was no supporting evidence to corroborate the allegations.

Detective Sergeant Hall agreed with Mr. Pelletier's assessment. He said at the hearing, "There was no doubt in my mind" that there were no reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges.

Beyond the lack of grounds, Mr. Pelletier also concluded that laying charges would not be in the public interest given the nature of the comments, the lapse in time, the death of Mr. Seguin, and the proceedings against Father MacDonald.

Follow-Up With the Complainants

Detective Sergeant Hall spoke with Helen Dunlop on December 24, 1998, and told her that no charges would be laid. She asked which Crown attorney had reviewed the brief. Detective Sergeant Hall told her he "did not know for certain however the written opinion came from Acting Regional Crown Pelletier."

Detective Sergeant Hall met with Helen and Perry Dunlop after the Christmas holidays, on January 6, 1999. He testified that the Dunlops were not happy with the decision not to lay charges, but he resisted the suggestion that it damaged his relationship with them:

It probably had an effect. To what—you know, to use the word "damage," I don't know what extent you could add to that. I mean, anybody making allegations and you don't lay charges is probably going to be upset.

Detective Inspector Hall did not contact Mr. Leroux or Mr. Silmsen to inform them of the decision not to lay charges.

Comments on Delay in the Investigation

There is little doubt that the death threats investigation moved significantly down Detective Sergeant Hall's priority list following the initiation of Project Truth. To some extent, this response was appropriate given the heavy workload shouldered by him and the other Project Truth investigators. There were reasons to doubt the seriousness of the allegations, including the delay in bringing them to the attention of the police, the unwillingness of the alleged main target of the threats (Constable Dunlop) to participate in the investigation, and the credibility issues surrounding the case's only witness, Mr. Leroux.

While this may account for some of the delay in the death threats investigation, it does not excuse the significant periods of inaction on the file, the lack of transparency in Detective Sergeant Hall's discussions with Ms Dunlop, or the failure to inform Mr. Leroux and Mr. Silmser of the results of the investigation. For the reasons stated in Mr. Pelletier's letter, it is clear that there were insufficient grounds to lay charges in this investigation. Had Mr. Leroux, Father MacDonald, Malcolm MacDonald, and others been interviewed earlier, perhaps that determination could have been made more quickly. Accordingly, I find that although Detective Sergeant Hall investigated these allegations thoroughly, he failed to do so in a timely manner.

Investigations of Complaints of Claude Marleau and C-96

Claude Marleau Contacts OPP

In late July 1997, Claude Marleau read an article in the Quebec City newspaper Le Soleil and learned of the Project Truth investigation in Cornwall, Ontario. The article discussed the allegations of sexual abuse involving young people in the Cornwall area, talked about Constable Perry Dunlop, and provided a 1-800 telephone number for the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP).

At the time, Mr. Marleau had not told his wife and family about his abuse. He had discussed it in the past with his friend C-96, who also alleged that he had been abused, although they did not discuss specifics.

The morning after seeing the article in the paper, Mr. Marleau called C-96. C-96 had read a similar article in a Montreal newspaper. After discussion, the two decided to come forward to the OPP with their allegations. As I noted previously, the fact that Mr. Marleau and C-96 decided to come forward after reading a newspaper article about Project Truth is one example of the positive impact broad media coverage can have.

Detective Constable Don Genier was assigned to contact Mr. Marleau and spoke with him on July 28, 1997. Mr. Marleau said that he had been abused by eight men and said the abuse occurred when he was between ten and sixteen years old. He also identified other potential victims: C-96, C-110, C-95, and another individual. Mr. Marleau and C-96 agreed to meet with the OPP in a few days and provide a statement. Detective Constable Genier advised Mr. Marleau not to discuss the allegations with the other victims or anyone else involved directly or indirectly in the investigation.

Initial Interviews of Claude Marleau and C-96

Mr. Marleau and C-96 met with Project Truth on July 31, 1997, and were interviewed separately.

C-96 provided a statement to Detective Constable Steve Seguin and described his alleged abuse by Harvey Latour and Roch Landry. C-96 also claimed that he was abused by an unidentified individual. I have heard no evidence about whether or not this individual was eventually identified. C-96 had difficulty recalling his exact age at the time of the abuse but said it began when he was between eleven and thirteen and continued until he was around fifteen.

Mr. Marleau's statement was taken by Detective Constable Genier. In it, Mr. Marleau identified Mr. Landry, Father Paul Lapierre, Father Donald Scott, Father Kenneth Martin, George Sandford Lawrence, Dr. Arthur Peachey, and Laurent Benoît as his alleged abusers. There was another alleged abuser whose name Mr. Marleau could not recall but whom he described as the priest in charge of the parish in Ingleside.

According to Detective Inspector Hall, the allegations of C-96 and Mr. Marleau were a significant development for Project Truth, particularly because they did not come from Constable Perry Dunlop's materials. Project Truth's decision to investigate these complaints is discussed in the section "Project Truth's Mandate." As I point out there, the Claude Marleau and C-96 complaints significantly increased the number of suspects under investigation.

Choice of Language of the Interviews

At the outset of Mr. Marleau's first interview with Project Truth, Detective Constable Genier advised Mr. Marleau that he would prefer to conduct the interview in English. The transcript of the interview reads:

MARLEAU: Going to do this in English, or?

GENIER: Yes, preferably ...

Mr. Marleau testified that he would have liked to have done the interview in French, but he acknowledged that he never told this to Detective Constable Genier. Mr. Marleau believes that the content of his first statement would have been different if he had been given the opportunity to speak French. He contends that he would have been able to give better descriptions and found it easier to express his emotions.

C-96's interview was also conducted in English as Detective Constable Seguin did not speak French. According to Detective Inspector Hall, Detective Constable Genier was the only person on the Project Truth team who spoke French fluently. Detective Inspector Hall said he could not recall "any statements being taken in French" and acknowledged that if he had received statements in French he would have needed to have them translated.

I find it unfortunate that only one bilingual officer, and no bilingual administrative staff, were assigned to this investigation, despite the fact that it was taking place in a bilingual community. I heard significant expert testimony on the stress associated with disclosing incidents of sexual abuse. Efforts must be made to ensure complainants are comfortable, and this includes conducting the interview in the language in which the alleged victim is most comfortable. The choice of language should be left with the complainant and not made for the convenience of the investigators.

Mistakes in Memory Made by Claude Marleau During His First Interview

By the time Mr. Marleau gave his first statement in 1997, approximately thirty years had passed since the alleged abuse occurred. He had never mapped out the entire sequence of events. Before they met with the Project Truth officers, Mr. Marleau and C-96 visited most of the places where they were allegedly abused.

Mr. Marleau testified that before giving his statement to Project Truth, he had put all the past abuse in a “drawer” for thirty years. Mr. Marleau described his initial statement as opening the drawer and beginning to unpack the various memories that he kept there. He believed at the time he had a good memory of events and places. However, he made a few mistakes with respect to the dates of the alleged incidents. He believes the mistakes were attributable to the fact that his story came out all of a sudden, and he said that once he was able to find some reference points, the memories were intact. These mistakes and changes in dates were later the subject of intense cross-examination during the course of the criminal proceedings.

Alain Godin, the Crown responsible for prosecuting some of Mr. Marleau’s alleged abusers, testified that when he reviewed Mr. Marleau’s statement, he noticed that Mr. Marleau referred to markers (such as where he lived, which school he attended, etc.) instead of referring to his age. Mr. Godin asked the officers to speak with Mr. Marleau’s mother and to obtain school and land registry records. This documentation helped Mr. Godin assess Mr. Marleau’s age at the time of the incidents. Mr. Godin further noted that this often happens in historical cases.

Wendy Harvey, an expert in the prosecution of child sexual abuse, suggests that before taking a statement, investigators should help complainants develop a plan to best recount their version of an event that took place years earlier. This may include collecting documents and photographs, and creating a timeline to provide some context for the incident they are trying to recall. According to Ms Harvey, a complainant’s first responsibility is to reconstruct what transpired in as accurate a way possible, and because the human memory cannot do that on its own, they will require some assistance with structured documents around issues of dates and that type of thing.

In my view, the steps recommended by Crown Godin and Ms Harvey are examples of techniques that can be of considerable benefit when investigating allegations of historical sexual abuse, and they should be incorporated into investigative protocols.

Identification of Father René Dubé

A few days after providing his statement to the OPP, Mr. Marleau contacted Detective Constable Genier and told him that he had forgotten to address one incident of abuse. Detective Constable Genier's notes state:

Marleau adds he forgot to mention one (1) accused; he had it written on the other side of his paper. His name is Father Deslaurier[s].
Marleau recalls one incident occurring in Montreal area at approx. age of 13/14 years.

On September 3, 1997, Mr. Marleau met with Detective Constable Genier in Montreal. During this second interview, Mr. Marleau described an incident where he alleged that he had been jointly abused in Montreal by Father Paul Lapierre and a priest whom Mr. Marleau identified as Father Deslauriers.

On October 19, 1998, Mr. Marleau told Detective Constable Genier that he believed it was another priest and not Father Deslauriers who had abused him in Montreal. Detective Constable Genier's notes state:

Spoke to Marleau about the Father Deslauriers issue. Marleau was speaking to his mother last evening and she believes the Priest responsible for abuse is not Deslauriers but Father Dubé.

Marleau stated years ago, he attended a wedding in Cornwall and was corrected by mom that the priest wasn't Deslauriers but Dubé.

Mr. Marleau had determined that the priest who presided over the wedding of a relative was the person who had allegedly abused him. Detective Constable Genier attended Nativity Church and asked for information about the wedding of Mr. Marleau's relative. He learned that the priest at this wedding was Father René Dubé.

On November 20, 1998, Mr. Marleau provided a formal statement to Detective Constable Genier regarding the name of the alleged abuser in Montreal.

Q: I understand, Mr. MARLEAU, that you realized the name of a priest that you disclosed to us was wrong. This correction applies to your disclosure involving Father DESLAURIERS. Could you tell me how you came to this conclusion?

A: After thinking back on that specific priest, I kept thinking that the name was wrong, but physically I always knew who he was. After talking to my mother, which was after the Montreal Urban Police had contacted me, I realized the Father I was talking about was not DESLAURIERS, but Father DUBÉ, because my mother lives in the parish and after I described the Father to her, she said it was Father DUBÉ because of the description I gave her.

...

Q: Do you know what Father DESLAURIERS looks like?

A: No, I've never met him. The mix up in the names came from my trying to get information from [C-96's mother], who lives in the parish. I was trying to recollect who served at Nativity Church in the late 70's, or early 80's, as that was the period I knew I had seen him again. [C-96's mother] with the information I provided, said it was Father DESLAURIERS that was there at that time. But I didn't give her a description at anytime, because I didn't want her to think that any of these questions were related to Project Truth. I spoke to [C-96's mother] the morning before I gave my video statement at Lancaster Detachment.

Detective Constable Genier went to Quebec City in order to have Mr. Marleau identify his alleged perpetrator in a photo line-up. Mr. Marleau selected the picture of Father René Dubé.

The allegations about the incident involving Father Dubé and Father Paul Lapierre were eventually turned over to police in Quebec.

Identification of Father Hollis Lapierre

On October 20, 1998, Detective Constable Genier met with Mr. Marleau and showed him a statement from someone who said they could help identify the priest at Our Lady of Grace Parish in Ingleside during the relevant time period, as well as a photo of the parish priest. As a result, Mr. Marleau provided a statement and identified Father Hollis Lapierre as the unknown priest first mentioned in his July 31, 1997, statement. He told Detective Constable Genier that Father Paul Lapierre had informed him a few years previously that the priest from Ingleside was dead. Father Hollis Lapierre had in fact died in 1975.

Preparation of Crown Briefs and Crown Opinion

Following their investigation, the Project Truth officers prepared Crown briefs for complaints against Roch Landry, Father Paul Lapierre, Father Kenneth Martin, George Sandford Lawrence, Dr. Arthur Peachey, and Harvey Latour. The other suspects identified by Mr. Marleau and C-96 either were dead or the allegations against them had been turned over to Quebec police. Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier received these briefs on April 1 and 3, 1998.

On May 7, 1998, Crown Pelletier provided Detective Inspector Smith with an opinion on the allegations in the Crown briefs. Mr. Pelletier recommended that the charges against Mr. Latour proceed and had “no hesitation whatsoever in recommending charges against Roch Joseph Landry” and Father Paul Lapierre. Crown Pelletier noted that consent was a live issue in the cases involving Dr. Peachey, Father Martin, and Mr. Lawrence. He recommended that these cases proceed to a preliminary inquiry, after which they could determine whether the merits and public interest were sufficient for the various accused to be committed to trial. Crown Pelletier noted that Mr. Marleau was not “challenged specifically on the issue of consent” in his statements, although “the general tenor of Marleau’s statement is such that he was not a fully willing participant.” Crown Pelletier further noted that Mr. Marleau should be advised of the difficulties with the prosecutions in order to obtain his fully informed view on the matter.

Follow-Up on the Consent Issue

After receiving the Crown opinion, Detective Constable Seguin called Mr. Marleau on May 13, 1998, and asked about consent. Detective Constable Seguin’s notes describe the conversation as follows:

Asked about issue of consent. He advised that in all situations it was influenced consent. The way it’s brought upon you. These are people in control. With the stuff you’re given, it’s like you’re lured into it because of the stuff and treatment you get there that you don’t get at home.

According to Mr. Marleau, during this conversation there were no follow-up questions or questions about his relationship with the priests.

On May 19, 1998, Detective Constable Seguin called Mr. Marleau again and asked him questions relating to the Crown’s concerns about consent, particularly in relation to Dr. Peachey and Father Martin. According to Mr. Marleau, Detective Constable Seguin was interested in consent in a very narrow and technical sense rather than looking at the broader relationship he had with his alleged abusers.

Mr. Marleau understood that in the criminal trials, a lot revolved around legal definitions of consent. According to Mr. Marleau, not many people at the trial understood that the events at age seventeen were connected to the events at age eleven; it was for him a connected chain of events. It appears that Mr. Marleau was trying to explain that the connection between these events undermined any appearance of consent.

As I have previously noted, Detective Constable Seguin did not have specific training on sexual abuse. Such training would have helped him understand how victims can be groomed, thus making them appear to agree to acts of abuse when in reality their consent is vitiated by the psychological or financial manipulation employed by their abusers. In hindsight, had Detective Constable Seguin understood this principle, he would have been able to ask more targeted questions in order to obtain evidence of grooming and undermined consent. This incident underscores the need for officers to be properly trained on sexual abuse and to have this training updated periodically.

Delay in Laying Charges Against Alleged Perpetrators

Mr. Marleau and C-96 first gave statements in July 1997. The Crown briefs were submitted in April 1998, and a Crown opinion followed in early May 1998. However, no charges were laid until July 1998. The Project Truth officers advised Mr. Marleau that there were problems in assigning a Crown because the local Crown had a conflict of interest. It had been decided that local Crown attorney Murray MacDonald would not take on Project Truth prosecutions because of the allegations that were made against him in the Fantino Brief.

On the other hand, Detective Constable Seguin noted that he could not explain the delay of almost a year between the initial complaint and the actual charge, except to say that the decision when to lay charges was not his to make.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that when a number of arrests were to be made, it is the OPP's normal practice to do them all at once:

You're not going to do one this week, one the next week. We were doing it grouped because of the heightened interest in the community, and we wanted to make a press release and we knew there would be lots of discussion over it.

Detective Inspector Smith agreed that in special projects it is not unusual to do all the arrests on one day, issue a press release, and set the same court date for all the accused. According to Detective Inspector Smith, as of June 1998, the OPP were ready to arrest a number of suspects and were waiting for a Crown to be assigned to Project Truth.

Detective Inspector Smith and Crown Pelletier set a date of July 9, 1998, for charges against a number of suspects. Detective Sergeant Hall advised Bishop Eugène LaRocque about the scheduled arrests. The Bishop was to contact the clergy members who were to be arrested and request that they report at a certain time and location in lieu of an arrest warrant. Detective Inspector Hall testified that there were no complaints from alleged victims when arrangements were made to have alleged perpetrators come in themselves. He believed that the officers dealing with the victims explained the procedure and it was accepted.

Simultaneous Arrests of Alleged Perpetrators

In the month preceding the planned arrests, two suspects, in cases unrelated to Mr. Marleau and C-96, committed suicide. As discussed in the following sections, Richard Hickerson and Nelson Barque took their lives on June 19 and June 28, 1998, respectively. Both were to be charged on July 9, 1998.

Detective Inspector Smith mentioned during his testimony that in other cases he worked on in the past, often victims would commit suicide. He noted:

In this case, it's the opposite, although we had I think two attempt on victims, but now all of a sudden, because of media attention and everything else I've got—I've got suicides all over the place.

And as a police officer, you're sworn to protect life and property. What do I do to protect life? ... We don't have a death sentence in this country, but just the mere mention that somebody may be a paedophile or is going to be arrested, is a death sentence to some of them, and that bothered me.

And you know, how can I do my job at the same time make the arrests that I have to but what can I do to maybe stop these people from taking their lives ... that wore on all of us, you know.

Detective Inspector Smith was concerned about the suicides and wanted to prevent others. He had a discussion with Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald on June 30, 1998, about this issue.

Project Truth planned to arrest six other individuals on July 9, 1998. The suspects were asked to turn themselves in to the OPP, and all but one attended as planned. When Harvey Latour failed to attend and could not be reached by telephone, Detective Sergeant Hall asked the officers to go to his residence. On their arrival they discovered that Mr. Latour was attempting suicide. They obtained a key from the superintendent and called an ambulance. It was later determined that Mr. Latour had overdosed on Tylenol. He was arrested a few days afterwards.

Detective Constable Seguin had been in contact with Roch Landry's wife several months earlier to find out about Mr. Landry's state of mind, as there were concerns about suicide.

The Project Truth officers' attempts to prevent suicides among the alleged perpetrators demonstrate the concern they had for everyone involved in the investigations. They responded to problems when they had the knowledge and the ability to do so. I believe that they would have dealt with victims with an equal amount of sensitivity and diligence had they had more training on the particularities of historical sexual abuse victims.

Claude Marleau's Contacts With Constable Perry Dunlop

Mr. Marleau first heard of Constable Dunlop when he read the article in Le Soleil in July 1997. The newspaper reported the problems that Constable Dunlop had with the Cornwall Police Service. Mr. Marleau contacted Jackie Leroux, the author of the article, and Ms Leroux told him about a lawyer named Charles Bourgeois who was representing Constable Dunlop in a civil case. Mr. Marleau contacted Mr. Bourgeois and told him that he was a lawyer for victims of child sexual abuse in Cornwall rather than a victim himself.

According to Mr. Marleau, a few weeks after making his initial statement to the OPP, he received a call from Constable Dunlop. Constable Dunlop said that he had obtained his telephone number from Mr. Bourgeois. Mr. Marleau once again presented himself as a lawyer representing victims. Constable Dunlop offered to send him copies of court proceedings, a scrapbook of newspaper articles, and a copy of the Fifth Estate video. Mr. Marleau received the documents on December 2, 1997, and sent a cheque in the amount of $80 for expenses.

In fall 1998, the question of Mr. Marleau's contacts with Constable Dunlop was raised by defence counsel in prosecutions of Mr. Marleau's alleged perpetrators. On October 25, 1998, Mr. Marleau prepared a statement in which he detailed his contacts with Helen and Perry Dunlop. The Project Truth officers asked Mr. Marleau to refrain from further contact with the Dunlops.

Mr. Marleau testified that he received a call from Constable Dunlop on one occasion after providing his statement. He told Constable Dunlop that he had been advised by the police not to speak with him. Mr. Marleau testified that Constable Dunlop did not seem surprised by this and they had no further contact.

Detective Sergeant Hall questioned the Dunlops about their contacts with Mr. Marleau on November 16, 1998. This conversation is described in greater detail in the section "Interactions Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop."

The Links Among Alleged Abusers of Claude Marleau

Mr. Marleau testified that the men who abused him, with the exception of Laurent Benoît and Father René Dubé, all knew one another. Roch Landry was the first alleged abuser; he introduced Mr. Marleau to Father Paul Lapierre. Father Paul Lapierre introduced him to Father Donald Scott, Father Hollis Lapierre, George Sandford Lawrence, Father Dubé, and Father Kenneth Martin. Mr. Lawrence introduced him to Dr. Peachey. Mr. Marleau met Mr. Benoît independently, but Mr. Benoît employed Mr. Landry. To his knowledge, Father Dubé knew only Father Paul Lapierre. According to Mr. Marleau, it was clear that some of the alleged abusers communicated with each other and talked about him.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he completed an analysis of the suspects in the Marleau case and concluded that they were not all known to each other despite the common victim. According to Detective Inspector Hall, a ring is a group of people who all know each other and operate in concert. He said, “This wasn’t the situation here.” I discuss Project Truth’s linkage analysis further at the end of this chapter.

Communication Between the OPP and Quebec Authorities

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he and Detective Constable Genier went to the Montreal police headquarters and spoke with an inspector there regarding the incident of abuse that allegedly occurred in Montreal. They provided a copy of the interview reports, and the Montreal police took over the matter. Detective Constable Genier worked with the assigned investigator and made several trips to Montreal for court appearances.

Claude Marleau’s Perception of Treatment by the OPP

Mr. Marleau testified that the Project Truth officers whom he dealt with did not appear to have specialized training in historical sexual offences. He contrasted his dealings with the OPP and the Montreal police. He noted that the Quebec officer he dealt with specialized in sexual offences and had a better approach. Mr. Marleau said he did not feel judged by the Quebec officer, while the approach and techniques of the OPP officers intimidated him and made him feel like his credibility was being questioned.

Outcome of the Prosecutions

The only conviction obtained based on the allegations of Mr. Marleau and C-96 was Father Paul Lapierre; he was found guilty by a court in Quebec and sentenced to twelve months imprisonment followed by a period of probation of three years.

Father Dubé was acquitted of the charges in Quebec.

In Ontario, Father Lapierre was found not guilty of the charges laid by the OPP. Mr. Latour, Mr. Lawrence, and Father Martin were also acquitted of the charges against them.

Mr. Landry and Dr. Peachey died before their trials, and the charges against them were withdrawn.

These prosecutions are described in detail in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

Investigation of Richard Hickerson

Richard Hickerson worked as an employment counsellor for Canada Manpower. He had frequent interactions with probation officers Ken Seguin and Nelson Barque because he was often asked to help individuals on probation and parole find work. Mr. Hickerson also volunteered at the École Musica in Cornwall, where he acted as a “coach” for violin students. Previously, Mr. Hickerson had been a priest in Manitoba, but he left the priesthood around 1965, after the Bishop of his Diocese became aware of a “sexual incident” between Mr. Hickerson and a teenaged altar boy. He left and came to Cornwall in 1968. His background is more fully described in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service.

In the course of Project Truth, three complainants alleged sexual abuse by Mr. Hickerson. Detective Constable Don Genier was the lead investigator.

Complaints Against Richard Hickerson

On October 7, 1997, C-11 contacted Detective Constable Joe Dupuis to make a complaint regarding Mr. Hickerson. When C-11 was twelve or thirteen years old and in grade 8, he took music lessons at École Musica. Mr. Hickerson was a volunteer with the school’s orchestra and would coach some students individually at his apartment. C-11 alleged that during these coaching sessions Mr. Hickerson sexually abused him repeatedly over several years. C-11 also alleged that Mr. Hickerson had “an extensive pornography collection, ... including child pornography.”

A second complainant, Keith Ouellette, came to the attention of Project Truth on October 10, 1997. Detective Constable Dupuis received a call from probation officer Jos van Diepen advising him that Mr. Ouellette had complained that he had been sexually assaulted by Mr. Hickerson, Ken Seguin, and Chris Wilson. Mr. Ouellette was interviewed by Detective Constables Dupuis and Steve Seguin on October 30, 1997. He told the officers that Ken Seguin was his probation officer when he was around eighteen or nineteen years old. Mr. Ouellette said that Mr. Seguin sent him to Manpower to see Mr. Hickerson. He alleged that Mr. Hickerson had sexually abused him on multiple occasions.

Mr. Ouellette spoke with Constable Perry Dunlop a few weeks after he provided the statement to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) and met with him in 2000, just before the Dunlops moved to British Columbia. Mr. Ouellette claimed that he spoke with Constable Dunlop several times over the phone to set up meetings, but that he never attended these meetings. This appears to be Constable Dunlop's only involvement in the Hickerson case.

Finally, on May 11, 1998, the OPP learned from C-90 that Robert Sheets might also have been a victim of Mr. Hickerson. Detective Constable Genier took a statement from Mr. Sheets on June 2, 1998. Mr. Sheets alleged that Mr. Hickerson and Mr. Barque sexually abused him. When he was fourteen or fifteen years old, Mr. Hickerson was assigned to be Mr. Sheets' Special Needs Counsellor and to assist Mr. Sheets in finding a job. Mr. Sheets alleged that Mr. Hickerson would bring him to his place, give him alcohol and money, and sexually molest him. He said that this sexual abuse went on for two or three years and that he kept going back because he needed Mr. Hickerson's help to find employment. Mr. Sheets also referred to Mr. Hickerson's collection of pornography, alleging that Mr. Hickerson made him watch male homosexual pornographic movies.

Caution and Release of Richard Hickerson

On June 11, 1998, Detective Constables Genier and Dupuis took a cautioned statement from Mr. Hickerson. Mr. Hickerson admitted to having had a sexual relationship with C-11 and also acknowledged a "sexual incident" with an altar boy when he was still a priest. He said:

Let's face it, when you're gay and there's boys all around. I'm not into pre-pubescent boys, but as they reach to age of puberty I start to get attractive to them. Let's say twelve, thirteen to twenty-five years. It's a "ephebophile." (it's an adolescent that reached puberty.)

Mr. Hickerson denied having a pornography collection, and the OPP did not obtain a search warrant to follow up on the allegations of possession of child pornography. Nor did the Project Truth officers inform Project P, the OPP's child pornography section, of these allegations.

Despite his inculpatory statements, Mr. Hickerson was not arrested immediately. Instead, he was told that the OPP would be in touch within a few weeks. Detective Inspector Hall testified that Mr. Hickerson was among the group of suspects Project Truth planned to arrest on July 9, 1998.

Richard Hickerson Death Investigation

Mr. Hickerson committed suicide on June 19, 1998. Constable Jeff Carroll of the Cornwall Police Service investigated his death. A search was conducted of Mr. Hickerson's residence pursuant to a warrant issued by the Coroner, and the Cornwall police discovered a large quantity of pornographic material, including magazines and videos. The investigation is described in Chapter 6.

Problems With Investigation and Delay of Arrest

I am concerned that the OPP did not take steps to interview Mr. Hickerson, or search his residence, in the fall of 1997 after C-11 and Mr. Ouellette made complaints. It may be that the investigators were simply too busy or were attempting to gather further evidence before approaching Mr. Hickerson. Although Mr. Hickerson did not have a prior conviction, allegations of sexual abuse from more than one alleged victim and additional allegations of possession of child pornography should be investigated more quickly.

It is clear that the OPP could have done more to pursue the allegations of possession of child pornography. In his testimony, Detective Inspector Hall suggested that the OPP would not have had sufficient grounds to obtain a search warrant, in part because C-11's allegations were historical. I am unconvinced. The Cornwall Police Service was able to obtain a search warrant for Marcel Lalonde's residence based on historical allegations that he was in possession of child pornography, and the OPP should have attempted to do the same in the case of Mr. Hickerson. Moreover, in addition to C-11's allegations, the OPP eventually had Mr. Hickerson's own admission made during his statement that he was sexually attracted to, and had been sexually involved with, young teenage boys.

I am also concerned by the almost month-long delay between obtaining Mr. Hickerson's inculpatory statement and the planned date for arrest. Arrangements had been made by Project Truth to make a number of arrests and issue a press release on July 9, 1998. Detective Inspector Smith testified that this practice was not unusual in special projects. While mass arrests may not be uncommon, and may even be necessary in certain situations, such as drug busts or gang activity, I fail to see the reason for delaying the arrest of historical sexual abuse suspects. I find this practice inadvisable where suspects have made inculpatory statements and are aware that they are likely to be arrested, particularly in high-profile cases involving allegations of sexual abuse.

Project Truth Investigation of Nelson Barque

As discussed in other chapters and earlier in this one, Nelson Barque was investigated on several occasions: by the Ministry of Correctional Services in 1982, and jointly by the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in 1994. Following the 1994 investigation, Mr. Barque pleaded guilty to indecent assault and was sentenced to four months incarceration and eighteen months probation in relation to the abuse of Albert Roy.

Complaints Against Nelson Barque

The OPP's second investigation of Mr. Barque began in 1997 as part of Project Truth. Detective Constable Don Genier led the Project Truth investigation into allegations of sexual abuse by former probationers of Mr. Barque. On January 27, 1997, Detective Constable Genier received a call from C-45, who made allegations against Ken Seguin, Mr. Barque, and Marcel Lalonde. In a statement to Detective Constables Joe Dupuis and Steve Seguin on October 3, 1997, C-45 claimed that when he was fifteen years old, Mr. Seguin and Mr. Barque touched and measured his penis in Mr. Barque's office as part of a probation "pre-sentence report."

Project Truth learned of another possible victim, Robert Sheets, after speaking to C-90 on May 11, 1998. On June 2, 1998, Detective Constable Genier took a statement from Mr. Sheets. Mr. Sheets alleged that both Mr. Barque and Richard Hickerson had sexually abused him. He claimed that he was introduced to Mr. Barque by C-44 when he was about eighteen years old. Initially, Mr. Seguin was Mr. Sheets' probation officer, but Mr. Barque became his probation officer in January 1982. Mr. Sheets alleged that Mr. Barque gave him money and alcohol in breach of his probation conditions and that a sexual relationship ensued. A few of these incidents allegedly occurred at Mr. Seguin's residence. Mr. Sheets claimed that Mr. Seguin was not home at the time, but he left "a gay movie" set up for them. Mr. Sheets also claimed that the abuse began after he told Mr. Barque about his sexual contact with Mr. Hickerson.

This is the third time that public institutions became aware that Mr. Barque might have had sexual contact with Mr. Sheets. These allegations surfaced in the Ministry of Correctional Services' 1982 investigation into Mr. Barque, and again in 1994, when OPP Detective Constable William Zebruck was investigating Mr. Barque for his abuse of Albert Roy. These investigations are discussed in detail in previous sections of this Report.

Caution and Release of Nelson Barque

Mr. Barque provided Detective Constables Genier and Dupuis with a cautioned statement on June 18, 1998. Mr. Barque admitted that he engaged in sexual activities with Mr. Sheets when he was a probationer and estimated that these took place over one to one-and-one half years. He said that at the time he was under the impression that Mr. Sheets was eighteen or nineteen years old but that it was possible he was younger. Mr. Barque did not recall having sex with Mr. Sheets at Mr. Seguin's residence.

Mr. Barque also admitted to having a sexual relationship with C-44 and Mr. Roy. When asked if there was anyone else, Mr. Barque replied, "Not that I recall. In my mind there was only three." When asked generally if he had any sexual contact with C-45, he denied it.

Despite the admissions made in his statement, Mr. Barque was not arrested on June 18, 1998. Detective Inspector Hall testified the officers had reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest but the OPP's intention was to arrest Mr. Barque on July 9, 1998, along with several other suspects. However, Mr. Barque committed suicide on June 28, 1998.

Concerns About Delay

I am concerned about the delay in investigating allegations against Mr. Barque from June 1997 onwards. He had been convicted of similar charges in 1995, yet little priority seems to have been applied in investigating him again. In addition, as I commented in relation to the investigation of Mr. Hickerson, I believe it was inadvisable for Project Truth to delay the arrest of suspects in relation to serious charges involving the sexual abuse of young people, after those suspects made inculpatory statements in cautioned interviews.

Investigation of Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere

Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere was a retired teacher from the St. Joseph's Training School in Alexandria. He was also identified by the name Brother George Edmond. Detective Constable Don Genier was the officer in charge of investigating Brother Carriere.

In the fall of 1997, Detective Constable Genier took statements from C-105 and C-106. Both said Brother Carriere abused them when they were between the ages of eleven and thirteen. The alleged abuse took place while they were studying at St. Joseph's between 1954 and 1956.

Detective Constables Genier and Joe Dupuis took a cautioned statement from Brother Carriere on March 11, 1998.

On April 1, 1998, the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) submitted a brief to the Crown. In his opinion to Detective Inspector Smith, dated May 7, 1998, Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier expressed concern that it might not be in the public interest to prosecute Brother Carriere because of his age, seventy-seven, and the dated nature of the alleged offences. However, Crown Pelletier recommended that the matter proceed at least to a preliminary inquiry if Detective Inspector

Smith felt there were reasonable and probable grounds and that the public interest would be served.

Brother Carriere was arrested on July 9, 1998, and charged with two counts of indecent assault on a male.

The preliminary inquiry took place before Justice G. Renaud on May 31, 1999, and Brother Carriere was committed to stand trial on both charges. On January 13, 2000, Justice P. Lalonde granted a stay of proceedings, finding that Brother Carriere, who had suffered multiple strokes in recent years, would be unable to present a whole and complete defence at trial because of his mental deficits. This issue is further discussed in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

Investigation and Prosecution of Jacques Leduc

Complaints about sexual abuse by Jacques Leduc were first reported in April 1998. Project Truth conducted an investigation, and Mr. Leduc was arrested on June 22, 1998. He was ultimately tried on charges relating to three complainants. His first trial ended in a stay of proceedings due to wilful non-disclosure of information relating to contact between Constable Perry Dunlop and one of the complainant’s mothers. The Crown successfully appealed that decision, but a further stay was granted during Mr. Leduc’s retrial due to delay. The Court decided that Mr. Leduc had not been tried within a reasonable time, in violation of his rights under the Charter.

First Complaint to Ontario Provincial Police

Allegations about sexual abuse against Cornwall lawyer Jacques Leduc surfaced in April 1998. The first alleged victim to come forward was C-16. A report was made on April 8, 1998, to Detective Constable Verne Gilkes in the Hawkesbury Detachment by a friend of C-16’s family. C-16 was interviewed by Constable Charlene Davidson at the Lancaster Detachment on May 7, 1998. C-16 was twenty-one years old at the time of the interview. He alleged that Mr. Leduc began sexually abusing him shortly after he started doing outdoor work for Mr. Leduc when he was fifteen years old. C-16 said the incidents occurred every time he worked for Mr. Leduc.

On May 8, 1998, Constable Davidson gave C-16’s statement to Detective Constable Joe Dupuis and asked whether this case fell within the Project Truth mandate. Detective Constable Dupuis called Detective Inspector Tim Smith, who decided the allegation did fall within the mandate. Project Truth took over the investigation into C-16’s allegations. Constable Davidson contacted C-16 to advise him that the investigation had been turned over to Project Truth.

Investigation of C-16's Complaint

Detective Constable Dupuis, the lead investigator on the case, and Detective Constable Steve Seguin conducted a videotaped interview of C-16 on May 11, 1998. In this statement, C-16 stated he began working for Mr. Leduc when he was thirteen years old. He said the abuse started less than a year after he began working for Leduc and continued until he was about eighteen or nineteen years old. C-16 told the officers about other young people who had worked for Mr. Leduc, in particular C-23, C-17, and another individual.

Detective Constable Dupuis interviewed C-16's mother on May 13, 1998. The officer explained that he does not always interview complainants' mothers but interviewed C-16's mother to corroborate his statement. She confirmed that C-16 was twelve, about to turn thirteen, when he began working for Mr. Leduc. She said the first incident of alleged abuse took place during the second summer that C-16 worked for Mr. Leduc, when C-16 was thirteen years old. C-16's mother told the officer that Mr. Leduc gave her son clothing, including expensive cowboy boots, paid for braces for his teeth, and would let C-16 borrow his car whenever he wanted it.

Detective Constable Dupuis interviewed C-16 a second time on July 28, 1998. During this interview, C-16 provided further details about his alleged abuse. As I have discussed in earlier chapters, incremental disclosure is not unusual for victims of child sexual abuse.

Investigation of Allegations by C-17 and C-23

Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis interviewed C-17 on May 13, 1998. At the time of the interview, C-17 was seventeen years old. He told the officers that he had been working for Mr. Leduc since December 1995 and had worked for him as recently as one week before. He alleged that Mr. Leduc first abused him after they went deer hunting in the fall of 1997. Throughout the interview, C-17 had difficulty describing the abuse, in part because of language issues. C-17 had trouble finding the English words for what he was trying to describe. Neither of the officers could speak French fluently. They did invite C-17 to use the French words and they would "figure it out."

It is unfortunate that this interview was not conducted in French. As I discuss in the section "Investigations of Complaints of Claude Marleau and C-96," disclosing incidents of sexual abuse can be extremely stressful for victims, and efforts should be made to ensure they are comfortable. In my view, this should include, at minimum, conducting the interview in the language in which the complainant is most comfortable.

C-17 alleged that he was abused by Mr. Leduc approximately ten times. He also told the officers that Mr. Leduc gave him some clothes and would let him drive his car. He said a friend of his had just started working for Mr. Leduc and gave the name of another friend who used to work for him. C-16 had also provided the officers with the latter name. Both of these individuals were interviewed by the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) and became potential witnesses for the charges involving C-17.

C-17 was interviewed again on June 9, 1998. He provided some additional details about how he had come to work for Mr. Leduc and the incidents of alleged abuse.

The Project Truth officers also took two statements from C-23, on May 25 and July 22, 1998. C-23 told the officers that he had sexual contact with Mr. Leduc but said that it was consensual. He also said that he and Mr. Leduc engaged in sexual acts with another individual, C-22. As I explain below, the officers later interviewed C-22 and Mr. Leduc was eventually charged in relation to allegations made by him. The Crown intended to call C-23 as a similar fact witness in Mr. Leduc's trial.

Constable Perry Dunlop's Conversation With C-16's Mother

On June 15, 1998, Detective Constable Dupuis visited C-16's home to pick up a videotape dealing with victim support. C-16's mother advised him that she had received a call from Constable Perry Dunlop, who wanted to know how the investigation was proceeding. Detective Constable Dupuis told her not to discuss anything with Constable Dunlop while the investigation was ongoing. He did not ask her any questions about the phone call or whether she had any previous contact with Constable Dunlop. He did make a note of this in his notebook.

When Detective Constable Dupuis returned to the Project Truth office he made a general comment about the phone conversation between Constable Dunlop and C-16's mother, but at the hearings, he could not recall who was in the office at the time. Detective Inspector Hall remembered overhearing Detective Constable Dupuis say something to the effect of "[W]ell, Dunlop is contacting victims again." Detective Inspector Hall does not think Detective Constable Dupuis told him he had just come from C-16's residence. At some point, Detective Inspector Smith was briefed on the fact that Constable Dunlop spoke with C-16's mother.

Sometime during the week of June 15, 1998, Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall discussed the contact between Constable Dunlop and C-16's mother, and they met with Constable Dunlop on July 23, 1998. During this meeting, Detective Inspector Smith brought up the call to C-16's mother because he had previously asked Constable Dunlop not to contact victims or witnesses. Detective Inspector Smith did not make a note of this topic, probably, he testified, because he was more concerned about the issue of disclosure and felt this was a “side issue.” At this meeting, the OPP learned that Constable Dunlop had delivered four binders of materials to a number of government bodies and that these materials had not been forwarded to the OPP. This issue is further discussed in the section “Constable Perry Dunlop and Disclosure to the OPP.”

Detective Inspector Hall explained that he did not know Detective Inspector Smith was going to bring up the contact with C-16’s mother, and said he did not make a note of it because, “I just make notes usually on what I speak on if I think it’s appropriate.” However, earlier in his testimony, when Detective Inspector Hall described his note-taking practices, he said that he made sufficient notes to capture the “gist of the conversation” and also that he mostly wrote down what other people told him, rather than what he told them. Neither Detective Inspector Smith nor Detective Sergeant Hall made a note about the contact between Constable Dunlop and C-16’s mother either after hearing about it from Detective Constable Dupuis or during the July 23, 1998, meeting with Constable Dunlop. Given their concerns about Constable Dunlop’s contacts with witnesses, something should have been noted.

Constable Dunlop mentions this topic in a will-state he prepared in early 2000:

Inspector Tim Smith wants to know about [C-16’s mother]. I stated that I spoke to her and directed her to Project Truth. Inspector Tim Smith indicated that I called her back. Three weeks later I called [C-16’s mother] back out of concern she was very upset the first time she called me. Out of concern that a normal caring person has I called her back to make sure she was O.K.

Constable Dunlop’s will-state also refers to his initial contact with C-16’s mother on May 8, 1998, when he referred her to Project Truth.

The conversation between Constable Dunlop and C-16’s mother did not strike Detective Sergeant Hall as particularly significant because the officers knew that Constable Dunlop was contacting witnesses and it was not unusual to find out that he had talked to someone. Detective Inspector Hall explained that when this was discussed with Constable Dunlop on July 23, 1998, he said that he was following up to see how C-16’s mother was doing. There was no indication of contact with the complainant.

Detective Constable Dupuis’ note of this contact was not disclosed to the defence, and he never informed Crown Shelley Hallett, who was assigned in July 1998 to prosecute the matter, about the telephone conversation between C-16’s mother and Constable Dunlop. As will be discussed below, C-16’s mother testified about her contacts with Constable Dunlop during Mr. Leduc's trial, at which point the non-disclosure of this information to the defence became a very significant issue.

Jacques Leduc's Contact With Victims

During the course of the investigation by Project Truth officers, Mr. Leduc maintained contact with some of his alleged victims. On May 12, 1998, Mr. Leduc showed up at C-17's home while Detective Constable Dupuis was there discussing C-17's allegations. Detective Constable Dupuis believed this was merely a coincidence. Mr. Leduc had not been arrested, and Detective Constable Dupuis had no reason to believe that he would be aware of the investigation. On May 27, 1998 while Detective Constable Dupuis was interviewing another potential witness, Mr. Leduc called the residence asking this individual to come do some work for him. Again, Detective Constable Dupuis felt this was a coincidence. Given that both C-17 and the other individual had recently worked for Mr. Leduc, and that I did not hear any evidence of Mr. Leduc attempting to interfere in the investigation, I am inclined to agree with Detective Constable Dupuis that his contact was coincidental. However, it was probably disconcerting to the officers as it indicated a potential for ongoing abuse.

C-17 Receives a Death Threat

On July 13, 1998, C-17's mother provided Detective Constable Dupuis with an envelope containing a death threat that stated, "You're dead meat, faggot." C-17's mother asked Detective Constable Dupuis to investigate this threat. The letter was sent to the OPP in Long Sault to examine it for fingerprints, but none were recovered from the envelope. The OPP were never able to identify who sent the envelope.

Investigation of C-22's Allegations

As mentioned above, C-23 told the officers that he and Mr. Leduc had a "three-some" with C-22. Detective Constable Dupuis contacted C-22 on May 28, 1998, and he said he had worked for Mr. Leduc when he was fourteen years old. On June 2, 1998, Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin went to C-22's house and asked him to provide a statement. According to Detective Constable Dupuis' notes, C-22 "stood with his head down" while talking to the officers. He said he had a baseball game later that evening and had not yet had dinner. There were people in the house and he did not want to do the interview there. Detective

Constable Dupuis noted that C-22 was “reluctant” to speak to them. C-22 suggested that something had occurred while he was working for Mr. Leduc but said he “did not want to talk about it, did not want his name in the paper, or want to go to court.”

After the officers explained that they needed his help, C-22 agreed to speak to them and went to get his shoes. Another person came out of the house and said that C-22 did not want to speak to the police and that he was dealing with it himself. Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin told this unidentified person that if C-22 would not talk to them, they would subpoena him to appear in court anyway.

Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis tried again on July 30, 1998, to obtain a statement. By this date, Mr. Leduc had been charged for allegedly abusing C-16 and C-17. Although C-22 still did not want to give a formal statement, he did provide information that led the officers to believe that he was potentially a victim of Mr. Leduc. He said he had worked for Mr. Leduc for three years and had a sexual experience with him and another individual twice. Although he never received gifts from Mr. Leduc, C-22 did not have to pay legal fees for the drafting of his will, a power of attorney, or the purchase of his house.

C-22 stated that he did not want to go to court or provide a statement. He believed the police had enough people and did not need him. The officers then told C-22 that he would be “subpoenaed anyways.”

Detective Constable Dupuis acknowledged during testimony that he should not have told an alleged victim that he would be subpoenaed. Detective Constable Seguin admitted that there “could have been a better way of delivering” that message. I appreciate the officers’ acknowledgment of their error. It is, of course, not appropriate to threaten a reluctant alleged victim with a subpoena. In this case, C-22 was threatened twice, first through a third party and then directly. C-22 provided more information during his second interaction with the OPP than he had in the first and eventually provided a full statement. Patience rather than coercion is a more appropriate, and probably more fruitful, tactic to encourage a reluctant potential complainant.

On November 24, 1998, Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin again went to C-22’s residence in the hope that he would be willing to assist them. Crown Attorney Shelley Hallett accompanied them. She spoke to C-22 and convinced him to provide a statement. According to Detective Constable Dupuis, it was unusual for Crown Hallett to be involved at this stage of the investigation, but he did not suggest that it was improper. Crown Hallett’s involvement in convincing C-22 to provide a statement is discussed further in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

C-22 accompanied the officers to the Long Sault Detachment, where they conducted a videotaped interview. C-22 said that he was fourteen when he met Mr. Leduc. He had been charged with a criminal offence and Mr. Leduc represented him. He began working for Mr. Leduc while he was on probation. He recalled C-23 working for Mr. Leduc around the same time. C-22 alleged that Mr. Leduc began sexually abusing him about one year after he started working for him and that there were four incidents of abuse.

Detective Constable Dupuis and Crown Hallett met with C-22 again on March 24, 1999, to review his previous statement. After reviewing it, C-22 said he had left some things out. As a result, Detective Constable Dupuis conducted an additional videotaped interview with C-22. During this statement, C-22 said there were closer to fifty incidents of abuse. He said he did not tell the police this earlier because he was nervous, scared, and felt that he owed Mr. Leduc: “He’s done a lot of work for me that he hasn’t charged me for, and I feel that I owe him a lot. He’s like a father figure to me in my life.”

He also said that the abuse started approximately one month, rather than one year, after he started working for Mr. Leduc.

OPP Meets With Children’s Aid Society About Leduc Victims

On May 21, 1998, Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall met with Richard Abell, executive director, and Bill Carriere, Director of Client Services and Protection Services, at the Children’s Aid Society (CAS). They discussed the complaints against Mr. Leduc and the ongoing investigation. Detective Inspector Hall explained that the officers went to the CAS pursuant to their duty to report under the Child and Family Services Act. Although at this time the two willing complainants, C-16 and C-17, were over sixteen years of age, the OPP officers were reporting to the CAS because they had concerns about young people under sixteen potentially being at risk. The fact that there were current allegations against Mr. Leduc was a “live issue” for the officers.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that as of May 21, he was not aware of any young people who were employed by Mr. Leduc, but the officers were concerned about the upcoming end of school year and the possibility that Mr. Leduc might hire other youths for the summer. This was a legitimate concern, and the OPP were correct to inform the CAS of its investigation of Mr. Leduc. This said, the officers did not inform the CAS as soon as they became concerned that Mr. Leduc might currently be putting children at risk. It would have been prudent for the OPP to have reported to the CAS sooner.

According to Detective Inspector Hall, one purpose of the meeting was to share information, and he believes the CAS was given the names of the complainants, although perhaps not that day. Mr. Abell and Mr. Carriere testified they did not recall receiving the names of the complainants. As discussed in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the CAS, the CAS did not, at the time of this meeting, believe it had information that children were currently at risk from Mr. Leduc.

Arrest of Jacques Leduc

Mr. Leduc was arrested on June 22, 1998, and charged with six counts in respect of allegations by C-16 and C-17. Unlike most of the Project Truth investigations, an arrest was made before a Crown brief was prepared and submitted to the Crown Attorney for an opinion. The police were concerned, correctly in my view, about the possibility that Mr. Leduc would hire a youth to do work for him over the summer. Detective Inspector Smith discussed the issue with Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier. Detective Inspector Smith also spoke with Bishop Eugène LaRocque prior to Mr. Leduc's arrest. According to Detective Inspector Hall, Detective Inspector Smith did this because Mr. Leduc was still working as a lawyer for the Diocese on some matters.

On June 22, 1998, Detective Sergeant Hall swore the information against Mr. Leduc, called him, and asked him to come to the police station. The arrangements for Mr. Leduc's arrest were Detective Sergeant Hall's idea, and he explained that this is typically how an arrest of this nature would be carried out: "You try to be as least intrusive as necessary. We weren't going to go and put the handcuffs on and make a public display in front of his employees. I mean, you know, you've got to be considerate." While Mr. Leduc was being arrested at the station, Detective Inspector Smith attended his residence and spoke to his wife. He did this because of suicide concerns, because another suspect, Richard Hickerson, had just committed suicide a few days before. Detective Inspector Smith knew that Mr. Leduc's wife was on sick leave and his understanding was that she was fragile.

Mr. Leduc was released on bail subject to a condition that he was not to be alone with any males under the age of eighteen. He was also not to communicate with the alleged victims and their families, or with C-23 and his family.

As described above, the investigation continued after Mr. Leduc's arrest. An additional six charges were laid against Mr. Leduc on July 17, 1998, and he was charged with four counts relating to allegations by C-22 on March 11, 1999.

Crown Attorney Shelley Hallett was assigned to prosecute the case in July 1998.

First Trial of Jacques Leduc and Stay of Proceedings

The trial of Mr. Leduc began on January 15, 2001. The trial is examined in detail in Chapter 11. This section will look at the participation of the OPP officers in the trial and their perspective on the events that unfolded. Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin assisted Crown Hallett at the trial.

C-16's Mother Testifies About Contact With Constable Perry Dunlop; Detective Constable Joe Dupuis' Notes Were Not Disclosed

C-16's mother was called as a witness by the Crown. On February 7, 2001, in answer to questions put to her during cross-examination, she disclosed that she had two prior contacts with Constable Perry Dunlop. It was later determined that these conversations occurred on May 8 and June 15, 1998. She testified that Detective Constable Dupuis was aware of the second incident because he was at her home when Constable Dunlop called her. This testimony was significant because until this point, there had been no indication that Constable Dunlop had spoken to any witnesses connected with the Leduc prosecution.

Detective Constable Dupuis was in the courtroom, and when he heard this testimony, he remembered that he might have written something in his notebook about the call to C-16's house. He checked the Crown brief, but was unable to find a reference to it there. He contacted Detective Inspector Hall and asked him to check the statements for references to the call between Constable Dunlop and C-16's mother. When Detective Inspector Hall received this call from Detective Constable Dupuis, he remembered that Detective Inspector Smith had brought up Constable Dunlop's contact with C-16's mother during a meeting with Constable Dunlop on July 23, 1998.

Detective Inspector Hall did not know at the time whether Detective Constable Dupuis had notes of the incident and asked him to check his notebook. Detective Constable Dupuis, not knowing the date of the contact, looked through his notebook several times before he found the entry, several days later, on February 12, 2001. The entry was dated June 15, 1998, and it was five lines long:

1054 Picked up Project Guardian tape from the [C-16s]
 [C-16's mother] stated that she had received a call from Perry Dunlop wanting to know how the investigation was proceeding.

This note had not been disclosed to the Crown prior to the trial and, as a result, was not disclosed to Mr. Leduc's defence lawyers. At the hearings, Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he would have given this entry to the Crown but simply missed it when he was preparing his will-state for the Crown brief. Detective Inspector Hall explained that when the officers prepare will-states for a Crown brief, they use a computer-generated sheet that lists all the relevant witness statements. As a result, it would have been “quite easy” for Detective Constable Dupuis to overlook the entry in his notes, because he did not attend C-16’s residence on June 15 to take a statement or gather evidence, and therefore there was no computer record of the note. Detective Inspector Hall explained that Detective Constable Dupuis would have to have had a conscious recollection of the incident or of making the note when preparing his will-state.

I accept that the failure of Detective Constable Dupuis to include his June 15 note in the material he provided to the Crown was inadvertent.

Further, both Detective Sergeant Hall and Detective Inspector Smith were aware of the contact between C-16’s mother and Constable Dunlop. Neither of them made a reference to this contact in their notes when they learned of it, nor did they note it when they discussed the incident with Constable Dunlop on July 23, 1998.

As I mentioned in the section “Interactions Between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop,” Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall were aware that Constable Dunlop was contacting a number of witnesses in the Project Truth cases. They should have been noting these contacts as they became aware of them, and they should have had a means of tracking Constable Dunlop’s exposure to their cases.

Documentation of the Contact Between Constable Perry Dunlop and C-16’s Mother

In fact, a number of documents in Project Truth’s possession mention the contacts between C-16’s mother and Constable Dunlop. As set out above, Detective Constable Dupuis had a note of the June 15, 1998 incident. The two conversations with C-16’s mother were also mentioned in notes disclosed by Constable Dunlop to Project Truth on March 14, 2000. Finally, in a will-state given to Project Truth in April 2000, Constable Dunlop made two references to his contacts with C-16’s mother. He refers to the May 8, 1998, conversation and to the July 23, 1998, meeting where Detective Inspector Smith, Detective Sergeant Hall, and Inspector Trew discussed his contacts with C-16’s mother. None of these had been disclosed to the defence prior to C-16’s mother’s testimony.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Brings Documents to Courthouse

Around 2:00 p.m. on February 7, Detective Inspector Hall came to the courthouse and met with Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin and Crowns Shelley Hallett and Christine Tier. He brought with him photocopies of the relevant portions of Constable Dunlop's will-state and notes, as well as a copy of his own notes of the July 23, 1998, meeting with Constable Dunlop.

These were provided to Crown Tier for disclosure purposes. At this point, Detective Inspector Hall did not have Detective Constable Dupuis' note of the June 15 contact, because Detective Constable Dupuis was not able to locate it until February 12, while working on disclosure requests from defence counsel.

Police and Crowns Meet With Defence Counsel

Shortly after the meeting between the officers and the Crowns, Detective Inspector Hall, Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis, Ms Hallett, and Ms Tier met with Mr. Leduc's defence lawyers, Steven Skurka and Philip Campbell. The defence counsel were given the material Detective Inspector Hall had brought with him to court. The officers felt that defence counsel were very critical of the police for not having disclosed this material earlier. Detective Inspector Hall, in particular, recalls defence counsel being very aggressive and accusatory. According to Detective Inspector Hall, defence counsel pointed out that as experienced police officers, they should have disclosed the Dunlop material as required by Stinchcombe, a Supreme Court of Canada case on disclosure obligations. Detective Inspector Hall said, "Mr. Skurka was very explicit about that and ... I got a dressing-down for not doing it."

Detective Constable Seguin and Detective Inspector Hall both testified that while defence counsel was questioning the police about not having disclosed this material, Ms Hallett said that she did not know anything about it before. Ms Hallett said something to the effect of, "This is news to me." Detective Inspector Hall interpreted this comment to mean that she did not have any knowledge about C-16's mother's contact with Constable Dunlop. He testified that he had difficulty understanding this comment, because he believed that Ms Hallett had gone through Constable Dunlop's will-state after Project Truth received it in April 2000, so he "couldn't see how she didn't know about that."

Detective Inspector Hall said that he did not tell defence counsel that Ms Hallett had been provided with the Dunlop material in April 2000 because he was not in court that morning and was unsure of what had been said. He also did not want to embarrass Ms Hallett in front of the defence lawyers. The officers left the meeting with the impression that defence counsel believed the police had not disclosed the Dunlop material to the Crown.

As will be discussed in Chapter 11, Ms Hallett acknowledged saying something like, "This is news to me," but testified that she was referring to the meeting between Detective Inspector Smith, Detective Sergeant Hall, and Constable Dunlop that took place on July 23, 1998, and not to the existence of the Dunlop material.

Police and Crowns Meet After Meeting With Defence Counsel

After the meeting with defence counsel, the officers and the Crowns had a discussion. Detective Inspector Hall told Ms Hallett that she did in fact have the Dunlop material in her possession, to which Ms Hallett said something to the effect of, “Yeah, yeah, yeah, I know.” Detective Inspector Hall interpreted this as an acknowledgment that what she had said earlier, in front of defence counsel, was inaccurate. According to Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Seguin, Detective Inspector Hall also told her that he could have raised that issue in front of the defence but chose to wait until they left. Ms Hallett, on the other hand, testified that Detective Inspector Hall never said anything about not wanting to embarrass her in front of defence counsel.

Detective Inspector Hall took the position when testifying at this Inquiry that Ms Hallett lied during the meeting with defence counsel on February 7, 2001. He acknowledged, however, that his notes of the meeting do not reflect that belief and that he did not confront Ms Hallett about this perceived lie.

Detective Inspector Hall was understandably upset by defence counsel’s accusation of wilful non-disclosure. It is clear to me that he felt Ms Hallett was attempting to deflect blame for the failure to disclose onto the OPP officers. In my view, however, Detective Inspector Hall’s belief was the result of a misunderstanding during the meeting with defence counsel as to what Ms Hallett was referring to when she said, “This is news to me.”

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Sends Copy of July 4, 2000, Letter to Shelley Hallett

Following this discussion, Detective Inspector Hall returned to the Long Sault Detachment and obtained a copy of a letter from Ms Hallett to Detective Constable Dupuis, dated July 4, 2000. The letter, among other things, explained that she would review the Dunlop materials in order to determine what needed to be disclosed in the Father Charles MacDonald case.

Detective Inspector Hall wrote on the letter, “Shelley, For your information,” and signed his name. He instructed Detective Constable Seguin to deliver the letter to Ms Hallett the next morning. In a will-state later provided to the York Regional Police on this matter, Detective Inspector Hall said that the purpose of delivering the letter to Ms Hallett was to remind her of its existence, as her files were probably in Toronto, and so she would be in possession of it, if required, for disclosure. Detective Inspector Hall said he also wanted to remind her of their previous conversation about the Dunlop material. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he picked that particular letter because it stated that Constable Dunlop had personally attended Ms Hallett’s office in Toronto and given her a copy of his will-state. According to the letter, Ms Hallett was reviewing the material for the Father MacDonald prosecution, not the Leduc matter. When questioned about this, Detective Inspector Hall replied, “if you see a name, you see a name,” meaning that he did not think that she would overlook the portions of the material that did not relate to the Father MacDonald case.

Detective Inspector Hall was of the opinion that this memo could be required for disclosure, although he never suggested this to Ms Hallett and he acknowledged that it would be her decision to disclose it. Detective Inspector Hall never explained to Crown Hallett why he sent her the letter.

On the morning of February 8, 2001, as per Detective Inspector Hall’s instructions, Detective Constable Seguin gave the copy of the July 4, 2000, letter to Ms Hallett. She attended the Project Truth office in the days following the delivery of this letter. She never asked Detective Inspector Hall why he sent it to her, and he did not ask her what she did with it. The letter was never discussed between them.

As will be discussed in Chapter 11, Ms Hallett did not know why the letter was sent to her but thought Detective Inspector Hall was trying to remind her that she was in possession of the Dunlop materials. In any event, Ms Hallett was of the view that as an internal communication between a Crown and a police officer, this was not the type of document that she would normally disclose.

As will be described below, the letter was not included in the disclosure package subsequently prepared by the Crown and the OPP. Detective Inspector Hall, however, provided a copy directly to defence counsel without informing Crown Hallett.

Defence Makes Several Disclosure Requests

Over the course of the next week, defence counsel made a number of disclosure requests of the Crown. The Project Truth officers assisted the Crown in fulfilling these requests. In a letter to Crown Hallett dated February 12, 2001, defence counsel requested two categories of disclosure. First, they asked for a detailed account from any officer with knowledge about Constable Dunlop’s contact with C-16’s mother. In this regard, they wrote:

It is clear to us that non-disclosure on this issue was willful rather than unwitting: Mr. Dunlop’s telephone call to [C-16’s mother] was of sufficient seriousness that Detective Dupuis raised the matter with his colleagues and superiors; reference to it was, however, omitted from his notes and willsay statements. The fact that OPP inspectors convened a meeting with Mr. Dunlop to broach the issue illustrates its importance to the investigators. We will require full disclosure from Inspector Smith and Inspector Hall. We would welcome clarification as to whether Detective Dupuis determined on his own initiative to omit reference to the matter from his notes and statements or whether he received directions from his superiors in that regard.

The second category of requested disclosure related to “information available to the police and Crown about the general investigative activities of Constable Perry Dunlop.” Detective Inspector Hall testified he interpreted this letter to mean that it required the disclosure of internal correspondence such as the July 4, 2000, letter from Ms Hallett to Detective Constable Dupuis. Yet at no time did Detective Inspector Hall discuss with Ms Hallett whether she should disclose the letter.

Detective Inspector Hall wrote a lengthy letter to Ms Hallett on February 15, 2001, in response to the February 12 letter from defence counsel. He stated:

I did not at any time willfully fail to make disclosure in this case. As you are aware, my position has always been that the Crown Attorney make disclosure, and the police provide the material for disclosure.

I did not at any time give any instructions to Detective Constable DUPUIS to withhold disclosure in relation to the [C-16's mother] conversation about her contact with Perry DUNLOP. In fact, in our meeting with defence counsel on 07 February 01, at the court house, I did not know at that time that Detective Constable DUPUIS had any notes of the conversation of 15 June 98.

Detective Inspector Hall also discussed the purpose of the July 23, 1998, meeting with Constable Dunlop and provided a detailed list of his contacts with Constable Dunlop.

The defence made further disclosure requests on February 14 and 15, 2001. One of the items requested in the February 15 letter from defence counsel was “[a]ny correspondence, notes, memos, letters or other records reporting to the Crown about issues related to Perry Dunlop, whether generally or before and after July 23, 1998” (emphasis in original).

Ms Hallett forwarded the February 15 letter from defence counsel to Detective Inspector Hall with a handwritten note requesting that “further efforts be made to follow through on items still outstanding.” In a memo she sent to a number of senior Crowns in March 2001, Ms Hallett wrote that she felt this would have been an additional opportunity for Detective Inspector Hall to include anything he wanted her to disclose, including her letter of July 4, 2000.

When asked why he did not raise the letter with Ms Hallett if he thought it should be disclosed, Detective Inspector Hall first replied, “I could have raised it with her, but ... based on the information I had from my supervisor, she was having some emotional problems and I wasn’t going to breach [sic] that with her.” In response to a suggestion that this was irrelevant and further questioning on the issue, he testified, “I didn’t think at that time it needed to be disclosed.” He explained that it was up to Crown Hallett to determine what to disclose. When pressed further, Detective Inspector Hall stated it was not apparent to him that the July 4, 2000, letter was not in the disclosure package. With respect to this last explanation, Detective Inspector Hall said he had delegated to his officers the responsibility to collect the outstanding items for disclosure.

Ms Hallett responded to defence counsel on February 16, 2001, and enclosed a number of materials. She copied Detective Inspector Hall so he was aware of what she was disclosing.

None of Detective Inspector Hall’s excuses strike me as particularly convincing. If he felt that the letter was relevant for disclosure, he had ample opportunity to share this opinion with Ms Hallett. It is clear he chose not to. In my view, he provided her with the July 4, 2000, letter as a means of reiterating the fact that she had the Dunlop materials and that, accordingly, the blame for non-disclosure should rest with the Crown, not the police. If Detective Inspector Hall felt this needed to be explained to defence counsel through disclosure of the letter, he should have made Ms Hallett aware of his views. If he felt that Crown Hallett was not sufficiently addressing his concerns, he should have raised the matter with his superiors, so that they could discuss the issue with Crown Hallett’s superiors, who could then direct her to take action.

At this time, the police were, understandably, distressed by the accusation of wilful non-disclosure levelled at them by defence counsel both in the meeting of February 7 and the letter of February 12. In the meetings between OPP and the Crown about disclosure, Detective Inspector Hall said there was no indication from Crown Hallett that she was intending to clear up these accusations against the police. Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he did not recall anyone explaining to him between February 7, 2001, and the stay of proceedings on March 1, 2001, the difference between inadvertent non-disclosure and deliberate non-disclosure or how the courts treat those concepts differently. As discussed in Chapter 11, Shelley Hallett testified that she did explain to the officers her strategy of arguing inadvertent disclosure. The perceptions of the parties obviously vary on this point.

What is clear is that the Crown and the OPP were not functioning as a team to address the defence’s accusation of wilful non-disclosure. They failed to develop a coordinated strategy to deal with this issue. Instead of openly and co-operatively dealing with a difficult situation, they let the lines of communication break down, which compounded any misunderstanding that initially existed.

Defence Brings Stay Application; Shelley Hallett Admits in Court to Having Dunlop Material

On February 14, 2001, defence counsel for Mr. Leduc declared their intention to bring a motion for a stay of proceedings on the basis of deliberate non-disclosure by the police:

The basis of our motion will be in brief, deliberate non-disclosure by one of the officers in charge of this case, Detective Constable Dupuis and several senior ranking police officers in the Project Truth investigation. It will be in the position of the defence on the motion, that these officers colluded and conspired to suppress all information in their possession relating to Perry Dunlop's participation in this case.

Ms Hallett made submissions to the Court in order to "contextualize" the application framed by defence counsel. She indicated that she too was surprised by the evidence of C-16's mother about her contact with Constable Dunlop. With respect to the entry in Detective Constable Dupuis' notebook that was not disclosed, she made these comments:

I would say, thousands of pages of both notebook entries and statements and the results of the investigation have been disclosed to the defence. However, one page of five lines with respect to this June 15th contact between [C-16's mother] and Constable Dunlop was not identified as something that should be handed over and I must say that, and there will be evidence I'm sure called on this next week obviously, that I have every confidence that, that omission was as a result of inadvertence by the investigation officer, Detective Dupuis and that there is no sinister or ulterior motive for not including that in all of the disclosure that has been provided in this case.

In these submissions, Crown Hallett is clearly defending the police, arguing that the non-disclosure was inadvertent. Ms Hallett also made submissions to the Court about the fact that she had received and reviewed the Dunlop material:

As I say, I perused these documents in a cursory way to satisfy myself, essentially, that they should be disclosed to defence counsel for Father MacDonald. However, because of my unawareness of any connection [between] Constable Dunlop and the witnesses for the Leduc matter, I did not pour [sic] over each document to see whether there was anything that would be relevant to Mr. Leduc's defence. And I take responsibility for that, however, as I say, by that point in time we had had the preliminary inquiry. There had been two judicial pre-trial conferences, there had been no suggestion to me as to what the defence was going to be. I had frankly anticipated a defence completely different than the one that I now have become aware, is being raised—a defence that was certainly something that I thought might be raised in this case and I obviously was wrong.

In these submissions, Ms Hallett took responsibility for the fact that she had reviewed the Dunlop materials and that she had not determined them to be relevant to the defence in the Leduc matter. If the Project Truth officers were not initially advised of the Crown strategy, it should have become evident to them at this point. Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin were both in court on this day and would have heard Crown Hallett's submissions. Detective Inspector Hall was not in court, and he does not recall speaking with Detective Constable Dupuis about what transpired.

According to Detective Inspector Hall, he first became aware of Crown Hallett's submissions to the Court that Detective Constable Dupuis' non-disclosure was inadvertent rather than wilful when he was cross-examined by Crown Hallett during the application for stay of proceedings on February 22, 2001. During her cross-examination, she outlined to the Court some of her submissions of February 14.

Stay Application Begins; OPP Officers Meet With Defence Counsel

The stay application began on February 19, 2001. As will be discussed in Chapter 11, because of the testimony of Richard Nadeau, Justice Colin McKinnon recused himself and Justice James Chadwick heard the stay application.

Retired Detective Inspector Smith was told by Detective Inspector Hall that he had to come to Cornwall on the Leduc matter and that he would be subpoenaed. Detective Inspector Smith arrived in Cornwall on February 19 and had dinner with Detective Inspector Hall and Ms Hallett. Detective Inspector Smith had never met her before, and they discussed the investigation and where the case was going. Detective Inspector Smith was not yet a witness on the stay application, but he had prepared a statement about his contacts with Constable Dunlop to be disclosed to the defence.

The next morning in court, Crown Hallett handed Detective Inspector Smith a subpoena to testify for the defence on the stay application. Ms Hallett did not know what the defence sought to ask him, and so Detective Inspector Smith, who knew defence counsel Steven Skurka from a previous trial, told Ms Hallett he was going to see Mr. Skurka to ask him what he wanted. Detective Inspector Smith testified that Ms Hallett responded, “well okay,” and he went to speak to defence counsel. There is a difference of opinion as to how the other officers came to accompany Detective Inspector Smith. What is clear is that Ms Hallett was aware that Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall and Detective Constable Dupuis went to speak with defence counsel. Although she thought this unusual, she did not object. Her recollection of what transpired will be discussed in Chapter 11.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that he went into a small office outside the hall and spoke to Mr. Skurka, who asked him if he had any notes pertaining to the discussion he had with Detective Constable Dupuis about the contact between Constable Dunlop and C-16’s mother. Detective Inspector Smith replied that he did not, but that he recalled vividly what had taken place. Mr. Skurka then gave Detective Inspector Smith his card, told him to send his expenses and told him that he might not be called as a witness. Detective Inspector Smith said this conversation took less than one minute. According to Detective Inspector Smith’s recollection, Detective Inspector Hall then came in, and a number of officers were speaking with defence counsel Phillip Campbell when Detective Inspector Smith left. Detective Inspector Smith said he did not know why Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Dupuis came to meet with the defence, or what transpired between them after he left.

According to Detective Inspector Hall, the three officers attended the meeting with defence counsel at the same time, although he does recall that Detective Inspector Smith left before he and Detective Constable Dupuis did. Although Detective Inspector Hall did not make contemporaneous notes of this meeting, an issue that will be discussed in further detail below, he set out his recollection of the meeting in a will-state he prepared several months later for the York Regional Police investigation into allegations that the Crown wilfully withheld disclosure in the Leduc matter:

The meeting lasted approximately 10 minutes. CAMPBELL, who it appeared would be directing questions to the writer the following morning asked specifically about the DUNLOP material in relation to his Will State and notes. He wanted to know when it was received and by whom, and when was Ms. HALLETT provided with the disclosure. He wanted to know if there was any correspondence in relation to the DUNLOP Will State and notes. The writer was aware from disclosure requested in the past weeks that correspondence relating to disclosure was requested from Defence Counsel. The writer indicated to CAMPBELL and SKURKA that there was correspondence on file at our office from Ms. HALLETT in that regard and was surprised that they did not have it. They requested to have a copy that day before court. The correspondence that the writer was referring to was a memorandum directed to D/Constable DUPUIS with a c.c. to the writer dated 04 JUL 00. The same memorandum that was provided to Ms. HALLETT on 08 FEB 00 [sic], with the writer's note written on it. Defence Counsel were staying at NAVCAN and provided telephone and fax number.

Detective Inspector Hall does not believe Detective Inspector Smith was present when they were discussing the July 4, 2000, letter.

Detective Constable Dupuis, at Detective Inspector Hall's request, provided defence counsel with a copy of the July 4, 2000, letter later that day, February 20. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not know he was going to give the letter to defence counsel until they asked him that day whether there was any correspondence relating to the Dunlop materials. Detective Inspector Hall never advised Ms Hallett that he was going to provide a copy of that letter to the defence.

Detective Constable Dupuis had never been in a meeting with defence counsel without a Crown attorney present. Although Detective Inspector Hall had met with defence lawyers without a Crown attorney present, he acknowledged that following such meetings he would inform the Crown about what was discussed. He agreed that it is important to fully brief the Crown about these discussions.

Although it may be unusual, there is nothing wrong with police officers meeting with defence counsel without a Crown attorney present in a situation, such as this, where the officers are to be called as witnesses for the defence. There is no property in witnesses. However, if matters such as disclosure are discussed, it is imperative that the Crown be informed.

Accordingly, I find that Detective Inspector Hall failed in his professional duties by providing documentation directly to defence counsel without consulting the Crown attorney and by failing to advise the Crown that such disclosure had been made. As I have said before in this Report, disclosure is solely within the purview of the Crown. If Detective Inspector Hall felt that the letter should be disclosed in light of what he would be asked on the stand the next day, he should have brought this to Ms Hallett's attention. Had he done so, he likely would have learned that Ms Hallett had acknowledged in court on February 14 that she had reviewed the Dunlop materials and accepted responsibility for the shortcomings in disclosure.

I reiterate the point that if Detective Inspector Hall had a concern with Crown Hallett's approach after raising the matter with her, or if he felt that he could not have raised the matter with her, he should have brought the issue to the attention of his superiors so that they could discuss it with her superiors.

Discussions With Shelley Hallett After the Meeting

According to Detective Inspector Hall, following the meeting with defence counsel, the officers returned to where Ms Hallett was gathering up her material, and he advised her that the defence was inquiring about the Dunlop disclosure and was going to direct questions specifically about when it was received, when it was disclosed, and any correspondence relating to it. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he also told her that Mr. Skurka had said they might not need to call Detective Inspector Smith as a witness. Detective Inspector Hall did not tell Ms Hallett about the intention to give the July 4, 2000, letter to the defence.

Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall were scheduled to meet with Ms Hallett after lunch. According to Detective Inspector Hall, Ms Hallett was late arriving for the meeting and when she did arrive, Detective Inspector Hall did not stay. Rather, he told her that he was going home to take his wife out to dinner for their anniversary and would see her in court the next morning. Detective Inspector Hall then went to the Long Sault Detachment to obtain a copy of the letter he says was requested by defence counsel. Detective Inspector Hall did not tell Ms Hallett he was going to retrieve this correspondence to give it to defence counsel. Detective Inspector Hall explained that he did not want to "push any buttons" or get in a verbal altercation with Ms Hallett: "So I was just going to do what I was going to do"—that is, give disclosure directly to the defence without telling the Crown.

Detective Inspector Smith met with Ms Hallett for approximately two hours, during which time they went through his notes. He left around 4:00 p.m. and returned home. At the time, Detective Inspector Smith lived just over 200 kilometres from Cornwall. He did not stay because he did not think he was needed at the stay application given what Mr. Skurka had said to him.

July 4, 2000, Letter Is Disclosed to the Defence Without Crown's Knowledge

Detective Inspector Hall could not find a copy of the July 4, 2000, letter at the Long Sault Detachment, so he called Detective Constable Dupuis, who also could not find the letter. Detective Inspector Hall instructed him to obtain a copy from Ms Hallett and take it to defence counsel. He did not instruct Detective Constable Dupuis to advise Crown Hallett why he needed the letter.

Detective Constable Dupuis, accompanied by Detective Constable Seguin, went to Ms Hallett's hotel room and asked her for a copy of the letter, explaining that they could not find their copy. Detective Inspector Smith was meeting with Ms Hallett at the time. Ms Hallett gave the letter to Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin and they left. They did not advise Crown Hallett that they intended to provide this document to defence counsel. Detective Constable Dupuis thought she knew this was the intention, as he assumed Detective Inspector Hall had discussed it with her. The officers made a copy of the document and returned Ms Hallett's copy to her. They then turned over the letter to defence counsel.

Detective Constable Dupuis acknowledged that the direct delivery of a document by a police officer to defence counsel was a highly unusual occurrence unless it is done pursuant to Crown instruction. Detective Constable Dupuis also thought it was unusual because of the sense of urgency involved: "It was, 'Hurry up and get it to Mr. Campbell.'"

Detective Inspector Hall acknowledged that it was entirely his decision to disclose the document to defence counsel and said that it was unfortunate that his officers had to get involved. He did not seek any advice from his superiors or colleagues about whether to disclose the letter to the defence.

Detective Inspector Hall agreed that it is not the role of police officers to provide disclosure but rather the role of the Crown, and that he has never in his vast experience as a police officer made disclosure as he did in this case. He explained, however, that he felt this was an "unusual situation" because "in my entire career I never had a Crown attorney lie to me in front of defence counsel." According to Detective Inspector Hall, the primary reason he turned the document over to defence counsel was because he was going to be questioned under oath the next morning. He thought giving the document directly to the defence without going through the Crown was the appropriate thing to do because he believed Crown Hallett had lied to defence counsel on February 7, 2001.

During his testimony, Detective Inspector Hall frequently said that he felt Ms Hallett should have said to defence counsel on February 7 what she did to the Court on February 14—that is, she should have admitted that she had received the Dunlop material. Detective Inspector Hall acknowledged that in hindsight he could have advised Ms Hallett that he was giving the letter to the defence. When pressed as to why he did what he did, Detective Inspector Hall responded: "I wasn't worried about the OPP; I was worried about me ... I wanted to make it clear to the defence that the police didn't fail to disclose."

It is clear to me that Detective Inspector Hall was so focused on the accusations made against him, he lost sight of his professional duties and the ultimate goal of successfully bringing the matter to a trial on the merits. Even years later, in his evidence at this Inquiry, Detective Inspector Hall did not admit that he had done anything wrong, nor did he acknowledge the consequences of his actions.

The fact is, the Project Truth investigators did inadvertently fail to disclose their knowledge of contacts between Constable Dunlop and C-16's mother, and the Crown inadvertently failed to disclose the relevant notes and will-state from Constable Dunlop to Mr. Leduc's defence counsel. Although it could have prevented a misunderstanding with Detective Inspector Hall, an acknowledgment by Ms Hallett in the February 7 meeting that she had reviewed the Dunlop materials would not have changed the fact that the materials had not been disclosed.

Moreover, Detective Inspector Hall decided to disclose the letter directly to the defence, after Ms Hallett had admitted in open court that she had reviewed the Dunlop material. Ms Hallett's "lie" was the key motivation for Detective Inspector Hall's actions, yet he did not bother to check whether his concern had been corrected before making his own disclosure decisions.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall's Notes

Before turning to what transpired after the disclosure of the letter, I want to comment on the fact that Detective Inspector Hall did not take any contemporaneous notes of the meeting with defence counsel in the courthouse on February 20. Detective Inspector Hall took meticulous and detailed notes over the entire course of Project Truth. In fact, twenty-one of his notebooks spanning a seven-year period were entered in evidence at this Inquiry. Detective Inspector Hall testified that his normal practice was to write notes of anything of significance before going off duty. On February 20, however, Detective Inspector Hall made no notes of his meeting with defence counsel, although he made notes of other events that day. He did write extensive notes about the meeting one week later, on February 27, 2001.

Detective Inspector Hall's explanation for this anomaly was that "it was an unusual day." When asked why he wrote the notes later, Detective Inspector Hall explained that there was some information he did not have until February 27, such as what transpired during the meeting between Ms Hallett and Detective Inspector Smith in the afternoon on February 20.

I am puzzled by this response, as the purpose of writing notes each day is to record anything of significance observed on that day. It appears to me that by February 27, Detective Inspector Hall had become aware of the ramifications of the meeting and, accordingly, wished to record his version of events.

Stay Application Proceeds Before Justice James Chadwick

On February 21, 2001, the stay application proceeded before Justice Chadwick. Detective Inspector Hall commenced his testimony that day. That evening James Stewart, the Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, came to Cornwall to have dinner with Crowns Hallett and Tier. This is discussed in further detail in Chapter 11. I note here that Detective Inspector Hall was present at the restaurant, stopped by their table, and engaged in conversation. If Detective Inspector Hall had any concerns about the July 4, 2000, letter and whether it should be disclosed, he had an opportunity at this time to speak with Mr. Stewart.

Detective Inspector Hall continued his testimony on February 22, 2001. As I discuss in Chapter 11, during Ms Hallett's cross-examination of the officers, she attempted to show the Court that Detective Constable Dupuis' failure to disclose his notes of the June 15, 1998, incident was inadvertent.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Meets With Defence Counsel Again

Detective Inspector Hall's testimony finished the morning of February 22, 2001, and was followed by Detective Constable Dupuis. After the lunch recess, Detective Inspector Hall was recalled to the witness stand by defence counsel. At the outset of this "second round" of testimony, Detective Inspector Hall was asked to confirm that he and Detective Constable Seguin met with defence counsel over that lunch break, during which the lawyers asked him questions about the July 4, 2000, letter. This lunch meeting had taken place without the knowledge of the Crown. Detective Inspector Hall explained at this Inquiry that he had no difficulty meeting with defence counsel because they were just asking him for more information about the July 4, 2000, letter. As described in Chapter 11, during this second round of testimony Detective Inspector Hall was then asked about providing a copy of the letter to Ms Hallett on February 8, 2001, and whether the purpose of doing so was so that she could disclose it.

Ms Hallett again cross-examined Detective Inspector Hall. She asked him if he had been present in court on February 14, 2001, and she reiterated much of what she had said to the Court on that day about having received and reviewed the Dunlop materials. Detective Inspector Hall said he was not aware of what Ms Hallett told the Court on February 14 until this cross-examination.

Final Submissions on the Stay Application; Shelley Hallett Is Upset With Detective Inspector Pat Hall

Following the completion of the stay application on February 26, 2001, Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin met with Crowns Hallett and Tier. Both Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin's notes indicate that Ms Hallett was upset with Detective Inspector Hall for having gone “behind her back” to give the July 4, 2000, letter to the defence. It appeared to the officers that she had not been aware that the letter had been given to the defence. Ms Hallett’s reaction is further described in Chapter 11.

Following this meeting, Detective Constable Dupuis contacted Detective Inspector Hall and advised him of some of the comments made by Ms Hallett, including the fact that she held Detective Inspector Hall responsible for giving the July 4 letter to the defence and that she believed he had done so because she was a woman. Despite this, Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not feel that his relationship with Ms Hallett had broken down at this point.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Speaks With James Stewart About Shelley Hallett

The next day, after hearing about Ms Hallett’s comments from his officers, Detective Inspector Hall contacted Mr. Stewart. He told Mr. Stewart that he did not think that Ms Hallett could handle the Father MacDonald case because she “didn’t have it to be a front line Crown” and suggested that Crown Robert Pelletier be assigned to the case. Detective Inspector Hall advised Mr. Stewart that Ms Hallett had previously indicated that she did not want to do the Father MacDonald case.

Stay Granted

On March 1, 2001, Justice Chadwick granted the stay of proceedings. Justice Chadwick found that the July 4, 2000, letter showed that the Crown had reviewed the Dunlop materials in more than just a cursory manner. He determined that the materials should have been disclosed and that the Crown’s failure to do so was wilful:

These materials should have been disclosed. I can only conclude that the holding back of the July 4th, 2000 letter and the Dunlop notes and will say statements, which had been reviewed in depth by the Crown, show that the Crown did not want the portal to open to make Dunlop’s evidence relevant to the Leduc case. I find the failure to disclose by the Crown was willful.

Detective Inspector Hall acknowledged that it appeared that the July 4, 2000, letter and the fact that it was disclosed by the police rather than the Crown were relevant to Justice Chadwick. In fact, in the Ontario Court of Appeal decision that overturned Justice Chadwick’s decision, the Court found that the July 4 letter, both its contents and the circumstances of its disclosure, were the “crucial plank” on which Justice Chadwick’s findings rested. It is sufficient to note here that the Court of Appeal went on to find that “not only did Ms Hallett not suppress the letter, she had no reason to disclose it.” As to whether in hindsight Detective Inspector Hall should have advised Ms Hallett about what he intended to do with the July 4, 2000, letter, he said, “Well, I think, in hindsight, both her and I could have did things differently.” He agreed that one of the things he could have done differently was talk to Ms Hallett about what he was doing.

As I have mentioned above, Detective Inspector Hall’s belief that Ms Hallett lied to defence counsel was the result of a misunderstanding. However, even if Detective Inspector Hall was justified in his view that Ms Hallett was less than candid in the meeting, his response (in the form of disclosing the letter directly to defence counsel) was unnecessary and unprofessional. It was also irresponsible and, in my view, ultimately contributed to the stay of proceedings in this case. If Detective Inspector Hall was concerned that Ms Hallett had been dishonest with defence counsel, he should have confronted Ms Hallett directly or taken his concerns to a superior rather than take action which he should have known would jeopardize the case.

Crown Shelley Hallett No Longer Assigned to Project Truth Cases

On March 8, 2001, Detective Inspector Hall met with Mr. Stewart to discuss the Project Truth files that were assigned to Ms Hallett, as she would no longer be involved in Project Truth matters. According to Detective Inspector Hall, he tried to discuss the events that took place on February 7, 2001, with Mr. Stewart, but he “didn’t want to deal with it.” Detective Inspector Hall testified that he showed Mr. Stewart the February 12, 2001, letter from defence counsel in which they accused the police of failing to make disclosure. Detective Inspector Hall said that Mr. Stewart just looked at it and gave it back: “[H]e didn’t want to enter any discussions about it at all.”

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Writes E-mail to James Stewart

On April 3, 2001, Detective Inspector Hall sent an e-mail to Mr. Stewart. The e-mail was predominantly about the nine boxes of Dunlop materials and the issue of Constable Dunlop having a privacy interest in those materials. At the end of the e-mail, however, Detective Inspector Hall made the following comments:

What disturbs me most is Ms. HALLETT not being truthful with SKURKA & CAMPBELL on FEB 07, 01 when the [sic] first asked about the DUNLOP material in light of the fact that on JAN

[illegible] 01³⁵ I had a telephone conversation with Ms. HALLETT when she asked me about the DUNLOP involvement in the LEDUC matter and how the initial complaint came in. None of us knew about the 5 lines in DUPUIS note book at that time. SHE certainly knew DUNLOP made notes and his will say entry on the [C-16's mother] conversations.

When Detective Inspector Hall wrote this e-mail he was aware that Ms Hallett was no longer working on Project Truth cases. According to Detective Inspector Hall, he wrote the comment about Ms Hallett because he was still concerned about the issue. He said there were several media articles saying that the police stabbed the Crown attorney in the back. This e-mail, and particularly its allegation that Ms Hallett was aware of Constable Dunlop's involvement in the Jacques Leduc case in January 2001, is discussed in further detail in Chapter 11.

After receiving Detective Inspector Hall's e-mail, Mr. Stewart discussed the matter with other senior Ministry officials and on May 16, 2001, the Attorney General's Office forwarded the information to the York Regional Police. As a result, the York Regional Police initiated an investigation "to determine if Crown Attorney Hallett willfully failed to disclose relevant materials provided by Constable Perry Dunlop to Defence in relation to R vs. Leduc."

Project Truth Officers Interviewed by York Regional Police

Detective Constables Dupuis and Genier and retired Detective Inspector Smith all gave statements to the York Regional Police. Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Seguin provided written will-states in lieu of an interview. According to Detective Inspector Hall, he did not refuse to be interviewed. When Inspector Denis Mulholland and Detective Sergeant Denise LaBarge of the York Regional Police came to his office on May 17, 2001, wanting to conduct an audiotaped interview, Detective Inspector Hall requested time to prepare a written statement given the complexity of the case.

In addition to outlining events in the Jacques Leduc case, Detective Inspector Hall's will-state raises a host of other issues, such as the delay in the legal opinions Crown Hallett was to provide in other Project Truth matters, difficulties he had in contacting her, and their differences of opinion regarding the arrest of another suspect and her transfer of the Dunlop boxes from the CPS to the OPP office. Detective Constable Seguin also included unrelated matters in his will-state. In particular, he noted her being late and her "over-interviewing" of witnesses.

35. Detective Inspector Hall's will-state to the York Regional Police states that the conversation occurred on January 9, 2001.

In my opinion, these matters were extraneous and irrelevant to the matter the York Regional Police was investigating, and there was no need for the officers to include them in their will-states. Nor was there any need for the York Regional Police to enquire into these matters.

Despite the concerns he outlined, Detective Constable Seguin testified that he thought Ms Hallett was an experienced and dedicated prosecutor who took the Jacques Leduc case seriously.

York Regional Police Conclude No Basis for Criminal Charges Against Shelley Hallett

The York Regional Police concluded that the e-mail sent by Detective Inspector Hall to Mr. Stewart was the result of frustration over several concerns and that nobody interviewed, including Detective Inspector Hall, believed Crown Hallett had intentionally withheld information from the defence. As a result, the investigative team concluded that there was no basis for criminal charges against Ms Hallett for the wilful non-disclosure of material to the defence in the Jacques Leduc matter.

Appeal of Stay of Proceedings

Justice Chadwick's decision to stay the proceedings in R. v. Leduc was appealed by the Crown in 2001 and overturned by the Court of Appeal in July 2003. The Supreme Court of Canada denied Mr. Leduc's request for leave to appeal in January 2004. The Court of Appeal's decision and the second trial of Mr. Leduc, which ended in a stay of proceedings, are discussed fully in Chapter 11. Two incidents occurred during this time that involved the OPP.

Jacques Leduc's Wife Contacts C-22

While Justice Chadwick's decision was pending appeal, Jacques Leduc's wife contacted C-22 and asked him to meet her at noon on August 9, 2001, at a particular intersection. On August 8, 2001, Detective Constable Dupuis received a call from a friend of C-22 who advised him of this fact. She had concerns about the meeting and had requested that C-22 not attend. Detective Constable Dupuis called Detective Inspector Hall and they discussed the implications of Mr. Leduc's wife meeting with C-22 to talk about his allegations. Detective Constable Dupuis then spoke with C-22, who expressed concerns for his safety and said there was no reason provided for the meeting. Detective Constable Dupuis told C-22 he could not stop him from going to the meeting, but asked C-22 not to attend. Detective Constable Dupuis told C-22 that meeting with Mr. Leduc's wife could cause issues at a new trial if the appeal was successful.

The next day, Detective Constables Dupuis, Genier, and Seguin set up surveillance at the specified corner to see if the meeting would take place. Ms Leduc arrived, but C-22 did not. The officers followed her back to her residence but did not speak to her. Later that day, Detective Constable Dupuis contacted C-22, who said that he did not show up for the meeting and had not received any other calls from Ms Leduc.

Detective Constable Dupuis testified that the officers were “confused” as to why Ms Leduc wanted to meet with C-22. He does not recall advising a Crown attorney about this incident.

This was certainly questionable behaviour from the wife of a suspect, particularly in light of the fact that one of the conditions of Mr. Leduc’s release after his arrest was that he not communicate with the complainants. Ms Leduc’s contact with C-22 could be seen as a violation of the conditions of release if she was attempting to speak to C-22 on Mr. Leduc’s behalf. Her attempt to contact C-22 may also have been an attempt to obstruct justice, depending on what she planned to say to him. In my view, the OPP should have taken the opportunity to question Ms Leduc about her actions and her motives. The officers also should have informed the responsible Crown prosecutor of this incident in the event that it came up at a new trial.

Disclosure Motion in Second Trial of Jacques Leduc

Detective Constable Seguin was the officer assigned to the second trial of Mr. Leduc and assisted the Crown, Lidia Narozniak, in preparing for trial. Detective Constable Seguin was present during the defence motion for disclosure of all relevant notes and materials from Mr. Dunlop and Carson Chisholm, which was heard over several days in August 2004 and September 2004.

On September 13, 2004, Justice Plantana issued an order of production for Mr. Dunlop to produce all material in his possession or control relating to this matter.

Perry Dunlop Served With Production Order

On September 27, 2004, Detective Constables Seguin and Genier attended at Perry Dunlop’s home in British Columbia to serve the production order.

Detective Constable Seguin had been instructed by Detective Inspector Colleen McQuade to serve Mr. Dunlop with the production order personally. The officers arrived, in suit and tie, at the Dunlop home around 7:00 a.m. Detective Constable Seguin testified that they went early because he knew Perry Dunlop worked in construction, and so his workday could start very early. He wanted to get there before Mr. Dunlop left for the day. Detective Constable Seguin did not recall seeing any children. Detective Constable Seguin handed him the document and explained what it was, and the officers left the Dunlops' property within ten minutes.

According to Detective Constable Seguin, Mr. Dunlop knew he was going to be served with the production order because Detective Constable Seguin had explained the document to him over the telephone twelve days earlier. This is confirmed by an entry in Detective Constable Seguin's notes on September 15, 2004:

1023 Contacted Perry Dunlop at [phone number]

Advised him of Production Order for any materials in his possession and /or control + that it would be served sometime next week. Call was a heads-up so that he had time to put it together. Also reminded him of info he said in Court that he'd look for it.

No fax avail for him.

Due 30th Sept.

At this Inquiry, Helen Dunlop testified that she was upset that the police officers came to their residence unannounced and felt they were there to "intimidate and harass" the Dunlop family. She thought they could have sent the production order by fax and that it was unnecessary for them to come in person. Following this visit by the OPP officers, the Dunlops' lawyer, Yvonne Pink, wrote a letter to Chief Superintendent Frank Ryder explaining how the Dunlops felt about the incident. The letter reads, in part:

The constables' untimely arrival at the Dunlop residence, before their children had left for school, was completely and utterly insensitive and unleashed a series of painful and frantic reactions from my clients' three young daughters. It is next to impossible to adequately express the flashbacks of fear and terror these children experienced on the morning of September 27th. The Dunlop family left Cornwall, Ontario more than four years ago to remove themselves from such harassment. They sought refuge on Vancouver Island to live a quiet family life and to begin healing the wounds caused by years of humiliation, harassment and threats as a result of these investigations.

...

What was the point of this unannounced visit? On whose authority did the constables travel to Vancouver Island? Neither constable offered up any such explanation on the morning of September 27th. Instead, my clients were left with an overwhelming sense that one or possibly two things were going to happen on or about October 1, 2004: a search warrant would be executed at their home and/or Mr. Dunlop would be arrested. The constables indicated they would be in “town for a week.” Nothing was said by either of them to assure or dissuade my clients from either of these possible actions.

The response from Chief Superintendent Ryder, addressed to the Dunlops’ lawyer, was brief:

I am in receipt of your letter dated 25 October, 2004. Please be advised that in future you will be contacted if we require anything further with respect to your clients, Mr. Perry DUNLOP and Mrs. Helen DUNLOP.

Helen Dunlop testified that they did not receive answers to any of the questions they asked in their letter.

It is unfortunate that the Dunlop family was upset by the arrival of Detective Constables Seguin and Genier. I believe the officers could have lessened the family’s discomfort by pre-arranging a time to attend at the home. However, aside from not extending that courtesy, I do not believe Detective Constables Seguin and Genier did anything wrong. They provided Mr. Dunlop with advance notice that they would be serving him with the production order, explained what was required of him, and were at the Dunlop residence for only a short time.

As will be discussed in Chapter 11, the charges against Mr. Leduc were stayed in October 2004 on the basis of delay.

Investigations Relating to the Cornwall Classical College

For many years the Cornwall Classical College (Collège classique de Cornwall) was the subject of rumours regarding the sexual abuse of young people. The most sensational claim was that a pedophile ring operated out of Classical College. The alleged abusers were priests at the school as well as other individuals who had a close connection to these priests or to the College. Classical College shut down in the late 1960s and was purchased by St. Lawrence College.

Classical College was operated by Les Clercs de Saint-Viateur, a religious order based in Montreal. Given that Classical College has been closed for approximately forty years, and that Les Clercs de Saint-Viateur no longer operate in Ontario, the institutional response of the Classical College is not within my mandate. However, it does fall within my purview to analyze how public institutions such as the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) responded to allegations and rumours of abuse occurring at Classical College.

At the very outset of Project Truth a number of individuals reported allegations of abuse at Classical College.

C-102's Allegations

On July 28, 1997, Detective Constable Steve Seguin spoke to C-102, who reported that when he was five years old, he was sexually abused at the Classical College by a man who he believed was a science teacher from the school. One of the officers noted in the Case Manager Assignment Register that because the suspect was middle-aged at the time of the abuse, he was possibly deceased. Detective Constable Seguin took a statement from C-102 on November 4, 1997. I have seen no evidence to indicate whether this suspect was eventually identified.

C-103's Allegations

Detective Constable Seguin received another complaint about Classical College on August 6, 1997. C-103 alleged that he had been sexually and physically assaulted by a brother or priest at the school. C-103 was not interviewed until November 2, 1998. Detective Constable Seguin attributed this delay to the fact that C-103 did not have a phone and so the officers had to leave messages for him with his mother, who lived half an hour away. At the time of his interview, C-103 was unable to name the person who allegedly abused him, but gave the officers his title and a physical description. In August 2000, C-103 contacted Detective Constable Dupuis and informed him that he had figured out that the person who had allegedly sexually abused him was Father Henri Legault. Father Legault died in 1985.

Richard Nadeau's Allegations

Project Truth received a third complaint of abuse at Classical College from Richard Nadeau. Mr. Nadeau was interviewed on November 14, 1997, and alleged that while he was a student at Classical College he had been abused by Father Hector Côté. Project Truth discovered that Father Côté had died in 1981.

Allegations Against Father Jean Primeau

On April 8, 1999, Project Truth was contacted by C-104 who alleged that he had been sexually abused by Father Jean Primeau and physically assaulted by two other priests at Classical College while he was a student there. Detective Constables Seguin and Don Genier interviewed C-104 and took a copy of a handwritten statement that C-104 had prepared about the abuse.

C-104 had met with Constable Perry Dunlop the previous day and disclosed this abuse to him. According to Constable Dunlop's will-state, he taped the interview but did not take a statement, and the tape was provided to Project Truth. C-104 told Detective Constables Genier and Seguin about this interview with Constable Dunlop.

A Crown brief was submitted to Crown Shelley Hallett on August 6, 1999. Father Primeau died on November 8, 1999. Crown Hallett testified that she read the brief but did not have time to write a written opinion before Father Primeau's death. However, Detective Inspector Pat Hall's notes show that he told Bishop Eugène LaRocque that Project Truth had received an opinion recommending that charges be laid, but had not set a charge date because they were looking into Father Primeau's health issues.

Notwithstanding this discrepancy, what is clear is that Father Primeau died before any charges could be laid.

Allegations About a "Pedophile Ring" at Classical College

Project Truth obtained some interesting information about Classical College when Detective Constable Dupuis interviewed Ron Wilson, a former Cornwall Police Service (CPS) officer, on July 28, 1999. When asked if he had knowledge about a pedophile ring in Cornwall, Mr. Wilson stated:

There was no doubt in my mind, in 1967, in the Cornwall Arena [sic], and what have you ah, from my knowledge, that there was ah, a ring running out of the ah, Classical College at the time. But not in the, in this modern day.

Mr. Wilson also mentioned there was a large investigation conducted by the Cornwall police into Classical College around 1967. According to Mr. Wilson, the investigation focused on Father Paul Lapierre and Father Donald Scott. Father Scott was a former student of the College. Father Lapierre did not work at the College, and his connection to it is unknown. Unfortunately, Mr. Wilson did not testify before this Inquiry. He was excused due to medical reasons.

On August 9, 1999, Detective Constable Dupuis spoke with Inspector Richard Trew at the CPS and requested the archival files surrounding Father Donald Scott, circa 1967. Inspector Trew said that he did not think the files went that far back but he would check. Detective Constable Dupuis told him not to worry about it because Father Scott was dead and he would get back to Inspector Trew if he needed the files at a later time. Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he did not recall doing any other follow-up on the information provided by Mr. Wilson.

Detective Inspector Hall testified he believed that Detective Constable Genier made some efforts to obtain these records from the CPS but said they could not get records that old. Detective Constable Seguin testified that he did not recall whether he followed up with the CPS about its investigation.

Linkages Between Project Truth Investigation and Classical College

As the Project Truth investigation moved forward, the officers became aware that some of the other individuals under investigation had links or alleged links to Classical College. For example, in the information provided to them by the Bishop, they learned that Fathers Romeo Major and Donald Scott had been students there.

In the year 2000, Project Truth became aware of a website called www.project-truth.com. Richard Nadeau posted a list of individuals on this website who he claimed were “priests at the college, associates or graduates from the college.” He did not specify the exact nature of the connections.

The list included a number of individuals who had been charged or investigated by Project Truth, including Fathers Lapierre, Scott, Primeau, Major, and Kenneth Martin. It also included Jacques Leduc.

Mr. Leduc was in fact a former student of the college, as were Ken Seguin and Nelson Barque.

I am not suggesting that these linkages are necessarily meaningful, but they certainly merited further exploration by the OPP. These connections also may have contributed to the rumours that existed about the school.

On the website, Mr. Nadeau speculated that a pedophile network began operating in Cornwall in the 1950s and that it began with Classical College.

Evaluation of Investigation of Classical College

The Project Truth officers were aware that there were serious allegations linked to Classical College and took a number of investigative steps in relation to this matter. Detective Sergeant Hall asked Bishop LaRocque for information about Father Primeau and Classical College. In a letter dated November 26, 1998, Detective Sergeant Hall made a general request to the Bishop for a list of students from Classical College as well as “information and photographs of staff” at Classical College during particular periods. The Bishop replied that this information was never in the possession of the Diocese, but gave Detective Sergeant Hall the name and address of the person to contact for these records.

Detective Constables Seguin and Genier obtained documents from the archivist of Les Clercs de Saint-Viateur relating to Classical College and Father Primeau in September 1999.

The officers also obtained the names of former students from some of the victims who came forward, and attempted to interview them.

Classical College was entered in Project Truth's ACCESS tracking system, and the Association Report allowed the officers to see which witnesses, victims, and suspects had a link with Classical College. However, this document only lists twelve names associated to Classical College, and it did not identify some of the individuals whose link to the school I have mentioned above, such as Mr. Seguin, Mr. Leduc, Mr. Barque, Father Major, and Father Scott. I am not aware whether the Project Truth officers knew of all of these connections at the time. However, these omissions indicate that there was not an extensive effort put into understanding all of the connections between the persons of interest to the investigation and the Classical College.

This said, after reviewing the evidence, it appears obvious to me that Project Truth performed substantial work on the allegations they received about Classical College, particularly in relation to C-104's complaints. However, it does not appear that they investigated Classical College itself in any systematic fashion. When Detective Constable Seguin was asked if there was ever a discussion at Project Truth about whether to look at Classical College as an institution, he replied:

Well, like I said, I think Don Genier had a file started on that or going on that. I don't know where he would have went with it, with all the people being deceased that we looked at. Everyone that I'm aware of, the alleged suspect was deceased.

In my view, there are at least two reasons the officers might have wished to pursue the matter further. First, Project Truth could have looked at Classical College as part of the conspiracy investigation to determine whether Classical College was the "haven" of the pedophile ring, as Mr. Nadeau claimed.

Second, further investigation might have revealed a significant number of victims. I heard testimony from Dr. Peter Jaffe that historically, institutions sometimes turned a blind eye to child sexual abuse. Where that happened a perpetrator might have felt he was "beyond reproach" and therefore was likely to continue to abuse children.

One of the difficulties of investigating allegations of historical sexual abuse is getting victims to come forward. Detective Wendy Leaver testified that making phone calls and knocking on doors is not the most effective approach. Where the allegation relates to an institution, like a school, it may be more helpful to use records to contact former students by letter, inform them of the investigation, and ask them to contact the police if they have any information. This way,

Detective Leaver stated, “potential victims get an opportunity to open up, to read it and make a decision.”

However, given the particular circumstances, there are also several reasons why it may not have been in the public interest for Project Truth to further investigate Classical College: the College was no longer operating; many of its priests and brothers had died or were very ill and therefore difficult to prosecute; and, given the passage of time, it would have been difficult to find former students. A full-scale investigation of Classical College would have required significant resources and might not have resulted in many charges. As already mentioned, resources for Project Truth were limited, and a broader investigation of the Classical College might have reduced resources available for other investigations. Moreover, a strategic decision had been made to investigate allegations that came to Project Truth, but not to actively seek out victims.

Although ideally the situation at Classical College should have been fully and thoroughly investigated, for the reasons set out above, the case-specific approach taken by Project Truth was not unreasonable. This said, further work should have been done to understand the connections between the various persons under investigation, both generally and in relation to Classical College. I explore Project Truth’s failure to conduct a proper linkage analysis more generally at the end of this chapter.

Investigation of Malcolm MacDonald for Sexual Abuse

Cornwall lawyer Malcolm MacDonald had many ties to the allegations investigated by Project Truth. He was a central figure in the Fantino Brief. Statements in the brief contained numerous allegations of abuse perpetrated by him; he was allegedly a member of the “clan” of pedophiles, and his cottage on Stanley Island was allegedly a central meeting place for members of the “clan.” Ron Leroux claimed that the cottage was the location of a “VIP meeting” just prior to the illegal settlement agreement made with David Silmser. Moreover, Mr. MacDonald represented Father Charles MacDonald in the settlement, and he had pleaded guilty to attempting to obstruct justice in relation to that matter in 1995. Detective Inspector Tim Smith also would have been aware, from his 1994 investigation, that Mr. MacDonald was linked to Ken Seguin and Father MacDonald as both a lawyer and a friend. Detective Inspector Smith was aware of rumours circulating prior to Project Truth that Mr. MacDonald “liked boys.” In addition, Mr. MacDonald was alleged to have made death threats against Constable Perry Dunlop and his family.

Accordingly, Project Truth investigated Mr. MacDonald both as an alleged perpetrator of sexual abuse and as part of its death threats and conspiracy investigations. The officers investigated sexual assault complaints made by three individuals against Mr. MacDonald, and he was arrested and charged in relation to two of the complaints. He died before he could be tried for these offences.

Allegations of Abuse by Malcolm MacDonald

The Fantino Brief contained a number of statements that alleged that Mr. MacDonald had abused young people. Ron Leroux claimed that he had seen Mr. MacDonald having sex with a boy at the Saltaire Motel in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, and that he had seen him on Birch Avenue in Fort Lauderdale, a “known pick up spot” for young male prostitutes. Mr. Leroux also claimed that Mr. MacDonald would bring young boys and prostitutes to his cottage.

Mr. Leroux further alleged that Mr. MacDonald had Polaroid pictures of naked minors in his office, and C-8 claimed that Mr. MacDonald had shown him pictures of nude males, “some that are young and some that are adults.” C-19 alleged that Mr. MacDonald had given a young person, C-5, money for sex.

Detective Constable Steve Seguin was the lead investigator into allegations of abuse by Mr. MacDonald.

Allegations of C-5

C-5 was interviewed by Detective Constables Seguin and Joe Dupuis on September 30, 1997. C-5 told the officers that he was abused by Ken Seguin and that Mr. Seguin had introduced him to Mr. MacDonald when he was thirteen or fourteen years old. He claimed that Mr. MacDonald would give him money or drugs in exchange for sex. He also alleged that Mr. MacDonald had taken nude pictures of him in his office in Cornwall. In addition, C-5 told the officers that he had been abused by Father MacDonald. C-5’s complaint against Father MacDonald is described in the section “Project Truth Investigation of Father Charles MacDonald.”

Allegations of C-10

Prior to meeting with Project Truth, C-10 disclosed his allegations of abuse by Mr. MacDonald to Constable Perry Dunlop. C-10 contacted Constable Dunlop and met with him on January 19, 1998. They met again about a week later at Constable Dunlop’s home. According to C-10, “He steered me to the Project Truth investigation.”

On January 26, 1998, C-10 contacted Project Truth. On February 3, Detective Constables Seguin and Genier interviewed C-10, who alleged that he had been abused by a number of individuals, including Mr. MacDonald. He claimed that he was abused by his probation officer, Mr. Seguin, beginning when he was thirteen to fourteen years old. Mr. Seguin referred C-10 to Mr. MacDonald for legal representation when he was fifteen or sixteen years old, and C-10 alleged that Mr. MacDonald subsequently abused him.

C-10 also alleged that he had been abused by Carl Allen and a Father Scott, although C-10 could not remember the priest's first name. As mentioned in the mandate section of this chapter, C-10's allegations against Mr. Allen were referred to the Cornwall Police Service for investigation. The officers eventually determined that the priest was Father Donald Scott, who died prior to Project Truth.

On June 26, 1998, Detective Constable Genier took a second statement from C-10 to clarify some of the details surrounding his alleged abuse by Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Seguin.

Allegations of C-21

The third individual to make allegations against Mr. MacDonald was C-21, whom Detective Constables Seguin and Genier interviewed on December 16, 1998. He alleged that he had been abused on numerous occasions by Jean Luc Leblanc. Some of this abuse occurred at Mr. Leblanc mother's cottage in Quebec. According to C-21, there were parties at the cottage where numerous adults would abuse children, and he claimed that he saw Mr. MacDonald at these parties, but he did not see him abuse anyone. C-21 also alleged that Mr. MacDonald had abused him once at the cottage.

Detective Constable Seguin testified that Detective Constable Genier passed information on to the police in Quebec regarding the alleged offences that took place in their jurisdiction. The Quebec police did not lay any charge based on these allegations.

As will be discussed in the section "Investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc," Mr. Leblanc was investigated by Project Truth. He was charged with and pleaded guilty to numerous sexual offences involving a number of complainants, including two charges related to C-21.

Interviews With Malcolm MacDonald

On June 8, 1998, Detective Constables Genier and Dupuis took cautioned statements from Mr. MacDonald relating to the allegations made by C-5 and C-10. Mr. MacDonald acknowledged that C-5 was a former client of his, but denied the allegations of abuse. He claimed not to know C-10.

On November 18, 1998, Detective Constables Seguin and Genier took another statement from Mr. MacDonald. The focus of the interview was the allegations made by Mr. Leroux. Mr. MacDonald was asked whether he had ever possessed nude male photographs. He denied the allegation.

Mr. MacDonald was interviewed again on December 17, 1999, by Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis, this time specifically in relation to the settlement with David Silmser. They did not question him regarding the allegations of sexual abuse nor did they ask about the allegations made by C-21 regarding his connections to Mr. Leblanc. This was a missed opportunity. I note that in their investigation of Mr. MacDonald generally, the officers did not appear to pursue his linkages to other alleged perpetrators of sexual abuse. Further, despite allegations that he was in possession of nude photos of C-5 and possibly other young people, the Project Truth officers did not attempt to get a search warrant to obtain them.

Crown Opinion

On July 7, 1998, a Crown brief was submitted to Shelley Hallett. She did not provide an opinion until eight months later, on March 9, 1999. This delay is discussed in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

Arrest and Release of Malcolm MacDonald

On March 11, 1999, Mr. MacDonald was charged with indecent assault and gross indecency in relation to C-5, and with indecent assault against C-10.

In May 1999, Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall travelled to Florida to investigate some of the allegations made by Mr. Leroux. They met with Fort Lauderdale police and asked if they had any information on Mr. MacDonald. The Fort Lauderdale police had no record of contact with him. The officers also went to the Saltaire Motel and spoke to the owner’s wife. She confirmed that Mr. MacDonald was a client, that he may have had male guests at night, but that he was “no trouble.” In a written interview, the motel owner later told Detective Inspector Hall that “I have never-ever witnessed any sexual misconduct with anybody staying at Saltaire motel.” Project Truth’s investigation of the allegations in Florida is discussed in greater detail in the “Conspiracy Investigation” section of this chapter.

Death of Malcolm MacDonald

Mr. MacDonald died in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, on December 23, 1999, and on January 11, 2000, the Crown withdrew all charges against him. Detective Inspector Hall testified that they were aware that Mr. MacDonald travelled to Florida in the wintertime.

I do not find the delay in investigating this matter unreasonable in the circumstances. It is unfortunate that Mr. MacDonald was not charged until March 11, 1999, but that was in large part due to the delay in obtaining an opinion from the Crown, which is described in Chapter 11.

C-8's Allegations Against Ron Leroux and Jacques Martell

As noted in previous sections in this chapter, C-8 was a complainant in the Marcel Lalonde and Father Charles MacDonald cases. He had spoken to Constable Perry Dunlop, Constable Dunlop's lawyer, and others during Constable Dunlop's private investigation in 1996 and 1997, and had provided them with statements, some of which were included in the Fantino Brief. C-8 also provided statements to Detective Constable Don Genier in January 1997, prior to the inception of Project Truth.

During the course of Project Truth, the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) investigated and prepared Crown briefs in relation to two other allegations made by C-8. He alleged that he had been abused by Ron Leroux and by Jacques Martell. No charges were laid in either case. As described in the section "Investigations of Complaints of Ron Leroux and C-15," Mr. Leroux was himself an alleged victim of sexual abuse. He was also a key complainant in the Fantino Brief and in support of Constable Perry Dunlop's amended statement of claim in his civil action against the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and others.

Statements to the OPP on January 23, 1997

The OPP first became aware of C-8's allegations against Mr. Leroux in January 1997, prior to Project Truth. On January 23, 1997, C-8 gave two statements to the OPP, in respect of his allegations against Father MacDonald and Mr. Lalonde. In the statement dealing with Mr. Lalonde, C-8 claimed that Mr. Leroux assaulted him and that this abuse occurred after the abuse by Mr. Lalonde. C-8 explained that he met Mr. Leroux and moved in with him when he was fifteen years old. As C-8 described it in his testimony, Mr. Leroux "got Mr. Lalonde away from me."

Detective Constable Don Genier, who was conducting the interview, asked C-8 if he would be willing to give another video statement about these allegations against Mr. Leroux and C-8 agreed. I have seen no evidence to indicate that a further statement was taken at this time specifically in relation to the allegations against Mr. Leroux. During both of these interviews, C-8 also alleged that three other men "came on to him." It does not appear that Detective Constable Genier asked any follow-up questions about these three individuals, although C-8 was later interviewed in respect of his allegations against Jacques Martell. This interview will be discussed below.

C-8 was interviewed again by Detective Constables Genier and Chris McDonell on February 27, 1997. The statement was primarily about his contacts with Constable Dunlop. In this statement, he told the officers that he had told Constable Dunlop about his alleged abuse by Mr. Leroux.

Statements Contained in the Fantino Brief and in Other Disclosure Provided by Constable Perry Dunlop

The Fantino Brief, which formed the basis of the Project Truth investigation, contained a statement from C-8 that dealt primarily with his alleged abuse by Father MacDonald and Mr. Lalonde. C-8 mentioned in the statement that he lived with Mr. Leroux and that Mr. Leroux showed him nude photographs of “young kids,” but he did not mention any sexual contact.

Constable Dunlop later provided notes to Project Truth in October 1997 that identified Mr. Leroux as a possible “pedophile” but did not specifically link him to C-8.

C-8 Is Interviewed About His Allegations Against Ron Leroux

A year and a half after C-8’s initial statement to Detective Constable Genier, Detective Constable Joe Dupuis interviewed C-8 about his allegations against Mr. Leroux on May 12, 1998. In his statement, C-8 explained how he met Mr. Leroux. C-8 was fifteen years old when he moved in with Mr. Leroux, who was approximately seventeen years older than him. As mentioned in his testimony, C-8 moved in with Mr. Leroux because he “had nothing else to do” and Mr. Leroux was like a big brother. C-8 alleged that the abuse began after he moved in with Mr. Leroux, although there had been an earlier overture. He mentioned the gifts Mr. Leroux bought him, including a car, a bike and jewellery. C-8 also said that Mr. Leroux convinced him to drop out of school and did not want him to have a girlfriend.

C-8 alleged that at one point he was ready to move out and Mr. Leroux “freaked out,” pointed a gun at his head, and said, “You’re not leaving, or I’ll kill ya.” C-8 also said that Mr. Leroux kept telling him he was going to kill himself. C-8, who was twenty-two or twenty-three years old at the time, stayed following this threat. He told Detective Constable Dupuis that it was hard for him to leave because “if I leave then I got this on my conscious [sic].” C-8 moved out a few years later around the fall/summer of 1992, at the age of twenty-five.

When asked how many incidents of abuse there were, C-8 responded that between ten and a thousand, the number of incidents was closer to a thousand. Detective Constable Dupuis asked if there was any consent in the encounters with Mr. Leroux. C-8 replied, “No, I never told him he could do anything ... I never, I never said yes, I always said no. I never once said yes.” He told Detective Constable Dupuis about a young boy who moved in with Mr. Leroux before he did. C-8 thought the boy was thirteen or fourteen years old at the time. Detective Constable Dupuis subsequently interviewed this individual, who said he lived with Leroux for one and a half years when he was seventeen or eighteen years old. He told Detective Constable Dupuis that Mr. Leroux had not tried to do anything of a sexual nature. This person refused to give a formal statement, and Detective Constable Dupuis noted that it was apparent that this individual was afraid of Mr. Leroux.

C-8 also discussed the fact that around 1991, Mr. Leroux transferred to him the title of the property where they had both lived for a number of years. In 1992, they entered into an agreement, prepared by lawyer Malcolm MacDonald, which provided that the house belonged to C-8 but Mr. Leroux could stay there, and that when and if the property was sold, C-8 would pay Mr. Leroux $80,000. C-8 indicated that Mr. Leroux later chose to move out and wanted money to move in with his girlfriend in the United States, so C-8 gave him the balance of the money he owed him. C-8 then moved back into the house. C-8 believed this was in late 1993 or early 1994, after the suicide of Ken Seguin.

On December 10, 1998, Detective Constable Dupuis interviewed C-8 again, asking him some clarifying questions about the alleged threats by Mr. Leroux that C-8 mentioned in his May 1998 interview.

Ron Leroux Not Aware of Investigation

Mr. Leroux testified that he met C-8 in September 1979 or 1980 and that C-8 lived with him for ten to twelve years beginning when he was approximately sixteen years old. Mr. Leroux acknowledged that during the time C-8 lived with him, their relationship became more than platonic. According to Mr. Leroux, he was not aware an investigation was conducted into sexual abuse allegations made by C-8 against him. He did not remember ever being interviewed as an alleged perpetrator.

Mr. Leroux was interviewed by two OPP officers in Orillia on February 7, 1997. During this interview, the officers asked Mr. Leroux if he had been in a homosexual relationship, at which point Mr. Leroux told them about meeting C-8 who was sixteen years old at the time. However, he said that the sexual relationship did not begin until C-8 was eighteen or nineteen. Mr. Leroux testified that during this interview the officers did not seem to be suggesting that they were investigating a crime. I have not heard any evidence to indicate that the officers who conducted this interview were aware of the allegations made by C-8, as Mr. Leroux was being interviewed in relation to his own abuse and other matters.

Mr. Leroux was interviewed again by the OPP on November 25, 1997. At the outset of the interview, Detective Constable Genier stated that the interview is about “sexual abuse information and allegations” in the Cornwall area. Partway through the interview, Mr. Leroux was asked about his relationship with C-8. He told the officers that the sexual relationship with C-8 did not begin until C-8 was twenty-one years old. It is apparent that neither of these two interviews was specifically in relation to the abuse alleged by C-8 against Mr. Leroux. Both of these interviews occurred before C-8 provided a statement to Detective Constable Dupuis in May 1998. It does not appear that an attempt was made to take a cautioned statement from Mr. Leroux as part of the investigation into C-8’s allegations.

Crown Brief Submitted for Recommendation

A Crown brief was prepared and submitted to the Crown for a recommendation on or about February 9, 1999. On September 20, 1999, Crown Paul Vesa provided an opinion on the Leroux matter. He determined that there was no reasonable prospect of conviction, based on a number of factors:

- C-8’s allegations were uncorroborated and depended almost entirely on C-8’s evidence.
- C-8 did not come forward at an early stage about these allegations. He gave several statements about other matters in which he did not mention allegations against Leroux.
- C-8 lived with Leroux for approximately twelve years, well into his adult life, and for a lot of the period, Mr. Leroux was not in a position of power over C-8.
- C-8’s criminal conviction for sexual assault would affect his credibility.
- There was evidence showing that C-8 had an animus against Mr. Leroux.

Investigation of Jacques Martell

C-8 also alleged that he had been abused by a man named Jacques Martell. Mr. Martell was interviewed by Detective Constable Dupuis on December 10, 1998, and a cautioned statement was obtained. He admitted to a few sexual encounters with C-8 but said the sex was consensual. A Crown brief was prepared and submitted to the Crown for recommendation on February 9, 1999. On or about February 25, 1999, Crown Alain Godin provided an opinion that there was insufficient evidence to proceed.

C-8's View of the Investigation

C-8 testified that he did not recall anything happening concerning his allegations against Mr. Leroux. He did not remember anyone telling him that a Crown attorney gave an opinion nor explaining why charges were not going to be brought. He said, "As far as I'm concerned it just didn't go anywhere. It was just a waste of my time."

Unfortunately, Detective Constable Genier did not testify, and I have not seen any evidence about why C-8 was not interviewed sooner, either before or during Project Truth, in relation to his allegations of abuse against Mr. Leroux and Mr. Martell. I am therefore unable to make any findings on this point. However, I am concerned about the length of the delay and its impact on C-8.

This said, C-8 and his alleged abusers were interviewed, and the complaints were investigated. Briefs were prepared and submitted to the Crown, who advised that the OPP should not proceed with charges in either case.

Investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc

Jean Luc Leblanc was convicted in 1986 of gross indecency relating to the molestation of young boys. He received a suspended sentence and was placed on probation for three years. In August 1998, the mother of one of the boys abused by Mr. Leblanc contacted the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) after Mr. Leblanc was seen in the company of young boys in and around Cornwall. The CPS passed on her concerns to the Lancaster Detachment of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), which did not pursue the matter.

Project Truth became aware of Mr. Leblanc in December 1998 and launched an investigation that led to his eventual conviction on eighteen charges related to sexual abuse.

Failure of OPP to Respond to Complaint in Fall 1998

Vivian Burgess contacted the CPS in August 1998 and notified them that Mr. Leblanc had been seen with young boys between the ages of eight and twelve in and around Cornwall. Mr. Leblanc had been charged twelve years earlier of sexually abusing her two sons, and Ms Burgess was very concerned that he might "be continuing his behaviour of the past."

On September 10, 1998, Constable George Tyo of the Cornwall police contacted Detective Sergeant Randy Millar of the OPP Lancaster Detachment and advised him of the complaint from Ms Burgess. Constable Tyo provided Detective Sergeant Millar with the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation

Cooperative (OMPPAC) number related to the complaint and further advised that Mr. Leblanc was living in Newington, a small town in OPP jurisdiction.

The day after his conversation with Detective Sergeant Millar, Constable Tyo entered a supplementary occurrence report in OMPPAC. The report noted that Constable Tyo “relayed all information to him [Millar] so that they could conduct appropriate checks on Jean Luc Leblanc in their jurisdiction.” The report further stated, “No further action, unless requested by the OPP.”

Detective Inspector Millar, however, testified that he did not remember Constable Tyo telling him that this information was relayed to him for that purpose. Detective Sergeant Millar did not read either of the occurrence reports despite having access to them through OMPPAC.

The OPP took no action on the information provided by Constable Tyo. Detective Sergeant Millar did not direct any of his officers to investigate Mr. Leblanc, and Ms Burgess was not contacted to see if she had any additional information.

Detective Inspector Millar testified that his plan was to set up surveillance on Mr. Leblanc, but that no steps were taken because he lacked the officers. Detective Sergeant Millar was facing a serious resource problem at that time. Five of his detectives had been seconded to other units, including Project Truth. In addition, Detective Sergeant Millar’s detachment was busy investigating a number of homicides, an attempted murder, and multiple robberies and sexual assaults. Detective Inspector Millar testified that the Jean Luc Leblanc matter was given low priority because no offence had been reported. According to Detective Inspector Millar, in order to investigate the Leblanc complaint, he would have had to put aside investigations into reports of actual sexual assault.

Detective Sergeant Millar informed his supervisors on a regular basis that he was having serious resource problems and requested assistance. This included meeting with Superintendent Carson Fougère, Director of Operations, Eastern Region, on November 20, 1998. Following the meeting, Superintendent Fougère discussed Detective Sergeant Millar’s concerns with Rick Deering, Director of Support Services, Eastern Region, and Chief Superintendent R.J. Eamer, and was told that there were no more resources. Detective Sergeant Millar had to make do with what he had.

Detective Inspector Millar testified, and the OPP conceded in submissions before me, that less resource-intensive measures were available. At minimum, Detective Sergeant Millar should have put out a “Zone Alert,” a printed bulletin informing officers that Mr. Leblanc was living in the area and directing them to identify any young boys he was seen with. Detective Sergeant Millar also should have informed his superiors of the information received.

It is impossible to determine whether Detective Sergeant Millar would have received additional resources had he indicated that these were necessary to conduct surveillance on Mr. Leblanc. I accept Detective Inspector Millar's evidence that he had repeatedly made his supervisors aware of the lack of resources. However, as Detective Inspector Millar admits, he never asked for resources specifically to deal with the Jean Luc Leblanc matter. In my view, he did not see it as sufficiently important. Detective Inspector Millar testified, "I was telling him [Millar's supervisor] that I didn't have sufficient resources to deal with real occurrences, actual offences. There is no offence. It would have been a nicety to be able to do surveillance on Leblanc."

In his testimony before me, Detective Inspector Millar said that he also chose not to take action because Mr. Leblanc could have been with the boys for legitimate reasons (e.g., they were relatives) and because, based on the information received, Detective Inspector Millar believed that any offences that had occurred would have taken place within CPS jurisdiction. These justifications were not mentioned in Detective Inspector Millar's will-state, nor in his evidence before the Police Services Board.

Having reviewed the evidence, I find that the failure to respond to the information relating to Mr. Leblanc can be attributed first to the lack of resources available at the Lancaster Detachment but also, and importantly, to a failure to recognize the dangers of a convicted sexual offender associating with children. There was sufficient awareness of those dangers in 1998 that the report about Mr. Leblanc should have been given higher priority. Notwithstanding the serious resource constraints he was operating under, I find that Detective Sergeant Millar could and should have taken some action in relation to the information received from CPS about Mr. Leblanc.

Project Truth Becomes Aware of Allegations Against Jean Luc Leblanc

Mr. Leblanc first came to the attention of Project Truth officers on December 15, 1998, during the Malcolm MacDonald investigation. A witness indicated that C-21 had been abused by Mr. Leblanc as well as by Mr. MacDonald.

On the evening of December 16, 1998, Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Don Genier interviewed C-21. He alleged that Mr. Leblanc had abused him on many occasions, approximately ten to fifteen years before when he was between the ages of eleven and fifteen. C-21 also alleged that Mr. MacDonald had abused him at a cottage belonging to Mr. Leblanc's mother.

Detective Sergeant Pat Hall reviewed C-21's statement the following day. Detective Sergeant Hall, Detective Inspector Tim Smith, and the other Project Truth officers were of the view that there were insufficient reasonable and probable grounds to arrest Mr. Leblanc at that time based on C-21's statement alone. They believed they needed further corroboration of the allegations, given that they were historical and of a somewhat unusual nature. All of these officers dispute the finding of a Police Services Board investigation into Detective Sergeant Millar's failure to take action on the information he received about Mr. Leblanc in September 1998. The Police Services Board found that Project Truth had sufficient grounds to arrest Mr. Leblanc on December 17, 1998. Given the decision of the officers not to arrest Mr. Leblanc on that date, I believe they took appropriate action in subsequently initiating surveillance quickly.

Detective Constable Seguin was assigned to be the lead investigator into the allegations against Mr. Leblanc. On December 17, 1998, he conducted an OMPPAC and Canadian Police Information Centre search on Mr. Leblanc, and learned that he had been convicted of sexual offences in 1986. He also discovered the occurrence reports entered by the CPS officers on August 7 and September 11, 1998, and learned that Detective Sergeant Millar had received information about Mr. Leblanc on September 10, 1998. Detective Sergeant Hall contacted Detective Inspector Smith and advised him of C-21's allegations and the OMPPAC reports. Detective Inspector Smith determined that surveillance should be conducted on Mr. Leblanc.

On December 18, 1998, Detective Inspector Smith contacted Detective Sergeant Millar and learned that nothing had been done with the information he had received because of a lack of manpower. Detective Inspector Smith insisted that some action needed to be taken. Accordingly, arrangements were made for Project Truth officers to conduct surveillance jointly with officers from Detective Sergeant Millar's detachment.

Surveillance of Jean Luc Leblanc

Surveillance began on December 21, 1998, but was called off early that day due to freezing rain and fog. Surveillance continued on December 22, 24, 29, and 30.

